Not long ago, a young man left his youthful wife, and I think, two little children, to take command of a whale ship. It was his first voyage as master. Having a mind of great native delicacy and sensitiveness, his anxiety was extreme that he might gratify his friends and satisfy his owners by a successful voyage. Devoting himself with unwearied fidelity and heroism to his arduous enterprise, he was rapidly filling his ship with oil, when one night he was driven upon a hidden reef, in the Pacific Ocean; and in a few hours his ship, with all its contents, was scattered in fragments over the waves. He, with the crew, escaped to an island, in the boats. And there they stood, upon a beach of an uncivilized island, penniless, and all their prospects utterly blighted. But the disappointment and the mortification were too great for his sensitive spirit to endure. The blow spared the body, but demolished the mind. As he thought of going home, to his loved family, with not a dollar to minister to their comfort; and of having the owners attribute the loss of the ship to his want of skill, the thought was more than he could bear, and with reason entirely dethroned, he is, perhaps, at this hour, wandering about the islands of the Pacific, a melancholy lunatic, living upon the charity of the natives. But who can describe the anguish which now rends the bosom of his wife. It was a refined and noble mind that was thus wrecked. It was an affectionate husband and fond father that was thus lost by a calamity far more deplorable than death. This is a cup of woe of no ordinary bitterness. It is indeed true, that "there is sorrow on the sea." And they who in such a city as this are searching out such cases of grief, and ministering solace to such afflictions, deserve encouragement and support from every one who has a heart to sympathize, or a mite to contribute.

Almost every ship that enters your port brings some tragic tale from the distant ocean. A fallen block dislocates a shoulder, or crashes a foot. There is no surgeon to be found within six weeks' sail. And under the tropics mortification soon ensues, and life is the forfeit. When the United States banner is unfurled at the head of the flagstaff in Nantucket, announcing that a returning a Cape Horn ship is seen in the distant horizon, it rolls a wave of intensest emotion over the whole island. Who are returning in that ship? Is it my father, husband, child, who have already been absent four years? Am I, in a few hours, to hear their loved voices, and to clasp them to my bosom? Or, is the ship to enter the harbor with the flag at half-mast, announcing that the loved one whose return I have been for many years so impatiently anticipating, is in the grave? Ah! that little speck, just visible in the dim distance, is fraught with tidings of inexpressible joy to some families, and of unutterable woe to others.

A ship returned not long ago from the Pacific, announcing to one lady that her husband had been taken sick at sea, and could not prosecute his voyage. He had therefore been left upon an island with the natives, while the ship proceeded on a cruise. In about six months the ship was to return to the island, and take the sufferer off, in case he should then be alive. And the wife would probably hear no tidings from him again, in less than a year. Wife and mother! make this case your own. Think of your husband; look upon your babes; and conceive what would be your anguish were you to pass the long twelve months of another year in this dreadful suspense. I may remark, that the ship returned to the island, and found the sick man restored to health. He resumed the command and returned home, after a four years' absence, enriched with the treasures of the deep. A few weeks after his return, in the name of the Father, Son and Holy Ghost, he publicly consecrated himself to the service of his Maker. And in the narrative of his religious experience, he referred with peculiar interest to the weary months of sickness and of sorrow, he passed among the natives of that uncivilized island. But he is now again rocked on the billows of the mighty deep, far away upon the broad expanse of the Pacific. And when I last took his hand, in the hour of his departure, and prayed that God might bless him, his eyes were swimming in tears, his voice inarticulate through emotion, and he could not utter one word of adieu, as he bowed his head and wept.

Tidings were brought to another wife that her husband had crushed his leg beneath a hogshead of oil. The ship was several weeks' sail from any port. The life of the sufferer depended upon their getting to some surgeon, who could amputate the limb. They immediately steered for the nearest port. And as the ship rolled in the vast surges of the Pacific ocean, week after week, this poor sufferer, far from wife or sister or daughter, groaned with agony in his cheerless berth. The moment the anchor was dropped in the harbor, a boat was sent for a surgeon. He came on board, bringing his instruments with him. The limb was amputated. But it was too late. The sufferer died that night.

Tidings were brought to another, that her husband, with a boat's crew, left the ship in pursuit of a whale. The harpoon was plunged into the animal, and with railroad speed he rushed through the deep, carrying them beyond sight of the ship. The darkness of the night came on and they did not appear. The winds rose and roared over the agitated ocean. Guns were fired, lights suspended, shouts raised, through the dismal hours of the night, to attract the lost boat. The morning dawned—a morning of darkness and tempests, of careering wind, and pouring rain, and foaming seas. And though anxious eyes were strained from every spar over the tempest-lashed deep, no glimpse of the lost boat could be obtained. Thus they cruised for three days and nights in unavailing vigilance and sorrow, and then relinquished the pursuit. What awful tidings are these to bring the mother of a helpless family.

Those ladies who devote themselves to searching out such scenes, and carrying to such firesides sympathy and relief, deserve to be supported by no stinted charity. The hand of benevolence should keep their purse full. We do indeed forget our duty, if we allow them to go to one such desolated home, and say to the weeping sufferer, we can bring you nothing but our sympathy and our prayers. You who know not want, and whose homes are blest with all that earth can afford, it is in your power greatly to alleviate these scenes of human suffering, and thus to draw down upon you the blessings of the God of the widow and the fatherless.

TURKISH PARABLE.—A traveler who spent some time in Turkey, relates a beautiful parable which was told him by a dervise, and which seems even more beautiful than Sterne's celebrated figure of the accusing spirit and the recording angel. Every man, said he, has two angels, one on his right shoulder and one on his left. When he does any thing good, the angel on his right shoulder writes it down and seals it; because what is once well done is done for ever. When he does evil, the angel upon his left shoulder writes it down, but does not seal it. He waits till midnight. If before that time the man bows down his head and exclaims, 'Gracious Allah! I have sinned—forgive me!' the angel rubs it out; but if not, at midnight he seals it, and the angel upon the right shoulder weeps.

SINGULAR ENTRY IN A PARISH REGISTER.—In the Burial Register of the parish of St. Thomas à Beket, Lymington, is to be found the subjoined:—"Died, on the 13th day of May, A. D. 1733, aged 66, Samuel Baldwin, late an inhabitant of this parish. N. B.—But he was not buried hereat, for his body was, in accordance with his last will, cast into the sea, sans ceremonie, a little way off from the Needle Rocks, and in the presence of much people."

"THAT FAITHFUL AND WISE STEWARD."

The doctrine that every man is a steward of God in the use of what he possesses, is one of the most practical and essential doctrines of the Bible. Yet, practical and essential as it is, there is scarcely any doctrine more constantly overlooked. In the anxious strife for wealth, and the careful balancing of plans and prospects, men lose sight of their personal dependence upon the Creator and obligation to him. This is not unfrequently the case even with those who, in their better moments, acknowledge that worldly property is simply a means to an end—the glory of God; that to regard it in any other light is gross idolatry; and that to refuse to use it for this noble purpose is flagrant sin. The language of Scripture is sufficiently explicit on this point. It assures us, that the worship of God and Mammon cannot exist together. There must be no rivalry here in our affections. It is only by making the love of gain, and the pursuit of those avocations in which it is found, subservient to the higher and nobler purposes of our being, that we are safe from a groveling selfishness unworthy of the Christian.

The influence of pursuing the ordinary avocations of life with simple reference to advancing the interests of religion, would be most happy. An individual acting from such a motive, would find his labors doubly attractive, and would perform them with double pleasure—a pleasure ever increasing, as his means of conferring benefits increased, and his own nature was developed. His influence upon those with whom he might come in contact, to modify their selfish views, and direct their attention to religious considerations, would be powerful. Nor would it end here; his example would certainly awaken in others holding the same profession with himself, a sense of obligation to go and do likewise. It is not possible for any individual, however humble, to pursue such a course consistently and perseveringly, without making an impression useful and lasting. The example of Jesus Christ, the Man of Sorrows, may well encourage such persons in their work. He went about doing good; and in this respect was a pattern for all his followers. They ought to feel that the property placed in their hands is designed to give them the means of promoting his cause and becoming like him. The history of good men in all ages, shows very clearly, that those who have done much to advance the interests of religion, have been to a great extent under the controlling influence of this feeling.

We question whether there has ever been a time when the enforcement of the doctrine of man's stewardship was more loudly called for than at present. In nearly every department of Christian enterprise, the field of labor is widening, and the appeal for help is heard. Many have entered the field, and are laboring with great self-denial. Others have their eyes turned towards it, and would gladly put in the sickle if assured of the countenance and support of those who ought to be their fast friends. But alas, how few of those who possess the means, or are in circumstances to acquire them, feel their obligation to be co-workers by consecrating their substance to the Lord. How many allow their whole time and thought to be engrossed in acquiring riches which are so used as to become a snare rather than a blessing. Those who possess little are often discouraged by the course of those who possess much; while those to whom much is given are often envied by those who possess less. In such a state of things, the spirit of piety is destroyed and duty left undone. The only remedy for this evil, we believe, is in the faithful preaching of the doctrine of man's stewardship. Let it be well understood, that whether we have little or much, what we have is entrusted to us as stewards; that large possessions, while they increase our ability to do good, equally increase our accountability; that our property, time, and talents, are but means to an end; and that hereafter a strict account must be given of the manner in which we have used what was committed to our keeping;—and, if we mistake not, the remembrance of these facts would greatly modify the present aspect of things, and lead to a more entire consecration to the work of extending the knowledge of the truth.

THE GERMANS.

The American Messenger contains some interesting statements respecting the extent and importance of the German emigrant interest in this country. From 1,500,000 to 2,000,000 Germans have already established themselves among us, and entered into the various relations of society. They are the landholders of some of the finest districts in the country, and control the wealth of several influential States. Their number is rapidly increasing. A movement is said to be on foot, in a single German principality, for the emigration to this country of 250,000 of its population. In view of such facts, the question becomes an important one, as to what is their character, and what are the influences under which it is developing? Many of them come from those regions where the Church is connected with the State, and where the practical infidelity of the priesthood or the neology of the learned has led them to despise a spiritual faith. When they reach this country, they often become the prey of speculators and sharpers to such an extent as to render them jealous and suspicious of every thing American. The consequence is, that they generally seek communities speaking their own tongue and agreeing with them in religious belief; so that instead of amalgamating with our population, and adopting our modes of thought, they actually become more Germanic than they were at home. Practical piety, family devotion, social religious meetings, and active efforts for the eternal benefit of men by means of benevolent institutions, are not only neglected, but often associated with fanaticism and new measures. Here, then, is a field to be cultivated—a field which, from its peculiar relation to the American churches, calls loudly for their contemplation and effort.

POPERY AND PROTESTANTISM.

It is a remarkable fact, that at the present time popery is rapidly gaining ground in many protestant countries, while protestantism is spreading with equal rapidity in papal countries. In England and the United States, within five years past, the numbers and influence of the Romish Church have increased beyond any precedent in the history of that church. In France, on the other hand, as well as in many of the smaller European States, a great revolution is going on among the papists, by which hundreds have been led to renounce popery and adopt the protestant faith. This may account for the recent efforts on the part of Rome to put a stop to the circulation of Bibles and good books. These facts, taken together, certainly indicate that preparation is now making for a great conflict yet to take place between the two systems—a conflict in which the religion of God's word simply will be arrayed against that of man's invention—the religion of the heart against that of form. Who is prepared for such a conflict?

"THE LORD'S DAY."

"I was in the spirit on the Lord's day."—Rev. 1: 10.

"Lord's Day" is used by many as the distinctive title of the first day of the week, and with as much assurance of its correctness as if they were informed somewhere in the Scriptures that the expression was actually intended for that day of the week by the Apostle John. The Scriptures, however, no where intimate such an intention on the part of the inspired writer, much less justify a breach of the fourth commandment by such an expression. We have the traditions of men only as our rule of faith, when we assume that "Lord's day" is synonymous with Sunday.

If the misapplication of the title "Lord's day" were objectionable on no other ground than that of sustaining the observance of a festival in the church, it might be allowed to remain in the balance, to exhibit the lightness of the arguments of our adversaries, when weighed against the express Word of God in relation to the Sabbath. But it may be more extensively disastrous, inasmuch as the wresting of any Scripture from the support of its appropriate theme, tends to obscure the truth which that Scripture was intended to reveal to our minds. The phrase in question does not establish the supposed change of the Sabbath as of divine appointment, and is therefore of no real value to that argument, while it may, by misconstruction, obscure the whole subject, if not entirely destroy the sense of an important prophecy of the Spirit of God. It is not supposed by this, that the seventh day will be more clearly sustained by denying the application of the terms to the first day; it would be supererogatory for this purpose; it is not needed, even were it applicable to no other question.

The phrase in the original, Εν κυριακη ἡμερα, translated "on the Lord's day," in our English version, signifies more accurately the lordly day, not as a name for a weekly day, but to designate a revealed day—a spiritual day—a day of great and special revelation of the Lord by the Spirit, that things might be made known to John. A lordly day, because the Lord Jesus in a solemn manner admitted him by the Spirit into his glorious presence, and showed him things that must shortly come to pass. "I was in the Spirit on the lordly day, and heard behind me a great voice, as of a trumpet, saying, I am Alpha and Omega," &c.; "and I turned to see the voice that spake with me; and being turned, I saw seven golden candlesticks; and in the midst of the seven candlesticks, one like unto the Son of Man, clothed with a garment down to the foot, and girt about the paps with a golden girdle. His head and his hairs were white like wool, as white as snow; and his eyes were as a flame of fire; and his feet like unto fine brass, as if they burned in a furnace; and his voice as the sound of many waters. And he had in his right hand seven stars; and out of his mouth went a sharp two-edged sword; and his countenance was as the sun shineth in his strength." It will be noticed from this description, that the Lord was the special object of the vision; and that to be in the Spirit, was to be carried by the Spirit into the presence of the Lord, whose face shone even as the sun in his strength; so that instead of being Sunday, it was a day to him which needed not the light of the sun; for the Lord himself was the light of it. Into that day was the revelator ushered by the Spirit.

This sense is confirmed by other passages in the book of Revelation. In chap. 4, verses 1, 2, it is said, "After this I looked, and behold a door was opened in heaven—and immediately I was in the Spirit." And chap. 17: 3, "So he carried me away in the Spirit into the wilderness, and I saw a woman sit upon a scarlet-colored beast." Also, chap. 21: 10, "And he carried me away in the spirit to a great and high mountain, and showed me that great city, the holy Jerusalem, coming down out of heaven from God."

Now, if to be in the spirit on the Lord's day, was to be in the spirit on the first day of the week, on what day of the week was John in the Spirit at the commencement of the second vision, (chap. 4,) for it was "AFTER THIS." Will any one say, it was the next Sunday? If a natural day of the week was necessarily connected with the vision, so as to be recorded in the first case, why was not the particular day named in the second?

May we not conclude, then, that the day alluded to by the Revelator, related to the circumstantial features of the lordly vision which he describes, and not to a particular day of the week; for to appropriate the terms of revelation to festival days of the church without a divine warrant is, to say the least of it, darkness rather than light, obscurity rather than clear vision of the truth. It looks much like wresting the Scriptures to our own destruction, when we make void a holy law of God by our traditions—annul the Sabbath—and call a day not divinely appointed, the "LORD'S DAY." LUTHER.

EXTRACT FROM A LETTER.

[A friend in New York has handed us a letter of one of his correspondents, from which we make the following extract. It is exceedingly gratifying and encouraging to know, that our cause is regarded with such feelings by those who are scattered throughout the country. Who that believes in the power of prayer can despond while such facts are before him?]

"The fast-day was a delightful season to me. I trust the Lord of the Sabbath put strength in me that day to plead with Him. After pondering my duty, and praying over it, I determined to repair to the Baptist meeting house, with a bundle of the Address to the Baptists under my arm, and make another effort to arouse attention to the subject. It so happened, that there was a very crowded congregation, brought out to hear a New Year's discourse, it being "the first Sabbath in the new year," as the preacher called it not less than a dozen or twenty times in the course of the sermon. At the close of the service I seized the opportunity to state to the assembly, that about six thousand Christians, in different parts of the United States, were that day humbling themselves before God with fasting and prayer. After a few words entreating them to give attention to the subject, I told them I was prepared to distribute the Address. The people pressed forward at once, and every copy I had was eagerly taken. I believe I could have distributed thrice the number, if I had had them. God only knows what the result will be. His blessing on the effort has been earnestly sought, and I trust the labor will not be in vain. Yet I have nothing else to trust in than the simple promise of God, that his word shall not return to him void.

"I firmly believe we are exerting a more important influence at this time, than any other body of Christians, in proportion to our numbers. We are laying a foundation for great results, to be manifest in after days; and I hope those whose have embarked in the enterprise will not be discouraged. The promise, 'in due season we shall reap, if we faint not,' ought not for one moment to be out of mind. There is no doubt an undercurrent at work, which will break out before long, and bear down every thing before it. 'If ye will not believe, surely ye shall not be established.' The Recorder and the Tract Operation I consider our most important engines of power. If we can sustain other enterprises, well; but let all others go, rather than these should fail."

PIOUS FRAUDS—THE BALTIMORE CONVENTION.

In the Boston Liberator for January 24, we find an article more than five columns long, headed, "A PLEA FOR SUNDAY FREEDOM; in a Letter to John Quincy Adams, President of the late Baltimore Lord's Day Convention; by One of the New Generation." The author of the article, we are told in an editorial notice, "is widely known in literary and philanthropic circles." His design is, to show up some of the inconsistencies of the modern advocates for a stricter observance of Sunday, and then to give his own opinion as to the proper manner of observing that day. To many things contained in the article we cannot subscribe, believing, as we do, that the Sunday Freedom which they advocate would be freedom from wholesome restraint rather than from what they call cruel and oppressive despotism. To many other things, we do subscribe most heartily, as our readers well know from what we have heretofore said upon the subject. Weigh the following extracts, and then say if we have not done justly in charging much of the neglect of Sunday upon the uncandid and unjustifiable course of the avowed friends of that day:—

"Our Sabbatarian* friends in the Convention—and such, too, is their practice out of it—took, in the first instance, very high ground. They know well the force of arrogant assumption to overawe weak minds. Their very first Resolution 'gratefully recognizes the wisdom and goodness of Jehovah in the appointment of the Sabbath, in the sanction which he gave it by his own example, in his command to men to remember it and keep it holy, and in the blessings which it has been the means of conferring upon those who have kept it, according to his will, in all ages of the world.'

"This resolution expresses a great deal, and assumes and implies a great deal more. It contains, in the first place, an express endorsement of the Mosaic account of the creation of the world, and of the institution of the Jewish Sabbath, as being literally and historically true. It assumes and implies, that the Jewish Sabbath and Christian Sunday are the same thing; and that whatever was the origin and obligation of one, is also the origin and obligation of the other."

* * * * *

"Grant, however, for the purpose of the argument, that the account given by Moses of the origin of the Jewish Sabbath is literally and historically correct. This concession, so far from aiding the Sabbatarians, only involves them in impious inconsistency. Everybody, who has the slightest tincture of historical or theological knowledge, knows that the Christian Sunday is not the Jewish Sabbath, but another day. If our friends of the Lord's Day Convention accept, in a literal sense, the Mosaic account of the origin of the Jewish Sabbath; if they really believe it, as the Jews do, to be a commemoration of the rest of the Deity, after the labor of creating the world, and as such, not a mere Jewish ceremony, but of universal and perpetual obligation—why do they not observe it? Why do they not obey a command, for which they profess so profound a reverence? Why do they neglect, altogether, the observance of this Sabbath, and substitute for it another day, commemorative, not of God's rest after creating the world, but of Christ's resurrection? Above all, why are they guilty of the fraud—I say deliberately the fraud—of attempting to palm off upon the ignorant, this Sunday, appointed by nobody knows who, as being the very Jewish Sabbath appointed and observed by God?

"Ecclesiastical history has occasion to make frequent mention of pious frauds—frauds committed and justified as being for the benefit of religion. Several of the early Christian fathers—as you well know, Sir—are but too obnoxious to this charge. Some of them appear to have regarded lying and forgery as very meritorious means of propagating and defending the faith. The Romish church makes free use of these aids; and our Sabbatarian zealots of the Protestant sects, do not shrink from the employment of the same means.

"The first set of resolutions proposed to and passed by the Convention over which you presided, could not have been more artfully drawn, had a deputation of Jesuits assisted in their concoction. The first of the set has been already quoted. In the second and third, it is silently assumed, that the Sunday observed by Christians, is the same Sabbath mentioned in the first resolution. In the fourth resolution, the phrase 'Lord's day' is slily substituted; in the fifth, nothing is spoken of but the 'Christian Sabbath!' This is a piece of ingenious effrontery, equal to that of the metaphysician, who carefully removed, one by one, the threads of his silk stockings, substituting worsted instead, and after every particle of silk was gone, and nothing but worsted remained, still persisted in declaring, that his stockings were silk! Our Protestant doctors may as well give over ridiculing the Catholic miracle of transubstantiation;—for if they, by the mere arts of rhetoric, are able to substitute, for a day of God's appointment, commemorative of his rest, a different day, commemorative of quite a different matter, why need we think it strange if, by similar arts, Catholic priests can transform mere bread and wine into real flesh and blood?

"It is but fair to say, that there were a few honest men in the Convention, unwilling to give countenance to this gross fraud. They attempted to substitute in the resolutions, the phrase 'Lord's day,' in place of the word 'Sabbath,' whenever it occurred, and so to modify the resolutions as to make them consistent with this change of phraseology. These attempts encountered at the hands of your Convention, the most indecent opposition. Hisses even were employed to put them down. An overwhelming majority sustained the pious fraud, and passed the resolution unaltered. They thought, I must conclude, that, however the more intelligent and better informed might see through the falsehood, and despise it, yet the multitudes of the uninformed, particularly women and children, might be kept in the dark a little while longer, by the solemn resolutions of so venerable and pious an assembly! It may, however, be doubted, as one of the movers of the proposed amendments justly observes in his published letter, whether the indecent haste and violence with which the truth was scouted out of your Convention, may not rather tend to defeat the objects of its call.

"This same pious falsehood, I am grieved to find, is again repeated in the Address to the Convention, to which your name is appended. Recommending the observance of the Christian Sabbath, that Address says—'It is a law of God, coeval with the creation. It is one of the selected few of the ten commandments, that brief but comprehensive expression of his will.' I cannot but believe, Sir, that your name was appended to this statement without your knowledge; and I put it to you, whether, consistently with the duty you owe to the community, you can allow that respectable, venerated name, to be thus used as an endorsement to a gross piece of deception. At all events, I am certain that you will not venture publicly to deny, that the corner-stone of the Convention's doctrine, that which forms their first resolution, and that upon which their Address is built, is nothing better than a piece of mere moonshine—a figment invented perhaps by ignorance, but upheld and propagated by fraud. The Christian Sabbath is NOT the Jewish Sabbath."

"Now, by the common consent of all Protestant sects—and this is their great point of difference with the Papists—no tradition, whether as respects doctrine or observance, has any binding authority. Nothing is binding, as religious doctrine or duty, except that which is laid down and commanded in the New Testament. But there is not a single word in the New Testament, that ascribes any particular sanctity to the Sunday. There is not the slightest hint of any command to observe it in any way—much less to observe it with that wearisome superstition and idle austerity practiced by the Jews on their Sabbath."

THE LABORERS AND THE HARVEST.—The Rev. Mr. Winslow, missionary at Madras, mentions sixteen missionaries who have been removed by death from Madras and parts of India westward from that point—six of whom were from America and ten from Europe. Less than one half that number of laborers have been added to the missions during the same period, notwithstanding the call for missionary labor was never so urgent, and the encouragement never so great, as at present.

CHIEF RABBI OF ENGLAND.—The election, which we mentioned some weeks ago, has taken place, and resulted in the choice of Dr. Adler as Chief Rabbi of the Jews in England. He had 121 votes. Of his rivals, the Rev. Dr. Hirschfield, had 13 votes, and Rev. Rabbi Hirsch 2; while three synagogues, having seven votes, declined to give their suffrages at all.

NEW TREATY WITH CHINA.—The treaty concluded with China, through the agency of Mr. Cushing, has been ratified by our government, and is spoken of as very satisfactory. It establishes perfect equality between China and the United States, and contains many provisions not in the English treaty. Mr. Cushing has secured the credit of being a successful negotiator.

REVIVAL.—We are pleased to learn, by a letter from Eld. James H. Cochran, that the 2d Church in Alfred, N. Y., is enjoying a season of refreshing. Eld. S. S. Griswold has assisted the Pastor in a series of meetings which continued two weeks and resulted in much good. Seventeen persons have been baptized, and seven who had formerly been baptized have been added to the church. Two-thirds of the whole number are heads of families.

A DAY OF FASTING AND PRAYER.—The Executive Committee of the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society have recommended that Friday, the 7th day of February next, be observed as a day of fasting, humiliation and prayer, in reference to the proposed Annexation of Texas. They have been prompted to this course by a conviction that annexation is hostile to the morals, liberty, and happiness of the United States; that it is designed to extend the slave system; that this system already calls for the just judgment of an offended God; and that duty requires us, in such circumstances, to invoke the aid of a gracious God against the devices of wicked men.

BAPTIST LITERATURE.—A Society has recently been formed in London, the object of which is to secure a republication of the writings of old and celebrated Baptist authors. The meeting for the purpose was held in the Library of the Mission House, Moorgate street, at which Dr. Steene took the chair, Mr. Underhill read a statement, and interesting remarks were made by several influential Baptist ministers. We are glad to see that the subject is attracting so much attention. It is due alike to the old authors themselves, and to the cause with which they were identified.

CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

In the SENATE, much of the early part of last week was spent in executive sessions. A bill was passed on Wednesday, granting Joshua Shaw $25,000 for his improvements in percussion caps; and another bill was passed establishing the Smithsonian Institute. A Message from the President was laid before the Senate, containing an abstract of the Treaty with China, and recommending the establishment of a consular or other commercial agency in that country. On Thursday the Senate adjourned over until Monday.

The HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES was occupied almost exclusively in discussing the different schemes for annexing Texas to the United States. On Tuesday a resolution was passed, that the debate should terminate on Saturday. This set in motion all those who had speeches to make. Among the speakers on Friday were Gen. Dromgoole, Mr. Barnard, and John Quincy Adams. Mr. Adams spoke for an hour in answer to some charges of a personal character against himself, and in opposition to annexation. On Saturday the galleries of the House were crowded with spectators, among whom were many Foreign Ministers and other distinguished men. The debate was animated, and continued until two o'clock, at which hour tellers were appointed to take the final votes. Several proposed amendments were lost, and the vote was at length taken upon the main question of adopting the Resolution as reported by the committee. It stood, Yeas 120; Nays 98. So the Resolution passed by a majority of 22. The House then adjourned until Monday, it being past 4 o'clock.

The following is a copy of the Joint Resolution declaring the terms on which Congress will admit Texas into the Union as a State:—

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That Congress doth consent that the territory properly included within, and rightfully belonging to the republic of Texas, may be erected into a new State, to be called the State of Texas, with a republican form of government, to be adopted by the people of said republic, by deputies in convention assembled, with the consent of the existing government, in order that the same may be admitted as one of the States of this Union.

SEC. 2. And be it further resolved, That the foregoing consent of Congress is given upon the following conditions, and with the following guarantees, to wit:

First—Said State to be formed, subject to the adjustment by this government of all questions of boundary that may arise with other governments; and the constitution thereof, with the proper evidence of its adoption by the people of said republic of Texas, shall be transmitted to the President of the United States, to be laid before Congress for its final action, on or before the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and forty-six.

Second—Said State, when admitted into the Union, after ceding to the United States all public edifices, fortifications, barracks, ports and harbors, navy and navy-yards, docks, magazines, arms, armaments, and all other property and means pertaining to the public defence belonging to said republic of Texas, shall retain all the public funds, debts, taxes, and dues of every kind which may belong to, or be due and owing said republic; and shall also retain all the vacant and unappropriated lands lying within its limits, to be applied to the payment of the debts and liabilities of the said republic of Texas; and the residue of such lands, after discharging said debts and liabilities, to be disposed of as said State may direct; but in no event are said debts and liabilities to become a charge upon the government of the United States.

Third—New States, of convenient size, not exceeding four in number in addition to said State of Texas, and having sufficient population, may hereafter, by the consent of said State, be formed out of the territory thereof, which shall be entitled to admission under the provisions of the federal constitution. And such States as may be formed out of that portion of said territory lying south of thirty-six degrees thirty minutes north latitude, commonly known as the Missouri compromise line, shall be admitted into the Union, with or without slavery, as the people of each State asking admission may desire. And in such State or States as shall be formed out of said territory north of said Missouri compromise line, slavery, or involuntary servitude, (except for crime,) shall be prohibited.

* The term Sabbatarian is here used for those who advocate the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath. It was so used to some extent in the first discussions of the subject two hundred and fifty years ago; but that class of persons were more commonly called New Sabbatarians, in distinction from those who observed the seventh day, and were the only true Sabbatarians.

FOREIGN NEWS.

The new steamer Cambria reached Boston on Friday last, bringing Liverpool papers of the 4th inst. She brought 90 passengers, among whom are Mr. Leavitt and Mr. Oakley, the Illinois Commissioners. Her freight list is said to be very large, amounting to 250 tons—larger than ever brought by a boat of the line before. The news is not of remarkable interest. The Cotton trade, which was rather at a pause when the Oxford left, had revived, and a partial advance of prices was realized.

The weather continues very severe in England and France. On the ornamental waters in Regent's Park the ice was from two to three inches thick. More than two thousand persons were skating upon it at one time. In France the cold was so intense that a train of merchandize which left Rouen in the night, having been obliged to stop at Meulan to discharge some chests, the oil in the boxes of the wheels became frozen, together with the water in the pipe which communicates from the tender to the machine. The consequence was that the train was obliged to remain there all night. A similar delay occurred on the Paris and Orleans rail road.

Mr. Calhoun's writings concerning the annexation of Texas, and especially the dispatch to Mr. King, have excited much feeling in England. The latter is sharply condemned in the London papers.

The commissioners for the allowance and management of charitable bequests &c., in Ireland, had been appointed under the new act—five Catholics and five Protestants. Of the Catholics, three are prelates of the Irish Church; and Mr. O'Connell has publicly declared his extreme dissatisfaction at their acceptance of the office.

There had been another religious insurrection in Switzerland, caused by a resolution of one of the local governments to entrust the education of youth to Jesuits. It broke out in Lucerne, and for a time threatened to be very formidable, as other cantons seemed to take part in it. It was suppressed, however; two of the leaders were killed, and others took to flight. Strong movements against the Jesuits were in progress in several of the cantons, and great agitation on the subject prevailed.

The Bishop of Exeter has found himself obliged to yield to public opinion on the surplice question. He avowed in the progress of his controversy on the subject, that he did not think it very important whether a clergyman preached his sermon in the surplice or the gown, but insisted on the surplice chiefly because the laity was averse to it.

The London Times advocates the establishment of diplomatic relations between Great Britain and Rome; arguing at great length that they can do no harm, and that they are due to the rights and wishes of the Queen's Roman Catholic subjects.

Burgess, the bank robber, who was arrested at Boston, some time ago, under the Ashburton treaty, was convicted on the 19th of December, and sentenced to transportation for life.

Dr. Wolff had arrived at Teheran, in Persia, on his way to England.

It is said that the King of Prussia, has made up his mind to fulfil the solemn promises made by his father, and bestow a constitution upon his subjects.

The British Government is said to have in contemplation another Arctic expedition for the discovery of a North-West passage.

Mr. Everett, the London papers say, will leave England for the United States early in the Spring.

The Anti-Corn Law League has recommenced its system of agitation for the season, but the opening has been rather unfavorable to their views, the free trade candidate, Dartmouth, having lost the election by a majority of seven. This is a seat gained by their opponents, not simply retained.

The Bank of England has called in all the £1,000 notes, for the purpose of cancelling those stolen from the banking house of Messrs. Rogers & Co. This experiment, it is understood, has been successful. The £1000 notes are principally held by the bankers—rarely by private individuals.

Ireland.—O'Connell appears to be seeking a little more quiet, and has renounced the schemes which, on his release from prison, he declared himself resolved to carry through—the preservative society, and the impeachment, and the mission to England. Age and perpetual exciement, it is not unlikely, are telling upon him. He has retired to Derrynane, and his farwell advice to the people was—"Keep up the rent." The exhortation was apparently needed.

Notwithstanding his opposition to the charitable bequests bill, backed as he was by a large section of the Roman Catholic priesthood, government has succeeded in appointing the commissioners—including two arch-bishops and one bishop of the Roman Catholic Church, who accepted the office; in spite of a resolution of their brethren, assembled at Meath, under the Right Rev. Dr. Kennedy, "that any Roman Catholic, lay or clerical, taking a place on the commission to carry into effect this odious act, deserves the heavy censure of the Church, and the indignant scorn of the people of Ireland."

The whole capital of $800,000 required for the Southern Railway, from Dublin to Cork, was subscribed in three days, and subscribed entirely in Ireland.

Scotland.—Professor Knight, of Marischal College, Aberdeen, died last week from the effects of a severe cold caught while engaged in observing the late lunar eclipse.

It is said that Lord Jeffery has subscribed £1000 to the college of the Free Church, of which he is not a member.

The Rev. Thomas Jolly, minister of Dannet, in the county of Caithness, died in the manse there, on Monday, the 2d ult. at the patriarchal age of ninety-one. Mr. Jolly was the oldest preacher in Scotland, having been upward of sixty-five years at Dannet. He retained his faculties to the last, and preached regularly till within a few weeks of his death, with all the vigor and clearness of his early years. When the disruption in the Church of Scotland took place, the venerable minister addressed a letter to Dr. Chalmers on the subject, which was acknowledged to be one of the ablest of the vast mass of letters and statements which that unfortunate secession called forth.

France.—The French Ministry is said to stand on a less secure foundation than formerly. It was expected that the Guizot Ministry would have to go out, and that Mr. Guizot himself would be replaced by Count Mole.

M. Villemain, the Minister of Public Instruction, has been afflicted with insanity, his restoration from which is doubtful.

The King opened the Chambers on the 26th December.

A letter from Piedmont of the 16th December, states that a great quantity of snow at that date covered the vall eyof the Po. At Turin it fell to the depth of three feet, and so great a weight of it covered the roofs of the houses that men were employed to shovel it off, fears being entertained of the wood work giving way. At Alexandria, Asti, and some other parts of Piedmont, the snow was nearly four feet deep, and when the last accounts left every thing foreboded a most severe winter.

From the East.—The overland mail arrived on the 2d, bringing advices from Bombay to Dec. 2, and from China to October 12.

The disturbances in the Southern Mahratta country were still going on, and had assumed a serious character. The British had taken another of the forts occupied by the insurgents, but the garrison effected their escape. Colonel Outram having retired from the political agency, his successor, Colonel Ovans, had been captured by the insurgents, while on his way to Kholapore, and carried off to a hill fort, where he was still detained but treated with respect.

German Literature in America.—A plan has been projected at Vienna, and received with much interest by the booksellers at Berlin, Leipsic, Frankfort, Stuttgardt, and other principal German towns, for the establishment at Philadelphia, of a grand central depot, for the United States of America, of German literature, on behalf of the leading publishers of Germany. There are in the United States, it is said, nearly five millions of Germans, and no establishment through which they can follow the course of literary publication at home, or procure the works they may desire. To supply this want, and open a new and extensive market, are the objects of this proposed association.

Tschech, who recently attempted the assassination of the King of Prussia, was executed on the 14th ult. at the fortress of Spandau.

From Oregon.—Some eighteen months ago, a government was formed in Oregon, by the white settlers, similar to that of the Territory of Iowa. A sum of money was raised to establish a printing office at the Methodist missionary station at the Willamette. The materials for this office were forwarded from New York last week. News from Oregon has been received to the 2d of August:—

"The Legislature of Oregon adjourned a few days before the 3rd of July, having passed some important laws. One of their acts is, 'Any person who shall make, sell, or give away ardent spirits in the Territory of Oregon, South of Columbia River, shall forfeit and pay $100 for each and every such offence.' The Legislature is called the 'Legislative Committee,' and consists of nine persons elected by the people.

"The officers of the Oregon Territory consist of three Governors, called the Executive Committee, a Supreme Judge, and a Legislative Council. The laws are the same as those governing the Territory of Iowa.

"Since the arrival in Oregon of the Rev. Mr. Gray, some important changes have been going on at the Methodist mission, of which he is superintendent. The Indian school has been discontinued, and the building lately occupied by it has been sold to the Methodist Episcopal Church, lately organized, for a literary institution. The mission has also parted with its mills, herds of cattle, and nearly all its property, which the settlers bought at good prices.

"The lay missionaries were about to be dismissed, but would remain in the colony as settlers. The colony is in a most encouraging condition. The crops were giving promise of an abundant harvest."

Late from Mexico.—The Charleston Courier of the 18th inst., contains the following statements, given by Mr. Tripler, a passenger who arrived at Charleston the day before:—

Mr, T. left Vera Cruz for Havana on the 2d inst. in the British mail steamer Dee, which vessel reached Havana on the 7th inst. At the last accounts Santa Ana was at San Martin de Sesmoluca, about four leagues from Puebla, with a force of about 6,000 men, mostly mounted on horses taken from the inhabitants. Gen. Paredes, being in close pursuit with an army of 9,000 men, but maneuvering and avoiding a conflict as a matter of policy, as Santa Ana's forces were daily decreasing on account of desertions from his ranks, while Gen. P. was rapidly acquiring strength.

The city of Mexico had been well fortified, and every precaution taken to prevent or repel an assault. The aqueducts had been opened, and the mole which surrounds the city filled with water, and there was a force of some 30,000 armed citizens prepared to defend it.

At Vera Cruz, also, fortifications were in progress, and the citizens were arming. The steamer Montezuma left Vera Cruz a short time before the Dee, bound to Campeachy for troops, and reinforcements were also expected from Alvarado and Tlacatalplan.

A decree had been issued by the Mexican Congress declaring Santa Ana a traitor and an outlaw, and authorizing any who may meet with him to take his life. Measures had also been adopted to prevent his escape, by guarding the different seaports and other outlets, and it is believed that he must eventually be captured! A person named Arollano, an individual in the interest of Santa Ana, with additional confidential correspondence, had been taken, and it was supposed he would be executed.

Mr. Tripler states that the whole country is in a state of the utmost confusion—robberies of travelers were committed daily, and he himself was twice stripped of whatever was valuable about him, in his progress through Mexico, but without any indignity being offered to his person. It is the opinion of Mr. T., from what he could learn, that the new government will be as much, if not more virulently, opposed to the annexation of Texas, as the former, and he states that Americans are held in great abhorrence, and receive frequent insults at the hands of the Mexicans.

The Dauphin street Theatre, New Orleans, known as the Théâtre des Variétés, was entirely consumed by fire yesterday morning, Jan. 14.

Etiquette on the Scaffold.—A letter from Presburg, of September 23, in the Gazette des Tribunaux, says: "The murderers of M. de Keznet, one of the deputies of the Diet of Hungary, have just been tried and executed. One of them was Conrad Tornyi, the servant of the deceased, and the other a shoemaker, named Kowaez, who not only aided in the crime, but afterwards robbed his accomplice of all the articles of value which were in M. de Keznet's apartment at Presburg. Tornyi avowed his guilt, and acknowledged that he cut the body in pieces. The sentence of the court was, that Tornyi should be quartered, his body burnt, and the ashes thrown to the wind; and that Kowaez should be decapitated. The prisoners appealed, but the King confirmed the sentence of death, changing Tornyi's punishment into simple beheading. The sentence was carried into execution two days back, in the market place, and a strange incident added to the terrible interest of the scene. The judgment ordered Kowaez to be first executed; but this Tornyi protested against in the strongest terms, declaring that as he was of noble blood, he was entitled to die first. His claim being rejected, he fell on Kowaez, and endeavored to pull him from the block. Kowaez sent him back with a violent blow on the chest; and Tornyi was on the point of giving blow for blow, when the executioner's men seized him and bound him so tight as to prevent his making any exertion. They were both executed in a few minutes after. This singular ambition of Tornyi to have his claim of birth attended to in such circumstances, calls to mind an execution at Copenhagen in 1816, when some men were sentenced to death for exciting their fellow-prisoners to revolt; three of the number had been beheaded, but the fourth refused to place his head on the block, on the ground that the person before him had been a Jew, and that he being a Christian, could object to having his blood mingled with that of a Jew. After some parley, the magistrate granted his objection, and the man having cleaned the block of the blood as well as he could, placed his head down tranquilly, and underwent the sentence."

The Silk Culture in the South.—The Savannah Republican takes strong ground in favor of the cultivation of silk in the South. The editor says that "all that is wanted to give this business an impetus at the South, is the establishment in our seaport of manufactories or of agencies for the purchase of the silk when produced. One of our planters remarked, only a few days since, that he could raise an unlimited number of cocoons; his difficulty was to have it skilfully reeled, and then to find a speedy market for its sale. Such difficulties should not deter them for a moment from its production. They are not half as great as those which the cotton-grower experienced prior to the invention of Whitney's cotton-gin. Silk reels of approved quality can be purchased for a few dollars, and a reasonable degree of skill in their use can be acquired almost in the preparation of a single crop. Georgia and South Carolina should take encouragement from their Western neighbors. Tennessee alone, in 1843, produced from 20,000 to 25,000 pounds of cocoons, against 1,237 in 1840. A fine manufactory in that State, under the superintendence of an experienced manufacturer from London, is said to have produced splendid specimens of satin. Kentucky, Indiana, Ohio, are all more or less engaged in the culture. Ohio alone produces cocoons enough to employ constantly 200 reels."

Boys in Spain.—I asked a boy whether he or his parents were acquainted with the Scripture, and ever read it; he did not, however, seem to understand me. I must here observe, that the boy was fifteen years of age, that he was in many respects very intelligent, and had some knowledge of the Latin language; nevertheless, he knew not the Scripture even by name, and I have no doubt, from what I subsequently observed, that at least two-thirds of his countrymen are on that important point no wiser than himself. At the doors of village inns, at the hearths of the rustics, in the fields where they labor, at the stone fountain by the way side, where they water their cattle, I have questioned the lower classes of the children of Portugal about the Scripture, the Bible, the Old and New Testament, and in no one instance have they known what I was alluding to, or could return me a rational answer, though on all other matters their replies were sensible enough.

FORGIVENESS.

At Lambeth street police-office, Richard Harvey, a coal-whipper, was charged with having committed a most violent and brutal assault on Lawrence Sculley, another coal-whipper at a public house, by striking him on the face with a quart pot in such a manner that he completely broke his nose, the end of which dropped on the floor. The face of complainant presented a frightful appearance. Part of the organ the poor fellow held in his hand.

The prosecutor informed the magistrate that he did not wish to press the charge, as the prisoner was a hard-working man, with a large family. Mr. Norton—What, not wish to punish him after that savage assault? The Prosecutor—No, your worship. I don't want to hurt him; he has only knocked off a small bit of the end of my nose, which I have in my hand, and it will mend in time.

The magistrate said the prosecutor evinced a very Christian spirit, and told the prisoner to make him some compensation. The parties shortly returned into the office, and the magistrate asked what the prisoner had given him. The prosecutor said nothing, but he would pay his witness for the loss of time, and that was all that was required. Mr. Norton—O no, I cannot permit that; the case is too serious. The Prosecutor—Please your worship, he has a large family, and if you will forgive him, I shall sleep all the better. At the earnest solicitation of the complainant, the prisoner was then discharged.

THE FARMER.

It does one's heart good to see a merry round-faced farmer. So independent, and yet so free from vanity and pride. So rich, and yet so industrious—so patient and persevering in his calling, and yet so kind, social, obliging. There are a thousand noble traits about his character. He is generally hospitable—eat and drink with him, and he won't set a mark on you, and sweat it out of you with double compound interest, as some I know will—you are welcome. He will do you a kindness without expecting a return by way of compensation—it is not so with every body. He is generally more honest and sincere—less disposed to deal in a low and underhand cunning, than many I could name. He gives society its best support—is the firmest pillar that supports the edifice of government—he is the lord of nature. Look at him in his homespun and grey—gentlemen!—laugh at him if you will, but believe me, he can laugh back, if he pleases.

SUMMARY.

Dorr refuses to be liberated on the terms sanctioned by the Legislature of Rhode Island. The principal condition was that he should swear allegiance to the existing government of the State.

Thomas H. Fletcher, Esq., an eminent member of the Nashville, Tennessee, Bar, died suddenly in that city, of appoplexy, on Sunday afternoon, the 12th inst. He had been for several days previous under high mental excitement, caused by his exertions in a murder case before the Criminal Court of Davidson.

The Toronto Mutual Insurance Company presented each fireman of that city with a New Year's gift of twenty dollars, as a token of appreciation of their valuable services during the past year.

A Steam Planing Mill and Sash and Blind Factory was burnt in Danvers, (Mass.) on Thursday last. Insured for $2000.

There was a good deal of excitement at Pittsburgh last Wednesday, caused by the efforts of a Virginian, aided by a collecting Consttable, to secure a runaway slave. The (so called) owner arrested the slave, but the keeper of the jail would not admit her without a regular commitment; he then took her before an Ex-Alderman, who refused to do any thing in the matter. In the mean time, a crowd was collected, who took means to aid the slave to escape. The woman got off in safety.

Mr. Leonard W. Treat, formerly from Hartford, Conn. about twenty-five years of age, an industrious and highly esteemed master-mason, was accidently shot on Saturday week, about five miles from Milwaukie, by a friend, with whom he was hunting.

It is said that there are twenty persons in this city worth in the aggregate seventy-five-millions of dollars. What an immensity of good these people could do if they chose.

Hamilton Lovett, the teller of the Commercial Bank, Albany, is a defaulter in the sum of $34,445.

By the arrival of the brig Victorine, we learn that the fever was raging at St. Jago to an alarming extent among the shipping. There were seventeen sail of British and two French vessels that had lost the principal part of their crews by fever—they were not able to obtain assistance in consequence of the scarcity of seamen.

The number of houses in the United States, is 1,300,000. While in England there are 849,147, not half the quantity in proportion to the population.

In Lincolnshire, one jury is said to have found a man charged with stealing pigeons, "guilty of manslaughter," and another, "guilty, but not much."

A Liverpool paper says that Wm. Towns, a soldier in the 21st Fusileers, now in India, has confessed that it was he who dashed out the brains of a game-keeper in Essex, about nine years ago, and that a man named Chalker, who was executed for the murder, was innocent.

A poor workman in Alton, has recently come into possession of a fortune of £1,500,000 by the death of his brother, who lately died at Demerara.

Some Yankees have gone to Chusan, on the coast 1200 miles north of Canton, to establish the "ice business," and supply the great Chinese cities with the luxury. A lard oil factory is also to be established at Canton. The Chinese hogs are said to be uncommonly oily.

An orator, holding forth in favor of woman, concluded thus:—"Oh, my hearers, depend upon it, nothing beats a good wife." "I beg your pardon," replied one of his female auditors, "a bad husband does."

Miss D. D. Dix presented her petition on the subject of a Hospital for the Insane and for Idiots to the New Jersey Legislature on the 23d instant. It will be printed.

Dr. Johnson, as reported by Boswell, observes, that from his earliest years he had inwardly resolved to excel in conversation; and to this end he never uttered a sentence without first endeavoring to make it as significant and correct as it was in his power. His unrivaled skill in conversation is undoubtedly to be attributed to this habit.

A Scotch laird, who not only refused to sell a site for an edifice for the Free Church, but bought up large tracts to prevent their being secured for that purpose, offered a poor widow much more for her premises than they were worth. "My laird," she exclaimed, "ye surprise me by offering me sae much for my little manse, an' if I should take it, I should be made a rich lady; but I dinna ken I shall. I canna take it, My Laird above (lifting her eyes to heaven) gave it to me, and to my Laird above it shall go." A new church for the worship of her Savior is now going up on the premises.

A Venerable Bible.—At the Anniversary meeting of the American Bible Society, an old divine from New Hampshire, of the Presbyterian denomination, called Father Robbins, held in his hand the identical Bible upon which the members of the First Congress and President Washington were sworn into office, and containing the names of all those old worthies written on its pages. These, said Mr. Robbins, were Bible times—and these, Bible men, and God blessed and prospered their labors; and under these men their country was prosperous. God grant, sir, said he, that we may again have such rulers and such times!

Our beloved friend, Francis Wright, of Utica, died in Philadelphia, on the 2d instant. To those who knew him not, it needs not that it should be told that a good man has died, for such die every day; and those who knew him will ask for no long eulogy on one whom they so loved and esteemed. But those who knew him best, will mourn not only that they have lost a friend, but that a true man has died. To our short sightedness it seems that we can ill spare him. We need always the clear head, the generous heart, and the willing hand like his, and when such an one is taken from our side, we have few words of comfort for each other. That he is mourned for, and that he will not be forgotten, is his best eulogy, and that he did well his work our best solace.—A. S. Standard.

MARRIED,

At the Worship Street Baptist Meeting, in London, on the 28th of August last, by the Rev. Joseph Calrow Means, Rev. William Henry Black, Pastor of the Mill Yard Sabbath-keeping Church, to Miss Harriot Slater, daughter of Rev. Wm. Slater, the former pastor of that church.

In Andover, N. Y., on the 1st inst., by Elder Daniel Babcock, Mr. George D. Rosebush, to Miss Lucetta Perkins. Also, Mr. John M. Brown, to Miss Eliza Perkins.

In South Otselic, N. Y., on the 7th inst., by Rev. Wm. Holroid, Mr. T. Rogers, 2d, of Waterford, Ct., to Miss Elizabeth Miller, of the former place.

DIED,

At his residence in Hopkinton, R. I., Dec. 10th, 1844, Jonathan C. Johnson, aged about 56 years.

Information.—We have been asked, whether two dollars will be received in payment for the Recorder for one year, after six months of the time has passed? We wish to be as lenient as possible in this matter, especially to those individuals whose payments have been delayed from a real difficulty in obtaining the money. We would not knowingly increase the burden upon one such person. Hence we have determined to extend the time for three months longer, and to receive two dollars for the year if paid at any time previous to the end of the third quarter, or about the first of April. We hope, before that time, to receive payment from nearly all of our subscribers. Money can be remitted through Post Masters with perfect safety, and without expense. Of the hundreds of letters sent us within six months past, we are not aware of having lost but one; nor are we aware of a single instance in which a post master has refused to forward money, names of new subscribers, or change of address, when respectfully asked to do so.

☞ We have lately had several requests for back numbers from the beginning of the volume, and have forwarded them accordingly. Fifty sets more can be furnished if application be made soon.

☞ The Minutes of the General Conference have been forwarded to those who have requested them. Others will be supplied on application.

☞ Our thanks are due to Eld. Daniel Babcock for the good work he has begun in Allegany Co. We hope his circumstances will allow him to continue it.

FOR SALE—A BARGAIN.

THE well-known premises of the late Jonathan R. Dunham, deceased, situated in the township of Piscataway, County of Middlesex, N. J., about one quarter of a mile from the New Market Depot on the Elizabethtown and Somerville Railroad, within about two hours' ride of the city of New York, the cars making three trips each way daily—including 12 acres of excellent land, with a good Apple Orchard and other fruit trees. On the premises is a large and convenient DWELLING HOUSE, two stories high, with seven rooms on the first floor; also a large TAN-YARD, with a sufficient number of vats; a Shoemaker and Currying Shop, and Bark House; a Barn, and other necessary out-buildings. Adjoining the premises is a small Dwelling House and Garden. Terms reasonable.

THE FAMILY MEETING.

BY CHARLES SPRAGUE.

We are all here,
Father, Mother,
Sister, Brother,
All who hold each other dear,
Each chair is filled—we're all at home;
To-night let no cold stranger come:
It is not often thus around
Our old familiar hearth we're found.
Bless, then, the meeting and the spot:
For once be every care forgot;
Let gentle peace assert her power,
And kind affection rule the hour.
We're all—all here.

We're not all here!
Some are away—the dead ones dear,
Who thronged with us its ancient hearth,
And gave the hour to guileless mirth.
Fate, with a stern relentless hand,
Looked in, and thinned our little band;
Some like a night flash passed away,
And some sank lingering day by day;
The quiet grave-yard—some lie there—
And cruel ocean has his share—
We're not all here.

We're not all here,
Even they—the dead—tho' dead, so dear,
Fond memory, to her duty true,
Brings back their faded forms to view;
How life-like, through the mist of years,
Each well-remembered face appears!
We see them, as in times long past;
From each to each, kind looks are cast;
We hear their words, their smiles behold;
They're round us as they were of old—
We are all here.

We are all here,
Father, Mother,
Sister, Brother,
You that I love, with love so dear.
This may not long of us be said—
Soon must we join the gathered dead,
And by the hearth we now sit round,
Some other circle will be found.
Oh! then, that wisdom may we know
Which yields a life of peace below;
So, in the world to follow this,
May each repeat in words of bliss,
We're all—all here!

SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS.

THE CONTRAST.

There is not in the Old Testament, a more odious character drawn by the pen of inspiration, than that of Jezebel, the wife of the weak and wicked Ahab. From the time of her first appearance on the stage of action to that of her miserable death, every thing in her history is in perfect keeping with the cold-blooded cruelty and depravity of her heart. There are no relentings, no womanly feeling, shining out through the darkness of crime, to soften the horror and detestation with which such a character must be regarded.

Almost her first public act seems to have been the murder of the prophets of the Lord. But for this horrible crime, some excuse may be found, in the fact that as a heathen, the bigoted attachment of the Queen to her own religion, and her jealousy of the claims of the true God, might have made it seem to her a meritorious act to sweep his servants from the earth. The page of history is filled with similar instances of cruelty, perpetrated under the guise of religious zeal, by those who verily thought they were doing God service in their deeds of blood. Accordingly we find Jezebel, boldly threatening the life of Elijah, who in pursuance of his commission as a messenger from God, had slain four hundred of the false prophets. She openly avows herself the protectress and avenger of Baal and his lying prophets, and would undoubtedly have made good her threats, had not Elijah escaped for his life, first to Beersheba, and then into the wilderness.

So far all is open enmity, and while we shrink from the vindictive and heartless cruelty of the woman, we can at least partly understand something of the motives by which she was actuated. But in the next act of her life, so graphically described in the 21st chapter of 1st Kings, nothing is visible but the most calculating and fiend-like treachery. When Ahab, actuated by sordid avarice, coveted the vineyard of his unoffending neighbor and subject, the latter replied, impelled by feelings both natural and creditable to him, "The Lord forbid it me, that I should give the inheritance of my fathers unto thee." But Ahab, accustomed to have his own way in all things, and like the despotic tyrant he was, took this laudable refusal so much to heart, that "he lay down on his bed, turned away his face, and would eat no bread." And what does Jezebel in this case? Alas for degraded human nature! Instead of arguing with Ahab on the unreasonableness of his wishes—instead of reminding him of the vast extent of his possessions, and the comparative poverty of Naboth, she says to him, in the unfeeling selfishness of conscious power, "Dost thou now govern the kingdom of Israel?" or in other words, "May not a king gratify to the full all his wishes, however unreasonable?" She then adds, "Arise, eat bread, and let thy heart be merry, for I will give thee the vineyard of Naboth the Israelite."

Ahab, whose imbecility and cowardice are apparent in every act of his life, seems to have yielded himself implicitly to the guidance of his crafty and strong-minded Queen. She accordingly wrote letters in Ahab's name, and sealed them with his seal, saying, "Proclaim a fast and set Naboth on high among the people," that is, let him be publicly accused before the people. By proclaiming a fast, she impressed the minds of the people with the belief that some great wickedness had been committed—which, unless solemnly expiated, would bring down Divine judgments on the city. Then on the appointed day, Naboth must be seized, and "men of Belial" suborned, to testify that he "had blasphemed God and the king."—The plot was artfully laid, and succeeded only too well. Convicted on perjured testimony, like some sufferers of our own times, the innocent Naboth was sentenced to be stoned to death, and his property confiscated, and thus the coveted vineyard became the prey of Ahab.

But the wrath of the Lord was kindled against the guilty pair, and terrible was the message sent them by the mouth of Elijah. "Thus saith the Lord, In the place where dogs licked the blood of Naboth, shall dogs lick thy blood, even thine; and of Jezebel also spake the Lord, saying, The dogs shall eat Jezebel by the wall of Israel, and there shall be none to bury her."

In the 25th verse of the same chapter, it is said, "But there was none like unto Ahab, which did sell himself to work wickedness in the sight of the Lord, whom Jezebel his wife stirred up." Jezebel was, it seems, the seducer of her husband into evil, and the hardener of a heart naturally susceptible of better feelings, for we are told that Ahab humbled himself deeply before the Lord on the reception of this awful message—and his contrition, however temporary, procured for him the remission of part of the penalty. But on the part of the proud Jezebel, there was no contrition, no relenting, no misgivings, no fear of present or future punishment. She fasted not, she put no sackcloth on her flesh, not even when the tidings came of the death of her husband, and that according to the words of the prophet, "the dogs had licked up his blood." On the contrary, when Jehu, who held a commission from God to destroy the house of Ahab, came to Israel, she "painted her face, tired her head," and looked out of the window, perhaps expecting, like Cleopatra of old, to convert her conqueror into her slave. This circumstance, slight as it is, reveals another trait in the character of the wretched Jezebel, without which its deformity would have been incomplete. In the vanity and unfaithfulness to the memory of her husband here displayed, we have the finishing touches to a history which embodies more of evil, without one redeeming quality, than any other on record.

But her arts were in vain. The conqueror gave the fearful word, and those who doubtless had been foremost in cringing servility in her day of power, were now first in obeying his commands. She was thrown down from the window, and her blood sprinkled on the walls and on the houses, and he trod her under foot. When soon after, Jehu would have buried her decently, remembering her honorable descent, nothing could be found of her but the feet, the skull, and the palms of the hands, thus verifying the truth of the word which the Lord spake by his servant Elijah, saying, "In the portion of Israel shall dogs eat the flesh of Jezebel, and the carcase of Jezebel shall be as dung on the face of the field in the portion of Israel, so that they shall not say, This is Jezebel."

Terrible accomplishment of a terrible prophecy! but it excites but little pity for the wretched victim, because she was herself without pity, and we feel that there never was more strict retributive justice—never a better illustration of the monitory words, "With what measure ye mete, it shall be meted to you again."

But from this warning to her sex; from Jezebel, who was the shame and destruction of her house and family; I gladly turn to one who was an ornament to her sex—to the virtuous Shunamite, whose simple history presents her in a point of view every way excellent and honorable.

In the 2d book of Kings, 4th chapter and 8th verse, we read thus—"And it fell on a day, that Elisha passed to Shunem, where was a great woman; and she constrained him to eat bread. And so it was, that as often as he passed by, he turned in thither to eat bread." What a picture of generous kindness to a poor servant of God is here exhibited! But not satisfied with what she had done, and like the mother of our race—"on hospitable thoughts intent," she said to her husband, "Behold now, I perceive that this is a holy man of God which passeth by us continually. Let us make a little chamber, I pray thee, on the wall; and let us set for him there, a bed, and a table, and a stool, and a candlestick, and it shall be when he cometh to us, that he shall turn in hither." Doubtless the heart of the husband safely trusted in his admirable wife, and she readily obtained permission to carry her plan of delicate kindness into effect. How different does this Shunamite appear, thus prompting her husband to love and good works, from the Queen of Israel, stirring up her royal consort to treachery and blood!

"And it fell on a day, that he came thither, and he turned into the chamber, and lay there. And he said to Gehazi his servant, Call this Shunamite; and when he had called her, she stood before him. And he said unto him, Say now unto her, Behold thou hast been careful for us with all this care—what is to be done for thee? Wouldst thou be spoken for to the king, or to the captain of the host?" Elisha evidently thought that her care had not been quite disinterested, but that, being an ambitious woman, she had taken this method of obtaining more wealth, or rank, or distinction. How then must he have been struck with her simple but memorable reply—"I dwell among my own people," uttered probably in a tone of sorrowful reproach, as she felt how entirely her kindness had been misunderstood by its object. Convinced by her noble reply, that wealth or grandeur could not add to her happiness, but still anxious to repay his obligations, Elisha says to his servant, "What then is to be done for her?" Gehazi's answer shows that he rightly appreciated the character of the Shunamite; and as worldly temptations could not lure this wise and virtuous woman from the sphere in which Providence had placed her, he imagined that the heart which was deaf to the call of ambition, might eagerly listen to the voice of the affections, and he says to the prophet, "Verily she has no child." This, in that age and country, was regarded as the greatest earthly affliction, and was undoubtedly felt to be such by the Shunamite; and accordingly, when the prophet assures her that in due time she shall embrace a son, she is unable to believe that such a favor could be vouchsafed by the Most High to one so unworthy, and exclaims in lowliness of spirit, "Nay, my lord, thou man of God, do not lie unto thy handmaid."

But the prediction was inspired by Him in whom she trusted, and in due time was graciously fulfilled, for we behold her at length in the joyful and tender capacity of mother. How that affectionate heart must have thrilled with rapture, as she gazed on her darling boy, and beheld in him not only the pride and solace of her declining years, but the special gift of God, and the token of his approbation of her character and services.

But alas! how evanescent is human happiness! Hardly has she tasted the deep joy of a mother's heart, hardly has she learned to call the spirited, blooming boy, in whom her hopes were centered, her own, when he was torn from her in a moment, and she was again written childless. We are told in the sacred record, that she went up, and laid the dead body of her child on the bed of the man of God, and shut the door and went out. It would seem from this act, that even in the first agonies of bereavement, faith was in full exercise, and that she felt that He who gave and had taken away, could in his own good pleasure restore. Having deposited the precious remains in this hallowed chamber, she set off on an important and interesting errand, to see the man of God, and inform him of the sad event which had occurred. He saw her coming while afar off, and sending Gehazi to her, inquired—"Is it well with thee? Is it well with thy husband? Is it well with the child?" At this question, an ordinary Christian would have been overwhelmed, and amid bursting sobs and sighs, the story of grief would have been poured into the prophet's ear. But this excellent woman, this child-like believer only answers, "It is well." When she came near to Elisha, she said to him in her agony, "Did I desire a son of my lord? Did I not say do not deceive me?" On hearing this, he instantly understands the nature of her grief, and would have sent his servant with his staff, evidently supposing that the child might thus be restored to life. But the bereaved mother would accept of no substitute, and refused to leave the prophet till he consented to accompany her back.

I will not detail the circumstances of that wondrous restoration to life. When it was complete, and the delighted mother was called to receive her son raised from the dead, she took him up and went out—went out in silence. She was speechless from the excess of feeling too deep and sacred for utterance. She bowed herself to the ground in grateful though mute adoration, and departed to vent in solitude, her tenderness, her joy, and her thanksgiving.

But the favor of the Lord towards the Shunamite was not yet to cease. During a period of famine, she was sent by the special providence of God, into the land of the Philistines for seven years, and upon her return, found that her house and land had passed from her into other hands. As an unknown petitioner, she came to the king for justice, just at the time that Gehazi was talking with the king of all the great events of the prophet's life. "And Gehazi said, My lord O king! this is the woman, and this is her son!" Touched with the strange coincidence, and penetrated with admiration of the character of the Shunamite, the king commanded the immediate restoration of all her estate, together with payment of all arrears from the day she left the land until that time.

I can only glance at one or two points of contrast in the lives of these remarkable women, though much might profitably be said upon the subject.

No warnings, nor threatenings of Divine vengeance, not even their fulfilment in the appalling death of her husband, with its attendant circumstances, had power to bring conviction or repentance to the unbelieving heart of the proud Jezebel; but the faith of the Shunamite remained firm in the severest trials, because she trusted in Israel's God. The one, exerted all her influence as a woman and a Queen, to draw her husband and subjects into sin, and the polluted atmosphere in which she moved, was fatal to the growth of every thing pure, lovely, or of good report. The other, on the contrary, leads the way in every good word and work, and by the calm content, and winning sweetness of her character, seems to have diffused peace and joy all around her. Jezebel became every day more odious in the sight of God and man, and finally closed her career unpitied, unlamented, by a death so awful, that imagination could never have conceived it.

I regret to say, that with the restoration of the Shunamite's lands, ends all record of the life of this interesting and distinguished woman. It would be pleasant to trace her course along her blest, because useful and virtuous existence, to an instructive close; but judging of the future by the past, there can be no doubt that He who had crowned her life with loving kindness and tender mercy, was with her to the end, and that unlike her miserable contemporary, she closed a life of piety, by a death of peace.

May the writer, and every reader, taking warning by the fate of Jezebel, wrestle with an evil heart of unbelief, and resist the fatal suggestions of a proud, vindictive, persecuting spirit

Thus too, taught by the lovely example of the Shunamite, may we learn in all things to be content, to cultivate a hospitable, benevolent, meek, and confiding spirit, so that in the midst of the most trying dispensations, we may be able to say from the heart, even in the first moments of bereavement and agony, "IT IS WELL, IT IS WELL."

Adv. Moral Reform.

WHO IS A GENTLEMAN?

Not he who displays the latest fashion—dresses in extravagance, with gold rings and chains to display. Not he who talkes the loudest and makes constant use of profane and vulgar words. Not he who is proud and overbearing—who oppresses the poor and looks with contempt on honest industry. Not he who cannot control his passions, and humble himself as a child. No—none of these are real gentlemen. It is he who is kind and obliging—who is ready to do you a favor, with no hope of reward—who visits the poor, and assists those who are in need—who is more careful of the state of his heart than the dress of his person—who is humble and sociable—not irascible and revengeful—who always speaks the truth without resorting to profane or indecent words. Such a man is a gentleman, wherever he may be found. Rich or poor, high or low, he is entitled to the appellation,

OUR THOUGHTS.—On the whole, it is of as great importance for a man to take heed what thoughts he entertains, as what company he keeps; for they have the same effect.

LOVE AND COURTSHIP.

LOVE is a subject which has ever been open to discussion amongst persons of all classes, and of every variety of mind and character; yet after all, there are few subjects which present greater difficulties, especially to a female writer. I will begin by dismissing a large portion of what is commonly called by that name, as wholly unworthy of my attention; I mean that which originates in mere fancy, without reference to the moral excellence of the object; and if my young readers imagine, that out of the remaining part they shall be able to elicit much amusement, I fear they will be disappointed; for I am one of those that think that the most serious act of a woman's whole life is to love.

What, then, I would ask, is love, that it should be the cause of some of the deepest realities in our experience, and of so much of our merriment and folly?

The reason why so many persons act foolishly, and consequently lay themselves open to ridicule, under the influence of love, I believe to originate in the grand popular mistake of dismissing this subject from our serious reading and conversation, and leaving it to the unceremonious treatment of light novels, and low jests; by which unnatural system of philosophy, that which is in reality the essence of woman's being, and the highest and holiest among her capabilities, bestowed for the purpose of teaching us how much our nature is capable of doing for the good of others, has become a thing of sly purpose, and frivolous calculation.

The very expression—"falling in love," has done an incalculable amount of mischief, by conveying an idea that it is a thing which cannot be resisted, and which must be given way to, either with or without reason. Persons are said to have fallen in love, precisely as they would be said to have fallen into a fever or an ague-fit, and the worst of this mode of expression is, that amongst young people, it has led to a general yielding up of the heart to the first impression, as if it possessed of itself no power of resistance.

It is from general notions such as these, that the idea, and the name of love have became vulgarized and degraded; and in connection with this degradation, a flood of evil has poured upon that Eden of woman's life, where the virtues of her domestic character are exercised.

What, then, I would ask again, is love in its highest, holiest character? It is woman's all—her wealth, her power, her very being. Man, let him love as he may, has ever an existence distinct from that of his affections. He has his worldly interests, his public character, his ambition, his competition with other men—but woman centres all in that one feeling, and

"In that SHE lives, or else she has no life."

In woman's love is mingled the trusty dependence of a child, for she ever looks up to man as her protector, and her guide; with the frankness, the social feeling, and the tenderness of a sister—for is not man her friend? the solicitude, the anxiety, the careful watching of the mother—for would she not suffer to preserve him from harm? Such is love in a noble mind, and especially in its first commencement, when it is almost invariably elevated, and pure, trusting, and disinterested. Indeed, the woman who could mingle low views and selfish calculations with her first attachment, would scarcely be worthy of the name.

So far from this being the case with woman in general, I believe, if we could look into the heart of a young girl, when she first begins to love, we should find the nearest resemblance to what poetry has described, as the state of our first parents when in Paradise, which this life ever presents. All is then covered with an atmosphere of beauty, and light; or if a passing cloud sails across the azure sky, reflecting a transitory shadow on the scene below, it is but to be swept away by the next balmy gale, which leaves the picture more lovely for this momentary interruption of its stillness and repose.

But that which constitutes the essential charm of a first attachment, is its perfect disinterestedness. She who entertains this sentiment in its profoundest character, lives no longer for herself. In all her aspirations, her hopes, her energies, in all her noble daring, her confidence, her enthusiasm, her fortitude, her own existence is absorbed by the interests of another. For herself, and in her own character, alone, she is at the same time retiring, meek, and humble, content to be neglected by the whole world—despised, forgotten, or contemned; so to that one being only she may still be all in all.

And is this a love to be lightly spoken of, or harshly dealt with? Oh no; but it has many a rough blast to encounter yet, and many an insidious enemy to cope with, before it can be stamped with the seal of faithfulness; and, until then, who can distinguish the ideal from the true?

I am inclined to think it is from the very purity and disinterestedness of her own motives, that woman, in cases of strong attachment, is sometimes tempted to transgress the laws of etiquette, by which her conduct, even in affairs of the heart, is so wisely restricted. But let not the young enthusiast believe herself justified in doing this, whatever may be the nature of her own sentiments. The restrictions of society may probably appear to her both harsh and uncalled for; but, I must repeat—society has good reasons for the rules it lays down for the regulation of female conduct, and she ought never to forget that points of etiquette ought scrupulously to be observed by those who have principle, for the sake of those who have not. Besides which, men who know the world so much better than women, are close observers on these points, and nothing can lessen their confidence in you more effectually, than to find you unscrupulous, or lax, even in your behaviour to them individually. If, therefore, your lover perceives that you are regardless of the injunctions of your parents or guardians even for his sake, though possibly he may feel gratified at the moment, yet his opinions of your principles will eventually be lowered, while his trust in your faithfulness will be equally lessened.

In speaking of the entireness, the depth, and the disinterestedness of woman's love, I would not for a moment be supposed to class under the same head, that precocious tendency to fall in love, which some young ladies encourage under the idea of its being an amiable weakness. Never is the character of a woman more despicable, than when she stoops to plead her weakness as a merit. Yet some complain that they are naturally so grateful, it is impossible for them to resist the influence of kindness; and thus they fall in love, perhaps with a worthless man—perhaps with two men at once; simply because they have been kindly treated, and their hearts are not capable of resisting kindness. Would that such puerile suppliants for the charity they ill deserve, could be made to understand how many a correct and prudent woman would have gone inconceivably farther than them in gratitude, and generous feeling, had not right principle been made the stay of her conduct, and the arbiter of all her actions. Love which arises out of mere weakness, is as easily fixed upon one object as another; and consequently is at all times transferrable; that which is governed by principle, how much has it to suffer, yet how nobly does it survive all trial!

I have said, that woman's love, at least all which deserves that name, is almost universally exalted and noble in its commencement; but that still it wants its highest attribute, until its faithfulness has been established by temptation and trial. Let no woman, therefore, boast of her constancy, until she has been put to the test. In speaking of faithfulness, I am far from supposing it to denote merely the tenacity of adhering to an engagement. It is easy to be true to an engagement while false to the individual with whom it is contracted. My meaning refers to faithfulness of heart, and this has many trials in the common intercourse of society, in the flattery and attentions of men, and in the fickleness of female fancy.

To have loved faithfully, then, is to have loved with singleness of heart, and sameness of purpose, through all the temptations which society presents, and under all the assaults of vanity, both from within and without. It is so pleasant to be admired, and so soothing to be loved, that the grand trial of female constancy is, not to add one more conquest to her triumphs, where it is evidently in her power to do so; and, therefore, her only protection is to restrain the first wandering thought that might even lead her fancy astray. The ideas which commonly float through the mind of woman, are so rapid, and so indistinctly defined, that when the door is open to such thoughts, they pour in like a torrent. Then first will arise some new perception of deficiency in the object of her love, or some additional impression of his unkindness or neglect, with comparisons between him and others, and regret that he has not some quality which they possess, sadness under a conviction of her future destiny, pining for sympathy under that sadness, and, lastly, the commencement of some other intimacy, which at first she has no idea of converting into love.

Such is the manner in which, in thousands of instances, the faithfulness of woman's love has been destroyed, and destroyed far more effectually than if assailed by an open, and apparently more formidable foe. And what a wreck has followed! for when a woman loses her integrity, and self-respect, she is indeed pitiable and degraded. While her faithfulness remains unshaken, it is true she may, and probably will, have much to suffer; but let her portion in this life be what it may, she will walk through the world with a firm and upright step; for even when solitary, she is not degraded. It may be called a cold philosophy to speak of such consolation being available under the suffering which arises from unkindness, and desertion, but who would not rather be the one to bear injury, than the one to inflict it? and the very act of bearing it meekly and reverently, as from the hand of God, has a purifying and solemnizing effect upon the soul, which the faithless and the fickle never can experience.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

THIS Institution has a pleasant and quiet location thirteen miles south-east of Angelica, and six miles south of Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y., under the care of W. C. KENYON, as Principal, and Miss CAROLINE B. MAXSON, as Preceptress, aided by able and experienced assistants.

Teachers' Classes will be exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining every facility of a Normal School, without its usual disadvantages. Within the past year, more than one hundred and fifty students of the institution have been employed as teachers in this and the adjacent counties—a number much larger than from any other institution in the State.

Students are prepared for entering any class in College. Ample advantages are also secured to those pursuing Modern Languages and the Fine Arts. The institution is liberally endowed and supplied with a choice and valuable library, and apparatus sufficiently extensive to illustrate every department of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. It has also well selected cabinets of Geological, Mineralogical and Conchological specimens.

The plan of instruction aims at the development of the moral, intellectual and physical powers of students, so as to render them thorough, accurate, and practical scholars.

Lectures on Chemistry, accompanied by a full course of experiments, will commence with the second week of the fall term, and continue daily to its close. During the fall and winter terms, daily lectures will be given on School Teaching. Lectures on Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Physiology, illustrated by experiments, will be given each term of the year.

TUITION, per term of fifteen weeks, from $3,50 to $5. Board per week, in private families, $1. The entire expense of the academic year, including tuition, board, washing, light, and fuel, need not exceed $60. No extra charges incurred.

CHRISTIAN LOVE-FEASTS—NO. 2.

BY WM. M. FAHNESTOCK, M. D.

I embrace the earliest leisure moment from professional engagements, to fulfil my promise, of extending my remarks on the Agapæ, or Christian Love-Feasts. Having in my last communication merely expressed my feelings, and defended the practice of the religious Society, of which I am a member, of holding a Love Feast after the death of one of their number, I propose, in this article, to exhibit the design and manner of conducting this festival of the primitive church; which may be new and interesting to some of the readers of the Recorder, as it has, for many centuries, been almost entirely abandoned, and is scarcely known in the present age, to have been a recognized usage of the church in the days of the Apostles.

I do not here assume it to have been their practice to hold one on the occasion alluded to, (the death of a member among them,) the propriety of which I have already attempted to vindicate; but design to notice the practice as it was observed on ordinary occasions, and which is still imitated by some churches in modern times.

DESIGN OF THE LOVE-FEAST.

The term Agapæ is derived from the Greek word Αγαπη, love, and designates "a religious festival practiced among the first Christians with a view of cultivating mutual affection and friendly intercourse among each other. * * * There they testified their love by mutual acts of kindness, and by partaking of the same fare, and by liberally supplying the necessities of their indigent brethren."*

The relation of church membership is not, now, generally, regarded as it was in the primitive church, but has deteriorated in proportion as the pure fountains of truth have been perverted; and the laxity and superstition of successive ages have weakened its significance, until we have scarcely any of its original genius left. Love, which was the magnet of union among the early disciples, has degenerated into almost sheer selfishness in the churches of the nineteenth century. Most of the professors of the religion of the Cross, carry too much of the repulsive coldness of the world into their high and holy calling, instead of a warm glowing heart, expanding with love to God and enkindling a burning zeal for the constant exercise of kind offices towards each other, and think that they have done all, when they have related their "experience," submitted to the initiatory ordinances, and had their names enrolled on the church books. We are too apt to look upon our religious profession as a mere personal affair, without understanding or rightly appreciating the mystical union of the individual members to each other, and all with Christ, the head of the church. When we, upon a slight exercise of faith and repentance, imagine that offended Deity looks propitiously upon us in the face of Jesus, we rejoice for a season and then settle down in listlessness, and think all is right, all secure; and should we experience in our hearts, in the faintest degree, that we love the Lord with all our heart, and all our soul, and all our strength, and all our mind, we fancy that we have the Spirit bearing witness with our spirits, that we are accepted of God, and we have no other concern in the matter. It was not so with those of old "hewn from the rock," and those "digged out of the hole of the pit," when their hearts were touched with fire from off the altar, and upon whose lips were put the "new song,"—they slumbered not, neither kept they silence, but were found "with one accord," walking and working together; "heirs with God and joint heirs with Jesus Christ."

Identity among believers is one of the binding laws of the kingdom of Christ. "This is my commandment," says our divine Master, "that ye love one another as I have loved you." And in another place he says, "A new commandment give I unto you, that ye love one another." "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another." "This injunction," says J. A. James, "is denominated the new commandment of the Christian economy; not that love was no duty before the coming of Christ; but it is now placed more pre-eminently amongst the duties of believers; it is urged on fresh grounds, enforced by a more perfect example, and constrained by stronger motives. The dispensation of Jesus Christ is a system of most wonderful, most mysterious grace; it is a manifestation, commendation, and perfection of divine love. It originated in the love of the Father, and is accomplished by the love of the Son. Jesus Christ was an incarnation of love in our world. He was love, living, breathing, speaking, acting amongst men. His birth was the nativity of love, his sermons the words of love, his miracles the wonders of love, his tears the meltings of love, his crucifixion the agonies of love, his resurrection the triumph of love. Hence it was natural that love should be the cardinal virtue in the character of his saints, and that it should be the law which regulates their conduct towards each other. And it is worthy of remark, that he has made his love to us, not only the motive, but the pattern of our love to each other. 'This is my commandment, that ye love one another as I have loved you.' The Apostles echoed the language of their Master, and continually enjoined the churches which they had planted, to love one another, and to let brotherly love abound and increase. It is a grace so important that, like holiness, no measure of it is sufficient to satisfy the requirement of the Word of God. It is the basis, and cement, and beauty of the Christian union. The church where it is wanting, whatever may be the number or gifts of its members, is nothing better than a heap of stones, which, however polished, want the coherence and similitude of a palace."†

Our blessed Saviour illustrates this intimate union between himself and his disciples, by the beautiful and endearing simile of the vine and its branches, of which "the Father is the husbandman;" and Paul represents the believers as the "body of Christ and members in particular;" in reference to which he says, "There should be no schism in the body; but the members should have the same care one for another. And whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it; or one member be honored, all the members rejoice with it." From the whole tenor of the Scriptures it is manifest that they design to inculcate and enjoin the cultivation of an affectionate solicitude for each other, far above mere human sympathy. A very excellent writer, Miss Caroline Fry, correctly remarks: "Surely, if Christians, re-united to one stem, planted together in the likeness of one life and death, are only just, only benevolent, and in intention kind, it may well be said to them, 'What do ye more than others; do not the Scribes and Pharisees the same?' The word that requires us to feed the hungry and clothe the naked, says also, 'Weep with those that weep, and rejoice with those that do rejoice.' "* Jesus the Righteous, dwells particularly upon this subject in all his teachings; and it is enforced by all the divinely-inspired amanuenses of the Holy Spirit. John says, "My little children, let us not love in word, neither in tongue, but in deed and in truth. Hereby perceive we the love of God, because he laid down his life for us; and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren."

What a wide departure from this love, this holy confraternity, which the church was designed to be, is seen, on every hand, in the present day, and in all sects of Christendom. We are too easily satisfied with the fancied evidences of our own safety, and manifest too little concern for the advancement of piety and the welfare of the brotherhood. We take a name and sit down and fold our hands in almost perfect indifference in regard to the extension of the Redeemer's kingdom, and caring less about "bearing one another's burdens, and so fulfilling the law as we are commanded." This was not the case in the early ages of Christianity. When the disciples entered the ranks of the "Captain of our salvation," they entered for the whole war—they rallied round the standard with their whole heart, and left the world entirely behind. Impelled by an all-absorbing love, they knew nothing, nor cared for any thing, but love to God and love to man. They enjoyed all things "with singleness of heart;" lived as one family, and strengthened each other's hands in doing good and in glorifying God their Maker. "All that believed were together, and had all things in common; and sold their possessions and goods. and parted to all men, as every man had need.—And the multitude of them that believed were of one heart, and of one soul: neither said any of them that aught of the things which he possessed was his own; but they had all things in common."†. This was prompted by the spontaneous feelings of the disciples—their voluntary act, springing from love toward each other, and not from any requirement. When dedicating themselves to the Lord, by a public profession of his name, they regarded themselves as a family—the Lord's children—the household of faith. And when their domestic economy was changed, the children of the heavenly King could not relinquish the idea of an associated family, could not abandon altogether the social alliance, which hitherto characterized their profession, nor could they reconcile the dissolution of the holy ties of affiliated brotherhood in its primitive form. They were not content with the simple privileges of meeting together to worship, to identify them as the covenant children of the Lord; but still desired to share the old family relationship, by occasionally partaking of a social meal together, in imitation of that which Christ shared with his disciples on the night that he was betrayed, and which they regarded as the most feasible mode of perpetuating social fellowship; and thereupon established the Agapæ or love feast, to be regularly observed in connection with the administration of the Eucharist. This is expressly stated to be the motive for introducing this festival, by Chrysostom, the Patriarch of Constantinople, A. D. 398. "The first Christians," says he, "had all things in common, as we read in the Acts of the Apostles; but when that equality of possession ceased, as it did even in the Apostles' time, the Agapæ, or love feast, was substituted in the room of it." And all the early writers concur in ascribing much good as resulting from this practice. Mosheim says: "Among all the members of the church there was a perfect equality, which they manifested by their love-feasts." These Agapæ, remarks Calmet, were not only powerful means among the early Christians of cultivating mutual affection throughout their body, and of gaining the good will of those who observed their conduct, but in all probability, they contributed to promote the Christian cause, by leading to conversions, and by supporting the minds of young converts, under the difficulties attending their situation. There seems reason to conclude, that the social intercourse of early believers might lead them to discover many excellencies in each other, which might contribute to justify and to promote the observation of the heathen strangers, "See how these Christians love one another."‡ It is very certain that these Love-Feasts were prompted by kind feelings of those in better circumstances, to assimilate, in this act, with their indigent brethren, and to remove, at least for the time, all difference of rank and possession; and it is generally understood to have been observed in imitation of the last supper of our blessed Redeemer, and constituted a part and parcel of that solemn repast.‖

It is a mooted question among theologians, whether the supper of our Lord and Master with his disciples on the night he was betrayed, was the Jewish Passover, or a distinct meal—some contending that he celebrated the Passover and immediately afterwards instituted the sacrament of his body and blood; others supposing, from the example of the Gallatians, that he ate the Jewish Passover on Thursday evening, or rather on the first hour of the 14th of Nisan, while the Jews did not celebrate it until the last hour reaching to Friday evening, and that the Supper at which he instituted the sacrament was a "social repast" in the last hour of the 14th of Nisin, and was a pattern for the disciples to imitate and perpetuate in the church. Again, some maintain, that he did not celebrate the Passover at all the last year of his life; and others, to reconcile all conflicting doubts, make him eat the Passover and then another distinct meal (supper) with his disciples, on the same evening. I may take another opportunity to discuss this controverted point, and therefore shall, here, only remark, that as the Paschal Lamb was a type of the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world, and as he said of himself, that all things concerning him (typified of him) have an end, consequently the "Passover" was no longer to be observed, under the new dispensation; yet after this he was found eating a Supper* and breaking bread unto his disciples; which leads to the inference of it being a new institution to be perpetuated in the church. That he gave it a new phase and a new significance is incontrovertible, when he rose from the table before they began to eat and washed the feet of the disciples, then resumed his place at the table and partook of the Supper, at which he presented to them the emblems of his broken body and shed blood. Neither the beginning, (feet-washing,) nor the end, (the communion,) was part or parcel of the Jewish Passover. Peter, who was perfectly familiar with the observance of the Passover, did not understand it so; and the whole transaction bears prima facie evidence of it attaching, throughout, to the new dispensation. And thus I am inclined to regard the Lord's Supper, to consist in commencing, as he commanded, and gave the example—not a precept but an example to do the very same act, with washing each other's feet, partaking of a solemn social repast, and closing with the communion of the body and blood of the crucified Redeemer. Although only the feet-washing and partaking of the emblems of the Redeemer's body and blood are made obligatory in the ordinance, yet the "social repast" is admissible if not expressly required; and we should be careful that we do no damage to this institution by disjointing the consecutive acts constituting the ordinance—both those expressly enjoined and those tacitly implied by the nature of the circumstances attending its introduction.† The only place that we have the term "Lord's Supper" used in the Scriptures, is in reference to this very festival—the Aagapæ. When schisms and irregularities crept into the Corinthian churches, and heresies and divisions prevailed amongst them, they no longer walked together as one man, as a household of faith, but instead of partaking of the one meal in harmony, they individually brought their own provision, and enjoyed it without sharing it with the others, so that "some had much, others less; some ate to excess, others had scarcely enough to satisfy nature; one was hungry and the other drunken—was filled to the full. The Paulians, the Rephites, and the Appolleans continued to be distinct parties, and ate their meals separately even in the same house," although it was a "grand feast of the church;"‡ which unbecoming conduct the Apostle condemned—not the repast itself, but the shameful manner in which it was conducted—it was the schisms and the selfishness that he reproved.

This stigma, it appears, was fixed upon the church, for a long time afterward, as we find Tertullian laboring to remove the prejudice which it had excited, and which was continued to his day (the fourth century,) while at the same time he defends the observance of this festival, and proves it to have been continued regularly in the church at that period. "We Christians," says he, "look upon ourselves as one body, actuated as it were by one soul; and being thus incorporated by love, we can never dispute what we are to bestow upon our own members. And is it any great wonder that such charitable brethren as enjoy all things in common, should have such frequent Love-Feasts? It is for this you traduce us, or reflect upon our little frugal suppers, not only as infamously wicked, but as exceedingly scandalous. The nature of this supper may be understood by its name, for it is the Greek word for love. We Christians think we can never be too expensive, because we consider all to be given that is laid out in doing good When, therefore, we are at the charge of an entertainment, it is to refresh the bowels of the needy. We feed the hungry, because we know God takes a peculiar delight in seeing us do it. If, therefore, we feast with such excellent and noble designs, I leave you, from thence, to guess at the rest of our discipline in matters of pure religion. Nothing earthly, nothing impure, have admittance here. Our souls ascend in prayer to God before we sit down to meat. We eat only what suffices nature, and drink no more than what is strictly becoming chaste and regular persons. We sup like servants who know that they may awake in the night to the service of their Master; and discourse as those who recollect that God hears them. When supper is ended, every one is invited forth to sing praises to God, and by this you may judge of the measure of the drinking at a Christian feast. As we begin, so we conclude all with prayer, and depart with the same degree of temperance and modesty with which we came, as men who have not so properly been drinking as imbibing religion."*

MANNER OF CONDUCTING THE LOVE-FEAST.

We have every reason to believe, notwithstanding it was abused in the earliest days of the church, by their selfish schisms, that while "they did eat their meat with gladness and singleness of heart," it was regarded as a solemn and holy repast, for which their hearts were prepared by acts of devotion. Even profane historians bear this testimony to the purity and devoutness of the believers in attending to this token of fellowship. Pliny, who wrote in the first century, in his letter to the Emperor Trajan, says, concerning this festival of the Christians: "Their practice is to meet before day and sing a hymn to Christ, and bind themselves by a solemn covenant to do no wickedness; these things performed, they separate and meet again to partake of a common and innocent meal."

Regarding it as a token or manifestation of fraternal affection, of a family recognition among believers, some few denominations in modern times have restored this festival and observe it regularly in their churches. Among others who have revived this usage, are the Moravians of Germany, the Wesleyans of England, the Sandemanians of Scotland, the Dunkers or German Baptist Brethren, and the German Seventh-day Baptist of America; all of whom have the same design—token of fellowship—but differ in the manner of conducting it.

The Moravians assemble in their place of worship, with such Christian friends as they may bid to the feast, and celebrate it apart from the communion, in a most frugal and cordial manner On these occasions, all present are supplied with a light cake and a mug of coffee, of which they partake, while their deep-toned organ, inspiring orchestra, and thrilling choir, chant loud anthems of praise to God their Maker. The Methodists observe it with still more simplicity. Meeting with closed doors, yet admitting spectators who may make the request, to witness this festival, after singing and prayer, bread broken into small pieces and a bowl of water are passed round to each in union. This despatched, they continue in prayer and relating their individual religious exercises during the remainder of the evening. Among the Sandemanians, it consists of dining together at each other's houses in the interval between the morning and afternoon service; and of which every member is not only allowed but required to partake. The Dunkers, or German Baptist Brethren, like the Moravians, serve rusk and coffee, preceded and followed by singing and prayer, and afterward give the kiss of charity to each other. These brethren all shadow forth the same design in this service—brotherly union—fraternal fellowship. The German Seventh-day Baptists, however, imitate more closely the festival of the primitive Christians, who originally observed it as a social repast—a regular well-provided meal; and in the exuberance of their benevolence did not confine it to membership or professing Christians, but extended it to all persons present. Bountiful preparations are made days in advance; and the meeting, usually commencing on sixth-day evening, continues to first-day morning, during which time the whole multitude are feasted three times a day. This custom arose from the force of circumstances around them in the infancy of the church; which was planted in a wilderness; and the people of the sparse settlements having but little opportunity to hear the preached Gospel, came from all the surrounding region on these occasions; and the Society, acting on the principle which moved our divine Master, when the multitude came to hear his words, and were empty, he took pity on them and fed them; and thus they got into the custom, which has been continued to the present day. In the early days of the society (of Ephrata,) the meal on the evening after the close of the Sabbath, was regarded, more especially, as the Love-Feast. In approaching it they humbled themselves in the act of Feet-Washing, and ended with partaking of the communion; but of late years, with a dense unruly populace, they find that impracticable with open doors (which they, as yet, have not attempted to close,) as there is generally so much confusion from the crowd, that of late they have but two meals a day, at eight in the morning and at three in the afternoon, and dispense with the meal at the communion. The Love-Feast is regarded among them, as the meeting of all the members of the neighborhood and from abroad together as one family, to engage in holy exercises—enjoying, during the continuance of the meeting, a common board, supplied for that purpose, and in renewing their pledges of love in Christ Jesus, by partaking of the emblems of his broken body and shed blood.

To part of this practice I fully accede, but from part I do dissent and have always expressed that dissent. In making the appointment for the recent festival held at Ephrata, I expressed my views and feelings on the subject very freely; but residing ninety miles distant, I found it impossible to break up old rooted usages, however pernicious they may become; for the reckless portion of the community for miles around take advantage of their very great liberality, and make a frolic of it instead of respecting it as a solemn religious festival, and thus frustrate, in a great measure, its grand design as well as destroy all comfort and satisfaction to those engaged in it. I cannot see any necessity for feeding the swarms of idlers who congregate, not to worship, but to revel and disturb the meeting; but we always experience much annoyance and positive evil resulting from it. It takes away entirely the solemnity which ought to characterize such a meeting. In my opinion, they ought to be conducted in as plain and quiet a manner as possible; and to effect this object, and confine it within its legitimate sphere, the entertainment should be exclusively for the members of the church. Calmet says, the "faithful" ate together. Pliny says, the "the followers of Christ;" and Tertullian says, the "believers on the Lord Jesus." Aside from all the annoyances, the design of the festival—a token of fellowship, a family recognition—is totally destroyed by admitting the heterogeneous multitude to a participation. It thus becomes as much a token of fellowship with the world as a token of fellowship among the members of the church. Should the propriety of feeding the multitude, who come on those occasions to hear the Gospel, be legitimately sustained, it proves most conclusively the propriety of continuing the "social repast" in connection with the administration of the communion, as observed in the primitive church, to constitute a Love-Feast; which should not only be restricted to the disciples of the Lord, but be enjoyed in privacy, apart from the general congregation.

As the design of the Love-Feast is to maintain, not only by word but in deed, a practical family recognition, I consider the following regulations necessary to attain and preserve that object, viz:

1st. Where the members of the Society are scattered abroad, as that of Ephrata, and a Love-Feast is appointed, preparations ought to be made to entertain all the members of the church at one table, in a plain and frugal manner, during the continuance of the meeting; including the invited friends from a distance, but no others.

2d. Public services be dismissed before the evening of the administration of the "Lord's Supper," and the members of the Society, and any serious persons who may desire to be present, as spectators, meet alone, and attend to these solemn exercises in privacy and quietness.

3d. Where there is no general meeting in contemplation, let the members of the local church meet alone and have the family recognition revived and preserved, by restoring the "social repast," shared by our precious Redeemer, in his last hour, with his disciples, and for so many years perpetuated in the primitive church, and crown all by partaking of the sacramental signs of his body and blood—the seal of covenant love with the head of the church.

CONCLUSION.

A very judicious writer has said: "If there are on the one hand, those who identify the primitive Agapæ, with the stated ordinances of public worship, it is scarcely less censurable to discard them wholly, as is too much the case with multitudes of Christians in the present day, and to consider them as matters altogether undeserving their regard. It is demonstrable from the writings of Pliny and Tertullian, that they (the Love-Feasts) were observed at a very early period of the church, and that they were continued so long as the Christian profession was preserved in its original purity. * * * * But since the abuse of a thing can never be fairly quoted as an argument against the thing itself, it merits the consideration of Christians of the present day, whether the revival of this ancient practice might not possibly be rendered, under proper regulations, productive of beneficial results, and made subservient to a restoration of that fervent love of the brethren, which so distinguished the first churches of the saints.*"

In all I have said, I do not elevate the simple Love-Feast, per se, to a "stated ordinance of public worship," nor do I attempt to make it of binding obligation; because the social repast is not commanded; whereas the Feet-Washing and the Communion are distinctly enjoined; yet I believe that it is not only admissible, but that there is a great propriety in connecting it with the administration of the Eucharist; yea, I repeat, I am inclined to think that it ought to be made a part and parcel of the "Lord's Supper." Still I do no wish to be too tenacious on that point; nor should I quarrel with any disciple for omiting it. The "Communion" may be administered without the "repast," and be valid; but I should not call that the "Lord's Supper"—that is the "Communion." The "social repast" constituted part of our great Examplar's proceedings in the matter; and inc arrying out the institutions of the New Testament, we should be careful, like Moses in building the tabernacle, "to make all things according to the pattern showed unto us."

I may take another opportunity, some time hereafter, to express my views, at length, on the Administration of the Lord's Supper, wherein I shall endeavor to show that there was in ancient times much significance and a sanctity attached to a "social repast," not at all appreciated in the present day, and which may aid to impress us with the propriety of restoring it to its proper place in that last precious legacy of our dying Lord.

‖ It was an early custom in the church, before receiving the Sacrament, to have a feast; to which all the poor (brethren) were invited at the charge of the rich, as an expression of their mutual love and charity. In these feasts the Corinthians did not observe due order and decency.—Burkitt.

It is very unreasonable to call this custom in question, or to imagine that St. Paul here rather referred to a Paschal Supper, than to this Appendix of the supper of the Lord. When I call it an appendix, I do not mean that it was eaten by them after the Lord's Supper—to take before his own supper, shows the contrary, viz. that this banquet was celebrated before the Lord's Supper; but only that it was joined to the Lord's Supper in imitation of our Lord who celebrated the Sacrament after the Paschal Supper.—Whitby.

After the model of the Jewish Passover and the first institution of this rite, the celebration of the Lord's Supper originally was joined with a general meal and both together formed one whole; and because communion of believers with the Lord, another brotherly communion with each other, were called the Lord's Supper.—Neander.

* Some confusion has arisen from the erroneous translations of the first sentence of the second verse of the 13th chapter of John. "And Supper being ENDED," which produces much difficulty to a correct understanding of the narrative. All commentators of erudition, however, of every denomination, agree that it is entirely the reverse—Supper was come—was prepared—was made ready, &c. See Whitby, Felbinger, Henry, Doddridge, Clarke, Thompson, Campbell, and Barnes, who say that the Arabic and Persian translations give it this meaning.

† The vantage ground Baptists have over Pedobaptists arises from like circumstances respecting the ordinance of baptism—"going down into the water"—"coming up out of the water"—"near Salim, because there was much water there," which for that purpose are regarded as legitimate arguments.

A HEART-SEARCHING QUESTION.—Tell me, thou child of God, hast thou not more singleness of purpose, more definiteness of view in thy worldly undertakings, than in thy religious plans? Is not thy religion subservient to thy business? Art thou as zealous, as single-hearted for the salvation of souls and the interests of the Redeemer's kingdom, as thou art for the success of thy worldly schemes? Settle it with thy conscience this very hour, "Am I doing all in my power to convey the world?"

MORAL OBLIGATION—EXPEDIENCY.

Much has been said among theologians about the standard of moral obligation. Some of them make it to consist in conformity to reason and nature; others, in the fitness of things; and others still, in utility and expediency. But the advocates of each of these opinions, when they come to apply their theories to practice, have met with insurmountable difficulties. They have found reason and nature too much obscured and depraved to be an exclusive guide. They have found that their abstruse speculations about the fitness of things, though they may be very interesting to the refined, are altogether above the capacities of the mass of mankind, and totally powerless to regulate their lives. And they are compelled to acknowledge, that to judge of a course of action by its utility and expediency requires more comprehensive views than most men possess. In the light of such considerations, we believe the only trustworthy conclusion in this matter is that which refers moral obligation to the simple will of God, as that will is revealed to us in our relations and his written Word. This brings before the mind at once the lawgiver and the subject—the duty enjoined and the best reason why it should be done. It is a standard which may be ever present, easily applied, and can never mislead. It is, therefore, the standard which we need, and to which we ought to bow.

But while it is allowed that the will of God is the standard of moral obligation, there is in this age, if we mistake not, a strong disposition to modify and interpret this will by what are supposed to be the demands of expediency. The old-fashioned doctrine, that obedience to God is always expedient, is secretly doubted or openly opposed; the human understanding and man's judgment of propriety are often substituted for plain commandments; and the Scriptures, instead of being received as a sufficient rule of faith, are criticised and explained according to some system which has been previously adopted. All this is done on the plea of expediency, and not unfrequently with the utmost self-complacency. With such expediency we have no fellowship. It is of the earth, and not from above. Yet there are undoubtedly some circumstances in life with reference to which the Scriptures do not contain any specific rules, and in which, therefore, the judgment that God has given us must be exercised, or, in other words, expediency must be to some extent consulted. We believe it will be found, however, in all such cases, that the general principles of the divine law are a sufficient guide for those who are disposed to apply them and walk in their light. To exercise the judgment in regard to the application of these principles, is not only justifiable, but praiseworthy; and to do it is a very different thing from sitting in judgment upon the principles of the law to decide whether it is expedient or inexpedient to carry them out at all. It is merely deciding how the law shall be carried out in those points—not whether it shall be.

Many are the illustrations of that expediency, falsely so called, which sets itself up in opposition to the law of God, and practically denies all moral obligation. It is seen in the pious apologies for slavery, notwithstanding the divine command to "break every yoke and let the oppressed go free." It is seen in the countenance which religious men often give to intemperance, in defiance of the declaration, "Woe unto him that giveth his neighbor drink." It is seen in the image-worship which prevails, in spite of the command, "Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image." It is seen in those popular church arrangements, where the plain and personal application of the truth is restrained from fear of offending the fashionable and wealthy. But a more palpable illustration than either of the foregoing is seen in the course which is pursued with reference to the fourth commandment. The word of God says, "The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God; in it thou shalt not do any work." Yet leading doctors and religious teachers combine to encourage and practice working upon the seventh day, of which God has said, "in it thou shalt not do any work." When the subject is directly pressed upon them, they often give up all attempt to vindicate their course from Scripture, and rely alone for an apology upon the difficulty and inexpediency of changing the day commonly observed. They deliberately decide, that it would not be expedient to do what God enjoins, and then labor to vindicate their course in the face of the divine commandment.

Such are some of the forms in which moral obligation is resisted on the plea of expediency—the law of God made void through the traditions of men. These cases of making the truth subservient to expediency are daily occurring, and we cannot escape the conviction that they are the crying sins of the present day. They weaken the restraining influence which a deep reverence for divine authority was designed to exert; they open a door to almost universal license; and worst of all, they destroy the very foundations of moral obligation. "If the foundations be destroyed, what can the righteous do?"

Sunday Travel on Railways.—The recent English papers contain a correspondence between the Hon. Somerset Maxwell and Sir Andrew Agnew, on the subject of desecrating the Sunday by travel on Railways. It seems that the former of these gentlemen refused to co-operate in the formation of a railway, on the ground that it would be required to do business on Sunday; whereupon the latter, who is the chief mover for reforms in that matter, addressed him a letter, maintaining that Christians ought to take shares in the concern in order to have votes and the power to protest. To this Mr. Maxwell replied, arguing that the best way to protest is by refusing to have any thing to do with an evil. This drew out Sir Andrew again, and led to a pretty warm discussion.

PRECEPT vs. PRACTICE.

The Unitarian churches of Boston and its vicinity have within the last twenty years made many complaints about the illiberality and bigotry of the orthodox churches, in refusing them invitations to exchange pulpits. But a case has recently occurred which puts their principles severely to the test. Mr. Theodore Parker, one of the fraternity, has avowed doctrines widely at variance with the Unitarian creed. He maintains that the miracles of Christ are "myths and fables;" that Christ was frequently "mistaken;" that "the evangelists have mingled with their story puerile notions, and tales which it is charitable to call absurd;" that the Christianity of the present time is "little better than heathenism." In consequence of his avowal of these doctrines, Mr. Parker has been excluded from most of the Unitarian pulpits, and one or two preachers who have refused to exclude him, have been severely admonished. Hereupon Mr. P. denounces his former friends as illiberal and bigoted, and as doing the very same things for which they have blamed the orthodox! There is little room to doubt the sincerity or consistency of the Unitarians in the course which they have adopted. But we do not see how they can hereafter charge Trinitarians with illiberality for refusing their pulpits to those who deny the divinity of Christ, the atonement, and regeneration by the Holy Spirit—doctrines which they deem fundamental to Christianity. Nor do we think the application of the principle ends here. It will require them to allow, that men may refuse to co-operate with those who differ from them in many other points, without being justly chargeable with illiberality and a want of the Christian spirit.

THE TWO BIBLE SOCIETIES.

A controversy is now going on between the friends of the American Bible Society and of the American and Foreign Bible Society, about the incorporation of the latter institution. It will be remembered, that this Society was organized some years ago, in consequence of a refusal on the part of the old Bible Society to assist in the circulation of those versions of the Scriptures in which the word baptizo was translated instead of being transferred. Since its organization, the Society has several times applied to the Legislature for an act of incorporation, but without success. Application has been made again the present winter, accompanied with numerous petitions both from Baptists and others. Yet this application is opposed by a remonstrance from the Board of Managers of the American Bible Society. What the result will be, is yet undetermined. Meanwhile it is natural to inquire as to the justness of the objections which are raised against its incorporation.

It is said, in the first place, that the name, American and Foreign Bible Society, is very likely to be confounded with that of the American Bible Society—an objection having about as much weight as if John Smith should remonstrate the Legislature against allowing his neighbor to be called Joe Smith, lest the said Joe Smith should be confounded with himself. The Society has already been known for several years by this name, and it is difficult to see why a change of its name should be made a condition of its incorporation. To name the Society is no part of the Legislature's business.

Again, we are told that it is a sectarian institution, and its name ought to indicate that fact. Yet by a reference to the preamble and constitution, it will be seen that the new Society was founded upon the principle of making the inspired originals the only standard of sacred Scripture, and of requiring faithful translations therefrom, without transferring any word which could be literally translated. The old Society, on the other hand, makes King James' translation the standard, and requires a general conformity to that. If a translator in a foreign land, under the patronage of the new Society, should conscientiously think the word baptizo ought to be translated either sprinkle or immerse, he would have a perfect right so to translate it; but if that same person be under the patronage of the old Society, he must transfer the Greek word, and leave the reader to guess at its meaning as best he can. Which of the two manifests the most catholic spirit in this respect? To us it certainly appears, that if the new Society ought to be required to introduce the word Baptist into its name, because it happens to be supported by Baptists, then the old Society ought to be required to introduce into its name the word Pedobaptist, because it is supported by Pedobaptists. But we do not believe that the interests of truth require such restrictive titles in either case; nor have we any sympathy with that spirit, though found among the leaders of benevolent societies, which would exclude a sister institution from important benefits unless they should be accepted upon such conditions.

American and Foreign Bible Society.—The petition of the friends of this Society for an act of incorporation, was referred to a Committee of the Legislature, by whom it has been reported upon. It seems that there was a difference of opinion among the members of the Committee. The majority have reported in favor of granting the prayer of the petitioners, but leave the question about the name to be decided by the Legislature. The minority are opposed to granting the request, and in their report they argue the case at some length.

Doing Evil that Good may Come.—A Doctor of Divinity of the Romish Church has recently admitted the fact that St. Peter's Church at Rome was built from the sale of indulgences. Instead of lamenting it, however, he says, "If there was no other proof of the utility of indulgences, the erection of that splendid temple, mainly due to them, is a monument which would suffice to remove every other cavil." Many persons very justly express a pious horror at the bold announcement of this doctrine. But how very like is the logic of this doctor to that of some orthodox Protestant divines, who think the blessing which has attended the observance of Sunday ought to "remove every cavil" about the change of the Sabbath.

EXTRACT FROM A LETTER.

[The following extract is taken from a business letter of a brother in Western New York. The concluding remark reminds us of Ahab's question to Elijah, "Art thou he that troubleth Israel?"—and Elijah answerd, "I have not troubled Israel; but thou and thy father's house, in that ye have departed from the commandments of the Lord." A return to the commandments of the Lord would soon do away with all trouble from the no-Sabbath doctrine.]

"I have just held a public debate with a Mr. Jones, a Disciple, (Campbellite,) on the subject of the Sabbath. He took the no-Sabbath ground in the fullest sense, publicly declaring that it was not sinful for a non-professor to work on Sunday. When pressed with the question whether it would be sinful for a professor to work on Sunday, he would not answer. He maintained that Sunday was a festival, and as such should be kept by the church. The no-Sabbath doctrine prevails to a great extent in this country, especially among the Baptists, whether Freewill or Calvinistic. An intelligent and worthy Baptist deacon, a short time since, having stated that the Baptists were fast coming to that belief, was asked the reason of it, and frankly answered, that it was because the Seventh-day Baptists kept stirring the subject so that they were compelled to!"

RELIGION IN GERMANY.

The Western Christian Advocate publishes a long communication from Rev. Wm. Nast, now on a mission to Germany under the direction of the Methodist Church The object of Mr. N.'s mission is mainly to counteract the influence of various publications in Germany characterized by bitter hostility to the Methodist Episcopal Church, and also to collect information and secure correspondents for a German newspaper published in Cincinnati, of which he is editor. He gives a dark picture of the state of religion in that country. Popery is on the increase. No marriage is regarded as legal, unless the ceremony is performed by a clergyman of the Lutheran or Roman Catholic Church. A Baptist Society was recently formed, standing in direct opposition to the established church, which was at first greatly persecuted, but is now undisturbed in its religious rights, although subject to many civil disabilities. The following is Mr. N.'s account of the manner in which Sunday—which he calls the Sabbath—is observed among the representatives of Martin Luther:—

"He arrived at Winnenden on Saturday night about 12 o'clock. This town contains professedly the most religious population in the kingdom of Wurtemberg. He, however, found the great majority of the peasants engaged in dancing at the taverns, which amusement they kept up till Sunday morning. There appears to be a very general desecration of the Sabbath. Mr. Muller, who acts in some degree as a missionary under the sanction of the English Wesleyan Church, told Mr. N. that he could double the numbers in Church membership with him, especially of mechanics, if he would allow them to keep open their shops on the Sabbath! All kinds of sales and bargains are prosecuted on that day. The streets are full of hucksters and venders of fruit and vegetables. It is the principal day for making and returning calls and visits of every kind, and the ladies think nothing of sewing and knitting; and this, Mr. Nast says, among the religious as well as the profane, insomuch that he heard an evangelical minister of the Established Church, in a missionary meeting, exhort the ladies to sew for the missionary society one or two hours on the Sabbath afternoon."

The Jews of Mogadore.—The suffering and loss to the Jews on account of the bombardment of Mogadore, Africa, by the French, is even greater than was at first supposed. There was almost an entire destruction of property, the affluent and the poor being alike reduced to ruin. Thousands of fugitives are wandering over the country, stripped of every thing. A subscription has been opened in London to aid the sufferers. The appeal upon the subject has been liberally responded to.—Among other subscriptions, the Messrs. Rothschild subscribed $2,500, and $1,000 was given from the Captives' Fund of the Bevis Marks Congregation.

Missions in Iowa.—In addition to the clergymen of the different denominations in the territory of Iowa, there are twenty-five sustained by the American Home Missionary Society. They occupy the most prominent positions, and are exerting a powerful influence upon the character of that community. Five churches have recently been constituted through their instrumentality, in the valley of the Des Moines river, the former residence of Abner Kneeland, of atheistic notoriety, where he prophesied that infidelity would reign triumphant.

A Catholic Seminary.—The Freeman's Journal, a Catholic paper, says it is in contemplation to erect a Diocesan Theological Seminary in New-York, for the education of Roman Catholic priests. That paper contains reports of contributions for the purpose in various parts of the state, showing a remarkable liberality. From five congregations in this city about $7000 have been received. Other congregations have contributed equally well.

MASSACHUSETTS ANTI-TEXAS CONVENTION.

A large and spirited Convention was held in Faneuil Hall, Boston, on Wednesday and Thursday of last week, to enter the solemn protest of the people of Massachusetts against the violation of the Constitution threatened by the Annexation of Texas. The delegates nearly filled the Hall, and made up an assemblage seldom equaled for respectability, age, and patriotism. The deliberations were harmonious, though participated in by representatives of all the parties. Several strong resolutions were passed, after able speeches in support of them. An Address to the People of the United States was reported by a Committee appointed for that purpose, and adopted by the Convention. It is spoken of as a masterly production, full of truth intelligible to all, which will find ready access to every mind. The proceedings throughout were characterized by intelligence and decision worthy of the representatives of Massachusetts, and their influence will be extensively felt.

MISSIONS IN JERUSALEM.

Since the establishment of a mission in Jerusalem, a growing interest has been felt in the religious condition of that city and the surrounding country. The following description of its present state is given by Dr. Hawes, who returned from a visit to the country last summer. It differs widely from some of the accounts we have read.

"Our next and last visit was to the station in Jerusalem. There, our work was soon done. In regard to this city, viewed as a field for missionary labor, I saw nothing which should give it any special claim on the attention of our benevolent societies. It has indeed a considerable population, amounting to seventeen or eighteen thousand. But it is such a population as seemed to me to bear a near resemblance to the contents of the sheet which Peter saw let down from heaven by the four corners. It is composed of well nigh all nations and of all religions, who are distinguished for nothing so much as for jealousy and hatred of each other. As to the crowds of pilgrims who annually visit the Holy City,—a gross misnomer, by the way, as it now is,—they are certainly no very hopeful subjects of missionary effort; drawn thither as they are chifly by the spirit of superstition, and during the brief time that they remain there kept continually under the excitement of lying vanities, which without number are addressed to their eyes and poured in at their ears."

WHO IS JOHN B. GOUGH?

Our readers have all heard about this eloquent advocate of temperance, who has been lecturing in different parts of the country for some months past. They will be interested in the following incidents of his history, which we copy from the Christian Observer:—

He is a native of England—the son of a pious mother; his parents were so poor that they were unable to afford the expense of apprenticing him to a trade in that country. An acquaintance of his parents brought him to this country, promising him the advantage of a school and preparation for business—a promise which was never fulfilled. At the age of twelve years, he found himself a friendless boy, in a strange land. He was sent to live with a farmer in Western New York, where for two years he was abused and trampled upon. He then returned to New York city, lonely as an orphan, without a single acquaintance. His mother came to New York in 1834, or '35—a period when many of the poor could find no employment. Their distress from want of food, and the means of a bare subsistence, in the winter of 1835, was most severe. His mother died in deep penury—and he and a sister were left to all the evils of orphanage and poverty. Subsequently he found employment—and in a social party, was enticed with others to take his first glass of wine! The temptation was repeated—he drank of the insidious cup occasionally—till at length, and before he was aware of the imminent peril, he was a victim to strong drink. After a woful experience, which none can describe but those who have felt the agonies of a drunkard's misery, he was snatched from the fiery current, and restored by divine grace, we trust, to himself and to the world.

"Such were a few of the incidents in the early career of this child of Providence—who has been in no school since he was twelve years old—whose training has been under the severe discipline of poverty, sin and sorrow. 'He was dead, but is alive again'—and lives to rescue others by his impressive eloquence from a vice which, if not corrected, may soon yield its bitter fruits in lamentation and woe."

The Right Agency.—A writer in the Spirit of Missions, an Episcopal paper, makes the following suggestions, which apply equally well to all churches:—

"Much has been said concerning the mode by which funds should be raised for the support of our Missions. Will you permit one who has the subject at heart, to express the opinion that the ministers of the church, each in his own parish, should be the only agents required for the work? And that the greatest deficiency in our present system consists in the want of efficiency and responsibility on the part of our clergy, in making known the wants of our Missions, and their claims on our liberality, and in using their exertions and influence actively in their behalf. Let each clergyman feel it his duty to secure in each year at least as large an amount for the cause of Missions as in the preceding year; and he will doubtless be able to effect his object."

Excommunication.—The Gazette des Tribunaux says, "Our last advices from Jerusalem mention that the Synagogue of that city, whose members are known for their deep aversion to every innovation, and to progress in general, have pronounced a sentence of excommunication against all the Israelites who should participate, either as collectors, or donors, in the subscription now open in Europe, for the purpose of encouraging agriculture among the Jews of Asia, and establishing, at Jerusalem, for the indigent of those same Jews, an extensive hospital and schools for adults and children of both sexes. Among the persons visited with anathema, are the heads of the different branches of the Rothschilds, who have subscribed 100,000 francs towards that charitable undertaking."

Revivals.—In the Morning Star we find notices of several interesting revivals in different parts of the country. In New Haven, Ohio, twenty-five were recently baptized. In Norway, N. Y., some fifteen have joined the church, nearly one half of whom are heads of families. At Eaton Rapids, Mich., at Roxbury, Mass., and Epsom, N. H., an encouraging state of religious feeling is said to exist.

◆

Medical Missionaries.—A Medical Missionary Society has been established in China, the object of which is to exert a religious influence over the minds of the Chinese through the intimate and friendly relation which springs up between the physician and his patient. By a report which the Baptist Record has received from a missionary of the Baptist Board, it appears that in Hong Kong, and in all the five ports open for commercial relations with foreigners, except one, hospitals are in successful operation, which have administered to the bodily sufferings of more than 12,000 patients within the past year. Since the existence of the Society 30,000 Chinese have sought aid from it. Many opportunities have thus been afforded the missionaries of explaining the way of salvation to the perishing.

◆

Cheap Postage.—There is not the least reason why the present system of high postage for the people, and no postage for those in power, should be continued longer. We believe it would not be, if the sovereign freemen of the nation, as one man, would make known their dissatisfaction. Let their voice be heard in the ear of Congress, and they would soon be placed on the same footing as their rulers in respect to mail privileges. Here is a petition on the subject, which ought to be signed by the citizens of every village in the country, and forwarded at once to those who have power to grant the request:—

To the Hon. the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The undersigned respectfully request that you will reduce the rate of letter postage, throughout the United States, to two cents, and that of newspapers and pamphlets in due proportion, and abolish the franking privilege.

The Baptist Mission in China.—From the Baptist Advocate we learn that considerable success has attended the labors of the Baptist Missionaries in China. Ten natives have been baptized into the Christian faith by the Rev. Messrs. Shuck and Dean; seven by the former and three by the latter. The information is given in a letter from Dr. Macgowan, dated Hong Kong, September 24th. There are two churches there; the one in the care of Mr. Shuck numbers about twenty members, who speak the Canton dialect; the other in the care of Mr. Dean, numbers about fourteen, who speak the Tiechew dialect.

A commodious school house has been erected at Hong Kong, and the Missionaries and their wives have children under instruction. The food for a boy costs $18 per annum, and clothes $4; $25 a year will cover the whole expense of a boy thus placed under the instruction of the Missionary; a girl requires $30.

In a letter to the Christian Intelligencer, from Rev. Mr. Abeel of the Protestant Reform Dutch Church, dated August 23d, we have some interesting information from that Mission. He says that he is informed by the commander-in-chief of the British forces in China, that the English are going to evacuate Koolongsoo and restore it to the Chinese. The prevalence of fevers and other epidemics, Mr. Abeel says, is attributable to the stoppage of draining, as has been proved by experience. A return to draining has at all times stayed the ravages of the disease.

Missionary to Slaves.—The Board of Missions in the Presbyterian Church, have appointed a missionary to labor exclusively among the colored population in Halifax county, North Carolina. For the support of this Mission, the Board are indebted to the liberality of an excellent lady in Raleigh, N. C., who has generously pledged her entire support.

◆

Scotch Free Church College.—This new College, in which about 500 clergymen, seceding from the established Church, are interested, has recently been opened under the most favorable auspices. Dr. Chalmers, at the opening of the Institution, dwelt with great force and variety of illustration, on the necessity of combining high scholarship and spiritual vigor in the qualifications of the ministry.

◆

Colored Methodists.—It is stated, on the authority of the Minutes of the General Conference, that there are one hundred and thirty-seven thousand colored members of the Methodist church, in the slave-holding States, and eight thousand three hundred and forty-five in all the non-slave-holding States.

◆

The London Standard says it has been calculated that the Romish clergy in Ireland receive annually for confessions, $1,350,000; for christenings, $150,000; for unctions and burials, $270,000; for marriages, $1,350,000; for prayers for purgatory, $450,000; for collections at chapels, $2,410,000; for curate collections, $101,000; for government grant to Maynooth College $45,000;—total $6,135,550.

◆

A Circular of the American Baptist Board of Foreign Missions states that their missionaries are translating the Word of God into more than twenty different languages and dialects, and that they are laboring to give the Gospel to more than 25,000,000 of Pagans, exclusive of Europe and the vast empire of China.

The Episcopal Recorder states that in one of the counties of Pennsylvania there are from eight hundred to one thousand families destitute of a Bible. This is exclusive of Roman Catholics, of whom there are about one thousand families in the county.

The late John Barker, of Roxbury, Ms., hasas left by his last will, $34,000 to various benevolent institutions, besides $60,000 more after the decease of his widow. Of this latter sum $50,000 is to go to Harvard University for the support and aid of such scholars as shall exhibit peculiar natural capacities for any science taught in that institution, that their education may be carried to the highest desirable point.

CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

[Compiled for the Recorder.]

Monday, January 27.

The House, in committee of the whole, discussed for a long time a bill for the purchase of 1500 copies of Greehew's History of Oregon, California, &c., to be distributed to members of Congress, Governors, &c. The bill was finally passed. The Oregon bill was then taken up, and remarks were made by Mr. Adams, who was opposed to the bill in some of its details; by Mr. Brown, who was in favor of it; and by Dr. Duncan.

In the Senate, the credentials of Messrs. Dix and Dickinson of New York, and of Daniel Webster, were presented. Petitions were presented against Annexation, and for an alteration of the Naturalization Laws. A bill on the Naturalization Law was reported from the Judiciary Committee. The Joint Resolutions for the Annexation of Texas were twice read, and referred to Committee on Foreign Affairs. Mr. Merrick discussed at length his Postage bill. The Senate then went into executive session with closed doors.

Tuesday, Jan. 28.

In the House, the morning hour was devoted to the reception of reports from committees. A large number of reports, not of general interest, were made. A resolution was agreed to, requesting the President of the United States to instruct our Minister to England to interfere in behalf of American prisoners in Van Dieman's Land.

Mr. Adams submitted a resolution which was passed, calling upon the President of the United States, if not incompatible with the public interests, to communicate to the House copies of any instructions given by him to our Minister in England, in relation to Oregon, since March 4, 1841; also, a copy of any correspondence which may have taken place between this Government and Great Britain, or one Minister to the other, since that time.

Mr. Murphy of New York offered a resolution that the Military Committee be instructed to inquire into the propriety of erecting a proper sepulchre for the bones now lying at the Wallabout, of those soldiers of the Revolution who died by reason of British cruelty on board of the Jersey Prison Ship, and for the erection of an appropriate monument over them. The committee to report by bill or otherwise.

In the Senate, Mr. Bagby presented the resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives of Alabama, praying that the postage on mail matter be so modified as to conform to the national currency. Ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. Phelps presented a petition from the State of Vermont against the Annexation of Texas; and one also, praying for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. The first was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs—the second was laid on the table.

Mr. Huntington presented a memorial against the Annexation of Texas, from citizens of Connecticut.

The bill for the modification of the postage on letters came up for consideration till the Senate adjourned.

Wednesday, Jan. 29.

The House, after the transaction of some unimportant business, went into committee of the whole on the state of the Union. The Oregon bill was discussed by Duncan of Ohio, Belser of Alabama, Bowlin of Missouri, and Thompson of Mississippi. Bills making appropriations for the Post Office, Pensioners, and Fortifications were reported and passed. The following are the appropriations for the Post Office:

For transportation of the Mail,	$3,050,000
For compensation to Postmasters,	970,000
For ship, steamboat, and way-letters,	12,000
For wrapping paper,	16,000
For office furniture (offices of P. Masters,)	4,000
For advertising,	30,000
For mail-bags,	16,000
For blanks,	22,000
For mail locks, keys and stamps,	6,000
For mail depredations and special agents	30,000
For Clerks of Post Offices,	200,000
For miscellaneous,	55,000

In Senate, the principal business was the discussion of the Post Office Bill. Several amendments were offered and reported. There has been no definite action on the matter yet. This, with the presentation of petitions, and the consideration of some private bills, occupied the attention of the Senate till the time of its adjournment.

Thursday, Jan. 30.

The House was occupied most of the day in discussing the Oregon bill. Several speakers asserted that England had assumed jurisdiction over American citizens there, and they therefore urged the immediate organization of a government. Other speakers opposed this movement with equal earnestness.

The Senate was occupied principally with the Post Office bill. It was still under consideration when the Senate adjourned. They adjourned over till Monday.

Friday, Jan. 31.

In the House, Mr. Tibbatts, by unanimous consent, submitted a joint resolution, that the law of 1808, appropriating annually two hundred thousand dollars for arming and equipping the militia of the United States and Territories, be so modified that one-fourth of the amount shall be applied to the purchase of Colt's water-proof ammunition.

Mr. Saunders, from the Committee on the Judiciary, introduced a bill to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and to repeal all other acts on this subject heretofore passed.

Mr. Weller submitted a resolution to bring to a close to-morrow at two o'clock the debate on the bill to establish a Territorial Government in Oregon, which was passed.

The House went into committee of the whole, and took up the bill for establishing the Government of Oregon. The debate on this subject lasted until the adjournment.

Saturday, Feb. 1.

The House went into committee of the whole, and resumed the consideration of the bill to establish the Territorial Government of Oregon. Several speeches were made, and several proposed amendments introduced, some of which were rejected and others adopted. The bill was then reported to the House with amendments. The main question was ordered to be put, and the bill will be the first business in order on Monday.

The Oregon Bill.—This bill defines the boundaries of the Territory as follows:—"All the country belonging to the United States, lying west of the summit of the Rocky Mountains, and bounded on the south by the 42d, and on the north by the 54th degree and 40 minutes of north latitude." It then provides for the appointment of the necessary officers to organize a government. It forbids involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime. It provides for a grant of 640 acres of land to every white male inhabitant of the age of 18 years and upwards, who shall cultivate and use the same or any part thereof for five consecutive years, or to his heirs in case of his decease; and for a grant to every married man of 160 acres in addition to the previous grant, and for a grant of the like quantity to the father of each child under eighteen years of age, which he may have, or which may be born to him during the five years aforesaid. All this is restricted by a provision, that the future grants of lands contemplated by this act shall be subject to the settlement of any dispute now pending between Great Britain and the United States in relation to their respective claims, and subject also to the acquirement, by treaty and otherwise, of the Indian title to the said lands. Nothing in this act is to take effect until due notice of twelve months has been given to the British Government; and nothing is to be so construed as to interfere with any right of any subject of Great Britain until the expiration of that time.

[P. S. We hoped to have been able to give this week, the vote of the House on the Oregon Bill, which was taken on Monday last. But a severe snow storm, (which commenced on Tuesday morning, and continued twenty-four hours,) has retarded the mail from Washington so that what was due at 11 o'clock Tuesday evening is not yet received at 12 o'clock Wednesday.]

The Smithsonian Bequest.—The bill in reference to the Smithsonian bequest, has at length passed the Senate. The main provisions of the bill are that the interest of the main fund, amounting now to about $209,000 be devoted to erecting a building, and enclosing and preparing grounds for a library, and scientific and horticultural collections; that the main sum be loaned to the United States at six per cent.; that a sum not exceeding 5,000 dollars annually, be devoted from the interest of this sum to procure lecturers in the various departments of science and art, who shall lecture during the session of Congress, and submit their lectures to be printed in a cheap form; that a sum of 20,000 dollars be annually devoted to procuring a library; and that a board of seven managers be entrusted with the business of procuring lecturers, disposing of the monies, &c. The bill has yet to pass the House. [Cor. Ch. Watchman.

New York State Offices.—On Friday last the Members of New York State Legislature, both parties, held Caucases to select candidates for the State Offices to be filled this week. The following is the result:—

Democratic Nominations.

For Sec. of State—Samuel Young, of Saratoga.
Comptroller—Azariah C. Flagg, of Albany.
Treasurer—Benjamin Enos, of Madison.
Attorney General—John Van Buren.
Surveyor General—Hugh Halsey.
Commissary General—Henry Storms.
Regents of the University—Martin Van Buren,
Wm. C. Bouck.

Whig Nominations.

For U. S. Senator—John C. Clark, Chenango.
For Sec. of State—Arch. McIntyre, Albany.
Comptroller—Samuel B. Ruggles, New York.
Attorney General—B. Davis Noxen, Onondaga.
Treasurer—Judson W. Sherman, Allegany.
Commissary General—Isaac Teller, Dutchess.
Surveyor General—Edward Dodd, Washington.
Regents of the University.—James Stevenson, Albany, Dudley Selden, New York.

Important Verdict.—The Albany Evening Journal says, that in the case of Chancey Rider, vs. Artemas Boughton, Daniel C. Sherman, Enos St. John and John Dietz, Jr., tried before the Circuit Court of Albany County on Friday, the Jury returned a verdict against all the defendants of 10,000 dollars; it having been proved that they were present when in 1841 the plaintiff as deputy sheriff was lynched by a company of Indians for attempting to serve a legal process in the town of Bern, and that they did not in any manner discountenance the proceeding. It will thus be seen that the law in such cases makes no distinction between the designing men who are the mere instruments in perpetrating an outrage of this character, and the men who, by their presence, and by a word, a smile or a nod, encourage or countenance the outrage. All are principals, alike guilty, and subject to the same punishment—even of death, if a murder is committed.

The Anti-Rent War in Cattaraugus.—By letters from Ellicottville, dated Jan. 26 and 27, we discover that the cause of the disturbances in that place, was an attempt by the deputies of the sheriff, to arrest the ring-leaders who attacked and roughly handled the sheriff and his deputies, in June last. Some eight or ten were indicted at the June court for the offence, but no attempt was made to arrest them until Friday night last.

The officers succeeded in bringing back one prisoner, after a desperate encounter. Col. Eldridge, with a party of six men, went through the settlement a short time after, and found a large collection at the school-house, and being ordered to halt, which orders he disobeyed, was fired upon with eight rifles. He returned the fire, and came home. Whether any were injured we are unable to say. On Monday evening, there were some 600 people in the village, 300 or 400 with arms, ready to act under the sheriff; at 12 o'clock, about 350, under the command of Gen. Huntly, proceeded with the sheriff, to the scene of disturbance, leaving about 300, with three pieces of cannon, to protect the jail and land offices. The report of a cannon was heard this morning at 6, in the direction of Dutch Hill, probably one the anti-renters have obtained from Cuba. They are strong in numbers. The opinion is, that the sheriff will march through without any difficulty, and that he will find the men among the missing when he gets there. A large flag has been erected in front of the court-house, bearing the following inscription:—"The Laws must and shall be enforced."

Another Outrage.—Sheriff attacked and Papers taken from him.—On Monday the 27th ult. Thomas Whitaker, Deputy Sheriff of Cherry Valley, Otsego county, left East Worcester for the purpose of serving declarations on Abraham Harrington, of Worcester, in favor of Murray & Ogden, on contract—they having refused or neglected to pay the demand then due. The sheriff having served a declaration on Abraham Harrington, left to serve the remaining one on Jacob H. Harrington.

He was followed by Abraham, the son, who informed him that Jacob, his father, would be found at the house of a son-in-law in Summit, Schoharie county, two miles distant. He had not reached his place of destination when he was encountered by a party of thirty Indians, who stopped his horse, and proceeded to search for his papers, which Mr. Whitaker refused to give up. In the meanwhile, discovering the old man, Jacob B. Harrington, in council with the Indians, he attempted to serve his papers, but was hindered by their flocking around him, stopping the service, demanding the papers, &c. The Indians seeing that they were effecting nothing, became enraged; and presenting a pistol at the head of Mr. Whitaker, threatened his life should he refuse to accommodate himself to their designs—at the same time saying, that "dead men told no tales."

Mr. Whitaker, determining to do his duty as became his station, was, after being provoked and insulted to the last degree, ridden on a rail, his head tarred, his boots filled and drawn on, and finally sent away with the injunction that he must never again appear within "their dominions," under pain of death.

Land Slip.—On Monday evening last, a portion of the hill adjacent to the Steep Rocks on the the Hudson River, comprising an area of six or seven acres, and about 50 feet in depth, broke off in three masses at three several times, and slid down the face of the hill to the beach below, a distance of about 200 yards. Upon striking the level each mass broke into pieces, filling up a chaos of gigantic fragments of pure clay, intermingled with trees, some of them of large size. The perpendicular height of the hill is perhaps 150 feet. The action of the water, and the rapid succession of freezing and thawing at intervals, will account for this phenomenon. Providentially there was no dwelling in the course of the avalanche.

[Kingstown (N. Y.) Jour.

Pardon.—We learn from Jefferson City, that Gov. Edwards has pardoned the Abolitionist Work, who was sentenced to the Penitentiary about three years since for assisting in the escape of negroes from Marion County. His punishment was fixed at nine years. There are two others, sentenced at the same time for the same offence, who will probably remain until the expiration of their time. In the case of Mr. Work it is stated, that he has manifested proper constriction for his offence, and as he has a wife and several children—one of which he has never seen, public opinion will sanction and justify the clemency of the Governor.

Rev. Charles T. Torrey.—This gentleman is now in the penitentiary of Maryland, where he is to remain for six years, unless pardoned by the governor of that State. He can write to his wife once in three months, and on business matters oftener, if absolutely necessary. He is not permitted to answer his correspondents, but will receive their letters, provided, 1. That the postage is paid; 2. That they contain no allusions to slavery derogatory to the character of the institution; 3. That they contain no information of what is going on in the world.

From Mexico.—By the arrival of the Sarah Ann at New Orleans, dates were received from Mexico to the 9th inst. The following letter is published in the New Orleans Tropic:—

Tampico, January 14, 1845.

Dear Sir: Dates from Mexico to the 9th inst. arrived here last night by express. A desperate battle had been fought on the plains of Appan, between Santa Ana, on the one side, and Bravo and Paredes on the other, which ended in the total route of the former, who was captured in trying to make his escape! Five hundred men are reported to be killed, and Gen. Paredes had been despatched by Bravo in pursuit of the routed troops of Santa Ana. Bravo himself was to march back to Mexico, with his august prisoner.

Barbarous.—A slave in New Orleans, who was the paramour of her master, has recently been tried for the abuse of her mistress—abuse to which she was prompted by the husband and master. The following is her sentence:—

"We the undersigned, free-holders, forming the special tribunal, which was convoked and sworn to try the slave Pauline, belonging to Peter Rappeneck, accused of striking her mistress so as to cause the shedding of blood, do unanimously find her guilty, and agree to sentence, and do hereby sentence the said slave Pauline, belonging to Peter Rappeneck, to death, and do hereby unanimously fix and appoint the 21st day of February, 1845, between the hours of 10 A. M. and 2 P. M., as the time when the said sentence of death shall be carried into effect, the place of execution to be opposite the parish prison. And inasmuch as we are given to understand that the said Pauline is now pregnant, and this sentence could not be carried into execution while she is in that situation, we, in such a case, do farther unanimously order that said sentence of death shall be executed at the same hour and place, on the 28th day of March, 1846."

Barbarous Murder.—Three men, two of whom were overseers and the other a keeper of a grogshop near Cubatchee, Ala., flogged a negro man to death about two weeks ago, for no other cause than refusing them admittance into a house in which he slept. The negro was the property of Mr. John Shackelford, who offers a reward for the arrest of the murderers. After killing the negro, the wretches set their dog upon his wife, who in alarm had ran off. The dogs overtook the poor woman and wounded her dreadfully.

The Cultivator, for February, acknowledges the receipt of eight thousand subscribers in January—2,500 more than during the same month last year.

Treasury Department, Jan. 27, 1845.

The Secretary of the Treasury acknowledges the receipt, by an anonymous letter, of one hundred and fifty dollars, post-marked New York, and running thus:—

"Enclosed $150. Paid U. S. pursuant to a promise made to the LORD." [Madisonian.

Slave hunters from Maryland, seized a colored preacher, last week, at Harrisburgh, Pa. They gagged him, and were about to carry him off, when the authorities interfered and released him.

From the latest authorities, it appears that the number of distilleries in the United States is 10,406; the number of gallons of distilled liquors produced annually is 41,602,607, which, if sold at twenty cents per gallon, would produce $8,329,501 40. What untold misery is the result of this enormous and degrading traffic!

SUMMARY.

A bill has been passed by the New York Legislature reducing the salaries of Canal Commissioners from $2000 to $1600. A proposition was made to reduce the salaries of the Comptroller and Secretary of State, which was lost.

It is in contemplation to supply the city of Brooklyn with Croton Water by means of pipes laid at the bottom of the East River—the water to be received in a reservoir on Brooklyn Heights, and then conveyed over the city.

Considerable anxiety is felt about two Liverpool packets which sailed for New York some sixty days ago. The weather has been unusually severe this season, and it is feared that they may have been wrecked. Their cargoes were very large and valuable, though the number of their passengers was small.

The people of Manlius, N. Y., were recently thrown into a state of great excitement by the discovery that a grave in their cemetery had been robbed of its tenant. Two medical students were arrested and bound over for trial.

Five negro-hunters, according to the Cincinnati Herald, attempted to carry off a free black studying in the Seminary at Red Oak, Brown County, on the 18th ult. The negro man was carried off after a conflict, the other persons in the house being women; but was let go finally, the kidnappers being alarmed.

The citizens of Montibello precinct, Hancock county, (Ill.) have had a meeting to organize a plan of protection against Mormon thieving. A schedule was exhibited showing that property amounting in value to $1,336 50 had been stolen from the single precinct of Montibello.

The Illinois Legislature have repealed the Mormon charter unconditionally, by a very decisive vote—76 to 36.

A boy named Blakeslee, about 12 years old, stabbed another boy of the same age named Mayce with a pocket knife, in Hartford, on Thursday last. The wound came near being fatal.

A line of British steamers will be put upon Lake Champlain. The Americans have now a monopoly of the freight on that lake. A large trade is carried on with the States, by the route to New York, and the duties received from imports at St. Johns last year, go over $100,000.

A great Canal Convention was held at Rochester on the 20th to consider what action should be taken in the matter of the losses by the competition of the Welland Canal. The loss this year is estimated at $100,000.

The arrivals at Boston for the month of January were 298, of which 247 were coastwise and 51 foreign. The clearances were 233, of which 160 were foreign.

In the aggregate not less than two million pounds of wool were imported in 1844.

A Company of Boston Capitalists have secured a tract of territory for two miles along both banks of the Merrimack at Andover, where they contemplate the establishment of manufactures on a large scale.

We see it stated that eighteen thousand slaves have been landed from vessels bearing the American flag, at Rio Janeiro, in six months!

Over one million of books are now in the District School Libraries of this State, 700,000 children are taught in the schools, which is 50,000 more than last year.

"Wright" is to be the name of a new county in this State, to be formed from Chenango, Broome, Delaware, and Otsego, with Bainbridge as the county town.

Whether you attempt little or much, let every hour have its employment, in business, study, social converse, or diversion.

There are nine thousand three hunbred seventy-eight and a half miles of railroads in the United States.

450,000 persons have perished in slavery in the island of Cuba since 1764. The slaves in existence there, amount to 370,000. Taking from this number 80,000, the number of creoles, there remains 290,000, which sum, deducted from the total importations, 751,776, the mortality amounts to 460,776 negroes.

A buxom lass in Michigan has bet herself that Lewis Cass will be the next President.

A Virginian lately liberated by will all his slaves—54—who are now on their way to Ohio, where lands are provided by the executors.

A singular discovery has been recently made in taking a census of the island of Trinidad. It is that of two encampments of aboriginal Indians of the Island, belonging to a race perfectly distinct from any hitherto known.

The last news from the Hermitage reports Gen. Jackson's health to be such as to render his sudden death not at all improbable.

There are twenty farmers in the Senate, and forty-two in the House of Representatives of Ohio. That branch of industry is well represented.

It is computed that the trade on the western waters employs six hundred steamboats, with an aggregate tonage of 130,000 tons, navigated by 12,000 men, at an annual expense of twelve millions of dollars, with cargoes to the amount of two hundred millions of dollars.

Hon. Abbott Lawrence has given the sum of wenty thousand dollars to the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association, to aid in the erection of a hall which shall do credit to that institution; and towards the establishment of a free school therein, for the education of mechanic apprentices in those branches of learning which may be most beneficial to their several pursuits.

The Legislature of Pennsylvania has passed a law providing for the payment of all the interest on the State bonds. The interest on the funded debt is $873,516. And the Treasurer shows that there will be funds applicable under the above law to the payment of interest on the first of Feb., to the amount of $902,398.

The Tribune counts on the Senate of the U. S. thus. For annexation 20; against it 24; doubtful 8. With the floods of Texas scrip which they talk of, floating about Washington, this estimate makes the resistance of the Senate a very doubtful case indeed.

In the Pennsylvania Legislature the judiciary committee have reported a bill in the House, repealing all laws allowing slaveholders to hold slaves in Pennsylvania for six months; also repealing all laws requiring constables to arrest runaways, and magistrates to commit them.

POSTSCRIPT.

Wednesday, 12 o'clock.

A destructive fire occurred this morning in the vicinity of our office, the smoke of which is yet rolling past our window. It is said to have originated in the publishing office of the New York Tribune, from whence it extended rapidly through the whole building forming the corner of Nassau and Spruce streets, which was reduced to ashes. We are informed that all the printing materials of the N. Y. Tribune, (not excepting the forms for the Weekly, which were just ready for the press,) were destroyed. The subscription books, however, were saved. Jansen & Bell, stationers, are said to have lost 10,000 dollars above their insurance. Wm. H. Graham, dealer in cheap publications; and V. B. Palmer, newspaper and coal agent, were considerable losers. The office of the Baptist Memorial was destroyed, though we have not learned with how great a loss. There were several other offices in the building, all of which are of course down.

Miscellaneous.

From the London Christian Guardian.

WHAT IS LIFE?

Say, is there aught that can convey
An image of life's transient stay?
'Tis a hand-breadth; 'tis a tale;
'Tis a vessel under sail;
'Tis a courier's training steed;
'Tis a shuttle in its speed;
'Tis an eagle on its way,
Darting down upon its prey;
'Tis an arrow in its flight,
Mocking the pursuing sight.
'Tis a vapor in the air;
'Tis a whirlwind rushing there;
'Tis a short-lived fading flower,
'Tis a rainbow on a shower;
'Tis a momentary ray
Shining on a winter's day;
'Tis a torrent's rapid stream,
'Tis a shadow—'tis a dream;
'Tis the closing watch of night,
Dying at the rising light;
'Tis a landscape vainly gay,
Painted upon crumbling clay;
'Tis a lamp that wastes its fires,
'Tis a smoke that quick expires;
'Tis a furrow, which the keel
Ploughs upon the watery main;
'Tis an April shower of rain,
'Tis an iris on the spray,
Dashed by vessels in their way,
Catching some slant solar ray;
'Tis a meteor in the sky;
'Tis a bubble, 'tis a sigh—
Be prepared, O man, to die!

LEAVES FROM A TRAVELER'S NOTE-BOOK—NO. 13.

WESTMINISTER ABBEY.

Westminister Abbey is a place of sepulture for the poets, philosophers, heroes, and kings of England. The bare mention of its name gives rise to reflections of paramount interest and attraction. How wonderfully are these reflections deepened by a visit to the venerable old pile itself! It has been the favorite and frequent resort of distinguished scholars in their hours of seriousness and meditation. The stillness and solemnity of the place, the use to which it is applied, and the condition of the people who lie in it, can not fail to fill their minds with a melancholy thoughtfulness which is agreeable rather than painful. A stranger's first visit to it will awaken within him thoughts, and send a thrill of delight through his heart, which will not soon be forgotten.

The early history of the Abbey is clothed in much mystery. Its site is supposed to have been once occupied by a Roman temple devoted to Apollo. When this was overthrown, Lucius, the first Christian King of Great Britain, is said to have "built thereon a church of Christianity." Sebert, king of the East Saxons, A. D. 616, demolished the old building which had been for a time devoted to heathen worship, and erected another in its place. It was extensively repaired by Edgar in 958; rebuilt with great magnificence by Edward the Confessor in 1050; taken down and rebuilt again by Henry III. some two hundred years afterward; since which time it has been enlarged by other appropriations, and completed under the supervision of Sir Christopher Wren. All the sovereigns of England have been crowned here since William the Conquerer; and nearly all of them have been buried here.

The visitor enters the Abbey through what is denominated the Poet's Corner—a title given to this part of the building from the number of monuments erected here to commemorate poetic genius. It is the most intensely interesting spot in the whole building. The monuments of wits and statesmen are strangely commingled here, yet so as to give the greatest effect to the whole collection. Here is a monument to Shakspeare, presenting his own lines on the mutability of human affairs—

"The cloud-capped towers, the gorgeous palaces,
The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
Yea, all which it inherits, shall dissolve,
And, like the baseless fabric of a vision,
Leave not a wreck behind."

Near by is a monument to Matthew Prior, the poet and diplomatist, who wrote his own epitaph—

"To me 'tis given to dye, to you 'tis given
To live; alas! one moment sets us even.
Mark how impartial is the will of Heaven."

The author of Paradise Lost and Paradise Regained, who was buried in Cripplegate church, has here a tablet and bust, directly under which is a monument to the memory of Thomas Gray, who is represented as pointing a finger to the bust of Milton, with this inscription—

"No more the Grecian Muse unrivall'd reigns,
To Britain let the nations homage pay;
She felt a Homer's fire in Milton's strains,
A Pindar's rapture in the lyre of Gray."

John Gay, author of the "Beggar's Opera," is kept in memory by a monument, presenting two lines, written by himself, and characteristic of him—

"Life is a jest, and all things show it;
I thought so once, but now I know it."

Many other monuments of nearly equal interest grace this favored "Corner," which is constantly open to the public, and is the great attraction of the Abbey.

Leaving Poet's Corner, the visitor is conducted through a series of small chapels surrounding the choir of the Abbey, filled with curious antique monuments and the effigies of their royal occupants. Among these chapels, none interest the stranger so much as those of Edward the Confessor and Henry the Seventh. In the center of the former, stands the venerable shrine of St. Edward, once a proud ornament, but now sadly defaced. Here are the two coronation chairs, under one of which is the celebrated stone formerly described by the monks as having been Jacob's Pillow. The Scotch used to believe that the person crowned over that stone would certainly rule their country. Hence Edward the First brought it from Scotland in 1267, since which time it has been the subject of many treaties and kingly conferences. The Scotch are said to have become reconciled to a union with England from the superstitious reverence attached to it. If one in looking upon these [illegible] could actually see an old king of England sitting in that chair, or Jacob's head laid upon that stone, his admiration would scarcely exceed that which appeared to possess our attendant in pointing them out.

Henry the Seventh's Chapel is neatly joined to the east end of the Abbey, and was erected by the monarch whose name it bears, as a place of sepulture for himself and family. It was commenced in 1504, and completed in nine years. The entrance to the chapel is through ponderous brass gates, curiously wrought. The roof and vaulting are supported by fourteen towers, richly ornamented. The lofty ceiling is wrought in solid stone, with an astonishing variety of designs. It has been called, in view of the labor bestowed upon it, "the wonder of the world." It was built as a tomb for royalty, and no one has been allowed to sleep there who could not trace his descent from some family of kings.

Having passed through the different chapels, we were conducted to the Nave of the church, and left to continue our observations as our fancies might dictate. Here is a vast collection of monuments to those who have distinguished themselves as warriors, statesmen, scholars, and divines. One to the memory of Major Andre, who was executed by the Americans as a spy in 1780, interested us. It is composed of a sarcophagus raised on a pedestal. He is represented as going with great fortitude to meet his doom; Britannia appears mourning his fate, and the lion seems crouching in a mourning attitude. There were many other monuments perhaps more deserving of attention. But this secured it because connected with the history of our own country. We strolled through this part of the Abbey until near nightfall; and when we retired it was in a serious mood, meditating upon the condition of those who had toiled through their lives to obtain a transient immortality, and had at length gone to the grave, with no attendant but the worm, and no eulogist but the silent epitaph.

ABOLITION OF MILITIA TRAININGS.

Nothing marks more certainly, though quietly, the decline of the war spirit among the great mass of the people, than their unwillingness to continue the ever extremely popular system of militia drills. It was retained in Massachusetts by a few war spirits, until nearly all men of sense became weary and ashamed of it; and then the Legislature in 1839 released from military drills all that had been liable to that service, and provided a fund of $50,000 a year to be distributed, at the rate of five dollars each, among any number of the old militia not exceeding 10,000, who voluntarily trained a certain number of times every year. Still, even this offer has never rallied in any year, more than 7,000 volunteers; and the number, we believe, is constantly diminishing.

MAINE, in 1843—4, entirely abolished the system of militia drills, repealing all her laws that required that useless service, but retaining the militia system, simply by continued enrolment of all that would be bound at her call to come forth for the support of her laws, or the defence of her soil.

VERMONT, at the recent session of her Legislature, has followed the example of Maine. She passed an act repealing all laws that had heretofore required militia drills, and substituted merely an enrolment, as for jury purposes, of all that would, under the old system, have been liable to military service.

Here are pretty unequivocal signs of the times; and we predict that none of the free States will much longer bear this expensive and contemptible nuisance. Even if advocates of the war system, we could consistently say this; for every intelligent officer knows, that our militia drills are utterly useless. Peace Societies have never, we believe, interfered on this subject, contenting themselves with the diffusion of the leaven; but we confess our surprise, that people of sense have in any State submitted till now to such a yoke.

[Adv. of Peace.

THE SEVEN YEARS WAR.

This war raged from 1756 to 1763, and nearly all the European powers were engaged in it. It originated in a dispute between England and France, relating to the Canadas; the French encroached on a tract of country claimed by the English, in the wilderness, uncultivated, and uninhabited, except by savages; and this war has often been called "a strife about so many acres of snow." The miseries which it occasioned in the interior of Europe, have been seldom equaled; and at length the Grand Signior invited the European Ministers at his court to hold a conference, and after stating to them the great abhorrence he felt at the bloody war thus raging between so many Christian nations, offered his mediation for effecting a general peace. The offer of the Mohammedan peacemaker was not accepted, but was rejected with pride and scorn, and hostilities were continued until poverty brought peace.

This war is represented by historians, as one of the most successful that England was ever engaged in. One hundred ships of war were taken from the enemy or destroyed, and nearly sixty millions of dollars acquired in prize money; but these glorious successes cost the nation 250,000 human beings, and about $600,000,000! The slaughter of the opponents and allies of Great Britain in this dreadful contest, was little less than 800,000 men!

FRANCE AND ALGERIA.—Paying rather dear for the whistle.—France, says the London Times, maintains an army of upwards of 100,000 men, at the cost of more than 80,000,000 francs per annum, for the protection of about 6,000 French colonists in Algeria; (which colonists do not pay a single franc back into the treasury!) and for these 6,000 colonists, already some 50,000 soldiers have miserably perished since the first occupation—and all this with increasing sacrifices of life and treasure. [Adv. of Peace.

"Pa, does wine make a beast of a man?" "Pshaw! child, perhaps once in a while!" "Is that the reason why Mr. Goggins, the tavern keeper, has on his sign, 'Entertainment for man and beast?'" "Nonsense! child, what makes you ask?" "Because ma says that last night you went to Goggins' a man and came home a beast—and that he entertained you!" "That's mother's nonsense, dear, run out and play; papa's head aches."

BEQUEST.—Mrs. Eunice Averill of Hartford, has left the sum of $13,000 to various charitable institutions.

TO THE SLANDERER.

'Blush! if of honest blood one drop remains,
To steal its lonely way along thy veins;
Blush! to be branded with the Slanderer's name.
And though thou dread'st not sin, at least dread shame
Blush! if the bronze long harden'd on thy cheek,
Can find ONE spot where the poor drop can speak.'

MISERY AMONG THE FLOWERS.

Esther Pierce, another pallid victim of the needle, was charged at Worship street with illegal pawning. Yes, famine took her to the pawn-broker with the goods of a Mr. John Halden, of 6 Bread street, Cheapside. Esther Pierce was employed to embroider a silk shawl with flowers—with no less than eighty silken blossoms—for the sum of sixpence! Well, this was a hard day's work; bringing something less than a half-penny an hour. The young woman had neither food nor drink; and so, with misery and famine at her heart—in the very despair of biting hunger—she took Mr. John Halden's property to the pawn-broker. She is urged, tempted—sorely tempted beyond the power of suffering nature to withstand—to commit crime, to make herself a felon, by the miserable wages awarded her by the tradesman of Bread street, Cheapside. Bread street! There is a cruel irony even in the address.

There is a society—all-honored be its object—for the relief and conversion of miserable young women, cast like weeds upon the world; for the wretched Magdalen, despised, outraged, degraded. This society calls with a voice of comfort to the defiled creature, and teaches her, in goodly season, modesty, self-respect. She is snatched from daily, hourly perdition, and restored to the decencies of life. She is no longer an animal, cursed with a soul. All praise be to the institution that works this goodness.

Yet, surely we think, the principle of wickedness must grin and hug itself at the gathering of this society—must chuckle, as the devil only chuckles—when the secretary, with grave face and self-complacent tone, reads the number of victims saved—of brands snatched from the fire—and turned to worthy uses. We say, this same wickedness must laugh at the small, retail humanity of such an institution, when, as in mockery of it, there are thousands and thousands of young women tortured by the injustice of the world, by its mercenary, heartless tasking, into a life of infamy. A feeble philanthropy saves indeed a few wretches; but then there is a giant injustice—iron-hearted son of avarice and trade—that drives his crowd into the street; that makes them in a wild despair of heart—for bread, horrid bread indeed so purchased—bind themselves to agony and shame! How many fall; how many, with heroic serenity of soul, their wounds bleeding inwardly, pine from day to day, and at length wither from the earth, no more accounted of than autumn flies! And now and then some haggard, white lipped creature, some famishing Esther Pierce, for the sake of a meal dares Newgate and the doom of a felon. And so it will be, until throughout all society it shall be preached, not meekly mouthed, but preached with a terrible, soul-smiting energy, that there are holier things than pounds and shillings; that human souls are in very truth of more account than bank paper.

Esther Pierce, our readers will rejoice at it, escaped prison; the benevolent pawn-broker (we should have liked to chronicle his name) giving up the shawl without payment, the shawl which contained the eighty flowers, worked for sixpence! In the East, they have a well known way of arranging flowers that, like words, they may discourse a passion. Alas! what a story may the eye of pity read in these eighty flowers, worked for a tester. On the one hand, what cruel, selfish, iron-hearted tasking! On the other, what misery, what weariness of life, what utter blankness of all that should comfort and sustain toiling humanity!

We should like to know the particular eighty flowers worked for sixpence by Esther Pierce for John Halden. Is it possible that for such a tradesman any of them could be heart's ease?

Mr. Halden, in a letter to the Times, says that "he gives considerably more than sixpence" for such work; but then, with the diffidence of genuine liberality, he does not specify how much more.

Mr. Halden also observes that the wretched story of Esther Pierce is "calculated to do him serious injury." We do not think it unlikely.

In conclusion, however, we should say to all wholesale dealers in embroidered shawls, give something more to female toil than sixpence for eighty flowers. Something more considerate, masters! So that while your wretched slaves are working flowers, your own consciences may not—for the after time—be working nettles.—Punch.

A CHILD'S FAITH.

A beloved minister of the Gospel was one day speaking of that active, living faith, which should at all times dwell in the heart of the sincere follower of Jesus, and related to me an illustration, that had just occurred in his own family.

He had gone into a cellar, which in winter was quite dark, and entered by a trapdoor. A little daughter, only three years old, was trying to find him, and came to the trapdoor, but on looking down, all was dark, dark—and she called, 'are you down cellar, papa?'

'Yes, would you like to come, Mary?'

'It is dark. I can't come, papa.'

'Well, my daughter, I am right below you, and I can see you, though you cannot see me, and if you will drop yourself I will catch you.'

'O! I shall fall, I can't see you papa.'

'I know it,' he answered, 'but I am really here, and you shall not fall or hurt you. If you will jump I will catch you safely.'

Little Mary strained her eyes to the utmost, but she could catch no glimpse of her father. She hesitated, and then advanced a little further, then, summoning all her resolution, she threw herself forward, and was received safely in her father's arms.

'Yes my dear, in a minute,' he said, and had just time to reach his arms toward her when in her childish glee, she fell shouting into his arms, and clasping his neck, said, 'I knew, dear papa, I should not fall.'

And now, my dear little readers, the Lord Jesus is calling you to come to himself. Many of you, I trust, have already obeyed his call, and chosen him as your portion, but he is still saying, 'Suffer little children to come unto me and forbid them not,' and, 'they that seek me early shall find me.' Though like little Mary, you cannot see him visibly present, yet he assures you he is willing and waiting to receive you, and you have only to drop yourselves into the arms of his sovereign mercy, and he will as surely receive you now, as when, while on earth, he "took little children in his arms, laid his hands on them and blessed them."—Ch. Witness and Advocate.

THE FULL DEVELOPMENT OF THE GOSPEL.

NONE possess an adequate idea of what the Gospel can do when its power is fully developed. Often have we repeated and sung—

"This is the word of truth and love,
Sent to the nations from above,
Jehovah here resolves to show
What his Almighty grace can do,
This remedy did Wisdom find
To heal diseases of the mind:
This sovereign balm, whose virtues can Restore the ruined creature man"

But we are much inclined to set bounds, saying practically, here are the deep roots of depravity which the Gospel cannot eradicate; here is a disease of the mind which even the Gospel, though provided by Infinite Wisdom, cannot heal; here is a "ruined creature," whom the "sovereign balm" itself cannot restore.

The Christian world ought now to look for manifestations of the grace of God in the rescue of the licentious, which shall be as mighty in achievement over the strong hold of sin, and as far extending in regard to the number of the fallen, as has been exhibited in the temperance reformation. Not to look for this, is to limit the Holy One of Israel.

In the application of gospel truth for the salvation of the licentious, there must be a special adaptation of it to their case, not only in the mode of presenting that truth, but also in all the accompanying facilities which shall be proffered to encourage reformation, and in all the precautions which shall be employed to guard against relapse. Legal restraints may be necessary to establish habits of sobriety, industry and order, among those who profess a desire to return to the paths of chastity: let such restraints be systematically enforced by city authorities, and in perfect coincidence let the gospel be proclaimed to them, saying, "Look, and live;" "Go, sin no more!" and who can tell what trophies grace may gain.

From among such fallen beings, many may be taken to become the companions of holy angels; while thousands of self-righteous moralists may reject salvation by the blood of the Lamb of God, and thus sink deeper in perdition than the fallen angels.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

THIS Institution has a pleasant and quiet location thirteen miles south-east of Angelica, and six miles south of Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y., under the care of W. C. KENYON, as Principal, and Miss CAROLINE B. MAXSON, as Preceptress, aided by able and experienced assistants.

Teachers' Classes will be exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining every facility of a Normal School, without its usual disadvantages. Within the past year, more than one hundred and fifty students of the institution have been employed as teachers in this and the adjacent counties—a number much larger than from any other institution in the State.

Students are prepared for entering any class in College. Ample advantages are also secured to those pursuing Modern Languages and the Fine Arts. The institution is liberally endowed and supplied with a choice and valuable library, and apparatus sufficiently extensive to illustrate every department of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. It has also well selected cabinets of Geological, Mineralogical and Conchological specimens.

The plan of instruction aims at the development of the moral, intellectual and physical powers of students, so as to render them thorough, accurate, and practical scholars.

Lectures on Chemistry, accompanied by a full course of experiments, will commence with the second week of the fall term, and continue daily to its close. During the fall and winter terms, daily lectures will be given on School Teaching. Lectures on Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Physiology, illustrated by experiments, will be given each term of the year.

TUITION, per term of fifteen weeks, from $3,50 to $5. Board per week, in private families, $1. The entire expense of the academic year, including tuition, board, washing, light, and fuel, need not exceed $60. No extra charges incurred.

President of the Board of Trustees

LETTER FROM ALLAN B. MAGRUDER.

The following letter was addressed to a brother in New Jersey, by whom it was handed to us for publication. The kind and candid spirit manifested by the writer entitles him to a respectful hearing. As he has consented to the publication of his letter in the Recorder, we presume he will look for a reply vindicating the views of Sabbath-keepers. Should any of our correspondents see fit to reply, and do it in the right spirit, we shall be happy to give them a place.

Our readers have seen the name of Mr. MAGRUDER connected with that of Mr. LEMMON, in the proceedings of the Baltimore Convention. These getlemen, it will be remembered, endeavored to dissuade the Convention from the inconsistency of calling the first day of the week by the name of the Sabbath. For doing so, they were treated as disorderly persons, interrupted in their remarks, and finally hissed. This letter of Mr. Magruder gives a very frank statement of his objectionable views, and will be read therefore with interest. It is the policy of the professed friends of Sunday, we are well aware, to take for granted, both that the Sabbath law is still binding, and also that it requires the observance of the first day of the week. But we doubt the wisdom of this course, and are altogether in favor of a free discussion of each of those questions, confident that the truth will not suffer thereby. It ought to be said, perhaps, to prevent misunderstanding, that Mr. Magruder is not a clergyman, as represented in some of the newspaper reports. His profession is that of the law, in which he has been engaged for the last ten years. ED. REC.

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va., Dec. 15th, 1844.

DEAR SIR,—I have received from my friend and brother Mr. Lemmon, of Baltimore, a pamphlet, Address to the Baptists of the United States, on the observance of the seventh day as now obligatory on Christians who acknowledge the authority of the Sabbath; which he forwarded to me at your request. I have read with attention the pamphlet in question, and beg leave to tender my thanks for your kindness in sending it. I take leave, in all Christian kindness, to give you briefly my opinion too of the subject on which it treats. Being myself an inquirer for truth, and both willing and anxious to take a "thus saith the Lord" as the only worthy authority in religious faith and practice, I read with avidity the views set forth in the pamphlet. I wonder that any one, who like you acknowledges the binding obligation of the law of Moses in relation to this subject, can escape the conclusion that Saturday and not Sunday is the day which ought to be kept as the Sabbath. Your reasoning on the subject is invincible. This was the position I attempted to defend in the late Convention at Baltimore, of which, I suppose, we were both members. As, however, I and those who are associated with me in keeping the commandments and ordinances of the Master—who claim to be simply "Christians," or "Disciples of Christ," though we are often, but most unjustly and opprobriously, called "Campbellites"—do not admit the existence of the obligation, in this dispensation, to keep any day whatever as the Sabbath day, I am forced to dissent from the conclusion to which you arrive. I believe heartily in the consecration of Sunday, or the Lord's day; not, however, as a Sabbath day, in any sense of the word, but as a day commemorative of the resurrection of our Lord, and not in memory of the creation, as was the Sabbath. There is no doubt in my mind, that the Sabbath was exclusively a Jewish law, and is now no more binding on Gentile Christians than circumcision, the passover, &c.

You seem to argue very elaborately the proposition, that it was only the ceremonial law which was abrogated by the Christian institution. But permit me to observe, that this distinction between moral and ceremonial law is a scholastic and not a scriptural discrimination. He who was greater than Abraham or Moses taught, that "on these two commandments, hang ALL the law and the prophets," viz: to "love the Lord, with all the heart," &c., and "our neighbor as ourself." Now it seems to me almost unaccountable, that you should contend that the law of Moses—any part of it—is now in force. Jesus came, as he says, "not to destroy but to fulfil it." Is there any further use, (except as matter of history,) for an institution which is fulfilled, which has answered the purpose for which it was intended. Is a will or a deed of any further use after all its provisions have been carried out, or "fulfilled." Besides, consider such passages, as these, "The law and the prophets were until John," &c. "The law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ." "The law was our schoolmaster to bring us to Christ, but after faith is come, we are no longer under the schoolmaster." Gal. 3: 25. See the whole epistle on this subject, particularly 10th and 11th verses of the 3d chapter. Observe, too, that Paul in 2d Colossians the 16th, expressly prohibits the observance of the Sabbath. See too Heb. 4: 11. Now, surely, I do not see how we can observe the Sabbath, (I mean your day, Saturday,) without actually setting the Apostle's authority at defiance.—Well, you perceive that in my humble opinion, both yourself and all Sabbatarians are in the wrong, though you are certainly right in observing Saturday as the day, if any day is to be observed as a day of rest.

Now I hold that it is right, in imitation of the example of the apostles and primitive disciples, to keep holy the Lord's day, (Sunday,) in honor of Christ's resurrection; and that on each weekly recurrence of that day, we (Christians) should "break bread" and attend to the other ordinary acts of religious worship, as set before us, in the example of the first church at Jerusalem, established on the day of Pentecost. See Acts 2: 42d and 47th verses—also Acts 20: 7. Pentecost was the first day of the week. In this place, therefore, as well as 1 Cor. 16: 1 and 2, we learn the manner of the apostolic consecration of the first day of the week, or the Lord's day as it is called in the Revelations. This is what we do. Can you show us a "more excellent way?" If so, we are ready and willing to learn it.

I think you have come very near a faithful delineation of our principles and positions in what you say under the second head of your pamphlet, on page 10, and from thence to the beginning of the first paragraph on page 12. It is true, we should differ widely as to the binding authority of the example of the Apostles. With us, their example is equally authoritative with a positive precept. Jesus requires our submission to it, for he says, "Teach them (the disciples) to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you;" and Paul says expressly to the Christians of his day, "Be ye imitators of us, (the Apostles.) See also Phill. 3: 17; also, Phill. 4: 9. Here we are taught to do "whatsoever things" the Apostles did. In 1 Thess. 2: 14, "the churches in Judea," set in order by the Apostles, are held up to our imitation. It is indeed in obedience to their example, for there is no command, that we perform any religious duties on the first day; and I would remark, that the same authority (their example) which leads us to preach, pray, sing, read the word, on Sunday, requires us likewise, and with equal obligation, to break bread and attend to the fellowship, or collection for the poor saints, on that day also. To do all this, the suspension of all secular business on Sunday is highly expedient, if not necessary; and therefore, not because it is commanded to be observed as a day of rest in the Old or New Testament, we do abstain from work, that we may the better attend to the Lord's business. Besides, it is a wholesome municipal regulation, and enjoined by the laws of the land, which Christians are commanded to respect.

Thus, in a spirit of Christian candor and good feeling, I have briefly set before you my sense of the nature, obligations, and duties of the Lord's day. As somewhat farther explanatory of the same, I send you herewith a paper by Mr. Lemmon, and a Card which I published in one of the Baltimore papers. Should you, or any of your friends, feel any further interest in the subjects here touched upon, it will give me pleasure to impart any information I may have, always referring you to "the law and the testimony"—the word of God being the only source of authority with me on these or any subjects connected with religion.

That we may all learn the whole truth, and finally attain to a resurrection unto life eternal, is the sincere wish and prayer of

Yours faithfully and benevolently,
ALLAN B. MAGRUDER.

To Isaac D. Titsworth, Shiloh, N, J.

A GOOD DEACON.

Those who have lived for forty or fifty years, can recollect the time when the office of deacon was held in high estimation. The fortunate incumbent was considered as occupying a place about mid-way between the minister and the people, and hence he had a seat assigned him half-way up the pulpit, where he sat in solemn dignity during the service. But in these latter days, he has a pew on a level with the rest of the worshipers, and is undistinguished by any outward form of elevation. The office has also descended far in public esteem; and no wonder, for it has been treated with a levity sufficient to bring almost anything into disrepute. For this degradation of a thing sacred, many of the most popular lecturers in some departments of moral refom are to a great extent responsible. Grave deacons have not unfrequently stood in the way of their radical movements, and they have set themselves to work in earnest, by all the power of satire and ridicule, to "break down" their influence. Hence, when they have wanted to say a sharp or witty thing, they have selected some deacon, and held him up for the scorn or amusement of a gaping audience. Many sober, considerate people have listened and laughed with the rest, little aware that what was sport to them, was death to the dignity and sacredness of an office which they ought to have protected.

There doubtless are some very unworthy deacons, as there are unworthy men in every office, divine and human; but there are also many who "use the office of a deacon, being found blameless." I knew one such who filled the station through more than half of a long life, and filled it creditably. He regularly visited his pastor once a week, and inquired if there was any way in which he could aid him, either in his temporal affairs, or his parochial duties. He often visited the sick, the aged and the poor, and from his own funds, as well as from the church treasury, ministered to their necessities. He was constant in his attendance at the meetings of the church, and prompt to sustain the appointed services. His talents were small, and his pecuniary ability was restricted, but all he had was devoted to the cause of Christ, and no good object was treated with coldness or neglect. His family was well regulated, and presented a lovely model of a household ruled in love by its pious head. He lived beloved and respected by all; and died in Christian triumph universally lamented. [Christian Watchman.

HOW TO WIN A JEW.

We have been deeply interested in reading a couple of volumes entitled, "Narrative of a Mission of Inquiry to the Jews, from the Church of Scotland, in 1839." The mission was undertaken by four distinguished ministers of the Gospel—Dr. Black, Professor of Divinity in Marischal College, Aberdeen; Dr. Keith, whose writings on the evidence from unfulfilled prophecy have been extensively read; Rev. R. M. M'Cheyne, and Rev. Andrew A. Bonnar. The results of the mission were such as to encourage the Scotch church to enter with great vigor upon a mission to the Jews, which has proved quite successful. We shall take occasion now and then to make extracts from the Narrative, and are confident that our readers will be interested in them. The following is a specimen. ED. REC.

It was not till evening that we were able to ascertain any interesting facts regarding the Jews in this place (Boulogne.) We had been told that two Jews had lately come from Dover, who resided near our hotel, but that they were men of the world rather than devout Israelites. In the evening, however, we were visited by a very interesting Jew, a person of education and agreeable manners, who spoke English fluently. He told us his history. Originally possessed of a small fortune, he had exhausted it in traveling for the sake of his brethren, having gone to North America, to investigate the question, whether or not the Indians there are really the descendants of the ten tribes. He had lived a year among the Winebagos and Micmacs, learned the Cherokee and Oneida languages, conformed to their manners, often living almost naked, all in order to ascertain that question, which he did not hesitate to decide in the negative. He was now spending his time in retirement, with the view of being able to recruit his resources, so as to undertake new journeys among his brethren in other parts, and especially in Palestine. The circumstance of our being on our way to Palestine had chiefly induced him to visit us. In the course of conversation, we stated the feeling of love to Israel which had led us to go forth on this journey; and Dr Keith, with great fervor, pictured the outcast state of Israel, and how plainly in seemed to be on account of some sin lying at their door, urging him to consider what that sin could be. He then spoke of God's general love and mercy; and when we in return exhibited the way of pardon and acceptance, he became much affected—"chiefly," he said, "because we manifested such interest in him, and kindness." He added, "he wished there were more of the Church of Scotland's missionaries;" but immediately explained himself, "that it was only in one sense he could express such a wish, for he could not desire our success in converting his brethren—only, if any should accomplish this, it would be in the way of kindness." He had been long seeking the truth, and thought he was still doing so, but was not convinced that it lay with us. He argued that the Jews had got their laws "for ever;" but he was silent when we pointed to the new covenant promised in Jeremiah. (Jeremiah xxxi. 31.) In speaking of Jesus, he made some interesting admissions. "The character and doings of Jesus Christ were most wonderful, and the success of Christianity in the world was the doing of God, in order to alleviate the misery of men; for, had Christianity not existed, he shuddered to think what might have been the state of nations." When pressed with the question, "Would Jesus, so excellent a character as he admitted him to be, declare himself Son of God, if he were not really so?" he was again silent, and seemed confused. He thought that God may possibly have prospered Christianity for the sake of the Jews; for true Christianity had never persecuted them. He had heard of Dr. Keith's work on Prophecy—expressed delight at meeting with the author—and on being presented with the Doctor's last work on the Evidences, requested him to write his name upon it. When presented with a Hebrew New Testament, on which we had written that we would often pray that he might be brought to light and peace, he showed much emotion. Once or twice, after rising to go away, he resumed his discourse. On finally taking leave, which he did with tears running down his face, he said with great emphasis, "If you wish to gain a Jew, treat him as a brother."

ORIGIN OF BELLS.

Bells were first used upon the horns of sheep, to assist the shepherds in finding their flocks. Then upon the heads of cows, cattle and horses, for similar purposes. They were afterwards found useful in house. And the Romans had a bell attached to their public baths, to give notice when the baths were open for use. The first great bells for the use of Christian churches were introduced about the year 600. And because they were supposed to be the invention of Paulinus, Bishop of Nola in Campania, they were called in Latin, Campana. The practice of baptizing or consecrating bells with holy water, was introduced into the Papal church, by Pope John XIII. who consecrated one, in the Lateran, and named it John the Baptist.

Some papists have attributed to bells the power to drive away demons, and dispell storms. But this is explained away by saying that Satan flies before the influence of prayer; and bells are a signal to summon men to prayer; and are therefore inferentially, a terror to demons. Bells were used in the churches in England before the time of Bede, who makes mention of them; that is in the eighth century. They were first introduced into the Greek church, in the year 865.

There is a canon of the Romish church made in the thirteenth century, requiring the bell of the parish church to be rung, when the Bishop of the diocese visited the parish, or when he even passed through or near it. The clergy were the first bell-ringers. Afterwards there was an officer called bell-warden, who had the care of the belfry. The uses which the Papists attached to bells are well told in an inscription upon a bell in Venice, as follows: "I worship the true God, I call the people, I gather the clergy, I adore the saints, I mourn for the dead, I chase away pestilence and devils." VIRTUE OF PATIENCE.

From Tertullian, a writer of the Second Century.

Patience is the guardian of Faith, the preserver of Peace, the cherisher of Love, the teacher of Humility. Patience governs the flesh, strengthens the spirit, sweetens the temper, stifles anger, extinguishes envy, subdues pride; she bridles the tongue, refrains the hands, tramples on temptations, endures persecutions, consumates martyrdom. Patience produces unity in the church, loyalty in the state, harmony in families and societies; she comforts the poor, and moderates the rich; she makes us humble in prosperity, cheerful in adversity, unmoved by calumny and reproach; she teaches us to forgive those who have injured us, and be the first in asking forgiveness of those whom we have injured; she delights the faithful, and invites the unbelieving; she adorns the woman, and approves the man; is loved in a child, praised in a young man, admired in an old man; she is beautiful in either sex, and in every age Behold her appearance and attire; her countenance is calm and serene as the face of heaven, unspotted by the shadow of a cloud, and no wrinkle of grief or anger is seen in her forehead; her eyes are the eyes of doves for meekness, and on her eyebrows sits cheerfulness and joy; her mouth is lovely in silence; her complexion and color, that of innocence and security—while, like the virgin, the daughter of Sion, she shakes her head at the adversary, and laughs him to scorne. She is clothed in the robes of the martyrs, and in her hand she holds a sceptre in the form of a cross. She rules, not in the whirlwind and stormy tempest of passion, but her throne is the humble and contrite heart, and her kingdom is the kingdom of Peace.

"DAYS OF OLD."

SUBMISSION THE BEST CONSOLATION.

A change had come over the spirit and over the face of the camp of Israel. Since the creation to the present time, never did man, much less a host of men, stand in so strange, so awful a position between life and death. God had to each individual above a very youthful age, "set him his bounds that he could not pass;" beyond forty years each one saw, could see, nothing but eternity; and to render this prospect the more solemn, each one knew that on earth no home, no abiding place remained for him; but in the wilderness must he wander, "the great and terrible wilderness, where were fiery serpents, and scorpions, and drought, where there was no water," save only the miraculous supply yielded by the rock of flints. Alas! how soon that gushing stream became itself a cause of offence in Moses and Aaron, the meek Moses, the consecrated Aaron, the two brothers whose holy mission had hitherto been so blamelessly fulfilled. But they were provoked by the murmurings which the Eternal bore with; and when commanded to speak to the rock, that it might yield a fresh supply, Moses had lifted his rod and smitten it, yea, twice he smote it, speaking in anger to the people, whom he was not at that moment commissioned to rebuke, but to meet with a new instance of Almighty love. For this, Moses and Aaron were included in the interdict, and they too must die on this side of Jordan. He knew that the Judge of all the earth did right; and if the Holy One of Israel was to be glorified, and beloved Israel more feelingly admonished by his removal, welcome was death to the bosom of Moses; welcome the summons to abide for ever in the presence of his God!

It was beautiful to see the zeal, the care, the anxious affection with which the fathers of Israel now watched the daily walk of the stripling youths, and guided and taught the young children of their respective houses. These were to inherit Canaan; these were to pass the waters of Jordan, and plant the standards of their tribes in the promised land. Whether for one day, or for forty years their own mortal existence should be prolonged, none among them knew; but the sands of the desert must entomb their bodies, and happy were the souls who, in that sure conviction, so numbered their days that they applied their hearts to wisdom; and walked thenceforth humbly with their God!

Jabin, on a sultry day, bore his pitcher to the mysterious stream that had again gushed forth at so dear a price to Moses. He was pensive, yea, he was sad. He had passed a group of Benjaminites, who were recounting in a sort of melodious chant the mighty works of the Eternal, when first He broke the rod of the oppressor, and delivered the chosen people from their bondage. The passage of the Red Sea, described in glowing language; the miracles of mercy in the wilderness, and the praises of the good land flowing with milk and honey, the glory of all lands into which the Saviour of Israel would still guide his flock, these furnished the theme of their wildly beautiful song. They were stately men, in the prime of life, and all the proud comeliness of manhood; and what they seemed to have forgotten pressed on Jabin's mind with painful consciousness—not one of those stately warriors should see the promised land! With slow and heavy step he gained the stream, and there beheld a youth, his senior by a year or two, reclined under a projecting ledge of the rock, his cheek resting on his hand, and his tears mingling with the dust of that parched soil. Jabin paused; he knew the youth to be one of the most ardent of Israel's sons, and his soul mourned because of the doom that had blighted his young hope, and shut out for ever the prospect that had been to him as the light of heaven. Great was his surprise when, looking up and recognizing him, Ahira smiled joyously through his tears, and extending his hand said, "Jabin, my brother, good is the word of the Eternal; help me to praise Him. Thou shalt inherit the land, the goodly, glorious land, while my carcase must fall in the wilderness. Good is the Eternal, let us praise Him, for His name is lovely." "Ahira! dear brother! I feared lest thou wast murmuring at the sore decree." "Murmuring, Jabin? no, Ahira hath not murmured; far be the accursed thought of rebellion from this heart. I wept at the contemplation of the beauty of wisdom that even poor, blind, unbelieving man may trace in the work of Him, whose way is perfect. Seest thou not that in the course of nature the present rebellious generation, now come to man's full estate, must die off at the end of forty years; while an army of warriors, trained and disciplined in a school where the Eternal is their teacher, and knowing to what that training tends, some in the early bloom, some in the meridian vigor, but none in the feebleness of declining life, will enter upon the possession of the land, our land, the land that God hath given us, and established therein the nation which from of old hath been destined there to dwell, there to flourish, there to exhibit to all the earth how happy are the people whose God is the Eternal."

All the fire of young Ahira's character had kindled while thus he spake. Starting on his feet, and pointing with out-stretched arm in the direction of the promised land, he resumed, "There is thy house, O Jabin; there, O Israel, the place where thy foot shall rest. Sin not against the Eternal the grievous sin of resting satisfied short of that possession. Be thou wandering in the wilderness, O Israel, or be thou scattered to the four winds of heaven, rejoice not, linger not, but press towards thy home. There the Eternal will choose Him a place to put His name; there will He meet thee, there will He bless thee; and when thou art away from thence, be as the banished dove, not idly lamenting her distant nest, but stretching a strong wing to regain its hallowed boundaries. My carcase will fall in the wilderneos, Jabin; but my free, unfettered spirit, hovering above the ranks of my advancing tribe, will doubly rejoice in your joy, praising, in songs as yet unlearned, the God of Abraham, the covenant-keeping God, who will yet, and finally, bring His ransomed people into that good land, and cause them to dwell therein for ever!"

THE MARTYR SPIRIT.

The following reply of one of the martyrs of the days of Queen Mary, Rogers Coe, an aged shearman, a plain unlettered disciple, shows the genuine martyr spirit.

The Bishop inquired whether he would obey the laws of the king and queen. He replied, "As far as they agree with the word of God, I will obey them." The Bishop told him that whether they agreed with the word of God or not he was bound to obey them, even if the king was an infidel. Coe quietly observed, "If Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, had acted thus, Nebuchadnezzar would not have confessed the living God." This undaunted man chose to be burned alive rather than do any thing that would diminish the faith of others in the Gospel.

When Latimer and Ridley were at the stake together, the former said to the latter, "Be of good comfort, Master Ridley, and play the man, we shall this day light such a candle, by God's grace, in England, as I trust shall never be put out."

As in evidence that the martyrs were compelled to choose death by a powerful internal constraint —a conviction of duty—let the following be read with attention. "At their burning, it was evident that these witnesses for the truth could only face the cruel torments which awaited them, when strength was supplied from on high. Haden had been remarkable for his cheerful reliance on the Lord, both previous to his apprehension and during his imprisonment, but after he was fastened to the stake with his companions, he came from under the chain to the great surprise and sorrow of many who concluded he was going to recant. But as Fox relates, he felt more in his heart and conscience than they could conceive; but alas! he was compassioned with great dolour and grief of mind, not for his death, but, for lack of feeling of his Christ; and therefore being full of cares, he humbly fell down upon his knees and prayed earnestly and vehemently to the Lord, who at last (according to his mercies) sent him comfort. Then he arose with great joy as a man changed from death unto life, and said, now I thank God, I am strong, and mind not what man can do unto me."

Lawrence Saunders, one of the earliest who suffered in that region, said to a pious shoemaker, who came to give him his parting blessing, "Pray for me; I am the most unfit person for this high office that ever was appointed to it." He shrunk from the flames, but could not deny Christ. In the final moment his strength was equal to his day. Being fastened to it he kissed it, singing, "Welcome cross of Christ, welcome everlasting life."

Glover was taken from a sick bed to prison, and from prison to the stake. Shortly before his martyrdom he had great doubts and apprehensions, complaining of the deadness of his heart, and his want of spiritual comfort; previous to his execution he continued all night in prayer, and "was carried in sight of a stake, yet his mind was weighed down with a burden, almost too heavy to be borne." But on a sudden he was powerfully filled with God's holy comfort, a foretaste of heavenly joys.

Christians of this age, it is to be feared, live so much under the influence of the support of worldly comforts that they are ignorant of the power of religion to fill the soul with true heavenly joys. We are not called to such sufferings, and to inflict sufferings which God has not appointed is wrong; still there never will be a time till the world be converted, when sacrifices for Christ will not be required. Nor will such sacrifices ever fail to receive their spiritual reward. [Macedonian.

The Sabbath Recorder.

NEW YORK, FEB. 13, 1845.

POPULAR OBJECTIONS.

It is sometimes instructive, though it may be painful, to notice the objections which flippant disputants raise against unpopular or unwelcome doctrines. Such objections will often be found destructive of each other, and directly at war with principles and practices which the objector himself allows in other things. This is especially true of a large class of objections raised against the observance of the seventh day as the Sabbath, by those who profess to be fast friends of the sabbatic institution, if it can only be observed on the first day of the week. Let us look at some of these objections, to see how they correspond with each other and with the profession of regard for the institution.

Among the first objections is that text of Scripture, "The Son of Man is Lord of the Sabbath;" from which it is argued, that because he was Lord of the Sabbath, therefore he changed the day on which it should be observed. To this it may be answered, that the Lord of the Sabbath had an undoubted right, if he pleased, to change or to annul it; yet it does not by any means follow that he did so. On the contrary, it follows much more naturally, that because Christ was Lord of the Sabbath, therefore he did and ever will maintain it, since to maintain what belongs to him is the proper business of a lord. One might as well argue from the fact of Christ being Lord of the quick and dead, that he would therefore destroy the living and raise the dead, as to make such a use as the objector does of this passage. All that can be justly made out of it is, that in a case of necessity Christ had authority to set aside certain restrictions concerning the Sabbath; but shall we thence argue that the Sabbath may be changed or annulled without any necessity?

A second objection is, that "Old things are passed away, behold all things are become new." In the application of this passage, it is argued thus, "Old things have passed away; the Sabbath is an old thing; therefore the Sabbath has passed away." But, carrying out this mode of arguing, it may be said with equal propriety, "Old things are passed away; all the ten commandments are old things; therefore all the ten commandments are passed away." But alas for this theory, the Apostles of Christ have again and again directed us to those old things. They say, "Whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning;" and also, "I write no new commandment unto you, but an old commandment." The Apostle, in the passage under consideration, speaks of the old man and old ungodly practices. To apply his words to the Sabbath, is to wrest them from their true meaning. Besides, if applied at all to the subject, they would do away with the institution wholly, and not with the seventh day alone.

A third objection is, that in Joshua's time, "the sun stood still in the midst of heaven, and hasted not to go down about a whole day;" from which it is argued, that time was so confounded as to prevent our knowing which is the seventh day, and of course to do away with the duty of keeping it. But if this objection is good for any thing, then neither the prophets nor any of the church of God since the standing still of the sun, have been able to obey the fourth commandment. Neither have they been able to keep the Passover on the fourteenth day of the month; nor any of the other feasts on their proper set days. To such conclusions would this reasoning drive us—conclusions which facts and common sense plainly disprove, and which no one would allow for a moment, except to support a favorite theory or escape from an unpleasant duty. Again, if this objection be a good one, how comes it that in Christ's time there was no difficulty about knowing which was the first day of the week? The persons who raise the objection are often the most strenuous advocates of the observance of the first day, on the ground that it was the day of the resurrection. Their practice, therefore, denies their belief in the validity of their own objection.

In connection with this objection, it is not uncommon to hear about the long days which occur in some latitudes, and the impossibility of keeping precisely the same time all over the world. But, if the objection raised hereupon be good against the seventh day, it is equally good against every other day, and so all regard for particular days is swept away at once. Further, if the exceeding length of days in some countries is a good reason why the people of other countries should neglect the seventh day, then the fact that some persons cannot honor their parents because they have none, is a good reason why those who have parents should neglect to honor them. But it is quite probable that the persons who raise this objection would have been the very first to condemn the Jews if they had argued that they could not keep the Sabbath in Canaan because it was remote from Mount Sinai, where the commandment was given.

Another objection to the seventh day, which is in the mouths of almost every body, and is the common resort when every other subterfuge fails, is that it matters not much which day is kept if we give to God the duties of the day. To this view there are several serious objections. God has seen fit to join the day and its duties together in one commandment. Would he have done this, if there was really no importance attached to their union, and no evil resulting from their separation? There is this evil from their separation, to say the least, that it puts asunder what God has joined, and thus mars one of those commandments which we ought to esteem in all things to be right. If whosoever breaketh one of these least commandments shall be called least in the kingdom of heaven, surely the Lord will not hold him guiltless who mars one of them in this way. But the evil does not end here. By such objections a door is opened to still greater license, through which enters instability of character and total disregard of divine authority. Proof of this is seen in the fact that wherever the purity and perfection of the fourth commandment is forgotten, the day of rest either becomes a holiday, or is entirely neglected. We regard it as a great sin in the Romish Church, that she has, by her refined speculations, blotted out the second commandment. Yet is it greater than the sin of many Protestants in their dealing with the fourth commandment? And does not the course of Protestants in this very thing give countenance to the Romanists? We believe it does; and we cannot, therefore, regard it as unimportant.

These objections, and a great variety of similar ones, are often raised by persons holding entirely dissimilar views, and for altogether different objects. One uses them against all Sabbath-keeping; another against keeping the seventh day; and a third against strictness in keeping the first day. This fact shows clearly, that while they clash directly with each other, they must also clash with the professions of some of those who raise them.

"IT IS FINISHED."

How many interesting associations cluster around those last words of our Redeemer when he gave up the ghost. His self-denying labors, his subjection to temptation and the power of the adversary, were then at an end. The atonement, which he came into the world to make, and which could only be secured through his death, was perfected. The law of God, which man had so wantonly violated, was magnified and made honorable. A way was opened by which God might be just, and yet the justifier of those who should believe. It was finished—the promise that the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head, was fulfilled; those realities which the types and sacrifices had but faintly symbolized, were now manifest; and the true light now shone. Full of meaning were those words, carrying the mind backward to what had been promised and endured, and forward to what should yet be enjoyed. They marked the end of the great evil, and the beginning of the great good. Thanks for the assurance, "It is finished." Who will dare to undo?

VOCAL MUSIC IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

In nearly every civilized country, vocal music is now regarded as an important and appropriate subject of instruction in primary schools. It is true, that the utilitarian character of the people of our own country has kept us somewhat behind the times in this matter; but we are rapidly coming to take right views, and to carry our views into practice. A report has recently been published by a committee appointed to consider the propriety of introducing vocal music into the public schools of Philadelphia, which presents a great variety of facts, and argues conclusively the advantages of the system. These advantages are ranged under two distinct heads, each of which is copiously illustrated.

The influence of vocal music in the discipline and culture of schools, is most valuable. Next to religion, music and song are the greatest harmonizers. They are sources of innocent recreation and pleasure, which increase the activity of all the social affections, and promote in a high degree the development of the moral sentiments. This is the influence of even the irregular musical exercises of individuals. How much higher and better must be the moral stimulus, when large numbers of the young engage together in the exercise. It is stated as a matter of fact, that in many schools where vocal music has been introduced, corporal punishment has been almost entirely dispensed with, the pupils learn their lessons better, and a striking improvement is seen in the discipline of the schools and the dispositions of the scholars. Of course great care must be taken in regard to the character of the music and the words of the songs, since injudicious selections might change the tendency of the exercise, and defeat its design. This consideration makes it especially important that religious teachers should interest themselves in the subject, endeavoring to encourage and direct the cultivation of music in common schools, and in every other sphere where it can be introduced with advantage. It ought to be remembered, that the songs of a nation often give stamp to its character. And it is a superficial and hurtful notion, that an interest in them is incompatible with the dignity and sacredness of the ministerial office. The notion will not be encouraged by any who rightly estimate the power of music to impart pleasure, to excite and strengthen the social principle, and to develop the finer sensibilities of human nature. Twenty-nine teachers in Boston unite in the following statement of the influence of singing, as conducted by Lowell Mason, on the schools under their charge:—

They state that its tendency, as proved by three years' experience, was to "increase the number of pupils, and secure a more constant attendance;" that it gave the children a "strong bond of attachment to the school;" that it was attended with an "increase of harmony in the government and discipline of the schools;" that it exerts "a happy and useful influence upon schools;" that of all sciences, "it appears to be the most susceptible of general attainment;" and that "apart from its interesting associations as a mere science, it sheds such a cheerfulness over the dry details of the school, gives renewed vigor to the before indolent perception, spreads a spirit of union and kindly feeling over the pettishness of the school boy; sustains by its perfect relation of parts to the whole, that correct discipline so much to be desired in a school, and, in short, in all its operations and results, so conduces to the well-being and moral advancement of the pupil, that its introduction as one of the common branches of education, is considered an auxiliary of vast influence to the teacher."

The influence of vocal music upon the health and temperament of the scholars, is another important benefit. The good effects of proper exercise in speaking are well known. It strengthens all the organs connected with the voice, expands the lungs, and contributes very much to defend them from those diseases to which the climate and other causes expose them. Even when the lungs are delicate, a moderate exercise of them communicates strength. In cases not a few, individuals who were predisposed to consumption, have ascribed their exemption from it to the effects of a systematic exercise of the voice. Add to this the influence of music upon the spirits in promoting cheerfulness and kind feeling, and it is easy to see that both the health and temperament of scholars must be greatly benefited by it.

THE INDIANS.

The report of Mr. Crawford, Superintendent of Indian Affairs, contains some interesting and curious statements. It seems that the whole number of Indians indigenous to the country west of the Mississippi river, is 168,290. The number removed, wholly or partially, is 89,348. The present western population of the tribes is 85,473; number remaining east, 31,587. The condition of the Indians is said to be improving, and slowly approaching to civilization. They give evidence of being in no respect inferior to our own race for aptitude to learn the sciences, and the arts of civilized life. Want of employment and incentive to exertion, which results from a joint ownership of the land, is their great drawback. They have found, like other nations, that separate and individual proprietorship of property, is indispensable to high civilization. It is gratifying to learn, that though there are no individual titles to property, yet many individuals are taking possession of and cultivating tracts for themselves. The iniquitous system of the whites in furnishing the Indians with the means of intoxication, is a great evil. Mr. Crawford uses the following appropriate language concerning it:—

"Worse for the red man, however, than the flood and army-worm, is the traffic in whiskey, to which our own citizens lend themselves from the most contemptible and sordid motives. Outraging every principle of morals, all law and the dictates of humanity, they deliberately place the instrument of destruction in his hand, and persuade him to use it—brutalizing him, and making victims of his wife and children, that they may fraudulently pick his pocket, and strip his back of the blanket that covers it. To this crime—among the greatest, in my opinion, a man can perpetrate, however it may escape punishment, or however inadequate the penalties of its commission—there seems to be, near the scenes of its occurrence, a lamentable indifference. It matters not that these misguided creatures kill each other, or that (a species of retributive justice) they take the lives of those who, still more cruel, have stimulated them to their mutual destruction; the sale of whiskey has gone on; it has increased; but there is some reason to hope that it will be diminished.

"The general character of the information received on this subject is gratifying. There is less of ardent spirits used than in former years; but I believe that we are in no degree indebted to an abandonment of the traffic by white men for this improvement, but to amended Indian lives and better Indian morals. This is the lever to which I have always looked for lifting the red man out of the mire into which white cupidity and want of principle had sunk him, and are yet endeavoring to press him still lower. The resolution of each individual, or, perhaps, of the tribes respectively, is the great dependence for a thorough reform. The firm resolve is, after all, under Providence, the source of every valuable change in the condition of men."

BLACK LAWS OF MARYLAND.

The Legislature of Maryland has recently enacted two or three exceedingly cruel laws against the free black and mulatto population of that State. A law has been in force there since 1831, providing that on certain conditions any free colored person might leave the State and return again; but this law has been so altered as to forbid their return to the State after an absence of thirty days. Another bill has been passed bringing Baltimore city and Anne Arundel County under the provisions of an old law which prohibits any vessel from sailing on the waters of that State under the sole command of colored men. A bill has also been passed, requiring all free males, between 21 and 50 years of age, who are capable of supporting themselves by labor, to appear at the County Clerk's office and be registered. The registry fee is $1, and the penalty of failing to comply with the law is a fine of from $5 to $10, for the payment of which the person may be hired out. By this law, a man who is unable to pay his $1 for bring registered, may actually be fined on account of his poverty, and virtually sold into slavery to pay his fine. The editor of the Baltimore Visitor, speaking of these laws, uses the follwing just language:—

"We write not as a politician, but as a man pleading for our fellow men. And would to God, there were now in our Legislature, some one with enough of moral courage to speak for the downtrodden—to rebuke this spirit of heartless cruelty—to tell the projectors of such laws, that they cannot consistently complain of 'nothern interference' while a class of our fellow men are placed in as bad a light to the Yankee, as we of the South have been wont to view the Heathen of other lands! Would there were some member who had the courage to tell them that they are destroying, in their madness, that which they are aiming to preserve—that they are playing into the hands of their enemies, giving them fresh pretexts for the kind of action of which they so bitterly complain. God grant our legislators more wisdom and humanity, and a power to discriminate between needful laws and despotic cruelty! We go for the protection of slave-property, as other property, while it is recognized; but we will not consent to have it protected by laws of such needless severity."

Slavery.—The Christian Index notices the publication of a work entitled, "Slavery. A Treatise showing that S very is neither a Moral, Political, or Social Evil." The editor recommends those who wish for enlarged and correct views of the subject of Slavery to buy and read this work, because "several have said, we once believed slavery to be a moral evil," but this has "convinced us to the contrary." An extraordinary book that must be, surely. Perhaps if Paul had read it, he would not have advised, "If thou mayest be made free, use it rather."

American Genius Appreciated.—The late English papers bring full accounts of the attention which Mr. Coleman's Æolian Attachment for the Piano Forte is receiving in that country. It has been submitted to the Queen and Prince Albert at Windsor Castle, and has received the unqualified approbation of the most distinguished musical professors. The fine arts, especially music, have been regarded as having little to expect from this country. It is therefore exceedingly gratifying to know, that an American invention in the department of music meets with success in those places to which we have hitherto looked exclusively for improvements. It is an honor to the individual and his nation.

The Æolian Attachment, which has excited so much attention in the musical world, consists of a piece of mechanism so simple and compact in its construction, that it can be applied in a short time to every variety of piano-fortes, without changing the external appearance or internal arrangement of the instrument. The result of it is, that the tones of the instrument may be sustained to any required length, and the performer may without the slightest effort, swell or diminish whatever notes he pleases, the quality of the tone being pure and distinct, resembling that of the human voice with an orchestral accompaniment. Its introduction will produce an entire change in the character of piano music.

Schools and Scholars.—The question of admitting colored children into the same public schools with white children, is receiving considerable attention in Massachusetts, and is likely to cause some difficulty. In Nantucket, a ticket for School Directors is opposed because a majority of the persons named are opposed to commingling the colors in schools. This is certainly a good reason why the friends of equal rights should refuse to countenance them by their votes. But it is painful to learn, that this question needs discussion in a Christian community at this age. Surely those places devoted to the cultivation of the mind and heart ought to be kept free from the unholy prejudice against color.

Benevolence.—A Hebrew Benevolent Ball was recently held in Philadelphia, the proceeds of which amounted to $568 49, which was divided equally between the three benevolent societies.

RUINS OF NINEVEH.

The researches and excavations going on under the direction of the French Consul, among the ruins of Mosul or the mounds of ancient Nineveh, are revealing objects of great interest. The mound Khorsabad, which stands in an enclosed area about one mile square, is now in process of excavation. Remains of towers have been found in various places, which were originally faced with large square stones. Eleven rooms have been excavated, one of which is 100 feet in length by 30 in width, with thick stone walls, on which are executed various figures in bas-relief. The following account of these sculptures is from a letter of Rev. Mr. Laurie, dated August 8, 1844, which appears in the Missionary Herald for February:—

The sculptures represent a variety of objects. In one place is a royal feast, with chairs and tables in European style. In another they prosecute a siege; and while some use the battering-ram, or advance under the testudo, others fire the gates, while the devoted defenders fall, transpierced, from the walls. In one instance, a row of figures in front of the fortress are impaled by the breast. In another dead bodies and headless trunks are seen floating down the river which flows in front of the beleaguered fortress. The names of most of these castles are inscribed upon them. Elsewhere, captives loaded with chains approach the conqueror on bended knee; and the executioner, standing by a pile of heads, waits, with uplifted sword, the nod that is to decide the fate of each one as he passes by. One room is entirely occupied with a royal hunt. The king's chariot is driven through the forests; birds perch on the trees; deer run beneath them; and the timid hare flies at their approach. Slaughtered game bears testimony to the success of the hunters, some of whom are seen carrying it in their hands.

The most remarkable sculptures, however, are those at the gates. These are guarded on each side by a five footed monster, of gigantic proportions. To the body of a bull, fifteen feet high and eighteen in length, is attached an immense human head. The side of the bull is concealed by wingst which spring from his shoulder; and a fifth foot was added by the artist, that two might appear in front as well as in the side view. But what is still more strange, the huge monster is sculptured on a single stone, four feet in thickness. How they managed to transport it, or set it up on the mound, is a qestion no one as yet has presumed to answer. Fifteen of these monsters, more or less perfect, have been found already. In connection with these generally stands the figure of a man with a bird's head, like the image of Osiris in Egypt.

There is a great variety of dress and armor in the several groups. In some cases a large umbrella is borne over the king. Some dresses claim a remote antiquity; while resemblance to a more modern style may be traced in others. But these are things understood better from painting than description. As to features, amid other diversities there is one head that is decidedly African. The sculptures are admirably executed. The muscles are distinctly and correctly delineated, and every countenance wears an expression corresponding to the situation of the individual.

LETTER FROM MERLE D'AUBIGNE.

New York, Jan. 27, 1845.

My Dear Brother,—I have just received a letter, by the Steamship Cambria, from Dr. Merle D'Aubigné, of Geneva, in which he authorizes me to say to you that, in order to obviate all difficulty in relation to the future publication of his History of the Reformation in the Sixteenth Century, by the American Tract Society, he will endeavor to put the work in such a form that it will be possible for you to issue it without censure from any quarter. He states that he will revise the omissions made, and see which of them he can adopt. He will also prepare an appropriate Preface for this New Edition. By some slight additions, he deems it possible to remove some of the obstacles which have been in the way of the Society's publishing the work as it was originally written.

Yours most respectfully,

R. Baird.

Rev. Wm. A. Hallock, Cor. Sec. Am. Tract Society.

In a note to the Society dated, Geneva, Nov. 11, 1844, Dr. D'Aubigné says, "I render thanks to God that he has permitted me to be a co-laborer with a Society so excellent as yours; and of the fruits with which he has deigned to crown my humble endeavors, there is none which is more precious to me, than the thought of spreading abroad the great truths and great things of God among the destitute settlements of your Great Valley, and other obscure and neglected portions of your country. But Oh, gentlemen, beseech the Lord, and call on your agents to pray, that he will not permit the volumes to go alone through your destitute settlements, but that he will accompany each by his Holy Spirit."

Postage Reform.—By reference to the Congressional Proceedings, in another column, it will be seen that a bill has passed the Senate of the United States, reducing the postage of letters to five cents a half ounce for any distance. This measure, if carried out, is destined to do more for the enlightenment and improvement of our country than all the other measures which have been under discussion put together. It will begin a new era of intelligence and progress. But the important question is yet to be settled, whether the House will adopt or reject the bill? Intelligent members express a hope that the bill will pass, yet are by no means certain. Meanwhile it is the duty of every friend of postage reform, to make known his wish through petition or otherwise. Let it be remembered, that if this bill is lost, probably nothing will be done this session. Prompt action only will be sure to prevent such a result.

The Late Storm.—From every direction our exchange papers bring notices of the severity of the late storm. The weather, it seems, has been extremely cold—in many places colder than before known for a long period. The snow fell to such a depth as completely to block up most of the public roads, and greatly obstruct the conveyance of mails and passengers. Some amusing incidents are told of cars imbedded in snow banks, and steamboats locked up in floating ice. We fear that painful intelligence is yet to be received of disasters upon the sea.

Editorial Resignation.—Mr. N. Southard, editor of the Morning Watch, (late the Midnight Cry,) has been compelled by ill health to resign his connection with that paper. In doing so, he expresses entire confidence in the principles of interpretation for which he has contended, and speaks of the signs of the times as daily confirming his expectation of the Lord's speedy second appearance.

"Render to all their Dues."—We have been reminded of this apostolic exhortation, by noticing a considerable number of our editorials copied into other papers without the appropriate credits. In a single copy of one paper we counted some half a dozen of our articles without credits; in another paper we see occasional extracts from our Leaves of a Traveler's Note-Book likewise wanting in the credit; and in others still, we find less flagrant, though not less real, evidences that the Apostle's exhortation is too often forgotten. A word to the wise is sufficient.

Rev. Mr. Phillips, a missionary of the Freewill Baptist Church, writing from his station in a heathen land, gives the following mournful account of the pilgrims and their pilgrimages. We find it in the Morning Star.

"The pilgrims are just now returning past our house from the Ruth, or principal festival of the year. There was, I believe, an unusually large proportion of deaths among them this year. Judging from the best accounts that have yet reached me, I think that one fourth of the whole number that went down, have perished, either at Pooree, or between this and Pooree, a distance of 180 miles. Probably not more than 80 or 90,000 pilgrims attended from this part of the country, this year—but how startling the fact, that one fourth of even this number have perished, unattended, in a foreign land! What would we, in the United States, think of being compelled to have an army of 80,000 men drafted yearly, with the absolute certainty that one fourth of this number would never again revisit their homes and friends? But the number of pilgrims this year is far below par. Not less than 200,000 assemble on some occasions! What a drain on the population of any country! What an army of souls to appear before the judgment seat, unprepared! At this very time, the dead and dying are to be seen thrown along the road in both directions, North and South, and the haggard forms, or rather walking skeletons, of those still able to move on, indicate plainly, that the work of death is by no means over! The half-eaten corpses, surrounded by dogs, vultures, and jackalls, quarreling over their prey, present one of the most disgusting, sickening sights I ever witnessed. But I will drop it."

CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

[Compiled for the Recorder.]

Monday, Feb. 3.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—J. Q. Adams presented a memorial relating to the National Institute. Resolutions of Louisiana Legislature on the subject of Annexation, were read. A bill was reported confirming and assenting to an act of the Legislature of Virginia, amending the act incorporating the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company, which led to a long discussion, and was finally passed. The bill to organize a territorial government in Oregon was brought up, several amendments concurred in, and the bill finally passed by a vote of yeas 140, nays 59—eighty-one majority. Soon afterwards the House adjourned.

SENATE.—Communications were received from the different departments. Several petitions, memorials, and remonstrances, against the Annexation of Texas, were presented. Also two petitions, praying that if Texas be annexed, Canada may also be taken into the Union. These last petitions led to considerable discussion. Mr. Barrow of Louisiana, made a speech against annexation, he believing that it would be detrimental to the interests of his State.

Tuesday, Feb. 4.

In the HOUSE, the bill to reduce and graduate the price of public lands in favor of actual settlers, was discussed for a long time, and a resolution passed that the debate should close to-morrow at one o'clock. Some unimportant business about individual claims was transacted, several bills from the Senate were referred, and six messages from the President, in answer to inquiries, were read.

In the SENATE, resolutions were presented from the Legislature of Indiana in favor of the occupation of Oregon, and for a reduction of postage. A resolution was passed calling upon the President for information in regard to Duff Green's mission to Texas. A report was made adverse to the bill providing for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue (the sub-treasury bill.) The Oregon bill was taken up and referred to a select committee. The Post Office bill was discussed at some length in committee of the whole. The Committee on Foreign relations presented a report relating to the annexation of Texas, accompanied by resolutions, that the joint resolution from the House of Representatives be rejected, and that all petitions on the subject be laid upon the table. The report and resolutions were ordered to be printed.

Wednesday, Feb. 5.

The HOUSE, immediately after the reading of the minutes, went into Committee of the Whole, on the Bill to graduate and reduce the price of Public Lands, Mr. Boyd in the chair. The Bill was discussed by Messrs. Hamlin of Maine, Houston, McDowell, and Rathbun. An amendment offered by Mr. Hamlin of Maine was adopted, and the Committee rose. Mr. Vinton of Ohio moved to lay the bill on the table—yeas and nays ordered,—Yeas 103; Nays 91. The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the Indian Appropriation Bill. On this a discussion was continued till the House adjourned.

In the SENATE, Mr. Benton presented a bill to provide for the annexation of Texas to the United States, recommending the formation of a State out of the present Republic of Texas, which shall be admitted into the Union, as soon as the terms of admission and of the cessation of the remaining territory, shall be agreed upon by the governments of the United States and Texas. The bill also recommends the appropriation of $100,000 to defray the expense of missions and negociations to agree upon the terms of admission and cession. It was laid over.

The Senate then took up the post office bill, on which they were engaged until the hour of adjournment.

Thursday, Feb. 6.

The HOUSE, in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with Indian tribes. The whole subject of Indian claims was brought under consideration, and some cutting remarks were made upon the past course of the government towards them. Mr. Giddings, and Mr. Black of Georgia, were led into a discussion about slavery, in the course of which Mr. Black made some exceedingly offensive remarks, to which Mr. Giddings replied with great severity. At the conclusion of the contest the bill was passed—Yeas 103, Nays 44.

SENATE.—After the transaction of some unimportant business, the Senate went into consideration of the special order of the day, which was the bill for the reduction of the rates of postage. The provision (9th section) restricting the Members of Congress to only five stamps and envelopes per day, during the session, was negatived by a vote 35 to 2. Several other amendments and propositions for altering the provisions of the bill were under consideration.

Friday, Feb. 7.

In the HOUSE, a number of reports from committees were read, chiefly upon private bills. A large number of private bills were considered in committee of the whole; the joint resolution of the Senate in regard to counting presidential votes was agreed to.

In SENATE, several memorials against the annexation of Texas were presented. A resolution was passed fixing upon Wednesday, 12th of Feb, as a time for the Senate and House to meet to examine the votes for President and Vice President. 10,000 copies of the map of Texas were ordered to be printed. The Senate then went into a consideration of the post office bill, adopted several amendments, and ordered that the bill be engrossed.

Saturday, Feb. 8.

The HOUSE was occupied chiefly with the third reading of bills reported from the committee of the whole. A long discussion arose upon a bill to pay James C. Watson for money expended by him in the purchase of negroes captured from the Seminoles during the war, and afterwards restored to the Seminoles on their removal beyond the Mississippi. Mr. Adams and Mr. Giddings protested against the bill. The discussion continued until the House adjourned.

In the SENATE, the Post Office bill was farther amended, and passed, by a decisive and gratifying vote of 38 to 12. The Senate then went into executive session.

THE POST OFFICE BILL.—This bill provides that every letter or parcel not exceeding half an ounce shall be deemed a single letter, and shall be conveyed to any distance for five cents; and five cents a half ounce to be charged for any additional weight. Newspapers of less than 1900 square inches, or 50 inches by 38, may be transmitted by the editors or publishers thereof to any person within thirty miles of the place of publication, free of charge; but for distances over thirty miles the postage is to continue as at present. Newspapers over 1900 square inches, and Magazines, are to be charged two cents per ounce. Printed circulars, handbills, or advertisements, two cents each. The franking privilege is to be abolished, except for Members of Congress, business of the departments of Government, the President, Ex-Presidents, and widows of Ex-Presidents. The bill also appropriates $750,000 to supply any deficiency in the revenue of the Department, consequent upon the reduction of postage. Should this sum prove insufficient, the deficiency is to be paid from the Treasury, providing that the whole expense of the department shall not exceed $4,500,000.

FIRE AT SALEM, N. J.—We learn from the Philadelphia Sun, that on Saturday morning the poor house at Salem, New Jersey, was completely destroyed by fire, which is supposed to have originated from the chimney. When the conflagration took place there were not less than one hundred inmates.

But what rendered the scene one of unusual excitement and terror, was the fact that several of them were lunatics, and were chained fast in their cells. We thought that this enormity had ceased to exist, in this country at least, and have seen and heard it asserted that such was the fact: In this instance, had it not been for the humanity and courage of some of the citizens or keepers, who at great peril, rushed into the cells and liberated the poor sufferers, the results of the fire must have been horrible in the extreme. One lunatic had been thus chained for twenty years, and when his rescuers entered his cell the wretched being started back in alarm and cowered down within the limit of his chain. When told of his danger his alarm and excitement were fearful; as soon as he was liberated he dashed off with more than Indian swiftness, and has not been retaken. The other chained ones were also liberated, re-taken, and lodged temporarily in the jail. [Commer. Adv.

INCIDENTS OF THE STORM.—Among the many disagreeables of the late storm, most of them very funny to all except to the poor victims, we were very much amused at the ingenuity of an Irishman, in Brooklyn, who was endeavoring to get home a couple of stray pigs. After trying in vain to drive them, he caught one of them in his arms, and, after carrying him a few yards, plunged him head first into a snow drift. While poor piggy was working his way out, Paddy went back after the other, who, in his turn, took a cold bath, and the process was repeated until they were both safely ensconced at home. [Express.

A SHIP SAILING 18,000 FEET ABOVE THE SEA.—Some very remarkable particulars are given in a Montevideo journal of British enterprise, one of whose most remarkable features is a "ship sailing 18,000 feet above the sea." The gold mines of Tapuana, and the emerald mines of Illimani, are situated on the banks of the Lake Chiquito. The only vegetable produce of the district is a species of red potato, called the chusma, and a few nutritious plants; but to the east of the Lake, at Copacassaua and in the valleys of Bolivia, are cultivated maize, barley, and fruit-bearing trees. The difficulty of feeding from their own scanty region, the large body of Indians working in the mines, suggested the idea of building a vessel for the navigation of the lake. An old brig was accordingly purchased and stripped of her anchors, sails, and rigging; and stocks being built, after two years of painful and unceasing labor, the vessel was launched on the lake, and a regular communication opened with the produce of the valleys of the Bolivia. The brig is well furnished with all the necessaries except anchors, which even the perseverance of these English speculators could not raise to so great a height. The same enterprising parties have transported a steam engine across the Cordilleras, dug through the metalliferous hills of Lacaycota, a canal 2000 feet in length, traversed by nine locks, and laid down a railway at its extremity, for the conveyance of their ore. The island of Titicaca in this lake, is assigned by tradition as the cradle of the earliest Peruvian civilization, and the sacred burial place of the ancient kings of the country.

THE UNICORN DISCOVERED!—A recent number of the "Journal Asiatique," (published in Paris,) states that M. Fresnel, the profound Orientalist, now French Consul at Jedda, in Arabia, has published a notice of the existence of the real unicorn in the wilds of Hadramant! This strange beast has a single horn, attached to its head by a joint, through which it can elevate or depress the horn at pleasure; remarkably confirming Psalms 92: 10, where it speaks of the "horn being exalted like the horn of the unicorn." This will throw great light on other passages of Scripture, which ignorance of Arabia prevented our comprehending. [Forum.

NEW JERSEY.—The following appointments have been made by the Governor of New Jersey, and confirmed by the Senate: Oliver S. Halstead, Chancellor; Joseph F. Randolph and Thomas P. Carpenter, Associate Judges of Supreme Court; Abraham Browning, Attorney General; Elias P. Seeley, John C. Ten Eycke, William C. Morris, and Isaac W. Scudder, prosecuters of the Peace; James Speer of Passaic, Aron Roberts of Warren, Ferdinand S. Schenck of Somerset, Jonathan J. Spencer of Burlington, Joseph Porter of Camden, and Joshua Brick of Cumberland, Judges of the Court of Error and Appeals. [Com. Adv.

CHOCTAWS.—Some three or four hundred of these Indians are now encamped on the Big Black, about eight or ten miles from Canton, Miss. They are waiting the arrival of the rest of the tribe, to proceed to their homes beyond the Mississippi, Messrs. Forrester, of Mississippi, and Anderson, of Tennessee, have the contract for their removal.

LONGEVITY AT NEWPORT, R. I.—The Newport Mercury of Saturday last has a list of 25 persons who died during the year 1844, whose united ages make 1956, giving an average for each of 78 years. The youngest in the list was 71—and there were eight, each of whose years exceeded 82—varying from that to 89. These 25 formed about a fifth of all the deaths in the town for the year.

LATER FROM THE SOCIETY ISLANDS.—A letter has been received in this city from Valparaiso, dated Oct. 4, which states that a vessel had arrived there from Tahiti, bringing accounts of a battle between the French and the natives, more sanguinary than any previous battle, which terminated in favor of the French. The natives had two hundred killed, and the French one hundred. The battle took place at Matavai Bay, Point Venus, on the West Coast of Tahiti, in the latter part of August or early in September. Our last previous advices were to August 12, for some weeks previous to which there had been no fighting, the natives having probably been engaged in preparing for a powerful effort to rid themselves of their oppressors.

Queen Pomare had gone to Bulobulo, an island about 60 miles south of Tahiti. The French had banished from the islands a great many foreigners who had taken up arms on the side of the natives, or otherwise assisted them in their warfare with the French. [Boston Dai. Adv.

AN EMBARRASING QUESTION.—A man convicted of having successively married three women, all three living, and not divorced, has just been arrested in Baltimore. But an embarrasing question is about to arise in the case. It has been discovered and proved that the man is the son of a colored woman, a slave at Annapolis, and consequently a slave himself, not subject to the law. Now his marriage with these three white women, according to this fact, is declared null by the laws of Maryland. It seems, therefore, no punishment can legally overtake him. If the jury decide it thus, this conclusion will be the result—That a slave may commit, with impunity, a crime for which the social laws punish a free man most severely! [Ev. Mirror.

ENTERPRIZE.—It is said of Messrs. Hayden, of Haydensville, Mass. the celebrated Steel Pen Manufacturers, that they commenced about the year 1830 the business of making Buttons by hand, employing only two or three persons besides themselves. They gradually enlarged their business, and in 1838 they had a capital of $10,000 and gave employment to 200 persons. In 1839 they added the business of manufacturing Steel Pens to that of Button-making, and now they have a capital of 75,000 and employ daily 275 hands. The number of Buttons manufactured at their establishment daily, in 1844, was 1,600 gross, and the number of Pens per day 100 gross.

LUNATICS.—The sixth annual report of the Lunatic Asylum of Ohio gives the whole number of patients in the Institution as 511. Their occupations are thus stated:

Farmers	117	Laborers	37
Teachers	16	Carpenters	12
Shoemakers	10	Clerks	8
Tailors	8	Merchants	7
Tailoresses	7	Preachers	7
Blacksmiths	6	Lawyers	6
Students	3	Musicians	2

A STEAM BALLOON.—A patent has recently been obtained by J. H. Pennington for a machine to navigate the air by steam. We have before us a view of one of these machines representing ten section balloons, instead of one entire balloon, a very obvious improvement. The engine is proposed to be placed in the upper story of the car appended to the balloon, and will be of about one and a half horse power. The steerage power is a rudder or an oar connected with the bottom of the balloon. To secure a light constrction, care has been taken to select only such materials as combine great strength with comparatively little weigh. [Cin. Gaz.

STATISTICS OF THE SCHUYLKILL COAL REGION.—The Miners' Journal furnishes some interesting facts in connection with the coal operations in that county. It says, few persons out of that region are acquainted with the necessity which exists in many instances, for mining below the water level, and the consequently enormous outlays for steam engines and machinery, and the heavy expenses constantly occurring for raising the coal and draining Mines. There are already 22 Collieries below the water level, and 41 engines employed in pumping, raising and breaking coal, with an aggregate horse power of 1278. A horse power is calculated as equivalent to the strength of eight able-bodied men—a man ordinarily labors but 10 hours in the 24; but the engines can, and some of them do run day and night; consequently they can perform, for each horse power, an amount of work equal to the labor of 16 men, and an aggregate of work equal to the labor of 20,448 men every 24 hours. The cost of these engines, pumps, and the necessary machinery, will not fall much short of $250,000, and the consumption of coal will amount to 40,000 tons per annum. The whole consumption of coal in this region, during the last year, is estimated at 100,000 tons.

A letter from a distinguished source in Washington says: "Texas, I think, is dead for this session."

THE NEW STATE PRISON IN CLINTON COUNTY.

RANSOM COOK, of Saratoga, the well known agent of the new Prison, has submitted a very interesting report to the Legislature, of its present condition and future prospects. It is now well known, that the very important experiment of driving trip hammers of the Catalan forge by means of the escape heat, while melting the ore, has been fully attested and found eminently successful. The importance of this discovery will be fully appreciated when we state, that water power is no longer necessary for carrying on great iron works, but that the heat which was heretofore allowed to escape, without being used, is now applied by a system of conduction to generate steam which drives the hammers of the forge. Its importance is still more palpable, when we add that the expense is less than to use water power.

He also finds, by experiment, that the ore from the Skinner bed, which has been purchased for the prison, is of a superior quality, that good steel is made while manufacturing iron. Therefore he thinks, with reason, that steel hereafter can be made with facility.

All the cast steel we use in this country is imported from England; and most singularly the iron is previously imported into England from Russia or Sweden. The charcoal has also to be imported. It is a very remarkable fact, which shows the commanding resources of our country, that steel must be manufactured from the charcoal iron, which England has not and cannot make. Her pit coal will not answer this purpose. Here, our means of obtaining charcoal are boundless and inexhaustible. By manufacturing steel at the prison, it competes only with the foreign manufacturer.

The new prison is to be called the Clinton Prison. It is situated fourteen miles nearly West of Plattsburgh, in Clinton county.

SUMMARY.

The number of common schools in Pennsylvania, according to the Superintendent's Report, just published, is 5,993, teachers 7,585; pupils 288,403.

The Springfield (Mass.) Republican of Saturday, states that last week, a party of ninety-nine persons, "old and middle aged ladies and gentlemen," from Bristol, Ct. arrived there in the morning, spent the day after the old fashioned sort, and returned in the afternoon.

It is said that the U. S. Government is about to make a peremptory demand upon the British Government, through Mr. Everett, for the delivery of a gang of eight or nine slaves who burned a house in Florida, and then escaped to Bermuda.

Samuel H. Smith, Esq. Treasurer of the National Monument Society, at Washington, reports the amount of money on hand, principal and interest, in different investments, to be $49,783 70.

John Powers, recently pardoned by President Tyler from the Kentucky penitentiary, in which he had been incarcerated for robbing the mail, has been arrested at New Orleans charged with abducting a slave and committing forgery.

A handsome monument now designates the spot where the remains of Nash and his brother officers who fell at the Battle of Germantown, lie interred.

A writer in the National Intelligencer states that he observed a short time since, in a bookstore in New York, a package of pamphlets, weighing sixty-six pounds, addressed to a bookseller in Illinois, who, being also a postmaster, his merchandize went postage free.

Mr. Kelsy, of this city, takes short pieces of roots of wild or other vines, and inserts his grape cuttings into them. The root and one bud of the cutting are buried in the ground. He says the cuttings take better, and grow faster.

The new Canal Commissioners of N. Y. have apportioned the canals among them. Mr. Jones takes this end, as far as Oneida Creek; Mr. Earll the middle, and Mr. Clark the West end. Mr. Bissell is not an acting Commissioner.

At Utica, on Sunday morning, Feb. 2d, the thermometer at sun rise ranged from 12 to 20 degrees below zero, and was but very little if any above zero during any portion of the day. At Boston 3 degrees below, and at Dorchester 10.

The French Catholic Church at West Troy, was destroyed by fire on Thursday morning. There appears to be no doubt that it was the work of an incendiary.

Churchill Houston, lately deceased, has bequeathed to various useful and benevolent Associations in the City and Districts of Philadelphia the sum of $13,000. Mr. Houston was a merchant.

The St. Louis Republican states that Lewis Rogers, son of the old Chief of the Cherokee Nation, was murdered, a short time ago, by several of the Ross tribe. He was attacked with bowie knives and literally butchered.

The length of Gov. Wright's Message has been definitely ascertained to be 120 miles. The clerk of the House commenced reading it at 12, and finished at 4 o'clock—at 12, Pomroy's Express started with it for Rochester, and at 4, was 120 miles on its westward way.

James Twyman, son of Dr. Leo Twyman, of St. Charles, accidentally hung himself. He was playing with a rope and barrel, at the residence of his brother, in St. Charles County; the rope was fastened to the joist of the building and round his neck. The head of the barrel on which he was standing broke in and he fell, and was soon after found by the other boys hanging by the neck, and life was totally extinguished.

The Editor of the Alabama Journal has been presented with a novel vegetable of the Cabbage kind, raised from seed sent from Belgium by the Hon. H. W. Hilliard. This vegetable is about the size of a small hen's egg, and is a perfect Cabbage, firm and white; it is said to be a most delicate dish, and superior to any of the same family of plants. The seeds are sown in May and transplanted in August, as other Cabbage-plants are, each plant producing from thirty to forty of these beautiful little Cabbage-heads.

MARRIED FOR A JOKE.—A bill has passed the Senate of Missouri declaring the marriage of Congrave Warner and Elizabeth Crocket null and void. The parties were at a wedding, and upon a banter given, probably by the gentleman, they mounted their horses and rode to a justice's, where the ceremoney was performed. Upon their return, and ever afterward, the lady insisted that it was all a joke, and refused to consider it otherwise. The gentleman desired to stand up to the joke, but the lady would not.

FREE BLACKS AND MULATTOES.—A bill of importance, concerning the interests of this class, has just passed both branches of the Maryland Legislature. By an act of 1831, they were allowed to leave the state for an unlimited period and return again, upon filing with the clerk of the county of their residence, a bill stating the reasons of their departure, and their intention to return. This clause of the bill making such provision, was stricken out—whereby under no circumstances will they be allowed to return to the state, after having absented themselves for thirty days.—*Jour. DIED.

At Adams, of Consumption, on the 24th of Nov. last, in the 24th year of her age, Miss NANCY SOPHRONIA GREEN, daughter of Mr. Edward Green.

The deceased was hopefully converted a number of years ago, and became a member of the S. D. Baptist Church in Adams, and continued so till her death. Her experience as a Christian exhibited nothing unusual while her health continued firm, and during the earlier part of her sickness, which was a protracted one of about nine months, she was distressed with gloomy doubts as to her adoption as a child of God, and her nature recoiled at the prospect of being cut off in her youth, and clung to her friends and to life, with the utmost tenacity. But a few months before her demise, after a most painful mental struggle, she was blessed with a full evidence of her acceptance with God, and rejoiced in the light of his countenance, with scarcely an intermission, till her release from the pains and sorrows of this life, to enjoy in endless fruition "the end of" her "faith."

For many weeks previous to her death she had been deprived of the power of speech; till within a few days of that event, she stated that she was now able to speak for the last time, and wished to address her friends on the importance of a timely preparation for death. A numerous family was convened at a late hour of the night, and she delivered to them her dying message, with a strength and clearness of voice, and a calmness and energy of expression, which astonished all who heard her. Her appeals to her unconverted friends were intensely moving, and will not be son forgotten.

After this she spoke no more, but remained about two weeks on the borders of the Heavenly Canaan, in the uninterrupted enjoyment of the blessed assurance of a glorious immortality into which she entered on the day above named. In her long and painful illness she was habitually patient, and near its close constantly cherished the "desire to depart and be with Christ." Her funeral sermon was preached to a large and deeply affected audience, by her pastor, who had visited her very frequently in her sickness, much to his own profit, and to her comfort. May her piety be imitated by her numerous friends who survive her, and the church of which she was a member. [Black River Journal.

In Brookfield, Madison Co., N. Y., on the 20th ult., Mr. HENRY C. MAXSON, son of Josiah G. Maxson, aged 24 years. He fell a victim to consumption, which had preyed upon his system for years. His decline and sickness were borne with great fortitude and patience. Death had no terror for him; but the hope heaven buoyed him up in view of it, and enabled him to give the brightest evidences of fitness for another world. He possessed a bright intellect, fine sensibilities, and a sympathetic heart. He was a warm friend of the slave, and labored earnestly for his benefit. His death is felt to be a loss to society.

Farewell! dear brother;
No more shall sickness, pain and grief,
Thy youthful frame decay
For death hath brought thee kind relief,
And called thy soul away.

Shall breath its gentle sigh,
No sound shall break thy deep repose,
No voice awake thine eye.

Sleep on, kind friend, till Gibriel's voice
Shall call thee from thy rest;
Thy mem'ry shall be ever dear,
Then rest, dear brother, rest.

THE MOSS ROSE.

A German poet thus explains the origin of that elegant flower, the Moss Rose:

"The angel of the flowers one day
Beneath a rose tree sleeping lay;
That spirit to whose charge is given
To bathe young buds in dews from heaven.
Awaking from his light repose,
The angel whispered to the rose—
'O, fondest object of my care!
Still fairest found where all is fair,
For the sweet shade thou'st given to me,
Ask what thou wilt, 'tis granted thee.'
'Then,' said the rose, with deepened glow,
'On me another grace bestow.'
The spirit paused in silent thought—
What grace was there that flower had not!
'Twas but a moment—o'er the rose
A veil of moss the angel throws—
And, robed in nature's simplest weed,
Could there a flower that rose exceed?"

THE BROKEN HEART'S APPEAL.

Give me back my childhood's truth!
Give me back my guileless youth!
Pleasure, Glory, Fortune, Fame,
These I will not stoop to claim!
Take them! All of Beauty's power,
All the triumph of this hour
Is not worth one blush you stole—
Give me back my bloom of soul!

Take the cup, and take the gem!
What have I to do with them!
Loose the garland from my hair!
Thou shouldst wind the night-shade there:
Thou who wreath'st with flattering art,
Poison flowers to bind my heart!
Give me back the rose you stole!
Give me back my bloom of soul!

WOMAN,

HER CHARACTER, INFLUENCE, SPHERE, AND CONSEQUENT DUTIES AND EDUCATION. NO. I.

If I were commissioned to labor in the most promising department of either human improvement or reform, and allowed to make my own selection, that choice would fall on WOMAN; because she is the fountain head of those streams that go forth to bless and to perfect mankind; or else to embitter and deteriorate our race. As are the women of any nation, of any age, so that nation, so that age. As is the mother, so are the sons—the latter being perpetual certificates of the character, the talents, the virtues, the vices, the all, of the former. Show me the stream, and I will show you the fountain. Show me the son, and I will show you his mother. Woman makes our laws, and then executes them; not by uplifting her voice in the councils of the nation, but by stamping her own image and likeness, mentally and morally, in like manner as she does phyisically, upon her sons, which likeness is but the type of both legal legislation and execution. Woman bears, and then educates and governs, our sons. Our sons guide and govern mankind. Second-handed, but effectually, does woman guide and govern the world. She wields that mighty Archimedian lever, whose fulcrum is childhood, whose length is time, whose weight is the world, and whose sweep is eternity. From her our race receives its greatest boons—its greatest banes. And by far the most effectual way to reform and perfect mankind, is to reform and perfect her; because every item of such perfection is felt at once and with augmented power, throughout all the ramifications of society.

Though the influence of young women upon the taste and tone of society, upon the manners, customs, conversation, everything, is indeed great; and though woman's influence as a wife, upon the character, pursuits and destinies of her husband, is incalculable, yet it is proposed here to limit attention to her educational influences only—her influence in moulding the character, shaping the conduct, forming the opinions, directing the tastes, and determining the destinies of the rising generation.

That the influence of mothers in these and other similar respects, is almost infinitely greater than that of fathers, is both a plain matter of universal observation and experience, and a clearly demonstrated principle of phrenological science; and by two of its fundamental laws: the one that early impressions are written upon the tablet of mind as with the point of a diamond, never to be erased; and the other, that we drink in our principal influences from those we love; and that mothers can, and generally do, secure the first and strongest affections of their children, and thereby hold unlimited sway over these first impressions.

Upon the fact, that the impressions of childhood and youth are indelible, I will not enlarge. It is too apparent to require it. Its efficacy, its universality, we all feel. We know it to be a law of mind. But it is important that we show,

First, The power which love gives the one beloved over the one loving; and,

Secondly, The faculties which mothers possess for gaining the affections of their children, and thus of moulding their characters.

First, then, The all-powerful influence which love gives those beloved over those who love. As long as one dislikes another, all the latter does and says, be it good or bad, right or wrong, is disliked, and therefore regarded with the same aversion with which its author is regarded. To gain the displeasure of another is to lose all influence over him—nay, more—is to influence him in a directly opposite direction. Let a minister, beloved by one hearer, be disliked by another, utter a giving sentiment, be it what it may, and the mere fact that the former likes him, makes him like it, and gives it a controling influence over him, which increases this like; while the fact that the latter dislikes its author, makes him reject it as irrational, offensive, and perhaps even monstrous; which aversion repels it from the mind, and precludes its exercising any influence over him; besides its rendering the author still more odious. Be the sentiment true, and even self-evident to an unprejudiced mind, his prejudice shuts his eyes against even the most palpable evidence of its truth, and he quibbles every way to convince himself of its erroneousness. Indeed, it has become a proverb, that "there are none so blind as those that won't see"—a fact both caused and accounted for by this very principle we are now urging. The author of the sentiment not only has no bond which binds him to his prejudiced hearer, but a partition wall has been erected as a barrier between them, which even the force of truth will not surmount.

But the friendly hearer has a connection already established. He likes its author, and that causes him to confide in him; and this confidence both opens his mind to conviction, so that he even yields up opinion, feeling intellect, everything to him who is beloved. This is the very nature of love. Indeed, love consists in this confidence, this blending and intermingling of spirits. And the greater this love, the more powerful the influence imparted thereby. Send a child to a teacher whom he loves, and he will progress astonishingly, but send him to another, perhaps still more talented, whom he does not love, and he may forget what he already knows, instead of learning more. A preacher of transcendent talents and virtues may preach with the words of angels, but, however solemn, however clear and convincing, his usefulness is at an end when his people, or even a few of them, become disaffected towards him; whilst another, be he lame of speech and slow of intellect, and even injudicious if not depraved, so that he has the affection of his people, will mould their opinions and their doctrines to his liking.

So we insensibly but effectually become what our friends are. If they swear, we swear; if they pray, we pray; if they reason, we reason. We assimilate ourselves with those we love—doing what they do, and becoming what they are. In short, friends magnetize each other, and this causes them to partake of each other's nature.

A kindred illustration of its influence over those who love, is to be found in the service friendship will do, and the sacrifice it will make as it were for those beloved. Not Solomon with all his glory; not Nero or Cesar with their power; not Crœsus with all his gold, if sick and friendless, could have bought, could even have enforced, those attentions to their wants which a loving sister, or wife, or mother would cheerfully bestow. Nor will any other principle, neither the deductions of intellect, nor the stubbornness of facts, nor the mighty power of selfishness, nor the fear of death, nor even the sense of moral obligation, or of praise or any other emotion whatever, secure the whole-souled co-operation and complete influence which affection of itself secures.

Now, to appeal from this principle itself, to its practical workings. And I call up as witnesses, all the distinguished men of all ages, and ask them if they did not ride into their elevated seats of influence in church, in state, and even in science, on the mighty car of friendship? But suffice it to ask each reader both to observe mankind at large, and then to consult the secret closet of his own soul, and then say, if, of all other means of moulding character, forming opinions, and shaping conduct, LOVE does not eclipse intellect, moral principle, the monitions of conscience, the voice of reason, the charms of sympathy, and all other motives whatsoever.

And now for the practical application of this great law of mind to maternal influences. The organ of Philoprogenitiveness is vastly larger in mothers than it is in fathers. This, all phrenologists will affirm. Indeed, from the extreme development of this organ mainly, can the female scull generally be designated from that of the male.

Not in size mainly, but in increased activity, is this faculty more powerful in woman than in man. So related are mothers to their children, from generation to adolescence, as to call the full power of this faculty into constant and most intense action. I need not particularize. Take the fact. Fathers will sleep soundly over their sick children, while mothers will watch and weep, night after night, year in and year out, taking mere snatches of sleep only, few and short, from their incessant watchings.

Now, since love excites love, this whole-souled affection of mothers for their children, causes children to love their affectionate mothers more than any other being, or more than all other objects put together. The principle that affection excites affection, as well as anger, anger, devotion, devotion, fear, fear, and so of all other human passions and faculties, need not be demonstrated here. Only two things can excite affection, the one is affection in another, and the other is the happiness taken in the one beloved. It is human nature to love what loves us, and what makes us happy; the former, perhaps, being a part of the latter. Nor do I know any other incentive of love. Mothers ought to love, do love, their children almost infinitely more than fathers. So constituted are they moreover, that their very circumstances compel them to do ten times more for their comfort than fathers; illustrations of which occur in feeding, clothing, talking with, and all the little, and all the great incidents of childhood and youth.

And now, intellectual reader, put these two facts together—a mother's love, a mother's perpetual supply of their constantly returning wants, and you have the reason why mothers so completely engross the affections of their children—and this tells the story of a mother's influence.

To apply this principle more in detail. Mothers mould the moral and religious character, opinions, and conduct of their children. For two reasons. They are religious themselves. Two females to one male will be found to have registered their names on the records of our churches. Woman was last at the cross, and first at the sepulchre; and female influence and effort have done more to propagate the pure and peaceful religion of Jesus, than all other earthly influence combined. True, woman does not occupy the pulpit, does not control the religious press—but she moulds the minds and forms the opinions of those who do. By precept, by example, she teaches her sons what to believe, and how to pray. She does not preach to the present generation, but the rising one. Those religious opinions that now prevail, are those taught by our mothers; while the mothers of the present day are now writing those homilies and creeds which will govern the religious opinions and practices of the generation that shall follow. Ask any eminent preacher of the day, where he learned to pray, and from whence he derived those landmarks which make his religious creed, and he will answer, "From my MOTHER." Nor can that religious teacher be found who had not a praying mother; or is scarcely to be met with who does not believe and preach with his mother. A single illustration is found in the general fact that in cases where the religious opinions of fathers and mothers differ, ninety-nine in every hundred believe and go with their mother—to mass, if she uttered mass; to the baptismal font where she goes; to the altar where she sacrifices. And I call upon every reader to say, not only from what source he derived his earliest and strongest religious impressions, but also whether they do not yet hang to him, though shaken off for the hundredth time, though repulsive to reason, and even though you know them to be palpably erroneous. Is it possible to efface them, even by any means? On our own experience, reader, I rest this point. Let that tell you the power, the importance, of this principle. Mothers should know that if they teach religious errors, those errors are to become fountains of unhappiness to the idols of their affection for life. Modern sectarianism, with all its diversity, with all its deformity, owes its perpetuality, its virulence, to maternal influence. Nor can the corrupt stream of the religions that are, be cleansed till this maternal fountain be purified. At your feet, mothers, lie the sin, the bigotry, the ridiculousness, of sectarian creeds. You teach them; and so teach them as to becloud reason, bedim observation or distort what it sees, darken the moral sentiments, and lead the human mind farther from God and truth than all other influences combined.

The summing up of this whole matter is simply this. The earliest affections of the child—the first going forth of its soul—turns to its mother. She then guides the stream as seemeth her good. Its channel once formed, the banks of predilection, perhaps the hills of prejudice, environ its course, if they do not render its direction unchangable. I beseech you, mothers, ponder well this principle. Pause, tremble, in view of your momentous responsibilities. Teach them religion, you certainly should, but teach them RIGHT. Some of you—most—are certainly in error; for, truth is one, but you differ heaven-wide—teaching doctrines directly at war with each other. But few of you can possibly be right. Most of you, therefore, are necessarily sowing the seeds of error, which are soon to spring up and bear evil fruit, "some twenty fold, some sixty, and some an hundred," to your shame, to their sorrow. Beware, I beseech you, what you instil, lest you sow tears and reap sin—sow the wind, but reap the whirlwind. At your hands will their blood be required. For your sins will those you most love also suffer, as well as yourselves. Learn what is truth yourselves, that you may teach your children truth only. Banish bigotry lest you infect them also therewith. Pray to the true God, lest you teach them also to pray to the idle of your sect, or else sicken them with your nauseating creeds, till their moral stomachs disgorge the errors imbibed in childhood along with all moral guidance and restraints, and sate their disordered souls on the carcase of infidelity, or are starved by the emptiness of atheism.

And here let me humbly suggest, (humbly? nay, but in the confidence of truth,) that they should be taught God, in his works—be taught natural religion, not sectarianism. But, as to fully present this subject will extend this article beyond our present limits, we will take another opportunity, probably in the next number, to show what religious impressions and doctrines should be inculcated, and what not; as well as the importance of a correct religious belief and practice.—American Phrenological Journal.

LIBERTINISM A CRIME.

Again have the petitions of many thousands of the virtuous mothers and daughters of our State been presented at Albany, praying that those crimes by which the peace of families is destroyed and innocence and happiness changed to pollution, shame, and misery, shall be declared an offence against the body politic, and punishable like any other crime. A Select Committee of the Assembly, of which Mr. Huntington of Ontario is Chairman, has considered these petitions and reported in favor of granting their prayer, with a promptitude and heartiness for which we tender them our fervent thanks.

We have as little faith as any one in reforming men by scourging them or in repressing evil passions by the denunciation or infliction of penalties. * * * * * * But to many persons the Law is the standard of rectitude, and it is every way important that the Law shall be equal and just in its inflictions. Whenever it gives impunity to one wrong, while punishing another less heinous or less hurtful, it does great injustice and tends to subvert the moral sentiment of the community. * * * * * *—Tribune.

REPORT of the Select Committee on the subject of Licentiousness.

The Select Committee to whom was referred certain petitions, praying for the passage of a law to punish as crimes seduction and adultery, beg leave to offer the following

REPORT:

The Committee regard the subject submitted to them as vital to the well being of the whole community, and yielding in importance to none that will demand the deliberations of this Assembly. This opinion derives additional strength from the structure of our Government, which is essentially based on the purity of the public morals. Whatever, then, has a tendency to deteriorate and lower the standard of public virtue, strikes at the root and endangers the stability of our free institutions.

The subject has long agitated the public mind, and annually has your table been loaded with petitions, imploring in the strongest terms, (evincing the deep feeling which pervades that virtuous and estimable class of our citizens from whom they emanate,) legislative aid to suppress the evils of which they complain.

Whether the difficulties with which the subject was supposed to be invested, or some other inexplicable cause, has induced each succeeding Legislature to leave it as a legacy to their successors, we know not; but your Committee believe that our tardy legislation has emboldened the licentious to throw off all restraint, and riot unrebuked in those corrupt indulgencies, which reduce their votaries to a level with the tenants of the stye.

Of all the fierce and fell passions which afflict fallen humanity, rendering indispensable for the protection of society the enactment of penal laws, none, it is believed, can compare with lust. It rushes to indulgence, reckless of consequences, trampling on all laws, human and divine, prostrating in its mad career, like the dire sirocco of the desert, all that is valued, beautiful and lovely in the domestic circle; desecrating all that is sacred around the hearth and the family altar, planting daggers in the bosoms of parents and friends, provoking the arm of private vengeance, and not unfrequently terminating in homicide and murder.

Its demoralizing influence is felt through all the ramifications of society, in its direct or incidental consequences inducing, it is believed, more suffering than any other individual cause. Your Committee humbly conceive that the first duty of the Government is to cherish and reward virtue, protect the public morals, secure and defend the rights of all, and visit merited and speedy punishment on the head of the guilty; and that that Government which does not achieve thus much for the benefit of the governed, has signally failed of accomplishing the object for which it was created.

The Committee do not feel called upon, in the discharge of the duty assigned them by the House, to furnish any extended statistics of those loathsome vices with which the public are, unhappily, but too familiar. Some idea, however, may be formed of the extent of the evil, from the fact that there has been ascertained to be not less than twelve thousand public prostitutes in the city of New York alone; and there is good reason to believe that they are to be found pro rata in our populous villages along the line of our canals.

From this data, it may be assumed that the State contains not less than twenty five thousand of these degraded women, migrating, by all our public conveyances, from place to place; contaminating the moral atmosphere, and scattering destruction in their path.

In the metropolis of England, it was stated before an investigating committee of the House of Commons, that the average life of women, who had abandoned themselves to prostitution, did not exceed five years.

On that supposition, five thousand in our own State annually perish. Passing over the suffering attendant on this wanton waste of life, with all its fearful consequences, we ask, from what source is this fountain of corruption to be supplied? Where are the five thousand annual recruits for this army of prostitutes to be sought for?

Foreign emigration it is admitted will furnish its full quota, but who can doubt that the great majority are to be drawn from the families of our citizens in every walk of life?

The demoralizing effect of such an influence upon our youth of both sexes, must be too obvious to demand an argument. But while we admit the evil, and lament its prevalence, does it not behoove us to enquire after the procuring cause, that in our public capacity we may devise and apply an adequate remedy?

The existing laws against rape recognize the physical incapacity of the female to protect herself against her ravisher. But what enactment is found on your statute book for her protection, recognizing her moral and intellectual incapacity to detect the designs of the villain who approaches her under the guise of honorable intentions? Or to forestall the insidious wiles of the practiced seducer, who not unfrequently adds force to circumvention, fraud and falsehood, which the victim of his brutal lust conceals from burning shame, thus putting herself entirely in the power of her betrayer, who improves it with the malignity of a demon, to hedge up her return to the paths of virtue, till satiety gives place to disgust, and the wretched female finds no alternative but an Alms-house or brothel.

And shall we wonder, if like a fallen angel, ruined herself, she seeks the ruin, not only of him who dashed the untasted cup of bliss from her lips, and blotted out forever the bright visions of future happiness which glowed in youthful imagination, but that of all his sex? One whose graphic pencil drew human nature to the life has told us,

> "Heaven hath no plague like love to hatred turned,
> Nor Hell a fury like a woman scorned."

And the records of some of our criminal courts, furnish a practical illustration of the sentiment.

Your Committee are therefore constrained to believe that the early action of the Legislature alone can prevent the recurrence of similar scenes, or those more tragical, which have transpired within a short period in two of our sister states, as chronicled by the public press, where the prompt hand of a father, or a brother, executed speedy vengeance on the seducer and the ravisher, and sent them without a moment's warning to their final account. Much as these acts of violence are to be deplored, in the absence of legal provisions to punish the crimes which provoked them, the public voice has hailed them as the dictate of common justice, and the triumph of right.

These facts speak a language not to be misunderstood, and admonish us, that while public opinion visits its terrible retribution on the head of the offending female, and affixes a mark of infamy, which neither the tears of penitence, nor a return to the paths of virtue, can entirely obliterate, it will no longer tolerate impunity to the guilty cause of her degradation, or screen him from the stroke of private vengeance.

Moreover, when we reflect upon the peculiar position of a majority of these numerous petitioners who are primarily interested in the subject matter of their petitions, but who, by the usages of society and the laws of the State, are excluded from any voice in electing the law-making power; their appeal to us, not only in our legislative capacity, but as the fathers, husbands and brothers, those endearing relations which we sustain to them in social and domestic life, forbid that they should be coldly repulsed or their petitions treated with indifference and neglect.

Much less can we consent that their motives should be impugned, or admit for a moment, that they have "overstepped the modesty of nature," or violated the most rigid rules of female propriety and prudence, in their efforts to procure even-handed justice for their sex, and wipe out the stigma of your present law, which regards them as personal chattels whose wrongs are to be measured by the loss of service to their possessors.

Believing that the evils of which the petitioners complain, exist to an alarming degree, and that the neglect on the part of the State to provide adequate laws for their suppression has conduced to their present magnitude, your Committee respectfully submit, that this Legislature cannot regard them with indifference, or refuse to pass such acts as will repress and punish them, without a dereliction of duty calculated to encourage the guilty, and expose this House to the merited censure of the constituent body.

With these views, irrespective of the sneers of the libertine, or the clamors of those who pander to lust, the Committee have come to the conclusion that the prayer of the petitioners ought to be granted, and ask leave to introduce the following bill.

J. HUNTINGTON, Chairman.

AN ACT to punish seduction and adultery as crimes, and for other purposes.

The people of the State of New York, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows:

[Sec. 1. Prescribes, for the seduction of a female under 18, by a married man, State Prison not more than five years, or a fine of not more than $3,000.

Sec. 2. Do. for seducing a female over over 18, State Prison not over three years, or County jail not more than one year, or a fine of not over $1,000.

Sec. 3. Seduction by an unmarried man of a female not over 18, same penalties as last above.]

Sec. 4. If any person shall inveigle, entice, or take away any female under the age of eighteen years, from her father's house, or wheresoever her residence may be, for the purpose of concubinage or prostitution, and every person who shall aid, abet or assist in such abduction, shall be punished by imprisonment in the State Prison, not less than three nor more than five years.

Sec. 5. Every person who shall keep a house of ill fame, or assignation for the purpose of prostitution, shall be punished by imprisonment in a county jail not exceeding one year, or by fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, or by fine and imprisonment both.

Sec. 6. Every person who shall let or lease any building or tenement, for the purpose of being kept as a house of ill fame, or as a place of assignation for the purpose of prostitution, shall forfeit for the use of the poor of such city or county, where such building or tenement shall be situated, the rents and profits of the same for two years, to be recovered in an action in assumpsit by the overseers of the poor or commissioners of the Alms-house.

Sec. 7. This act shall take effect immediately.

The Journal of Commerce, after inserting a summary of he above, remarks as follows:—

"Let a law of this description be enacted and enforced, and it would be the salvation of thousands of amiable young women, who otherwise will be destroyed. The object of leaving the penalties, to such an extent, at the discretion of the Court, is doubtless to provide for the different degrees of guilt which in different cases attend the crime. Virtuous men need not be alarmed at the enactment of severe laws on the subject; and as to others, it is time that they should be alarmed. If the voice of their victims could be heard now, as it will be hereafter, it would utter words of terror that would drive them to distraction.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

THIS Institution has a pleasant and quiet location thirteen miles south-east of Angelica, and six miles south of Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y., under the care of W. C. KENYON, as Principal, and Miss CAROLINE B. MAXSON, as Preceptress, aided by able and experienced assistants.

Teachers' Classes will be exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining every facility of a Normal School, without its usual disadvantages. Within the past year, more than one hundred and fifty students of the institution have been employed as teachers in this and the adjacent counties—a number much larger than from any other institution in the State.

Students are prepared for entering any class in College. Ample advantages are also secured to those pursuing Modern Languages and the Fine Arts. The institution is liberally endowed and supplied with a choice and valuable library, and apparatus sufficiently extensive to illustrate every department of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. It has also well selected cabinets of Geological, Mineralogical and Conchological specimens.

The plan of instruction aims at the development of the moral, intellectual and physical powers of students, so as to render them thorough, accurate, and practical scholars.

Lectures on Chemistry, accompanied by a full course of experiments, will commence with the second week of the fall term, and continue daily to its close. During the fall and winter terms, daily lectures will be given on School Teaching. Lectures on Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Physiology, illustrated by experiments, will be given each term of the year.

TUITION, per term of fifteen weeks, from $3,50 to $5. Board per week, in private families, $1. The entire expense of the academic year, including tuition, board, washing, light, and fuel, need not exceed $60. No extra charges incurred.

SAMUEL RUSSEL,
President of the Board of Trustees

THOUGHTS ON THE PERPETUITY OF THE SABBATH.

NUMBER FIFTEEN.

No inspired writer gives the distinctive title "Lord's Day" to the first day of the week.

"Luther's" exegesis of Rev. 1: 10, in No. 32 of the Recorder, so nearly coincides with my own thoughts upon the subject, that it is unnecessary to record them in this place. I wish, however, to observe, that such an exposition of that text may be supported by reference to the inspired title of the book, contained in verses 1 and 2—"The Revelation of Jesus Christ," &c. The Gospels are inspired narratives of the life and doctrines of Jesus Christ; the book of Revelations is a prophetic account of the events that are to transpire during the mediatorial government of Jesus Christ as High Priest of his people, and Prince of the kings of the earth, until that great day of his power, when he shall come to consummate all his designs upon earth. In his introduction, John asserts the divine origin and authority of the vision of which he is about to give an account, affirming that it was from God the Father and from Jesus Christ. He then gives an intimation that the vision related to the ascended glory of the Saviour and the events preceding his second coming. He next relates the circumstances in which the vision was shown unto him. When opening the vision itself, he says, "I was in the spirit on the Lord's day." By this expression John meant to say, that the Spirit transported him in vision to see the great, glorious, and dreadful things, which are to transpire during the mediatorial government of Him who is the Alpha and the Omega, the beginning and the end of all things.

That the phrase, "I was in the spirit," signifies a state peculiar to prophetic inspiration, is supported by every account of similar revelations given in the Old and New Testaments. Ezekiel 1: 1, says, "I was among the captives by the river Chebar." Dan. 10: 4—"I was beside the great river Hiddekel." Paul, Acts 22: 6—"It happened that as I made my journey, and was approaching Damascus." John, Rev. 1: 9—"I was in the Isle called Patmos," &c. So much for the places where these events happened. Of the time, Ezekiel says his vision occurred on the fifth day of the fourth month, in the thirtieth year of their captivity. Daniel's in the four-and-twentieth day of the first month, in the third year of Cyrus. Paul's about noon, as he approached Damascus on his persecuting mission. John's during his banishment to the Isle of Patmos for the word of God and the testimony of Jesus Christ. Neither Paul nor John give us the year, the month, the day of the month, or the day of the week. And it were just as authoritative to guess that Ezekiel and Daniel meant the seventh day of the week, and Paul the first, as to guess that John meant the first. If John had meant to designate the day on which this vision occurred, he would, like Ezekiel and Daniel, have connected it with the circumstances of his abode; but as it stands now, it is incorporated with the nature and subjects of the vision. That this is so, will be seen by putting the accounts of several visions in juxtaposition. Ezekiel 8: 3—"The spirit lifted me up between the earth and the heaven, and brought me in the visions of God to Jerusalem." Ezekiel 11: 24—"Afterward the spirit took me up, and brought me in a vision by the spirit of God into Chaldea." So John, Rev. 17: 3—"So he carried me away in the spirit into the wilderness;" and again, at chap. 21: 10—"He carried me away in the spirit to a great and high mountain, and showed me that great city, the holy Jerusalem."

Farther, that it was of a state peculiar to prophetic visions that John wrote, is manifest from the first effect of the vision upon the beholder. Ez. 2: 2—"I fell upon my face, and the Spirit entered into me when he spoke to me, and set me on my feet." Daniel—"There remained no strength in me; then was I in a deep sleep on my face; and behold a hand touched me, and set me on my knees and the palms of my hands." Paul fell to the earth; and after he arose, they led him into the city, and he was three days and three nights without sight, and neither ate nor drank. Acts 9: 1 to 11. John—"When I saw him, I fell at his feet as dead. And he laid his right hand upon me, and said, Fear not." Each of these accounts corroborates the fact, that humanity, in its present feeble state, is not able to bear the visions of spiritual glory, which are peculiar to the invisible world. Hence when they are given, they so overpower human nature, that it falls into a state similar to a deep sleep; when the person who beholds it becomes, body and soul, perfectly unconscious of all natural things that are passing around him. Peter calls it a trance; Acts 11: 5. Paul says he knew not whether he was in the body or out of the body; 2 Cor. 12: 2. In this state, the soul is introduced into the world of spirits, and is shown future times and things. In such a state was John when he was in the spirit, and saw the Lord Jesus Christ and the day of his power.

That John never intended to distinguish the first day of the week by the title of "the Lord's Day," is manifest, because unlike the appointment of every other sacred day in the holy Scriptures, no particular day is mentioned. Had the narrative said the first day of the week, as in the appointment of the passover it is said the fourteenth day; or like the institution of the Sabbath, where it is said the seventh day, all controversy on that subject would have been ended. But when no day is mentioned in the passage, it is impossible for it to teach that the first day of the week is to be regarded as a divine institution. Again, there is presumptive evidence that no particular day of the week is meant, because neither in his Gospel, (the last written of all the Gospels,) nor in either of his Epistles, (written after the Apocalypse,) does John call any day of the week by that title; nor does any other sacred writer give any intimation that the first day of the week was so called, or regarded as sacred time. John, writing of the resurrection, says, chap. 20: 1, "The first day of the week;" and again, "the same day at evening, being the first day of the week." That John wrote his Gospel after all the other three Evangelists, and near the close of the Apostolic age, is a circumstance on which the learned are well agreed. It is therefore incredible that the first day had acquired the distinctive title of Lord's Day, and yet in the only three instances in which he has occasion to mention the day, he simply calls it "the first day of the week;" and those instances in an account of the resurrection, in honor of which it is pretended it received the appellation Lord's day! Could language have been so used by a writer who eight times in his Gospel mentions the "Sabbath day" by its own appropriate name? Against such a pretence, there are five places in the New Testament, where, like 2 Thess. 5: 2, the time of the Lord's judgment is called the day of the Lord; and seventeen instances in the Old Testament, where the same form of expression is used, and with the same signification. It is certain that neither the Holy Spirit nor the Apostles ever so distinguished the first day of the week as peculiarly the Lord's day. Hence it follows, that to plead Rev. 1: 10 for that practice, is an unauthorized assumption. Would it not be better, and more in accordance with truth, to call it the Festival of the Resurrection?

To me the foregoing thoughts afford perfectly satisfactory evidence that the application of the title Lord's day to the first day of the week is unauthorized by any inspired Scripture. Yet it ought not to be concealed, that Beza, an eminent writer and translator, affirmed that in an ancient Greek copy of the New Testament, he found after the words, first day of the week, "the Lord's day," inserted in exegetical parentheses, with every appearance of its having been added by the copyist alone! Such was the anxiety of many in the early ages to secure some veneration for the first day! It is a historical fact, that Eusebius Pamphilius prefixed to the inspired title of the Apocalypse, "Saint John the Divine," or Theologian, which is retained in most versions to this day; and common readers suppose that title of the disciple whom Jesus loved, to be an inspired dignity conferred upon him. Who can wonder, then, at the popular delusion respecting the Lord's day? How much better is it to abide by the simplicity of the sacred Scriptures. They need not the arts of rhetoric or the aids of meretricious names.

EVENTS OF 1844.

I. RELIGIOUS EVENTS.

1. The expulsion of the Jesuits from Persia, on account of their political intrigue and wily arts for the spread of Romanism, occurred March 23, 1844.

2. The Preliminary Division of the Methodist Episcopal Church, on the question of retaining a slave-holding Bishop, was made by the General Conference of that church, during the month of May, 1844. It is to be carried into effect only on specified conditions.

II. SIGNAL PROVIDENCES.

1. The fatal explosion of the "big gun," on board the U. S. Steamer Princeton, took place Feb. 28th. By this awful catastrophe, the Secretary of State, Mr. Upsher; the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Gilmer; Commodore Kennon, U. S. N.; Mr. Maxcy, recent minister of Government in Holland; Col. Gardner, of N. Y., and one other person, were instantly killed. The "big gun" would carry a ball of 225lbs.

2. A great inundation occurred, at Adrinople, Turkey, caused by a sudden thaw, and burying 3000 houses in its floods, March 1st.

3. Disastrous Conflagration at N. Orleans, which reduced ten squares to a heap of ruins, including 300 buildings and $500,000 worth of property, occurred May 18th.

4. The Great Inundation of the Mississippi and its branches took place during the months of June and July. Whole towns were destroyed, numerous lives lost, and property to the value of $15,000,000 ruined.

5. Metamoras, Mexico, two-thirds destroyed by a Hurricane, August 24th. Two hundred lives lost.

6. Dreadful storm on our Southern and South-eastern sea-board, Oct. 5th and 6th. This storm has scarcely had a parallel in severity and extent of devastation for many years.

III. WARLIKE AND REVOLUTIONARY EVENTS.

1. Two battles in Givalior, India, between the British under Sir H. Gough, and the Natives, in January. The former were victorious, with the loss of 1000 killed and wounded, while the latter lost 5000 in killed and wounded, and 50 pieces of artillery.

2. O'Connell and the Traversers condemned in March, sentenced to imprisonment and fine May 30th, and finally liberated from the Dublin Penitentiary by a decision of the House of Lords Sept. 6th. This was a triumph for the Liberator of Ireland.

3. Mount Lebanon and the adjoining country (Syria) in arms March 1st. The Marronites revolted against their Turkish oppressors, to the number of 12,000 insurgents. At the last accounts the difficulties were far from being adjusted.

4. A new insurrection breaks out in Hayti, which resulted in the establishment of another Republic in that distracted island.

5. Romanist Riot in Philadelphia, on the 5th, 6th, and 7th of May. The Irish Catholics began the work of death by firing in upon a peaceable political meeting of Native Americans. For three awful days, anarchy, pillage and death, reigned in the city of Philadelphia. Some 15 or 20 were killed, numbers were wounded, and houses and Roman churches burnt.

6. Second awful Romanist Riot in Philadelphia, July 7th and 8th, occasioned by the arming and fortifying of Roman Catholic churches. In this formidable and disgraceful riot, some 12 or 15 persons were killed, and about 50 wounded.

7. Thomas W. Dorr, the chief of the R. Island rebellion, who had been sometime previously arrested, was sentenced to the State Prison of that State for life, June 25th. Since that time the Legislature has offered to release him, on condition that he swear allegiance to the existing Constitutional Government. He refuses.

8. The Revolution in Guatimala consummated March 7th. It was effected by the allied army.

9. Albania, an important province of Turkey, in a state of revolt, in May.

10. Battle between the forces of the belligerent Republics of Buenos Ayres and Uriguay (S. Am.) May 21st. Gen. Urquiza of the former defeated the troops of the latter under Gen. Rivera. The Oriental Republic is now nearly crushed.

11. Hostilities between France and Morocco, begun by the latter, June 1. On the 14th of August occurred the battle of Isly, between the French under Gen. Bugeaud and the Moors, which resulted in the total defeat of the Moorish forces, with the loss of 2500 in killed and wounded. About the same time, the French fleet under De Johnville, bombarded and took the city of Tangier. The latter event alarmed the Moslem Sultan, who sued for peace, which was concluded in Tangier, Sept. 10th.

12. Joe Smith, the Pseudo-Prophet of the Mormons, was murdered, by a lawless mob, at Carthage, Ill., June 26th. Great excitement prevailed throughout that section, military called out, &c.

13. Spain and Morocco commenced hostilities, in July, but finally settle their difficulties.

14. Armstice between Texas and Mexico declared by the latter to be at an end June 11th. Santa Anna attempted to renew the war, but was hindered by anarchy at home.

15. Defeat of the French, under Gen. Comman, by an Algerine hord—the Cab-y-les—Oct. 15th. This reverse of the French was occasioned only by the failure of their ammunition. About 1000 were killed and wounded on both sides.

16. Argentine Naval Squadron captured, by U. S. fleet, under Commodore Voorhees, in October. This hasty step was immediately retraced by the valiant Commodore after mutual explanation.

17. Dethronement of Santa Anna, for many years the Military Dictator and Despot of Mexico, Dec. 6th. The fate of the Dictator has not yet reached us. Gen. Herara is now at the head of the Republic.

18. The Manor Rebellion, or Anti-Rent Insurrection, in Eastern N. York, was in serious progress during the last month of the year 1844.

19. Sixty thousand Russian soldiers have perished by the fortune of war, at the hands of the brave mountaineers of Circassia during the past year. Loss of the rebels 10,000.

IV. POLITICAL AND DIPLOMATIC EVENTS.

1. Treaty Annexing Texas to the United States signed, at Washington, April 12th, by President Tyler and the Texan Commissioners.

2. The Texas-Annexation Treaty was rejected, by the U. S. Senate, June 8th, by a decisive majority.

3. Treaty of Peace, Amity and Commerce, between the celestill empire, China, and the United States, signed on the 4th of July. This Treaty has since been ratified by the U. S. Senate unanimously.

4. The Election of James K. Polk, of Tenn., to be the next President of the United States, in November. He received the Electoral votes of 15 States, and in the popular vote had a plurality over Clay, but not a majority over all.

5. The abrogation of the 25th Rule of the U. S. House of Representatives, (the Gag-Rule,) which excluded abolition petitions, Dec. 3d. This was a triumph for J. Q. Adams.

V. A GREAT INVENTION.—Professor Morse's Electro-Magnetic Telegraph completed, and brought into successful operation, May 30th. In an instant, intelligence is communicated, and written down at the place of its destination, by this wonder of the age.

FIGULUS.

February, 1845.

HIS CHURCHES ARE HIS STEWARDS.

You can have no more right to live unto yourselves and to your families, than the missionary has to live for himself and his family; that is, neither has any such right. Why should not the American pastor, the lawyer, and the physician, —why should not the merchant, the mechanic, and the farmer, live as entirely for Christ and sacredly obey his commands, as the missionary? Why should not the sisters of the church here be as self-denying and as faithful to this cause, as their sisters in foreign lands? Did they not alike come to the cross for salvation? Were they not all pardoned upon the same consideration? Is it not one vineyard, into which they were all received as laborers? And are they not all to act upon one principle? Of whom is it said,—"Ye are not your own, ye are brought with a price?" of the missionary, or of all Christians? Is it not emphatically said,—"No man liveth unto himself?" Weigh, my dear brethren and sisters, the reasons why it is our duty to enter upon this work. Do not the same reasons press your entire consecration to this cause? Is there no language to you in the dreadful condition of so many millions of perishing ones? Are you not a part of those disciples to whom the Saviour commands,—"Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature?" Again, prayerfully ponder the instructions of the Holy Spirit in Rom x: 11–15, and remember, that upon the amount of your co-operation will depend, under God, the number of those who personally enter the missionary field of labor, and the efficiency of their efforts.

[Binney's Address.

THE JEW'S LOVE FOR JERUSALEM.

We must never forget, that in the government of God throughout sacred history, as well as in the thoughts and feelings of the oriental nations, the city of Jerusalem is ever the center of all things. To the Greek, the Latin, the Armenian, the Jew, and even the Mussulman himself, it is still the Holy City, and the constant object of their frequent pilgrimages. Does anything extraordinary take place there, it causes as great a sensation in the synagogues of the Soudon, on the other side of the desert, as in those of Poland, on the banks of the Vistula; and the Jews, a people so remarkably sensitive, feel the vibration even to the farthest extremity of their national existence. Jerusalem now contains as many Jews as Mahometans, and they are drawn hither by two powerful reasons; the first is the study of the Scriptures of the Talmud; and the second, the happiness of being buried in the Valley of Jehosaphat. Even at the time when the Turks would not allow more than three hundred of them to inhabit the Holy City, every year were vessels seen touching at Jaffa, whose melancholy cargo consisted of the bones of Israelites on their way to be interred in Jerusalem. Could you see the Jew entering for the first time the city of his fathers, you would behold him, at one day's journey from it putting on his best clothes, and as soon as he perceives the Holy City, rending them, throwing himself on the ground. He weeps, he prays; and when at length he enters it, it is with dust upon his head. Never did exiled son revisit with greater tenderness his father's house, or never haughty noble behold with greater anguish the baronial hall of his ancestors in the hands of strangers. But above all, behold him on the day when the people have the custom of meeting under the western wall of Mount Moriah, to weep over the stones which they believe to have once formed a part of the foundation of the ancient temple! "Nothing is so affecting as this scene," says the traveler Wilde, "and years will never efface it from my remembrance. They stood in groups, mourning and singing the Psalms of David in the very places and in the very language in which David composed them, before those same walls which have echoed them twenty-four centuries before; their notes were mixed with sighs, or interrupted by sobs. They kissed the outer stones of the wall, but they could not enter within; the crescent of Islamism glittered on the pinnacle of the Minaret, and the blood-red banner of Mahomet floated over their heads. If ever I should be asked what interested me most in my journey on the Mediterranean, I should answer, that it was the sight of the faithful Jew weeping over the stones of Jerusalem."

THE SIN OF SLAVERY.

In a word, I believe that slavery is forbidden in the Scriptures just as almost every other sin is forbidden; that is, by the inculcation of moral principles which are utterly at variance with it. Is not this the almost universal method of the New Testament teaching? Do you not, my brother, so interpret it? When you attempt to teach men that they are sinners against God, do you enumerate the precepts which they have broken, or do you set before them the character of God and the universal relation to him? If their conduct has been at variance with all these relations, does not their own conscience pronounce them guilty? The case is, as I esteem it, similar here. God has thus taught us that slavery is wrong, a violation of his most holy law. And if so, it is our duty at once to abandon it.

The manner in which this is to be done may, I apprehend, vary with our circumstances. Such, I think, we may believe to be the teaching by example of the New Testament. A man, I suppose, delivers himself from the guilt of Slavery, at the very moment when he, in the sight of God, renounces all right in his fellow man, and acts in sincerity of heart, in the presence of his judge, in conformity with that renunciation. The manner of his acting out this renunciation may however, vary with the circumstances of the case. All that the gospel requires is, that, unbiassed by interest, unawed by persecution, he carry out the principles of the gospel wheresoever they may lead him. He is to do this as an individual, with respect to those whom he now believes that he has unjustly held in bondage. He is to do it in respect to the community whom, by his former precept and example, he has either led into, or confirmed in error. He is to bear his testimony to the truth, whatever sacrifice it may cost him. So soon as the church of Christ acts upon these principles, our land will be freed from the sin of slavery. Until she does this, the stain of blood guiltiness, and if it be a sin at all, it is a sin of appalling magnitude, is found on her garments.

PUBLIC WORSHIP IN LONDON.

1. When they enter their pews, they at once engage, for one or two minutes, in prayer. Episcopalians knelt for the purpose. Dissenters bowed their heads against the front of the pew. This gave to the whole scene an air of solemnity befitting the day and the place.

2. They had their pews as well supplied with Bibles as with Hymn books; and when the Scriptures were read from the pulpit, each hearer took a Bible and followed the reader.

3. I saw many persons, mostly young, taking notes of the discourses, and, therefore, giving a fixed attention, as if unwilling to lose a single thought.

4. The congregation were remarkably quiet and attentive. Preaching of moderate worth was listened to without any indications of restlessness or contempt.

5. When the benediction was concluded, the minister and people remained for half a minute in silence. Not a pew door was opened, not a hat or glove taken, not a foot moved.

6. They were exceedingly moderate in leaving the house. In no instance did I see the aisles crowded. They seemed willing to wait for one another.

7. Gentlemen retired from the house of God as respectfully as they would from the house of a friend—they did not put on their hats until they reached the door.

CHARACTER OF JOSEPH WOLFF.

It is thus that Louis Way describes this eccentric being, who was his traveling companion for some time. "A man who, in Rome itself, called the Pope the dust of the earth—who told the Jews that the Gemara is a lie—who spends his days in arguing upon and his nights in examining the Talmud. A man for whom a trunk is a pillow, and a brick pavement a down bed. Who can make himself friends equally amongst the persecutors of his old and new faith—who conciliates a pacha and refutes a rabbi—who converses with the oriental nations without an interpreter; can live without food, and pay without money. One who remembers as little the insults as the flatteries that are heaped upon him—who is completely ignorant of the manners and customs of polished society, and is yet received by men of every rank, and gives offence to none. Certainly, such a man must fix the attention of a people which for so many centuries has never changed the uniformity of its manners; and it is by him that God is preparing his pathway in the desert."

CHRISTIAN CONDUCT.

It has been well remarked, that conduct is language that all can understand, and if it be true, as the saying is, that actions speak louder than words, then all can and may speak of the Saviour —all may preach the gospel of the blessed Jesus, in the distinct, earnest, and powerful eloquence of a holy and well ordered life. We can all plead for religion with living and acting argument—all proclaim its beauty and excellency by conduct which is without reproach, and above all suspicion. This is a mode of preaching which all may adopt, and which every Christian should do—which men cannot avoid hearing—which they must and will respect—and which they cannot but feel and cherish. An infidel once remarked in relation to an excellent man, "I never see that man without feeling my own unworthiness—he is a constant reproof to me—the sight of him has often made me humble," or rather adore his virtues. Reader, preach the gospel by your conduct, and your brother will embrace it.

WOMAN'S CHARITY.—That was a beautiful idea of the wife of an Irish schoolmaster, who, whilst poor himself, had given gratuitous instruction to the poor scholars, but when increased in worldly goods, began to think that he could not afford to give his services for nothing:—

"Oh, James, don't say the like o' that,' said the gentle hearted woman, 'don't, a poor scholar never came into the house that I didn't feel as IF HE BROUGHT FRESH AIR FROM HEAVEN WITH HIM. I never miss the bit I give them—my heart warms for the soft homely sounds of their bare feet on the floor, and the door almost opens of itself to let them in."

JESUITS NEVER SING.—A converted Roman Catholic priest, who spent his novitiate at Rome, and was familiar with the characteristics of the different ecclesiastical orders who throng and curse that city, states, that whatever else the Jesuits do, it is contrary to the rules of the order to sing. We are not surprised at this, knowing the humanizing effect of music, and the kind of work they have in hand. They would be half unfitted for their intrigues and plots of mischief for the world, if the spirit of song were to be allowed to breathe upon them.

We are reminded at once, on learning this fact, of the words of Shakspeare:

> The man that hath no music in his soul,
> Nor is moved with concord of sweet sounds,
> Is fit for treasons, stratagems and spoils.

The celebrated John Randolph once took up a Socinian pamphlet, in a bookstore in Baltimore. With an indescribable look, and that penetrating shrillness which none who ever heard it can forget, he exclaimed, "what a Christian religion is this! Christianity without a divine Saviour! It is like the famous play-bill in England, in which some strolling players announced the play of Hamlet with the part of Hamlet left out."

The Sabbath Recorder.

NEW YORK, FEB. 20, 1845.

THE DEMOCRACY OF THE GOSPEL.

That was a true saying of a distinguished scholar, "The Christian Religion is the root of all Democracy." The Christian Religion addresses itself to men, not in a national or ecclesiastical capacity, but as individuals, each of whom has his own life to live, his own character to develop, and his own soul to save or lose. It aims to perfect in him whatsoever things are true, honest, lovely, or of good report; and at the same time to subvert whatsoever, in political or social arrangements, would hinder his free and full development, or sacrifice his individual morality and spiritual health. It thus lays the foundation for true democracy by teaching the doctrine of individual responsibility, and enforcing those principles upon which alone democracy can securely rest.

If we mistake not, there is at the present time a growing disposition to apply practically the democratic principles of the Gospel, which makes it important to understand what the Gospel does really encourage and inculcate.

Few will deny, that the Gospel encourages direct appeals to the common people upon subjects of the deepest interest to men. In doing this, it treats with respect the popular intellect, and assumes that the poor as well as the rich can appreciate the profoundest moral truths, that they have a right to instruction concerning them, and that to enlighten their understandings and guide their aspirations is a work worthy of the highest order of intelligence. It acknowledges no aristocracy either of birth or intellect, but honors all by addressing itself to understandings and feelings common to all. It appears, indeed, to have been designed, without show or boasting, to be imparted to the most ignorant as well as the most learned, and to be taught in the streets and market places as well as in the schools. When the disciples of John came to inquire of Jesus whether he was the true Messiah, he deemed it a sufficient answer to say, among other things, that the poor had the Gospel preached unto them. That fact gave evidence that he was the promised One, and that they need not look for another. It proved likewise, that the Gospel was strictly an appeal to the common people, implying their capacity to understand and appreciate it. The history of its promulgation from that time to this shows that it has generally begun its work among the common people, and has from them extended its influence to the highest places. One of the apostles eloquently boasts, that it commenced with the foolish and weak things of the earth, but at length confounded the wise and mighty. Such has always been the policy, and we do not see upon what ground a teacher of the Gospel can justify a different course. It is not surprising that despots and aristocrats discourage its study among the poor, since it invariably strengthens men's sense of right and quickens their sensibilities to wrong. But that any person should discourage it from a pretended regard for the truth and the church, is a just occasion of surprise.

Again, the democratic tendency of the Gospel is seen in its opposition to all hierarchies. It every where teaches the equality of men in religious things. It is sent to the strangers scattered abroad, and not to an exclusive episcopally-ordained few. The Christianity which aspires mainly for a place in courts and parliaments, seeks out the uppermost rooms at feasts, and prides itself in the title of "Rabbi," finds no countenance in the maxims or practices of Jesus of Nazareth. On the contrary, he taught that the greatest should become the servants of all, and illustrated the doctrine by his own practice. The only aristocracy or hierarchy here recognized is that of personal goodness and faithful service. When these are manifested in a remarkable degree they will seldom fail to awaken respect and veneration in the minds of all beholders—respect and veneration which will do infinitely more to attract the people towards the right way than any ecclesiastical canons or titles.

The democratic tendency of the Gospel is perhaps equally apparant from the encouragement which it affords to free inquiry and individual earnestness in moral action. The Founder of the Gospel sent his hearers to search the Scriptures, and see if the things spoken were really so. Even his own claims he would have subjected to this test although he spake as never man spake, and his words were attested by the clearest manifestations of the divine presence and approval. So was it with the apostles, and so has it been with all the true descendants of the apostles in every age. Free inquiry as to the grounds of belief, and earnest action in conformity therewith, has ever been preferred by them to a formal subscription to creeds, and traditions inherited from the past, however well supported, and however useful in their application. By such encouragement given to freedom of inquiry, the Gospel has won its way to the hearts of many who were not at all inclined at first to receive it, but who have afterwards become its strongest supporters and brightest ornaments.

It is impossible to calculate the results which would follow a practical application of the democratic principles of the Gospel. How soon would it abolish those religious customs which set the members of Christ's body apart from each other. How soon many of the stereotype notions in theology, which derive no support from reason or Scripture, would be exploded. How speedily would slavery and war, with their innumerable attendant evils, be abolished. How soon would the doctrine of human equality and brotherhood be acknowledged, and the song of angels, "peace on earth and good will to men," be heard. Such would be among the necessary fruits of a faithful application of these principles. Nor do we believe that they are altogether dormant at present. There are evidences that the Gospel is at this moment exerting a mightier influence, both in preserving the good and destroying the evil, than all other things beside. It undoubtedly meets with hinderances and corruptions, yet these are slowly but surely giving way, and will serve in the end to make more apparant the progress and triumph achieved.

ASSISTING RUNAWAY SLAVES.

The recent conviction of Charles T. Torrey and others, has set some hair-splitting casuists to discussing the question whether it is right to assist slaves to escape from their masters. The reasoning of some of those who think it wrong to render them assistance, is deserving of notice. They tell us, perhaps, that the law of the land is against it, and that it is the duty of Christians to obey the law of the land until it is repealed. But this doctrine acknowledges that the law of the land is superior to the law of God, and it would, if consistently carried out, put an end to all efforts to change the condition of men. What else is the whole scheme of missionary labor than an effort to induce men to obey the divine law in preference to statute law? We send missionaries to Turkey, for instance, to persuade her people to obey the laws of God in violation of those statute laws which enjoin Mohammedan worship. Or, we send them to China, where the statute law requires conformity to the religion of Confucius, and there support them in exhorting and persuading the people to obey God rather than man. These men go forth with their lives in their hands, leaving the dearest associations, and braving the greatest perils, to carry out what they regard as the commission of their Saviour. We therefore give them our countenance and bid them God speed. But how does their work differ from that of the missionary among slaves? He finds them liable to be bought and sold, placed under such restrictions as make it impossible to obey all the divine commandments, surrounded by every influence which is calculated to prevent their doing it, and this state of things continued by the aid of statute law. The slaves sigh for a home where they may be free from these evils, and they ask the missionary to point them to it. Can he, consistently with his professions of regard for their souls and for the divine law, refuse to point them to the land of freedom, and afford them such assistance as he may have in his power? We think not, unless he is convinced that slavery is no violation of the laws of God, and no obstacle to the salvation of the slave. No doubt he may do this often indiscreetly, and to the injury of the slave rather than his benefit. But that there is positive wrong in doing it, we cannot believe.

LETTER FROM ROWSE BABCOCK.

Sabbath Lectures—A Revival—Baptisms—Branch Church Organized.

Having been requested by Dea. M. L. Dean, of Ulysses, Potter Co., Pa., (a man who had been led to embrace the Sabbath by reading some of our publications on the subject, and comparing them with the word of God,) to visit and preach in his neighborhood, I complied with his request in Sep tember last. On arriving at the place, I found that the first-day Baptist and Presbyterian ministers had been preaching on the subject, and had still appointments to preach, for the purpose of quieting the minds of the people. Mr. Dean requested the first-day Baptist minister, of whose church he was still a member, to allow me to fill one of his appointments on the first day, as he had two. This he refused to do, expressing a fear that I would either preach a good Gospel discourse, get hold of the hearts of the people, and then go from house to house proselyting them to the Sabbath; or, that I would come out boldly, and preach upon that subject. He did not wish his beautiful church divided by either course. However, a Methodist brother gave me notice that his dwelling would be at my service to preach on the subject of the Sabbath, and an appointment was accordingly made that I should preach there at four o'clock P. M. A large and attentive audience assembled, to whom I spoke upon the claims of the seventh day until night forced me to close. In conclusion, I offered to meet any respectable minister of the Gospel in a public discussion on the subject. No one has yet accepted the offer. But these two ministers have preached several discourses on the subject in my absence, which I am told by some of their hearers have served rather to substantiate our views than otherwise.

On leaving the place, I made an appointment to preach there again in eight weeks. When I went to fulfil the appointment, I found the people very attentive, but learned that an influence had been exerted by visiting from house to house to quiet their fears, and lead them to think they might be wrong in their anxiety upon the subject.

Agreeably to encouragement given, I visited the place again in the latter part of December, for the purpose of holding a series of meetings. After the labors of the first day and evening, an expression was taken upon the question of continuing the meeting, and its continuance was unanimously requested. The next evening the congregation increased in numbers and interest, the Spirit of the Lord was evidently working in the hearts of the people, backsliders began to return, and sinners to mourn over their sins, inquiring, "What must we do to be saved?" We soon learned of some who had been dead, but were alive—had been lost, but were found; and we were permitted to hear young converts lisping forth the praises of their Redeemer. The meeting continued every evening, and some days, for three weeks, during which time men were persuaded to be reconciled to God both in public and in visits from house to house. I had the privilege of baptizing nine willing converts, and forming a branch of the church at Hebron. Some twenty persons were hopefully converted, and between twenty and thirty embraced the Bible Sabbath.

Again I visited the place three weeks afterwards, found the work still progressing, baptized five more converts, three of whom were received into membership, and celebrated the Lord's Supper with the little band in company with some of the brethren from Hebron. Arrangements were made for me to meet with them once in four weeks for a year to come, after which we hope to organize that branch into a church in connection with the General Conference, and to ordain one or two of its members to the office of deacons. The prospects for the future are encouraging.

The opposition with which we have been met, is not easily told. Even those who had offered themselves for baptism have been again and again dissuaded from it. But I believe that these things have turned to the glory of God. The evening before I left, a Methodist class-leader rose in the congregation, and stated that he had been sprinkled in his infancy, and had until lately been satisfied therewith; but that now he was convinced of his error, and no one should deter him from complying with the requirements of the Scriptures in this matter.

My labors have been severe for six weeks past. I have preached more than forty discourses, traveled 150 miles, baptized fourteen persons, administered the communion twice, formed a branch of the Hebron church, visited from house to house as much as my time would admit, and obtained five subscribers for the Recorder. Brethren, shall we not pray still, and more fervently too, for Zion, for sinners, and for the long-neglected Sabbath of the Lord? I seem to hear the response, "Yes! let us be consistent and active Christians." ROWSE BABCOCK.

SABBATH TRACT OPERATIONS.

Much interest has been manifested of late in the operations of the Sabbath Tract Societies, and a desire has been expressed that they might be so conducted as to secure the hearty and active cooperation of the whole denomination. This desire has led to an arrangement which we are confident will meet the approbation of all the friends of the tract cause, and which we trust will lead to more extensive contributions and efforts for the circulation of tracts. It may perhaps assist the friends of the cause to judge of their duty, and also encourage them in the discharge of it, to know definitely what has already been done, and what it is now proposed to do. For this purpose the following statement is made:—

The New York City Sabbath Tract Society was organized in June, 1842, for the purpose of publishing and circulating tracts in support of the claims of the seventh day as the Sabbath. Its efforts were designed to be confined principally to to the city of New York; and its funds were derived mainly from the annual subscriptions of friends in New York, and from the sale of tracts. The Society, soon after its organization, commenced the publication of a series of Sabbath Tracts, which have been issued at irregular intervals until the present time. Seven different tracts, embracing one hundred and seventy-six pages, have been published; and two numbers of the Sabbath Vindicator, eight pages each, have been issued, the first of which was stereotyped and has passed through four editions of five thousand each.—Since its organization, the Society has distributed about 1,000,000 pages of Tracts, and 250,000 pages of the Sabbath Vindicator. In doing this it has expended $879 17. Its receipts from annual subscribers and the sale of tracts have nearly equaled that sum. In view of the anxiety which has been expressed that the publication of tracts should be carried on exclusively by the American Sabbath Tract Society, it was resolved by the N. Y. City Society, at its last meeting, to tender to the American Sabbath Tract Society all its stereotype plates and tracts on hand at a reduced valuation, and to commit the whole business of publication to its care. It was also resolved, that if this proposition should be accepted the efforts of the City Society hereafter shall be directed mainly to the purchase and distribution of tracts in New York, and the maintenance and increase of the Sabbath Library.

The American Sabbath Tract Society was organized in September, 1843, at the meeting of the General Conference in Plainfield, N. J. A report of its labors was made at the Annual Meeting held in Verona, N. Y., September, 1844, which showed that during the year several agents had been employed, and many tracts distributed. Since September last, the Treasurer has received various sums of money, which have been expended under the direction of the Executive Board, in the purchase of tracts and in carrying out the designs of the society. At a meeting of the Board, on first day, February 9, 1845, the proposition of the New York City Sabbath Tract Society, to relinquish in its favor the publication of tracts, was duly considered and unanimously accepted. By this means the American Sabbath Tract Society has become the exclusive organ of tract publication, and is left free to go forward with its work of printing and circulating the truth as fast as its means will allow.

There is now but one obstacle in the way of the Society's going forward; and that we feel assured the friends of the cause will remove as soon as it is fairly and fully made known. It will be remembered, that the Constitution makes each annual subscriber to the funds of the Society a member, and allows such persons half the amount of their subscription in tracts. It also makes each subscriber of twenty dollars at one time a member for life, with the privilege of receiving one thousand pages of tracts annually. Each subscriber of fifty dollars at one time, or who shall by one additional payment increase his subscription to fifty dollars may become a Life Director, and be entitled to two thousand pages of tracts annually. Now, what is wanted most of all is, that the friends of the Society should connect themselves permanently with it, by becoming annual members, life members, or life directors. This is necessary in order to give the society a tangible form, and to furnish it with the pecuniary means necessary to carry on its operations. Who of our brethren are ready to put down their names as annual subscribers? Who as life members? Who as life directors? We hope sincerely, and with a good degree of confidence, that there are many who will not hesitate to identify themselves with the Society in this way. Much good has already been done through the medium of tract distribution, and it is impossible to estimate the good which would result from a general and hearty co-operation in this plan. It is hoped, therefore, that no person who ought to engage in this work, will lay the subject aside until he has decided what duty demands of him, and has acted accordingly. The Society is anxious to issue immediately a new edition of each of its Sabbath Tracts, and of the first number of the Sabbath Vindicator. It wishes also to re-publish one or two old and valuable books on the subject of the Sabbath, as soon as circumstances will warrant doing so. Will our brethren take hold of this work, and supply the means of carrying it forward?

In order to become members of the Society, it is only necessary to sign the Constitution and pay the sum subscribed, or to forward the money to the Treasurer, by whom the name of each member will be recorded in the Society's book. We publish below the report of the Treasurer, showing what has been received since the last annual report, and who have become members of the Society. Similar reports will be published from time to time as occasion may demand.

INQUIRY.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder;—

I noticed in your paper of last week a letter from Mr. A. B. Magruder, in which he expresses a willingness to "impart any information" he may possess to those who feel an interest in the subject of which his letter treats. There is one question upon which I should be glad to know his opinion, and which, therefore, I take the liberty to ask him through you. It is this—What law is that which convinces a man of sin, and makes him feel his need of a Redeemer? By replying to this question, Mr. Magruder will much oblige

An Inquirer.

War under its True Colors.—Many disgraceful expedients are resorted to in England to keep up the war spirit and secure recruits for the army. Sometimes a poor inebriate, half intoxicated and raving for another glass, is furnished with a few shillings by a recruiting officer on condition of enlisting in the army; and if, after coming to his senses, he refuses to do so, he is pursued as a deserter. At other times, those who are borne down by poverty and discouragement are entrapped with promises of plenty and leisure. By such means the immense annual loss is made up, and the ranks of the army kept full.

But the advocates of Peace, in England, sometimes give the recruiting officers trouble by a novel method they have of exciting among the people an abhorrence of war. This is by posting up placards in the most public places which present war under its true colors. Thousands of persons have been prevented from enlisting through this simple yet effective expedient. Here is one of their cards:—

"WANTED!!
Several Thousand Able-Bodied Men,
To shoot or to be shot at!!
Or perish miserably by thirst and starvation on the plains of India.

Nota Bene!!—The Duke of Wellington says that no one who entertains nice scruples about religion, has any business in the Army. None such need apply."

The Baptist Memorial.—The publication office of the Baptist Memorial, together with the subscription list, was totally destroyed by the late fire in New York. Mr. Bigelow, the publisher, has issued a notice requesting agents, postmasters, and all who feel interested in the continuance of the Memorial, to help him by sending in the names of such subscribers as they may know, with any facts in their possession respecting their accounts. Orders should be addressed J. R. Bigelow, 111 Nassau street, New York.

WAR AMONG THE CHEROKEES.

The Cherokee Nation is said to be now on the brink of an intestine struggle, if indeed war has not already been virtually declared. The nation consists of about 16,000 persons, two-thirds of whom emigrated from Georgia after the Schermerhorn treaty, and are called the Ross party; the other third are known as the old settlers, and the treaty party. The war now threatened is among themselves, and grows out of their several claims to money and lands from treaties with the United States. The difficulty has been hastened to a crisis by the murder, on the 24th of January, 1845, of Lewis Rogers, the heir apparent to the chiefship of the old settlers. This was done by a body of men who attacked him on the highway, and whom he declared, just at the point of death, to be members of the Ross party. The New York Tribune gives the following account of the matter:—

Over 20 years ago, our Government bribed some Cherokee Chiefs to sign a Treaty surrendering a large portion of their lands in Georgia, Alabama, &c. These chiefs betrayed their trust in so doing, and the foremost among them was put to death for it. But a part of the nation did about that time agree to remove West on certain conditions, and departed. Several years afterwards, our government, by the most execrable perfidy and tyranny, compelled the remainder of the nation to emigrate on pain of extermination. These were sent by us to the same territory on which the 'Western Cherokees,' or previous emigrants, had been located. The two parties were known to be at deadly feud; yet here they were expected to occupy the same lands and form one harmonious people! The result has been what must have been anticipate. The 'Ross party' or latest emigrants, form a large majority of the whole, and carry matters with a high hand, regarding the Ridge party, or first emigrants, as the authors of their humiliation and exile. Thus the original emigrants find themselves treated as aliens and culprits on the soil which they fondly deemed their own, by men who came among them but yesterday, and then because they must. Hence come heart-burnings, feuds, collisions, which obstruct the moral and intellectual improvement of the people and threaten a desolating civil war.

The cause of all this mischief and misery is to be found in the criminal recklessness of our government. The removal of the Cherokees was consummated in defiance of every dictate of foresight or justice. And now we are about to violate all our late engagements, as we have already violated all our older treaties, by interfering in the troubles we have provoked, and utterly subverting the independence which we had sworn to maintain. Thus one wrong leads to and compels another.

The editor of the New York Tribune discourseth to his correspondents in the following language, which is too good to be forgotten:—

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Do oblige us by omitting all such flourishes as 'your interesting and valuable paper,' 'your able and patriotic course,' &c. Our subscribers and the public know all about that sort of thing, and we have also a tolerable opinion of our own merits. If you think by this to improve your chances of insertion, you mistake ruinously.

When you have written what you have to say, run it over and see if there are not some sentences that could be spared without serious injury. If there are, out with them! We are often compelled to decline good articles because we cannot make room for them. A half column has ten chances where two columns have one and three columns none.

Try to disparage as little as possible, and where you must condemn, let your facts be stronger than your words.

When you assail any cause or person, always give us your real name, which we shall give up to whoever has a right to demand it. He is a sneak and a coward who could ask us to bear the responsibility of his attacks on others.

If you send us word that you 'have written in great haste, and have no time to correct,' we shall put your manuscript quietly into the fire. Why should you throw upon us the task of correcting your scrawl, when we are obliged to slight our own work daily for want of time?

Give us facts, incidents, occurrences, at the earliest moment, and we shall be grateful, though you wrote with a pudding stick; but if you attempt logic or sentiment, do it up right, instead of leaning on us.

CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

Monday, Feb. 10.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—Mr. Dana introduced a bill to reduce and graduate the price of lands to actual settlers. In committee of the whole, several territorial bills were considered. A long discussion arose on a bill for the remuneration of the Territory of Iowa for expenses incurred in defending their boundary with Missouri. The bill for the admission of the States of Iowa and Florida was under discussion till the House adjourned.

In the SENATE, the principal business was the passage of the French Spoliation Bill, after a spirited discussion.

Tuesday, Feb. 11.

In the HOUSE, the territorial bills were taken up and passed. Much discussion was had upon the bill for the admission of Florida and Iowa.

In the SENATE, many petitions were presented, including one for the annexation of Canada. The Texas debate was made the special order of the day for Thursday. Several unimportant bills were under consideration.

Wednesday, Feb. 12.

Some unimportant business was transacted in the House from 11 to 12 o'clock, which was the hour for the joint session of the two houses to count the presidential votes. The Senate entered the House, and after the usual formalities, the tellers reported that there were 170 electoral votes for James K. Polk, 105 electoral votes for Henry Clay, and the same number of votes respectively for George M. Dallas and Theodore Frelinghuysen for Vice President. The President then declared that James K. Polk and George M. Dallas were duly elected as President and Vice President for four years from the 4th of March, 1845. No other business was transacted.

Thursday, Feb. 13.

The HOUSE was occupied wholly upon the bill for the admission of Iowa and Florida into the Union. A long discussion arose upon a proposition to strike out one article in the Constitution of Florida which forbids the General Assembly to pass laws for the emancipation of slaves, and another which gives the General Assembly power to prevent free negroes, mulattoes, and people of color, from emigrating to the State, and inhibiting their discharge from vessels in any of the ports of Florida. This proposition to strike out was lost. The bill was finally read a third time and passed.

The SENATE spent the morning hour in receiving petitions, resolutions, &c. The hour having expired, the resolutions from the Committee on Foreign Relations relative to the annexation of Texas, were taken up. It was moved, for the sake of simplifying the matter, that the resolutions be indefinitely postponed. Mr. Morehead of Kentucky, delivered an eloquent speech two hours long against annexation. Mr. Buchanan of Pennsylvania obtained the floor, after which the Senate went into executive session.

Friday, Feb. 14.

The HOUSE had under consideration the Cumberland Road Bill, the Fox and Wisconsin Improvement Bill, the West Point Academy Bill, and the Naval Pension Bill, the last two of which were passed, when the House adjourned.

The SENATE Chamber was crowded to hear the continuation of the discussion on the Texas question. After some unimportant business, the Texas resolutions were taken up, and Mr. Buchanan of Pennsylvania addressed the Senate in opposition to the pending motion, and in favor of the resolutions. Speaking of slavery, he denounced the abolitionists in severe terms as the enemies of the slave and mankind, declared that he was opposed to slavery in the abstract, but he left it to the great Ruler of Nations to dispose of. After the close of his speech, the Senate went into the consideration of the bill for the admission of Florida and Iowa, which was referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Sabbath, Feb. 15.

HOUSE.—Two or three unimportant resolutions were discussed, and a large number of reports were made from the various committees, after which the House went into the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the support of the army.

In SENATE, a memorial was presented from Michigan against the annexation of Texas, and praying that if Texas be admitted into the Union, that Canada be admitted into it at the same time. Some discussion was had about commencing the sessions one hour earlier. But the question was laid aside for that of Annexation. Mr. Rives had the floor, and occupied it about three hours in a speech against the principle of admitting Texas into the Union by joint resolution. This speech embodied many important facts, was listened to with much interest, and continued until the hour of adjournment. The following passage, which occurs near its close, is note-worthy:—

"New territory must be acquired by treaty; new States may be admitted by Congress. This is the law and the Constitution of every country. If we acquire Texas in violation of our Constitution, it will be a curse, and not a boon. He did not expect an immediate dissolution of the Union, but if the friends of Texas, per fas aut nefas, can carry by a bare majority this measure, it will result in bitterness and jealousy. Even should we divide by the sword, the sword would unite us again; but the blessings of our Union would be gone. But if we annex by Congress, Congress can repeal that law, and 'slam' the door in the face of Texas. And who will say that that may not be done in the deep agitation which will follow the consummation of this measure?

"Let me appeal to gentlemen from the South. We have hitherto appealed to the sacred compromises of the Constitution. If we throw matters of this kind to the disposal of a bare majority, what will be the consequence? The majority in the other House when full is 49. In a vote the other day affecting the slave interest, there was a majority of 50 against the slave interest. Let us have these questions settled by the regular power the two-thirds power. This is our safety, and we shall rue the day when we break down this security which we, the slaveholding minority, have against the whims of a majority of Congress. The same majority may soon repeal slavery in the District of Columbia. It may, in regulating commerce, prohibit the removal of slaves from one State to another. It may repeal the safeguard we have in the right to claim runaway slaves, and then universal emancipation may be proclaimed throughout the land. If we set such lessons, even-handed justice will return the poisoned chalice to our own lips."

FOREIGN NEWS.

The packet ship Roscius, which reached New York on Sunday, 16th inst., brings English papers to January 12th.

The steamship Great Britain has made several trips and works admirably.

The Court news is, that the Queen "walked out some time this morning, attended by Lady Caroline Cocks."

It was currently reported that her Majesty has been graciously pleased to appoint Sir Henry Pottinger, Governor General of Canada, in the place of Sir Charles Metcalfe, who is seriously indisposed.

Mr. Consul Pritchard, who was so basely treated by the French at Tahiti, is about to sail for the important station to which he had been appointed by Government prior to his forcible removal from that island, namely, the extensive and populous group of the Samoas or Navigators' Islands.

The Dublin Monitor mentions another rumor—of a conspiracy discovered in Tipperary to murder the Archbishop of Dublin. It is said that Dr. Murray had received from a magitrate of Cork a letter of warning to that effect. The Monitor does not attach much credit to the report.

According to a correspondent of the Times, the British Government has demanded from that of France, "a categorical answer to the question, whether or not the French Government was endeavoring at the same time to join in the endeavors of the British Government to maintain the status quo in Texas, whilst in reality it was giving, through the King, to the American Minister an assurance that in no event would any steps be taken by his Government in the slightest degree hostile, or which would give the United States just cause of complaint."

Solomon Heine, the Israelite banker who died lately at Hamburg, has left by his will the large sum of 3,472,000 francs to different charitable establishments, and a society formed by himself some time ago for loans without interest to industrious workmen, without distinction of religious creed. He has also left handsome legacies to his clerks and servants, and 3,500,000 francs to his three sons-in-law. The remainder of the property, which comes to the son, is valued at 15,000,000 francs.

During the last year, 146 vessels, having on board 19,863 emigrants, sailed from the port of Bremen. Of this number, 19,146 went to the United State of America. During the year 1843, the number of emigrants who embarked there was under 10,000.

Amongst the projects of the day is one for a railway from Bombay to the eastern coast near Coringa, a distance of 1,300 miles, with a capital of £5,000,000.

Mr. Wakely, at an inquest, a few days since, mentioned the case of a woman who, when dying of excessive drinking, required to have a sponge saturated with brandy constantly held to her lips.

LATER FROM FRANCE.—A packet from Havre brings dates three days later than by the steamer.

A letter from Barcelona gives some details relative to the late inundation. Such heavy rain was never seen by the oldest inhabitants. It commenced at three in the afternoon, and lasted until six. The whole population were kept prisoners in their houses during that period. The shops along the walks of St. John were inundated, and some had a metre's depth of water in them. The Places of the Borne and Palacto resembled a lake. The fine gardens of St. Beltran are almost entirely destroyed. The loss in this quarter is estimated at 10,000 piastres (50,000fr.) The village of St. Andrew suffered considerably. The water arrived there so rapidly as to carry away a flock of sheep, with their shepherds, and many of the former were lost.

The Russian sinking fund, amounting to 233,000,000 of francs, destined to redeem the paper money in circulation, has been publicly deposited in a vault for safe keeping.

The advance in the price of American timber within the last twelve months has been nearly fifty per cent. This extraordinary rise is attributed to the steady demand and the diminished stocks, caueed by the great amount of shipping emplyed in the guano trade.

IMPORTANT FROM MEXICO.—The New Orleans papers of the 6th inst., confirm the rumor of the capture of Santa Ana. The Mexican Minister of Exterior Relations announced to Congress on the 17th January, that Santa Ana had been taken. He further gave notice that Santa Ana would be conducted to the fortress of Perote to await the decision of the government.

It appears that Santa Ana committed the most outrageous barbarities on the inhabitants of Puebia, killing, pillaging and burning, until he was met by the Constitutional army, which defeated him. His army, before he committed depredations amounting to 12,000 men, being disgusted with his conduct, abandoned their ranks and joined the Constitutional troops. The conflict, however, was not without bloodshed, and several hundred were reported as killed on both sides. When Santa Ana was taken he had scarcely a friend to accompany him. Government had ordered all the properties of Santa Ana to be seized and confiscated. The general belief was that Santa Ana would be condemned by the Government and executed.

Public tranquility was re-established throughout Mexico, and public festivals had been ordered throughout the Republic to celebrate the glorious event of the dewnfall of the tyrant Santa Ana. Government has issued orders for the disbandonment of the Army, and invites the absent to return and resume their occupations.

Santa Ana remains a prisoner at the castle of Perote—the same cold, dreary, and dismal place in which he so long held the unfortunate Texans in captivity.

A COOL ROBBERY.—The thief who entered a gentleman's study, where he was reading at night, blew out the lights and walked off with the silver candlesticks, has only been equalled by a recent act of cool robbery in Philadelphia. A few afternoons since, an elderly lady, looking out of a window in Fourth street, opposite Union, accidentally dropped her silver spectacles to the ground. A fellow, the only person of man's stature and appearance near at the time, passed by, picked up the spectacles, and quietly walked off with them, unmindful of the demands made by the lady and of a small boy, who on her behalf was sent after him.

THE STORM.—On Saturday night last New York was visited by a furious storm of rain, wind, thunder and lightning, by which the trees were disrobed of the ghostly covering of pendant ice which they had acquired, and it is feared much damage was done to the shipping on the coast. In the city, the dwelling of Hon. Moses H. Grinnell, College Place, was struck by lightning and badly injured, the fluid passing from the roof to the basement and displacing a man asleep there, but without doing him serious harm. A house in East Broadway, was likewise struck and nearly split in two from top to bottom, but we do not learn that any of its inmates were injured. The thunder was very sharp, and the gale for a time more vehement than is often experienced.

SHIPWRECKS IN 1844.—In summing up the destruction of life and property at sea as far as heard from, during the past year, between the months of December, 1843, and November, 1844, inclusive, we are greatly rejoiced at the decrease during the above period, compared with the two preceding years, viz: in 1842, vessels lost, 380; lives, 602; in 1843, vessels lost, 304; lives, 542.

FORTITUDE OF A WOLF.—A Wolf was lately taken by one of the paws in a snare set near Imphy, France; but it had sufficient strength to drag the snare after it, and swim across the river. Being seen, it was pursued, and its followers gaining on it rapidly, it suddenly stopped and bit off the paw, thereby getting rid of the object which impeded its flight, and then escaped.

LARGE ELECTRICAL MACHINE.—The British Mechanics' Magazine, gives an account of a mammoth Hydro-Electrical Machine, of extraordinary power, now constructing in England for the United States. It is said it will be able to produce a spark of 36 inches; to coat three thousand five hundred feet of metalic surface, in a battery of forty-eight Leyden jars, of two feet high by ten inches in diameter. The shock will kill a thousand men in an instant, if it were passed through such a chain. The machine is called the "Benjamin Franklin," and will cost about four thousand five hundred dollars. It will very soon be ready for shipment.

WALKING VARIETY AND PROVISION STORE.—An old lady, about 50 years of age, genteelly dressed, with cloak and muff, was brought into the New York police office, on Saturday last, upon a charge of attempting to steal an umbrella. Upon searching her, the following articles were found secreted in her muff, viz: two ladies caps, one hat feather, one worsted hood, two pairs of worsted mitts, one dozen spools of cotton, one gentleman's glove, one worsted cuff, two cut glass tumblers, and four business cards. Tied to her waist, beneath her dress, were four large pockets, within which were found three large oysters, one boiled crab, one steak of fresh codfish, seven large red onions, two very large flat Dutch turnips, one apple, one orange, one potatoe, three large pieces of taffy, four doughnuts, two muffins, two fancy poundcakes, and a copy of Bishop Onderdonk's trial.

DIOCESE OF NEW YORK.—The Committee appointed to consider the sentence upon the Right Rev. Benjamin T. Onderdonk, and the effect thereof upon the powers and duties of the Standing Committee of the Diocese of New York, have come to the conclusion that the Right Rev. B. T. Onderdonk is still a Bishop—that he has not been degraded or deposed from his Diocese, or order; and that the Standing Committee of New York, under the suspension, has become the regularly constitued ecclesiastical authority of the Diocese. The committee consisted of Chief Justice Jones, Murray Hoffman, Esq., and Hon. Gulian C. Verplanck.

ERBEN'S GRAND ORGAN.—Ten thousand dollars have been appropriated by the vestry of Trinity Church toward the erection of an organ suited to the style and proportions of "New Trinity." The organ case will be 52 feet high, 27 wide, and 32 deep. The largest wooden diapason pipe will be of such dimensions, that the interior will measure upward of 250 cubic feet. The largest metal diapason, in the center of the front of the organ, will be 5 feet in circumference and 28 in length. There are to be four separate organs, known by the names of the Great organ, Swell organ, Choir organ, and Pedal organ; 43 draw stops, 11 of which will be diapasons, one 52 feet long, and four of 16 feet in length, beside two reed stops of 16 feet. Whole number of pipes 2,169. Entire weight of the organ estimated altogether at 40 tons. It will be the largest organ ever erected in this country, and there are but few larger in Europe.

[Prot. Churchman.

DR. KALLEY.—This intrepid soldier of the cross, who has been illegally imprisoned 170 days in Madeira for preaching the Gospel, has been offered $4,000 if he would leave Madeira; but he has declined the offer, refusing to sell the right of speech and of disseminating the word of God for gold. He yet preaches publicly, because the charter tolerates every form of worship in private, and within the confines of dissenting churches, erected within the Portuguese dominions, though the Roman Catholic religion is the established religion of the state. [Boston Recorder.

EDUCATION IN RUSSIA.—We see it stated in an English paper that the religious education is now completely organized in the Russian empire. There are four districts of teaching, having each their academy—at St. Petersburgh, Moscow, Kiew, and Kasan. Under the academies, there are 45 seminaries, 173 circle and 190 parish schools. In 1842, the total number of pupils was 60,368. There are in the empire 34,415 churches of the Greek creed, besides 9,059 chapels. The number of clergymen is 117,445. There are 7 metropolitans, 28 archbishops, 28 bishops, 2,542 ecclesiastical tribunals. The total income of the church consisted, in 1842, of 3,042,754 silver roubles. The nnmber of the members of the Russo-Greek church is 44,102,195 individuals. [Boston Recorder.

THE SNOW-STORM OF 1717.—The great storm of 1717, shut people up at home as snugly and effectually as if they had been locked in. Those who were blockaded had to resort to their furniture and the like for fuel; in some places the snow was thirty feet deep. People made their exit frequently from the second-story windows, and the trees cut down for fuel, left long stumps behind. One Hannah Dingley, a poor woman who lived not far from New Haven, was buried for six or eight days, but at last discovered by her neighbors, by smoke of the fire coming through the snow. Hannah dieted a la Graham, on potatoes and dried corn, and warmed up by chairs and tables. A flock of a hundred sheep were dug out of a snow drift on Fisher's Island, where they had been buried to the depth of sixteen feet. [Tribune.

SUMMARY.

A fine bark of five hundred tons burthen, built by Messrs. George Greenman & Co, of Mystic Bridge, Ct., is now lying at one of the wharves of New York. Her workmanship is well spoken of by city mechanics, and shows that ship-building is not necessarily confined to large towns. She is to be called the May-Flower.

The people of Boston have tried seven times to elect a Mayor, but without success.

The anniversary of the Battle of Lexington will be celebrated at that place, on the 19th of April. There is but one survivor of the men who stood in the battle, living in the town; his name is Jonathan Harrington, and he is in good health, hale and hearty.

Col. Reed of Boston has invented a machine by which he thinks he can puff letters from Boston to New York in half an hour. The machine consists of an air-chest, charged with air by an enormous air-pump, with a tube leading out; when air enough is got in, it is of a sudden let out, and the letters with it.

Jacob B. Gaddis has been appointed keeper of the New Jersey State Prison.

The London Globe states, as a fact deduced from the statistics of the hospitals, that the proportion of insane person among the Quakers of England and Scotland, is much larger than prevails among the rest of the community.

Gen. Lewis Cass was on the 4th inst. elected U. S. Senator from Michigan for six years from the 4th of March ensuing.

The Massachusetts House of Representatives, by a vote of 188 to 41, have passed resolutions against the Annexation of Texas.

A loafer, houseless and ragged, applied to a Magistrate, in Baltimore, for admission into the Alms House, to keep himself from starving. On receiving his commitment as a vagrant, he sold it to a negro for 25 cents.

From March 27 to November 27, 1844, the whole number of vessels ashore and otherwise destroyed on the Lake, was 39. Amount of tons destroyed, 2,200; whole amount of loss $141,000—attendant with a loss of 51 lives.

The Legislature of Indiana have passed an act providing for taking a new census of the population of that State between this and the 15th of June next.

A Convention of the State of Louisiana has been sitting at New Orleans for three or four weeks past, engaged in revising the Constitution of that State. The qualifications of voters have been agreed upon as follows: "Every white male citizen is invested with the electoral privilege, with only these limitations, viz: that he be not a pauper, nor a felon, nor insane; and that he has been a resident of the State two years, one of which in the parish where he offers his vote."

The woolen factory at Burrville, (R. I.,) owned by Moses Aldrich, was totally consumed by fire on Friday. Insurance on machinery $3000.

At Franconia, (N. H.,) on February 3, the thermometer fell to 24 degrees below zero, and from January 31 to February 4, the mercury only twice rose above zero, once to 3 degrees and once to 4 degrees.

The Washington papers contain an advertisement of a runaway slave, a girl between 16 and 17 years old, white, with straight black hair, and dark eyes, weighing about 110 or 115 pounds, of good countenance, reads the Bible tolerably well, and has pretty good use of her needle. A reward of $500 is offered for the delivery of the girl to Geo. Fichlin, Thompsonville, Culpepper county, Virginia. This reward is to be paid if she is found in any non-slaveholding state, but if found in Virginia, the reward is to be only $50, and if in Maryland, $75.

The New Orleans Picayune says, in on official document read by Mr. Downs in the Convention yesterday, it was set forth that in 1840 the number of slaves in this city was 22,448, while in 1844 it was but 8,963. This seems to be a most rapid falling off in the numerical strength of our slave population.

Mr. Webster, says the gossip of the day, has been made entirely easy in his pecuniary circumstances by a contribution of $100,000 made up for him by the wealthy men of Boston, to enable him to serve the public hereafter above the necessity of pleading the law for a living.

A steamboat has just been launched in Cincinnati which measures 1053 tons. She is 305 feet in length, 38 feet beam, and about 10 feet hold.

The Magnetic Telegraph from Washington to Baltimore, having exhausted its appropriation, has shut up shop.

On Saturday, the 8th inst., Mr. John Stotler, of Wilkins township, was hauling a heavy log to mill on a sled. At a precipitous place on the road, the sled upset. Mr. S. was on the lower side, and attempted, with the assistance of his brother and little son, to get it on again, but unfortunately, in the endeavor it rolled against him, knocked him down, and passing over his body, crushed it in such a manner as to cause instant death.

A bailiff, calling at the residence of a distressed Quaker to serve a writ, was refused admittance. He said to the servant, "your master is at home, but he will not see me." "He has seen thee, friend," replied Abigail, "but does not like thy appearance."

A retired son of St. Crispin, who had amassed considerable wealth, used to put the letters F. R. S. and C. after his name; he translated it thus: First Rate Shoemaker and Cobbler.

A banished Polish clergyman, of unimpeachable character and exemplary piety, having ventured to return home, about two months ago, was seized by the Russian authorities, condemned to receive 150 blows of the knout, and perished at the 147th.

We see it stated in the Winyah Intelligencer, published at Georgetown, S. C., that one Wm. Watson, who had been in that town teaching a singing school for some time past, has been warned off by the town authorities—having been rather too free spoken on the subject of slavery.

There is a man named Wilschozk, of Archangel, who in 1838 won a match in skating against a rein-deer on the sledge drive on the Neva. He has since learned to skate on all fours, and produce exact representations of the polar bear. Mr. W. would draw at the Siberian theatres, and is the man, no doubt, whom Teufelsdrock, the clothes-philosopher, encountered at the North Pole.

TEMPERANCE ABROAD.—It has already been stated that the Emperor of Russia is prohibiting Temperance Societies, on the ground of the injury which they do to the revenue, by diminishing the consumption of liquors which pay a tax. But on the other hand, his brother-in-law, the King of Holland, is doing every thing in his power to encourage them. He has ordered that a copy of the rules and regulations of these societies shall be given to every laboring person, in order that he may be shown the advantages of Temperance. It is a curious fact that the first royal personage who placed himself at the head of a Temperance Society, was the half-civilized King of the Sandwich Islands. Twenty years ago, drunkenness having become habitual among his subjects, he called his chiefs together, and after a speech on the evils of intoxication, proposed that they should take with him a pledge to drink in future only water, and thus set an example to the lower orders—a pledge which, says a gentleman recently returned from the Islands, has been religiously observed. THE DYING DAUGHTER TO HER MOTHER.

BY MRS. AMELIA OPIE.

Mother, when these unsteady lines
Thy long-averted eyes shall see,
This hand that writes, this heart that pines,
Will cold, quite cold, and tranquil be.
That guilty child, so long disowned,
Can then, blest thought! no more offend!
And, should thou deem my crimes atoned,
O deign my orphan to befriend—

That orphan who, with trembling hand,
To thee will give my dying prayer;
Canst thou my dying prayer withstand,
And from my child withhold thy care?
O raise the veil which hides her cheek,
Nor start her mother's face to see—
But let her look thy love bespeak,
For once that face was dear to thee.

Gaze on—and thou'lt perchance forget
The long, the mournful lapse of years,
Thy couch with tears of anguish wet,
And e'en the guilt which caused those tears.
And in my pure and artless child,
Thou'lt think her mother meets thy view,
Such as she was when life first smiled,
And guilt by name alone she knew.

Ah! then I see thee o'er her charms
A look of fond affection cast;
I see thee clasp her in thine arms,
And in the present lose the past.
But soon the dear illusion flies;
The sad reality returns;
My crimes again to memory rise,
And ah! in vain my orphan mourns.

Till suddenly some keen remorse,
Some deep regret her claims shall aid,
For wrath that held too long its course,
For words of peace too long delayed,
For pardon, (most, alas! denied,
When pardon might have snatch'd from shame,)
And kindness, hadst thou kindness tried,
Had checked my guilt and saved my fame.

And then thou'lt wish, as I do now,
Thy hand my humble bed had smoothed,
Wiped the still moisture off my brow,
And all the wants of sickness soothed;
For oh, the means to soothe my pain
My poverty has still denied;
And thou wilt wish, ah! wish in vain,
Thy riches had the means supplied.

Thou'lt wish, with keen repentance wrung,
I'd closed my eyes upon thy breast—
Expiring, while thy faltering tongue
Pardon in kindest tones expressed.
O, sounds which I must never hear,
Through years of wo my fond desire!
O, mother! spite of all most dear,
Must I, unblest by thee, expire!

THE BAIT OF THE SPOILER.

"Beauty provoketh thieves sooner than gold."

Beauty is one of the gifts of an all-bountiful Creator, designed in its ever-varying forms to light up the shades of animate and inanimate existence. It may be seen at all times by an accurate observer peering forth among the works of God. Go in the season of vegetation to the wildest, most unfrequented forest, and you may learn lessons of love from the flowers that smile in beauty at your feet by the side of every stump, rock, marsh, and pool that abound in the vast desert. To describe minutely all that has been discovered of the beautiful in the works of Nature, would require a scroll wide as the earth, and broad as the Heavens. And can there be foes, who, for a sordid end, would mar this beauty in any of its developments? So the Poet asserts in the above quotation, but he fails to tell us by what name this foe should be designated—by what power or skill he effects his purposes, and who, or what are the special objects of his depredations.

Does he mean that the thief of beauty shall personify to our minds the King of Terrors? If so, he presents a Spoiler that spares not. With one blast of his breath he withers the flower of the morning and the green herb—and clothes in mourning the face of Universal Nature.—Man, too, is his victim. The countenance of the smiling babe, beautiful as the opening rose-bud, and lovely as innocence and infantile intelligence can make it, is changed at his approach, and its beauty departs forever. Death heeds not the mother's tears or father's sighs—he spares not age nor sex—all, all are his doomed victims, and he the Conqueror. He is said to come as a thief, and man is bidden to be ready for his coming. Who has not seen beauty consume away as ashes beneath his touch?

We remember a beloved youth who had just entered upon the stage of active life, surrounded by all that could render life attractive. She was thought more beautiful than her most lovely companions, and in every respect a model of higher perfection than usually pertains to humanity. Disease came suddenly, and ere her friends were aware, she was in the embraces of death, and the grave was her home. Thirteen years subsequently we stood by that grave. It was opened to remove her remains to a new cemetery. The undertaker found her coffin so decayed that a new one must be prepared before the removal could be effected—and, dear reader, how much do you suppose remained there of her former beauty? The flesh and skin were all gone, except sufficient upon the head to retain the roots of her hair, (which had grown quite through the decayed coffin, and spread into the earth like the roots of plants,) the neck was parted from the trunk, and her grave-clothes had entirely disappeared.—As we bent over the open grave, and gazed intently upon the poor body in ruins, the suggestion arose, if beauty must ever perish thus, is it a thing worthy to excite pride and vanity in its dying possessor? This was a sad sight, and owing to many associations connected with it, occasioned sadness for many days. It engraved on the tablet of memory, a lesson of human frailty effaceless as first impressions on the mind of childhood.

But Death, though he comes as a thief, and destroys where he treads, is not the foe intended by the Poet, for instead of possessing the characteristics of the felon, he is the messenger of God, sent to execute his will. He smites not unbidden—and to the soul prepared to meet him, he is not an unwelcome visitant—for while he disrobes the spirit of its mortal coil, he introduces it to beauty and loveliness "fadeless forever."

In what sense, then, does "beauty provoke thieves sooner than gold?" Reader—go through certain streets of our city, leave tracts at the door of certain dwellings in your tract districts, observing the faces of the occupants, and their replies when kindly warned to flee from the wrath to come; go to yonder Prison, Alms-house, or Penitentiary, and pass an hour—mark the appearance of their inmates of the weaker sex, and learn the causes that brought them there—and, the question will be fully solved. The traces of a Destroyer, more terrible than the King of Terrors, are legible upon the countenances of these fellow-beings—Ruin, more revolting than the reopened grave discloses, clings to them like a body of death.

It should not be inferred from the above, that all of this class have once been fair and lovely, for such is not the fact. This much, however, is true. There are thousands among them who, a few years ago, were the flower and pride of some dear domestic circle; they were flattered in childhood by misjudging friends—led to think a pretty face of great consequence, and a sure passport to distinction, while beauty of mind and "comeliness of words and deeds" were regarded by them as a matter of secondary importance. They were not taught that a prepossessing appearance, if unguarded by principle, and a just estimate of things as they are, might put thieves on their track, more to be dreaded than the thief of mammon. They knew nothing of the wiles of their worst enemy—nothing of the snares and pitfalls lying in their pathway, till their feet were taken in a net from which they struggled in vain to escape.

Within the past week, the case of two young women has been commended to our sympathy, whose history furnishes a practical comment on these remarks. Both are half-orphans, natives of flourishing New England villages—have had Christian parents, been for years members of a Sabbath school, and yet have received no instruction on points of vital interest to their present and future welfare. Trusting to the false professions and promises of men who, though above them in society, had been allured by their personal attractions to plot their undoing, they had been left by them recently in this city, bereft of character, health, friends, and home, and compelled either to find their lodging on the cold ground, or re-enter the door to infamy, temporal and eternal. There were those to whom they might have applied, who would have counselled them how to retrace their steps, but they knew it not. When asking assistance that they might be admitted to some hospital to die, the sickening anguish of despair was so depicted on every feature, that one must have had a heart like the 'nether millstone' to have witnessed their sufferings unmoved. These are not solitary cases, far from it; but we forbear.

Parents, guardians, and teachers! while it is yours to mould the character and destiny of the young, will you not teach those to whom the conscious or imaginary possession of beauty may ever become a snare, to place such an estimate upon the short-lived flower, as you suppose the saints and angels do, when they look down upon earthly things that God has made pleasing and attractive. Teach them the deep guilt of being proud or vain of any gift received from God. Teach them to regard a cultivated and lowly mind—a character formed in accordance with Bible precepts, as infinitely more valuable than mere external accomplishments, and that, while the latter may gain the admiration and flattery of the other sex, the former only can secure the heart that is worth the having. Teach them to esteem him who would rob them, or others, of the priceless jewel of VIRTUE, as a more dangerous and more odious associate than the burglar or assassin. That > "He who steals their purse steals trash,

> * * * But he who filches from them their GOOD NAME,
> Robs them of that which not enriches him,
> And makes them poor indeed."

Adv. Moral Reform.

THE CASE OE BISHOP ONDERDONK.

It is scarcely possible for readers at a distance from New York to appreciate the interest which this case has excited. Since the publication of the official account of the trial, of which some thirty thousand copies have been sold, the subject has been much discussed both by the secular and religious newspapers. In some cases, positions have been taken, in order to justify the Bishop, which seem to us destructive of all moral purity, and deserving of the severest censure: This is our reason for publishing the following just comments upon the subject. It will be remembered, that the charges against the Bishop were embraced under eight specifications. The account of the trial gives each of these specifications, with the evidence and pleadings thereupon.

The Journal of Commerce in commenting upon this document, has the following remarks:

"In proof of each of these charges, the testimony of one or more credible witnesses was adduced, all of them communicants of the Episcopal Church, and several of them clergymen or clergymen's wives. So far as we can judge from the character of their testimony, it cannot be discredited in its leading features, without at the same time throwing all other testimony into doubt and uncertainty. The same idea is more forcibly expressed by Bishop Hopkins of Vermont, when he says.—'Never, in the course of many years' experience, have I seen such a body of witnesses. Clergymen of unspotted reputation, their wives exemplary and blameless, communicants active and zealous of good works—such are the persons, on whose solemn oaths we have decided this afflicting issue. And I do not hesitate to say, that if I could admit a single doubt of the substantial correctness of their evidence, I should be compelled to abandon all faith in human testimony.'

The conduct of those ladies who in defiance of all the impulses of their nature, have come forward as witnesses in this important case, is evidence to our minds that they are more deeply penetrated with a love of justice and purity of their Church, than with any personal convenience of their own; and we cannot but regard as most ungenerous and cruel, the imputations which have been thrown out by certain prints, to the effect, that no female of real modesty is liable to be insulted by a voluptuary. The sentiment is not only false in itself, as is shown by facts of every day's occurrence, but is a foul slander when applied to the ladies under consideration. That is a despicable revenge which seeks to gratify itself by injuring the reputation of ladies, for an act which, when rightly viewed, redounds to their highest honor. There was one lady, who, though believed to be in possession of important evidence bearing upon the case, resisted all overtures to induce her to appear as a witness, and consequently the fourth charge failed to be sustained. Had all the others pursued a similar course, not one of the charges, probably, would have been substantiated. We therefore warn all citizens who desire to see justice done, either in church or state, to frown down every attempt to cast odium upon ladies, who, at a vast expense of feeling, appear upon the witness stand, in obedience to their summons, and testify to facts of which they alone, except the accused, are immediately cognizant."

Painful and revolting as it is to the sensitive mind, to have fresh instances of human depravity exposed, the thanks not only of our church, but of every mother, daughter, father and brother throughout the land, are due to those who in this delicate matter have done their duty without fear or favor.—Episcopal Prot.

In these remarks we cordially coincide, and we feel it to be at once a duty and a high pleasure to express the gratitude of all right-minded men, to those witnesses. Personally strangers to us, they are now, in our estimation, worthy of all honor as the champions of their sex, the vindicaters of female innocence and purity, and our esteem for them is only equalled by the ineffable contempt which we cherish for the men who can indite such reflections upon them as we recently saw in one of the daily papers. Well did the writer of that article give as the authority for his opinions, the remarks of "libertines in their cups." The article itself is worthy of the same parentage, and therefore its sentiments gave no one any surprise, except that depravity had so far lost its shame as to blazon its own licentiousness in the pages of a newspaper.

It is indeed painfully humiliating, that the religion of Christ must bear the reproach of such developments. But the guilt and shame belong to him by whom the offence cometh, while the gratitude of an injured church and of an outraged community, the approbation of all virtuous minds, the calm and sweet testimony of an approving conscience, and the favor of Him in whose sight the heavens are unclean, shall be the present and future consolation and reward of those noble women who have dared to do right in the face of the world. Honor to them, and to such as they, now and always.

Since the above was in type, we have had our attention called to the following remarks on the same subject by the Episcopal Recorder, which are so entirely in unison with our own sentiments that we copy them.

"They have performed a trying duty. They have borne the cross which their Divine Master laid upon them with patient firmness, while other pusillanimously shrunk back, and for their unfaithfulness, will one day have to answer at His bar. It is very probable that when the testimony shall be published, very decided attempts will immediately be made to tear their reputation to pieces. But we doubt not that He who has hitherto sustained them in the thorny path of duty will still give them aid; that their Saviour will be heard whispering to them, 'Fear not, I am with you.' And why should they fear? Can it be doubted who is most likely in the end to meet with approbation, she who having been insulted is willing to tattle about it to the disparagement of religion, but unwilling to testify; or she who solemnly summoned to the duty by our Lord himself, through the highest authorities of his church on earth, shrinks not from her appointed duty—tells what she knows with the courage of a woman; and then with the high endurance of a martyr, suffers the crucifixion of a cross-examination on this delicate subject, beneath the public gaze. We have read of timid females who have braved the faggot and the stake for the honor of the gospel; and verily we think that this makes as near an approach to such Christian heroism as anything which can take place in our age and country. Let these sufferers 'for Christ's sake,' then abide in peace. Many a Christian heart has already bled for them; and when the excitement shall be over, they will be reverenced by all—except, indeed, that some subsidized pander of the secular press may be tempted still by his cupidity to vend an occasional penny worth of scandal at their expense; and some petticoated pharisee while leading the gossip of the town, may, perhaps, like to display the ceremonial cleanness of her own character, by letting the world know how much more delicately she would have acted in such a case."

A writer in the Advocate of Moral Reform has the following appropriate reflections upon the record of the trial:

I have just been reading the Proceedings of the Court convened in this city, for the trial of Bishop Onderdonk, of the Diocese of New York, and am painfully struck with two things in the records of that trial, which seem to me to demand attention from the friends of moral purity.

The first thing is, the extreme tenderness with which the Bishops composing the minority of the Court speak of the immoralities with which their brother stands charged, in their written reasons for the judgment of not guilty which they pronounce. They seem to look at the matter almost entirely in a legal point of view, and nothing short of evidence which would bring a murderer to the gallows, will satisfy them that this man is unworthy to lead "the sacramental host of God's elect." Though they do not explicitly charge the ladies who testified against him, with perjury, they are unwilling to allow that their testimony leaves a stain upon the sacerdotal robes of the Bishop. The "free and paternal character" of the Reverend Father, his "long acquaintance" with one of the ladies insulted, the familiarities incident upon a travelling companionship; the "contact occasioned by jolting over rough and uneven roads;" such are some of the unworthy subterfuges resorted to by these office bearers in the church, to screen one of their number from merited punishment. To the learned counsel on both sides, and to the majority of Bishops composing the Court, it was manifest that if the witnesses were not utterly perjured, the accusations of 'immorality and impurity,' contained in the Presentment, were fully made out. In this opinion, I doubt not, every candid and impartial reader of the Proceedings will concur. The evidence, whether viewed in detail or in the general, whether singly or in cumulation, is singularly clear, straight-forward and convincing—leaving no alternative between believing it true, and the Bishop guilty—or false, and the witnesses perjured before heaven and earth. The latter, when we consider the character and standing of the witnesses, the absence of all motive thus to criminate the innocent, their ignorance of each other, and the perfect consistency of their several statements, is too monstrous a belief even for credulity itself to adopt. The former—alas for human nature! we have painful evidence all around us—may be, and doubtless is the fact, to the shame and scandal of the holy religion which such men falsely profess.

But the minority of the House of Bishops, seem resolved to admit neither of these alternatives; and we have in their "reasons," a specimen of special pleading which would come with a far better grace from a lawyer's bench than from the seat of a Christian minister. I knew we were "fall'n on evil times"—I knew that iniquity abounded even in the sanctuary of the living God—but I was not prepared to find men who are called "Fathers of the Church," treating lightly charges such as these, without utterly throwing away the evidence on which such charges are founded. The acts alleged, or something like them, they evidently think, are consistent with entire purity of intention and motive, and ought not to impair in the least, the Bishop's respectability or usefulness! After this, we are not surprised, in the paper read by the Respondent in excuse or palliation of the sentence to be pronounced, to find, that while he does not deny one of the charges brought against him, he solemnly avers his freedom from all impure or unchaste feelings or designs, and pleads that it is not every outward act which interprets the inward intention. This is an abstract proposition, and is doubtless true, but the common sense of mankind has long since declared certain familiarities between the sexes to be always indicative of a wrong state of feeling on the part of those who use, or permit them. We instinctively refuse credence to the man, whatever his professions may be, who claims purity of feeling and intention, while taking liberties with a lady, which must be considered as gross personal insults, if she possesses a vestige of modesty or self-respect. It surely betrays a standard of morality far below what even the world's code of honor requires, to argue that such things may exist without rendering a man unfit for the sacred office of the Christian ministry.

The second thing I wish to notice, is the strange and unaccountable fact, that the wrongs of these witnesses seem to have been so quietly received, and so long borne in silence, and on the part of most of them with scarcely any abatement of cordiality towards their author. I say this is unaccountable, for surely no principle of human nature or of religion will account for a course of conduct like that pursued by most of these witnesses towards Bishop Onderdonk. The same God who commands us when one cheek is smitten to turn the other also, says expressly "Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness but rather reprove them." "First pure, then peaceable," is the order of his kingdom. If these ladies really believed as they certainly must, that the Bishop, in his treatment of them was actuated by impure feelings and motives, how is it reconcilable with womanly dignity, or Christian character, to continue to treat him with confidence and friendship?

In the words of the Bishop of Maryland, "They exchange civilities with him by whom they have been insulted. They receive and render courtesies. In every instance, they share the friendly meal; in one, it is proffered and urged upon the offender as a guest. They gossip with others of liberties and improprieties, but to the party on whom they charge them, they give no hint or token that he has ever given them offence. In three instances, he remains in utter ignorance that any thing which may have passed between him and them has been taken amiss." This is the language of one of the minority, of one who believes the Bishop innocent, and of course that the accusations are in part at least, libellous—still there is just ground for his remarks, from the confession of the parties interested.

It is far from being my wish or intention to add one feather's weight to the burden already resting on those heroic women, whom I honor for coming forward even at this late hour, to unmask hypocrisy, and expose wickedness in high places. Still, as a friend and advocate of Moral Reform, and I may add, as a woman, a wife and a mother, I must protest against a course of conduct, which is calculated to break down the barriers between virtue and vice, and to leave our sex defenceless at the mercy of the foe.

There is, it has been truly observed, an instinctive feeling planted deep in our very nature, which prompts a virtuous woman instantly and indignantly to repel every attempt at personal freedoms on the part of the other sex, and which follows such attempts, if aggravated in their character, with unmeasured loathing and contempt. This I repeat, is instinct, and therefore liable in its blindness to exaggeration and perversion, but the Christian female has a higher and holier rule of conduct, and is bound to act from motives of pure benevolence while she obeys the divine command, "Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them." There can be no doubt, that both by the spirit and letter of the word of God, we are forbidden to associate on terms of familiar intercourse with those that manifestly are impure in heart, whatever may be their rank or office or profession. What would be thought of a virtuous matron, the wife of a clergyman, if she should invite to her table a man of the world, who had more than once grossly outraged and insulted her in the manner charged on the Bishop; if she should give him her hand at meeting and parting, and extend to him the common courtesies of life without apparent coldness or reserve? What would be thought of the husband, who could bear in silence such an insult to his wife, and treat its author with the same kindness and friendship as before? And does the fact, that it was not a man of the world who thus insulted virtuous females, but a professed Christian, a minister of the Gospel, a "Father of the Church," lessen the aggravation of the offence, or the criminality of the offender? Does it not rather greatly enhance both? While, therefore, we award to these ladies the praise due to their self-denying heroism, in thus submitting to a moral crucifixion for the truth's sake, we cannot but regret that the crimes charged on this man, were not immediately followed by an indignant rebuke; or at least by an entire cessation of all friendly intercourse with one who could thus abuse the privileges of his holy office. Such a course would have saved the witnesses from the taunts now thrown at them by those that espouse the opposite side; it would probably have either produced amendment or exposure long since, and thus have averted some of the disastrous consequences now resulting; above all, it would have been in accordance with the divine command, and thus have promoted the interests of virtue and holiness.

It is a melancholy fact, that comparatively so few even among truly virtuous women, seem fully to understand or realize their duty in regard to the treatment of licentious men. If these ladies had been thrown into company or contact with a woman of questionable character, what motives of expediency, of prudence, or of shame, would have been strong enough to induce them voluntarily to associate with her even for a single hour? The answer is obvious. What then but a perverted public sentiment, acting more or less strongly on all who have not been made sensible of its injustice and wickedness, could induce women to act so differently in the case of the other sex? I entreat those who have not hitherto looked at the subject in this light now to examine it, and to ask themselves why the man, or it may be, the minister, who manifestly exhibits impure feelings and purposes, should not receive the same treatment with the impure woman in the same circumstances. We are bound to judge according to our knowledge as God judges, and to look upon sin as he looks upon it, without respect of persons. The contrary course, is the fruitful parent of half the evils that now afflict society, and must be wholly abandoned, before one step can be taken toward a radical reformation of morals. It is greatly to be hoped that the proceedings in this important case, bearing as they do on this very point, and scattered broadcast over the land, may serve to awaken attention to this subject, and lead many to enquire how far it is consistent with womanly dignity and self-respect, (to say nothing of Christian obligation,) to treat with confidence and friendship, those who can deliberately wound female delicacy, or assault female virtue.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

THIS Institution has a pleasant and quiet location thirteen miles south-east of Angelica, and six miles south of Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y., under the care of W. C. KENYON, as Principal, and Miss CAROLINE B. MAXSON, as Preceptress, aided by able and experienced assistants.

Teachers' Classes will be exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining every facility of a Normal School, without its usual disadvantages. Within the past year, more than one hundred and fifty students of the institution have been employed as teachers in this and the adjacent counties—a number much larger than from any other institution in the State.

Students are prepared for entering any class in College. Ample advantages are also secured to those pursuing Modern Languages and the Fine Arts. The institution is liberally endowed and supplied with a choice and valuable library, and apparatus sufficiently extensive to illustrate every department of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. It has also well selected cabinets of Geological, Mineralogical and Conchological specimens.

The plan of instruction aims at the development of the moral, intellectual and physical powers of students, so as to render them thorough, accurate, and practical scholars.

Lectures on Chemistry, accompanied by a full course of experiments, will commence with the second week of the fall term, and continue daily to its close. During the fall and winter terms, daily lectures will be given on School Teaching. Lectures on Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Physiology, illustrated by experiments, will be given each term of the year.

TUITION, per term of fifteen weeks, from $3,50 to $5. Board per week, in private families, $1. The entire expense of the academic year, including tuition, board, washing, light, and fuel, need not exceed $60. No extra charges incurred.

President of the Board of Trustees

GUILDHALL.

Every body has heard about Guildhall as the principal seat of city legislation, and the scene of numerous feasts on memorable occasions. Here is a great Hall, 153 feet long, 48 feet wide, and 55 feet high, in which are chosen the mayor, sheriffs, and members of parliament. It was in this Hall that the Lord Mayor, in 1814, entertained the Prince Regent and the allied sovereigns with a feast which cost upwards of $100,000. The anxiety to gain a sight of this splendid repast was so great, that many wealthy merchants paid hundreds of dollars for the privilege of becoming waiters at the table. The Hall is enriched by several monuments, including those to Chatham, Pitt, Nelson, and Beckford. At one end of it, raised on pedestals, stand two colossal figures, representing an ancient Briton and Saxon, called Gog and Magog. They were formerly carried in procession on lord mayor's day, to the great amusement of the assembled crowds. But now they uniformly keep their places in the Hall, excepting that, as all the children believe, they come down to dinner when they hear the clock strike one. It so happens, however, that they do not often give evidence of having heard the clock. The building is the work of different periods, and is very irregular. It contains a council chamber, a library and museum, the city courts of law, and the justice hall, in which an alderman sits daily to hear charges, complaints, &c.

THE ROYAL MINT.

This is a handsome stone building of Grecian architecture situated on Tower Hill. It is inaccessible to strangers unless introduced by some of the officers. But when so introduced, every facility for observation is afforded to the visitor. He is first shown into the melting and pouring room, where the metal is made into bars ready for the rollers. Here are little wagons for transporting the bars on a sort of railway to the other parts of the building. One of these wagons, which we started very easily with a single hand, contained gold bars worth $500,000. The visitor is next conducted to the room for rolling the bars into plates; then to that for cutting the plates into pieces of the right dimensions for coin; then to that for preparing the pieces to stamp; then to that for stamping the pieces and finishing them for circulation. Much complicated and curious machinery is necessary to carry on the work of coining. It is here brought to such perfection, that a currency of improper weight or quality is hardly possible. An immense amount of specie is required for the financial transactions of England, since "small bills" are not known there. Yet the whole business of coinage is now carried on within these premises, and so carried on as to give almost no occasion for complaint. The Mint has had the attention and services of several of England's most distinguished and valuable men.

THE PORT AND DOCKS OF LONDON.

Some impression of the commercial importance of London may be obtained from a sail down the Thames for ten miles, or from a visit to the principal docks. The Port of London properly extends from London Bridge to Blackwall; but from the Bridge to Deptford, a distance of four miles, the river is constantly lined with vessels of all sizes and from all nations, busily engaged in loading or unloading. The intervening channel is occupied by steamboats and small craft, or by richly laden vessels going down or up according as the tide ebbs or flows. More than one hundred steamboats ply upon the river, connecting London with all the domestic and foreign ports. There is a place near Gravesend, which commands a good view of the windings of the river, and from which 1000 vessels may frequently be seen wending their way up or down, or quietly waiting a return of the tide. Mention is made of the extensive commerce of London as early as 359, and from that period onward may be found frequent allusions to its surprisingly rapid increase. Yet it was not until about 1760 that the necessity for extensive wet docks was fully appreciated, and a systematic effort commenced to meet it. This effort has resulted in supplying London with dock accommodations of immense extent.

The St. Katherine Docks were built in 1827 and 1828. They consist of two docks, a basin, and a connecting lock canal, and are sufficiently capacious to accommodate from 150 to 200 vessels. The docks are surrounded by extensive warehouses, into which goods may be hoisted from the vessels, and in which 210,000 tons of goods can be securely kept. The expense of purchasing the ground, and building upon it, was about $7,000,000.

The London Docks are situated a little lower down the river, and consist of two docks, a basin, and canal. One of the docks covers twenty acres and can accommodate 500 vessels; the other covers fourteen acres. They are surrounded by warehouses; one of which, called the tobacco warehouse, stands on four acres of ground, and rents for $75,000 per annum. Beneath the warehouses are immense vaulted cellars for wines and brandies in bond.

The West India Docks have warehouses capable of receiving the whole produce of the West India trade. One dock is exclusively for unloading ships, and occupies thirty acres; the other is for loading outward bound vessels, and occupies twenty acres.

The East India Docks were constructed for the accommodation of vessels engaged in the East India trade, and for the better security of goods brought home by them. It was required that all East India produce brought to the port should be unloaded there.

BRIDGES OVER THE THAMES.

The Bridges over the Thames were formerly few and rudely constructed. But a great change has since been made, so that the bridges are now sufficiently numerous, and form objects of particular attraction for their architectural beauty. There are six grand structures of iron or stone. The first in order, commencing at the west, is Vauxhall, which was completed in 1816, and consists of nine cast iron arches, with piers of Kentish ragstone, imbedded in Roman cement. Westminster was completed in 1750, at a cost of nearly $2,000,000. Waterloo was constructed in six years, and opened in 1817, on the anniversary of the battle of Waterloo, in the presence of the Prince Regent, the Duke of Wellington, and many other distinguished individuals. Blackfriars is of stone, and was built in 1768. Southwark is of cast iron, and consists of three arches, the center one having a span of 240 feet, and that on either side of 210 feet. The weight of the metal employed exceeds 5300 tons, and the cost of the structure was nearly $4,000,000. The New London Bridge exceeds all the others in style of architecture and expensiveness. It was built between 1824 and 1831, at an expense of more than $7,000,000. Probably no thoroughfare in the world is so crowded—more than one hundred and fifty thousand persons crossing it daily. It occupies the site of an old bridge which was completed in 1209 and remained until 1756. The probability is, that this will stand as long as its predecessor.

For the Sabbath Recorder.

TIME OF COMMENCING THE SABBATH.

DECREES OF KINGS AND COUNCILS.

Several articles have appeared in the Recorder discussing the question about the time of commencing the Sabbath. It is with some degree of regret that I have noticed this discussion, inasmuch as I think it cannot but have injured our cause by the declaration therein made, that the Scriptures are not sufficiently explicit to direct us as to the proper time and observance of God's sacred rest. I am not about to say any thing to prolong a controversy upon a point which, so far at least as it has reference to the practice of the Jews at Christ's time and before, was never seriously disputed by any of the first-day or no-day Sabbath writers; but I am about to present, so far as decisions of princes and councils will decide it, what has been the practice of the Christian Church in reference to this matter since the catastrophe which put an end to the Jewish polity; and if it does no other good, I doubt not it will serve to correct an error into which most of us have been led, of attributing to the Popes of Rome an innovation of which clearly they were never guilty.

In an examination of the decrees or laws of Eighty-five Kings, Councils, or Bishops, extending from A. D. 321, to about A. D. 1700, which are mentioned by Morer in his Dialogues on the Lord's Day, and which I presume are nearly all that made any decrees relative to the day, I find that fourteen have reference to the time of commencing its solemnities. Seven of these were on the continent of Europe, and seven in England or Scotland. The earliest of those on the continent was A. D. 791, and the last A. D. 1282. As will be seen, they were all in harmony with what has hitherto been conceded as the Mosaic practice. The subject seems not to have been introduced into them with reference to any disputes concerning the begining of the Sabbath, but to correct such infractions as the people would naturally fall into from the universal practice throughout the Roman Empire, of commencing the secular day at midnight.

The first of the councils that we find speaking upon this question, was called by Charles the Great, or Charlemagne, of France, and was convened at Friuli in Italy in reference to disputes concerning the Trinity and the incarnation. They decreed, "That all people should, with due reverence and devotion, honor the Lord's day, beginning on the evening of the day before; and that thereon they more especially abstain from all kinds of sin, and from all carnal acts and secular labors; and that they go to church in a grave manner, laying aside all suits of law and controversies which might hinder them from praising God's name together."

Three years subsequently, another council was convened by the same monarch, at Frankfort in Germany, where the boundaries of the Lord's day were determined "from Saturday evening to Sunday evening, that so there might be uniformity in the time of their worship, and the conscience made easy by the certainty of the hours when they were to begin and end that day's service."

A. D. 813, another council at Tours says, "Let there be no markets or pleadings on the Lord's day, which Christians ought to spend in the praises of God, and thanks for his blessings, and to continue in so doing until the evening."

Archbishop Herardus of Tours, A. D. 858, took measures to promote the observance of the day within his jurisdiction, and forbid all servile works and obscene language and markets on the Lord's day, which he required to be religiously kept from evening to evening.

About the middle of the eleventh century, A. D. 1050, a council was convened at Coy in Spain, by Ferdinand King of Castile, where it was decreed, "that all Christians should be admonished every Saturday evening to go to church, by way of preparation to the Lord's day following, which was to be entirely consecrated to the hearing of the mass. And no person was to presume to travel thereon unless for devotion's sake, or to bury the dead, or to visit the sick, or to carry expresses for the security of the State against the attempts of the Saracens."

A. D. 1282, the council of Angiers in France, called by Ptolemy Juliomagnus, forbid "Millers, by water or otherwise, to grind their corn from Saturday evening till Sunday evening, and also that at such times the barber should desist from his trade."

Many other councils are quoted from this period to A. D. 1618, but they make no reference to the time of commencing the solemnities of the day. One universal practice, we have seen, was taught throughout the dominions of "His Holiness," excepting, as we shall soon see, in England and Scotland, where a different practice prevailed—originating, doubtless, in part from the tenacity with which the people held to the Sabbath which they had before been taught to observe, and from which, in consequence of their isolated situation, they were not so soon nor so easily drawn off as the rest of the Catholic church.

The first legislation to be found in England concerning the observation of Sunday, was A. D. 692, by Ira, King of the West Saxons, who, says Morer, by the advice of his father, with his Bishops and his Aldermen and Sages, in a great assembly of the servants of God, for the health of their souls and the preservation of the kingdom, made several statutes, from the third of which the following is taken:—"If a servant do any work on Sunday by his master's orders, he shall be free and the master pay thirty shillings; but if he sent to work on his own head, he shall be beaten with many stripes, or ransom himself with a price. A freeman, if he work on this day, shall lose his freedom or pay sixty shillings; if he be a priest, double.

Five years afterward, a Synod was held at Berghamsted, under Bertualdus, Archbishop of Canterbury, and there passed the following canon among others: "If any person whatever doth any manner of common work on Saturday or Sunday evening after sunset, if a servant and by order of his master, the master shall be fined eighty shillings. If a servant travels on these days, he shall pay six shillings to his master or be beaten. If a freeman be faulty, he shall be put in the pillory or fined, and half of the fine shall be given to the informer."

A. D. 967, King Edgar not only prohibited buying and selling on Sunday, with all legal process or attendance on courts, but a scruple having arisen about the terms of this "Christian Sabbath," he further commanded, "that the festival should be kept from three of the clock in the afternoon on Saturday, till day-break on Monday morning, under the penalty of what the laws prescribed for those who misbehave themselves on the Lord's day."

King Canutus made a law subsequently, confirming the former laws for the observation of Sunday; and, according to King Edgar's rule, he began the festival on Saturday, at three o'clock, and ended it on Monday morning.

Edward III., on coming to the throne, A. D. 1054, made a collection of the Danish, Saxon, and Mercian laws, and whatever he found most useful, both for the civil and ecclesiastical governments, he selected and confirmed. Among them, those in reference to the Lord's day were not overlooked, but according to the way of olden times, he took care to discharge it of all litigious disputes and secular business, and to determine the bounds of it, from three o'clock on Saturday afternoon until Monday morning.

This was afterwards re-enacted by Henry II., about A. D. 1155, who, it is reported, had an apparition at Cardiff in Wales, in which St. Peter charged him, that on Sundays, throughout his dominions, there should be no buying or selling, and no servile work, except what concerned the provision of meat and drink; which things, if he observed, he should succeed in all his affairs.

A. D. 1201, Eustachius, Abbot of Flay, under the reign of King John, traveled through England and Scotland, reading a mandate which he said had been delivered from heaven, and was found by Akarius, the Archbishop, at Golgotha, where Christ was crucified, and in which the observation of Sunday was enjoined from the ninth hour on Saturday until sunrising on Monday. This document he read to a council in Scotland in the reign of King William, A. D. 1203, who, with the consent of his Parliament then assembled, passed it into a law, "That Saturday, from twelve at noon, ought to be accounted holy, and that no man should deal in such business as was on feast days forbidden." Also, at the tolling of the bell, the people were to be employed in holy actions, going to sermons and the like, and to continue thus until Monday morning, a penalty being imposed on those who transgressed.

About eleven years later, it was again enacted in a Parliament at Scone, by Alexander III. of Scotland, "that none should fish in any waters from Saturday, after evening prayers, till sunrise on Monday," which was afterwards confirmed by James I.

Although the list is continued down to A. D. 1698, no other expression is made in reference to the time for the commencement of the solemnities of the day, and we are left to conjecture only as to the origin of the present practice. But with such facts for our data, I think but one opinion can be formed as to its origin, and that must be, that it grew out of the light esteem in which the day continued to be held, despite of all the efforts of civil or ecclesiastical governments, to enforce its more strict observance, and the constant tendency of the people to regard it as the other days were regarded, from the commencement of the labors of the day until their termination. When a practice once obtains, a generation or two is sufficient, as our own experience teaches, to make the practice quite apostolic. S.

STATISTICS OF THE JEWS.

Their restless feet are pressing at this very hour the snows of Siberia, and the burning sands of the desert. Our friend Gobat found numbers of them in the elevated plains of Abyssinia, eighteen hundred miles to the south of Cairo; and when Denham and Clapperton, the first travelers that ventured across the great Sahara, arrived on the banks of the lake Tchad, they also found that the wandering Jew had preceded them there by many a long year. When the Portuguese settled in the Indian Peninsula, they found three distinct classes of Jews; and when the English lately took possession of Aden in the south of Arabia, the Jews were more in number there than the Gentiles. By a census taken within the last few months in Russia, they amount to two millions two hundred thousand; so that their population in that immense empire exceeds that of our twenty-two cantons. Morocco contains three hundred thousand, and Tunis one hundred and fifty thousand. In the one small town of Sana, the capital of Arabia Felix, they assemble together in eighteen synagogues. Yemen counts two hundred thousand; the Turkish empire two hundred thousand, of which Constantinople alone contains eighty thousand. At Brody, where the Christians, who are ten thousand in number, have only three churches, the Jews, twenty thousand in number, have one hundred and fifty synagogues. Hungary has three hundred thousand. Cracovie twenty-two thousand. In a word, it is imagined that were all the Jews assembled together, they would form a population of seven millions; so that could you transport them into the land of their fathers this very year, they would form a nation more powerful and more numerous than our Switzerland. [L. Gaussen.

THE ANGEL OF DEATH.

It is not to be denied, that sinful man has many enjoyments in this world. It is perfectly idle to say, as we look over the festive circle, and see the cheerful countenances, and hear the merry peel and vivacious laugh, that there is no enjoyment there—the whole scene would [illegible] There may be some sad hearts concealed under those gay exteriors, but for the most part those who compose that circle, are for the moment in a state of pleasurable excitement. And so too, abounding wealth, and popular applause are sources of great happiness to unsanctified hearts—and such as judge from outward appearances, are apt to look upon this world's votaries, as the monopolizers of enjoyment. We have, however, here only the front view of the picture; examine it more closely, and you will see in the back ground the angel of death advancing, and one and another of these figures moving through the scene, and dropping at his touch, and these happy souls in quick succession, are exchanging all their hilarity and high excitement, for the sorrows and the darkness of an eternal night. Thus the world is moving on, day after day, perpetually changing its phases. Thus end every day in more or less numerous instances, all the joys which the world can give. If we take this earth for our portion, it is our only portion, and however large it may be, it is soon to be wrested from us, and then the human mind is left to feed forever upon reflection, and the only word of consolation, if consolation it can be called, which falls upon the ear is this—"Son, remember that thou in thy life time receivedat thy good things." "Death, what a melancholy day to those who have no God." [Dr. Mason.

THE GENTLEMAN AND THE PEASANT.

A gentleman having come to the possession of an estate, invited a friend from a distance to partake of his hospitality, and to congratulate him on the acquisition of his possessions. The friend was a Christian; but the proprietor of the domain sought his happiness in the world's enjoyments. Soon after the arrival of the guest, he was led out to a balcony, commanding an extensive view. Pointing forward, the proprietor asked, "Do you see that range of fields extending to the verge of yonder hill?" "I do," was the reply. "Then these are mine. Look again," he continued, "in this other direction. Do you see those farm-houses and adjacent fields?" His friend assented as before. "These again," he cried in the joy of his heart, "are mine." Having gone over, in description, the whole of his property, he awaited the usual congratulations, but received none. On expressing his surprise, mingled with displeasure, his companion, who saw in those things the idol which had taken possession of his heart, and the rock on which his soul was being destroyed, gently replied, "Why should you be surprised? Look to yonder village: there lives a peasant, who can say more than you have said to day." The gentleman exclaimed with astonishment, "What can he say?" It was answered, "He can look up and ask, Do you see yon sky? above that sky is the heaven of heavens, that heaven of heavens is mine. Again, he can look beyond the world, over the narrow verge of time, to a vast eternity, and can say, That eternity is mine. But more, this disciple of the Lord Jesus can bid you look around, and asking you to behold the finger-marks of him who created all things, he can add, with joy unspeakable, that God, who made all those things, is mine. And when your property is burnt up in one vast conflagation, his shall endure for ever, and be enjoyed in blissful immortality."

A RIDDLE FOR CHILDREN.

"There is a father with twice six sons; these sons have each thirty daughters, who are parti-colored, having one cheek white—the other black. They never see each others' faces, nor live above twenty-four hours."

"A very strange and unsociable family!" observed Louisa.

"I should never guess it," said George, "if I were to dedicate a year to it."

"You have, nevertheless, my boy, just pronounced the name of the said father, and that, too, after a single moment's consideration."

"The name of the father!—how?—where?"

"It is a YEAR!"

"A year!" exclaimed the astonished boy.

"A year!" echoed Louisa; "to be sure it is; I now see it clearly. His 'twice six sons,' are the twelve months; the 'thirty daughters,' the days of each month; and since one day must pass away before the next can arrive, they may be truly said never to see each others' faces."

"Admirably expounded!" said her mother.

"And each day," added George, "is certainly 'parti-colored,' as it is made up of light and darkness." [Philosophical Amusements.

Exclusive Children's Books.—There is, even in these days, a section of works, the guiding principle of which is not so much what they shall put into the mind as what they shall keep out, and where the anxiety to exclude all that may be pernicious has also sacrificed all that is nourishing. There are some writers by whom their young readers are treated rather as languid, listless invalids, than as healthy, hungry boys and girls—who know no difference between ardent spirits and barley-water—and, for fear of rejection or intoxication, put their readers on a diet on which they may exist, but can never thrive. Nothing truly has surprised us more in our tour through little libraries, than to see the wishy-washy materials of which not a few are composed—the scanty allowance of ideas with which a narrative is held together, and the mere prate with which the intervals are filled up. There are some children, doubtless, who relish this barren fare, as there are plenty of old ones who devour the most vapid novels; and both cases are alike pitiable. We have known a boy of fifteen, whose energies were so sapped as not to be at the trouble of finishing King Lear, and a girl of about the same age, whose tastes were so rarified that she stuck fast in the Heart of Mid-Lothian. [London Quarterly Review.

Are the Young Men Engaged?—The young men in our churches. This is a question replete with interest and involving principles [illegible] to the prosperity and glory of the church. The young men, those who are strong and active, those who have lately entered the church—give them something to do. They are desirous to labor for Christ, but in too many instances their modesty hinders them from intruding their services, and they consider that the work belonging to the church, should be done by the older members, and they keep in retirement.

But bring them out, employ their talents, give them an opportunity to exercise their gifts in prayer, in exhortation, or in the conference meetings. Let them go into the Sabbath school, the Bible class, or assign to them some position in the church. [Record.

A Dying Thought of Sheldon.—John Sheldon, distinguished for his eminent learning, a few hours before his death, sent for Archbishop Usher and Dr. Langblain, and, among other things, told them that he had surveyed most of the learning of this world—that his study was filled with books and manuscripts, yet he could not recollect any passage out of the infinite volumes that he could think of, with half the satisfaction which attended his contemplation of the sacred Scriptures. He pointed out the particular text that greatly comforted and refreshed his spirits: "The grace of God, which bringeth salvation, hath appeared to all men, teaching us that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world; looking for that blessed hope, even the glorious appearing of the great God, our blessed Savior, Christ Jesus."

Biblical Pronouns.—Luther pronounced pronouns to be the sweetest and most consolatory expressions to be found in the word of God. What, in fact, more tenderly elevating than where the prophet Isaiah heralds peace and refreshing to the people of Israel? "Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, saith your God." No longer the "Lord God, the Lord strong and mighty," but "your God," and "my people." And how marked the difference between saying, "The Lord is a shepherd," and "The Lord is my shepherd;" between the heathen, who acknowledges God as the Father of all things, and the ransomed of his well-beloved, who behold in the Lord "our Father which is in heaven;" between "the Lord will hear me when I call upon him," and "Lo I am with you always even unto the end of the world!"

The Rev. Jacob Samuel, a converted Jew, describes, in his work entitled "Remnant Found," a remnant of Israel dwelling in Daghistan, among the Lesghy tribes; which latter are a fierce and indomitable race of mountaineers, the terror of the country round about, whom neither Turks, Persians, nor Russians, have been able to subdue. They are bigoted Moslems in religion, yet declare themselves to be of the tribe of Dan, and they allow the Israelites in question to live peaceably among them. They destroy the mounted Cossack by striking the heels of his horse, thus fulfilling the prophetic description of Jacob—"Dan shall be a serpent in the way, an adder in the path, that biteth the horses' heels, so that his rider shall fall backward." So hopeless is warfare against them considered, that the following proverb is current in Persia—"If any king of Persia is a fool, let him march against the Lesghes."

NEW YORK, FEB. 27, 1845.

REVIVALS OF RELIGION.

After a long season of almost unprecedented religious declension, the hearts of Christians are again cheered by frequent notices that the Lord is reviving his work. This good news is not confined to place or people, but comes from various and widely-separated sections of the country, and from nearly every denomination of Christians. There is one feature of the present movement which seems to us particularly encouraging, and that is, that the increased religious interest has been awakened and continued in most cases by the use of the ordinary means of grace. The preaching of the word by the stated ministry, the maintenance of prayer and conference meetings among the members of the churches, the faithful discharge of Christian duty by private individuals in visiting from house to house; these are the means under God by which such happy results have been produced—results which we are encouraged to hope, from the simplicity of the means used, will prove as lasting as they are happy.

It is hardly possible for a candid observer to look into the history of revivals in past years, without finding there occasions of pain as well as pleasure. In many instances they have sprung from meetings commenced under the influence of denominational pride, carried on in such a way as to make the greatest show, and concluded by trumpeting abroad the grand result. A single individual, invited to come from a distance into a community of total strangers, has often been relied upon to do all the preaching. His discourses have frequently been made up of a certain set of appeals to Christians, another set of appeals to the impenitent, and a conclusion of warnings both to the thoughtful and to the incorrigible. In this way an excitement has been produced, and a great change wrought in the community for the time being. Yet it is to be feared that this change has too frequently been but transient, and followed by a re-action which has brought things into a state equally as bad as they were before.

Without stopping to inquire how much positive good may have resulted from such efforts as have just been referred to, there are some evils to which they have led which ought to be borne in mind and guarded against. They have in some instances created an impression that the church is to look mainly to such seasons for its accessions—an impression which has encouraged indolence, unfaithfulness, and even total neglect of religious duties. In other instances, they have created such an appetite for preaching of an unnaturally exciting character, as to make the ordinary and systematic, though faithful, preaching of the Gospel appear stale and insipid. In other cases still, they have led men, under the influence of high excitement to take positions for which they are wholly unprepared, and to make professions and vows which they have never honored or fulfilled. The natural consequence is, instability of Christian character, and a total loss of Christian influence. Multiplied are the illustrations of this evil, and great are the obstacles which it throws in the way of the progress of religion. A single one of these unstable disciples—a person who is borne away by his over-heated zeal the moment a little special interest appears, and is again completely chilled as soon as it somewhat subsides—often does more to counteract the influence of good men, than can be done by the most violent opposition of the worst enemies of religion. Nor does the evil end here. The church is often brought into trouble, and compelled in self-defence to administer the most severe and painful discipline before the evil can be checked or eradicated

We do not refer to these evils for the purpose of discountenancing altogether such special efforts as they grow out of. Far be it from us. We believe these efforts have resulted in great good. At the same time, we are confident that they might be so conducted as to secure the good without the evil, and thus made a far greater blessing to the church than they are at present. The movement to which we have referred as now going on, seems to us a healthy one, free from many of the objections which exist against those which have preceeded it, and destined in the end to produce a great change in the mode of conducting the aggressive work of the church.

The Moravians.—That was an ennobling as well as pious doctrine of the Moravians, that Christians should not lay up for themselves treasures upon earth. It led them practically to consecrate what they had to the service of the Lord, and to refuse fellowship to those who were not willing to give up all for Christ. Now witness the result. In 1741, when they numbered only six hundred, they commenced their mission to Greenland; and within ten years from that date they had missionaries among the Indians of North America and the slaves of South America, in St. Croix, Lapland, Tartary, Algiers, Guinea, Ceylon, and the Cape of Good Hope. These missions have been increased in number and greatly blessed. They afford a happy illustration of the power of united and energetic action.

Religion in the Eastern Church.—The Missionary Herald for February contains a letter from a missionary at Constantinople, giving an account of the growing interest every where felt for religious instruction, and of the untiring efforts on the part of the Greek Patriarch, as well as the Romanists, to prevent the reading of the Bible. The Greek Patriarch has addressed a document to his bishops, commanding them to watch and "take good heed that this Old Testament, recently published, be neither bought, nor sold, nor read, in their diocese, nor any kind of anti-religious, anti-government book." The Vicar Apostolic of the Papists has also published an address to his flock in French, urging them to aid the Lyons Propagation Society in special efforts to gather into the bosom of the papal church all the eastern heretics, such as the Greeks, Armenians, Jacobites, and Nestorians. This address has produced considerable dissatisfaction among some who think it adapted to excite religious animosities.

REAPING IN DUE SEASON.

The history of missions presents many encouraging instances of the fulfillment of that promise, "In due season we shall reap if we faint not." At Otaheite the missionaries labored nearly twenty years without meeting with the least success, until the very naming of the place became painful to the friends of Christian missions. But their perseverance was at length crowned with a rich reward. In Bengal, Dr. Thomas labored from 1783 to 1800, a period of seventeen years, before the first convert was baptized. Yet this was the beginning of good things to that mission. The Baptist mission in Burmah was commenced in 1813, and it was not until about six years afterward that the first convert was baptized. In four years more some twenty had been baptized. Then came the terrible Burman war, which suspended all missionary labor for a time. At length, however, the clouds passed away, the whole Bible was translated into the Burman language, the field of labor was enlarged, a spirit of inquiry was awakened, and converts were numbered by hundreds. The last news from that mission was, that during the first half of the year 1844, a single missionary, with his native pastors, had baptized nearly two thousand persons, while the field was widening, and the call for laborers increasing. If such facts are insufficient to lead us to confide in the divine promises, we know not what could suffice. That is no forlorn hope which he cherishes, who relies for ultimate success upon the promises of an almighty and faithful God.

ANTI-MISSION BAPTISTS.

A Virginia correspondent of the Baptist Record gives some account of a class of Baptists variously known as "Anti-Nomians," "Iron-Jackets," and "Hard-Shells." They are distinguished for their violent opposition to all benevolent organizations for the purpose of disseminating the Gospel, and for their tenacity about the doctrine of personal election. Missionary, tract, and all similar societies, they regard as modern inventions, which they are called on to discountenance by refusing to fellowship those who engage in them. There are whole counties in Virginia in which there are no other Baptists. They have 108 churches, 12 associations, 48 ministers, and 6854 members. But few additions are made to their churches, while their numbers are diminishing from deaths and from members joining other societies. Both ministers and people are spoken of as extremely ignorant. They do not hesitate to assert that any man, converted or unconverted, may become a member of the churches which favor missions, by paying a certain sum of money. Hence they warn their people to beware of such churches as no better than an assembly of horse-thieves and robbers.

MISSION TO FUGITIVE SLAVES IN CANADA.

We do not know of a more interesting field for missionary labor than is found among the self-emancipated slaves in Canada. Their necessities are pressing, their claims upon Christians are undoubted, and the encouragements to labor among them are many. Ever since Mr. Wilson went among them, with the self-denial and simplicity of apostolic times, the field has been enlarging and whitening for the harvest. The following statement of the condition of the colony, and the efforts now making on its behalf, will be new to some and interesting to all. It was given by Mr. Hanson, a colored agent of the colony, and published in the Congregational Journal:—

"The colony at present consists of more than 15,000 persons, and is rapidly increasing. All made their escape from different slave-holding States at different periods and by different processes; some have resided there about 15 years, but the majority for a shorter period. They are not compactly located, but scattered over a territory a hundred miles in length by sixty in breadth; the Southern point is about 10 miles above Detroit, Michigan, on the Eastern side of the river. The land is extremely fertile, producing wheat, corn, oats, rye and tobacco, which find a ready market in Detroit and the neighboring towns and settlements. Most of the colonists own tracts of 10, 15, and 20 acres, mostly under cultivation, whilst others, more enterprising or older residents, are large and prosperous farmers. Ardent spirits are nearly abandoned, not one in a hundred making use of them.

"Though the colonists are scattered over so large a territory, the greater part are located in villages and neighborhoods, so that considerable congregations can be gathered. A white population is mingled with them, consisting of French, Irish and English, the greater part of whom are as ignorant as the runaway slaves. Of three hundred negroes collected at a religious meeting, not one could read; neither could he himself, though a Methodist preacher, till he was instructed by his little boy. An attempt is now making to erect a seminary, at the cost of $2,000, in which 200 negro children and youth may be instructed at a time. Rev. Mr. Wilson, a Congregationalist minister, has for several years devoted himself to the services of the colony, and is a sort of superintendent of all their interests. A committee of respectable and pious men in New York, examine all accounts, and published an acknowledgment of receipts. As the colony are mostly Methodists, we wonder the denomination makes no provision for their spiritual and educational necessities."

Of the 82,500 Baptists in Virginia, more than 10,000 were baptized during the past year.

For the Sabbath Recorder.

CONCERNING MR. MAGRUDER'S LETTER.

"Happy is he that condemneth not himself in that thing which he alloweth."

The sentiment of the quotation above was brought to my mind on reading the letter of Mr. Allan B. Magruder, which appeared in No. 34 of the Sabbath Recorder. It is truly wonderful, that amid the multiplied shapes and shades in which opposition to the law of the Sabbath appears, it should invariably carry with it demonstrations of its own impracticability. Why is it that Mr. M., after refusing to admit the obligation in this dispensation to keep any day whatever as the Sabbath day, should instantly feel the necessity of saying, "I believe heartily in the consecration of Sunday or the Lord's day ?" Is it not because the sentiment contained in his words is impracticable ? Is it not because the duties we owe to God and our fellow men necessitate us to honor and keep the Sabbath ? What though Mr. M. does add, in immediate connection with the above declaration, the words, "Not however as a Sabbath day, in any sense of the word." Yet since he does afterwards allow abstinence from labor on Sunday to be necessary to a proper attention to the duties of the day, he does so, in spite of himself, hold to and teach the duty of keeping the day as a Sabbath, though not the Sabbath of the law of God.

Mr. M. will have it, that in keeping the seventh day as the Sabbath, we set at defiance the authority of the Apostle. Now, if this view of the Apostle's doctrine be correct, does not Mr. M. set his authority at defiance by keeping, as he says, "holy the Lord's day, (Sunday) ?" Will not this view of Paul's language forbid keeping the Sunday or any other day ? For the Apostle says to his brethren, Gal. 4: 10, 11, "Ye observe days, and months, and times, and years; I am afraid of you." But this view of the subject is dubious. For how does Mr. M. make it appear that Paul expressly prohibits the observance of the Sabbath in Colossians 2: 16 ? Paul does there say, "Let no man judge you." But he does not say, "You must not observe those things." Nor does he necessarily speak of the Sabbath at all, for he uses the plural, Sabbaths, which is not the form in which he commonly alludes to the Sabbath. It is probable, therefore, that he has reference to such Sabbaths as the Pentecost, the day of atonement, &c. See Lev. 23d ch.

Says Mr. M., "Now I hold that it is right, in imitation of the example of the Apostles and primitive disciples, to keep holy the Lord's day, (Sunday,) in honor of Christ's resurrection." In support of this opinion, he refers to the first church at Jerusalem, (which of course was 'zealous of the law,') to Acts 2: 42d and 47th verses; also to Acts 20: 7; 1 Cor. 16: 1, 2. Now take notice, Mr. M. rests his case totally on the strength of example, openly allowing that there is no command to support it. Let us look at the example. How does it meet the necessities of Mr. M.'s case ? It is important for him, first, that the acts cited should be known to have been performed on the first day; and secondly, that they were done to 'honor' the 'resurrection' of Christ. Without stopping to dispute as to the time when these events happened, I will ask Mr. M. how he knows that the Apostles and primitive disciples kept Sunday holy in 'honor' of Christ's 'resurrection ?' It is not expressed in any of the passages he has quoted. It must be then implied, or there is no such 'example' in these texts as he has named. I know not in what he will say the 'example' is implied most clearly; but from the way in which he speaks of breaking bread, it appears to me he looks upon that as the most expressive circumstance. But the breaking of bread, as at the Lord's Supper, is done in honor of the death, and not the resurrection of Christ. As to the other circumstances in connection, such as preaching, praying, immersing, contributing for the relief of the poor saints at Jerusalem, they have nothing in them, as I can see, exemplifying any design to 'honor' the resurrection any more than any other branch of our Savior's wondrous mission. All arguments to show that we ought to imitate the Apostles and primitive disciples, to the effect urged by Mr. M., must be useless until the 'example' be first made to appear; and when that is done, a reference to municipal regulations, (so far as Christians are concerned at least,) will not add much to the weight of the argument.

As to the distinction between moral and ceremonial law being a scholastic and not a Scriptural discrimination, I agree that such is the fact, but in respect to words merely; they are not found in the Bible. But the thing intended in the use of these words is a Scriptural fact, and not a scholastic discrimination. For, He who was greater than Abraham or Moses, taught, that "On these two commandments hang ALL the law and the prophets," viz. to "love the Lord with all the heart, and our neighbor as ourself." The doctrine of Christ here is, I think, that the law and the prophets contained these principles, and as a whole grew out of and were designed to effect conformity to the same; as all the institutions or commands of God must be, whether perpetual or temporary in their nature. "Now," (while this eternal duty of love is by Christ put as the only support and source of the law,) "it seems to me almost unaccountable" that Mr. M. should contend that the law of Moses, no part of it, "is now in force." And he adds to all this, the superlatively unhappy argument, "Jesus came not to destroy but to fulfil it," (the law.) I call it an unhappy argument, because if Christ designed to fulfil the law, as Mr. M. holds that he did, then did he deny his design by an artful distinction where no difference existed. For such a fulfillment of the law, and that indiscriminately, is to all intents and purposes its destruction—the very thing Christ supposes them to presume against him when he makes the assertion that he came not to destroy the law. I think a better way to understand this matter is, that Christ fulfilled the law in the same sense as he fulfilled "all righteousness" in being baptized; that is, met and obeyed the requirements of both. But we are not, therefore, absolved from the duty to fulfil all righteousness or to be baptized; why then so entirely from obedience to all the law ? But since the law embraces the two commandments above named, or what is the same in substance, of course it enforces principles which are unalterable and cannot cease to bind. Yet there being many requirements in the Bible, included in the general use of the word law, which refer to certain performances that point to some coming event as a means of inspiring faith in the promises of God made by the prophets, and so for the time being promoting the love which is the fulfiling of the law—I say, there being such laws in the Bible, it is easy to see, that these laws may cease to be required, or even to be allowed to remain in force, whenever the things signified by obedience thereto have actually come to pass. This difference in the requirements found in the Bible has led to the use of the word moral as a name for the former sort of law, and the word ceremonial as a name for the latter. But if these words are objected to, we will lay them aside; and then our proposition is simply, that the former sort of law cannot be abrogated at all, but that the latter is abrogated just and only so soon as its objects are brought in. If, therefore, the Sabbath is allowed to belong to or form a part of the former sort of law, then of course it is still in force. But should this not be admitted, and should it be urged, that this law of the Sabbath belongs to the latter sort of law, the position we shall then take is that the objects to which this law points, never have been and never can be so fulfiled in this world as to destroy its binding power.

Mr. M. says, "There is no doubt in my mind that the Sabbath was exclusively a Jewish law, and is now no more binding on Gentile Christians than Circumcision, the Passover," &c. But permit me to observe, that this distinction between Jewish and Gentile law, is a scholastic, and not a scriptural discrimination. But the worst of it all is, that Mr. M. in this, (no doubt unintentionally,) contradicts Christ, who said, "The Sabbath was made for MAN." The Apostles in council decided that circumcision should not be required of the Gentiles; but there is nothing of this sort in regard to the Sabbath. Yet if it can indeed be shown, that God in his wisdom has seen fit that we should have no Sabbath, for one I wish to know and reduce that truth to practice, (though I confess I cannot see the wisdom of such an arrangement;) for it must be, if God has so fixed it, that it is best that we submit to it. And I beg of those whose views will justify them in so doing, that they will not flinch to let their fellow men and fellow Christians know by practical illustrations, that they are free from the obligation to keep "any day whatever as a Sabbath day," or day of rest. For it is odious in the eyes of men, that Christians should teach among themselves, that there is no obligation to keep a Sabbath, while their words and actions at large go to fasten guilt upon those who presume to work on Sunday. Let us not try to mend God's plan by adroitly slipping into it a Sabbath by another name, while we believe God did not mean to have any in his plan. Let us, at least, give God's plan a full and fair trial before we venture to think it defective. For this clinging to a weekly rest—this inability to carry out the no-Sabbath doctrine, though long cherished by many, arises either from custom, or the necessities of the case, or from what we are taught in the word of God. Now if it is enjoined by custom only, let us say so, and act accordingly, and not be ashamed.

LUCIUS CRANDALL.

A Question for Casuists.—In the American Bible Society's Record of Correspondence is published a letter from a gentleman in a Papal country, stating that Spanish Testaments had been sent him for sale. Upon their arrival, the authorities refused to allow them to pass through the Custom House, because the law did not authorize the importation of that translation. Hereupon, as the writer of the letter says, "rather than lose the good I had anticipated from the sowing of this precious seed, I determined to introduce the work surreptitiously, which I have done, though at a great expense, and have had the pleasure of distributing and selling nearly all of them."

A writer in an Episcopal paper, in review of these facts, asks the following questions:—"Did these New Testaments contain the passage, 'Whosoever therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God, and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation'? What! smuggle Bibles, and then boast of it, and send the proceeds of the sales of such Bibles to the treasury of the American Bible Society! 'Tell it not in Gath.'"

Here is a question indeed for casuists. We commend it to the consideration of those men in this Protestant country, who are invoking legislative help to sanctify the first day of the week out of a professed regard to that Bible which says, "Six days shalt thou labor; but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God; in it thou shalt not do any work."

The Sailors.—A plan is on foot in Boston for establishing a Mariner's Home at an expense of $20,000. It is received with decided favor by merchants and others. Abbott Lawrence offers to become responsible for one-twentieth of the sum.

Discussion of Slavery in Kentucky.—There is an evident disposition in Kentucky, though a slaveholding State, thoroughly to discuss the subject of Slavery. Cassius M. Clay, who has recently emancipated his slaves, is about to commence a paper at Lexington to be called the True American, and to be devoted to the advocacy of a gradual and constitutional abolition of slavery in the State. General Metcalf, a distinguished citizen, has just come out with a long letter opposing any scheme of emancipation, and assuming the ground that Kentucky will never emancipate her slaves, if at all, except upon the condition of their immediate departure or banishment from the State. The editor of the Frankfort Commonwealth, (the paper in which Gen. Metcalf's letter first appeared,) says, "The indications are manifest that the friends and opponents of gradual prospective emancipation, desire to discuss the merits of the subject before the country through the press. We know no good reason why the discussion should not proceed. There are many good, honest, conscientious, and patriotic citizens on both sides of the question."

Eugenio Kincaid.—This indefatigable missionary of the Baptist Church is now on a tour through the western and south-western States, for the purpose of awakening interest in the missionary work. In a letter published in the Baptist Record, he speaks of the want of systematic contributions as one of the greatest obstacles to be encountered. Where no system is adopted, nothing is done. Indiana, with 30,000 Baptists, does not raise $300 a year for evangelizing the heathen world. Kentucky, with 70,000, does not furnish the Board $500. Mr. Kincaid thinks, however, that the condition of things in this respect is improving, and that the churches will yet come up to the work.

Sailing of Missionaries.—Rev. Joel S. Everett, of Halifax, Vt., Mrs. Everett, of Southbridge, Mass., and Miss H. M. Lovell, of Palmyra, N. Y., were to sail from Boston for Smyrna on Tuesday last—Mr. and Mrs. Everett to labor as missionaries among the Armenians in Smyrna and vicinity, and Miss Lovell to take charge of a Seminary at Constantinople for the education of Armenian females.

Rev. Daniel H. Gillette, pastor of a Baptist church in Mobile, Ala., died in that city on the evening of the 9th inst. He was a graduate of Hamilton Literary and Theological Institution, and had preached for some time in Rahway, N. J., and in Charlottesville, Va. He took up his residence in Mobile for the double purpose of benefiting his health, and being useful in the ministry.

Church at Adams.—We are glad to learn from the Luminary, that Rev. Giles M. Langworthy has assumed the pastoral charge of the Seventh-day Baptist Church at Adams Center, Jefferson Co., N. Y., and is to enter upon his labors immediately. Considerable religious interest has existed there for a time past, and several persons have been hopefully converted. May this prove but the beginning of good things to that people.

"Biographical."—Inquiries have been made for the remainder of that series of Biographical Articles which was commenced in the Recorder. We have only to say, that their preparation and publication has been delayed by other and more pressing engagements. The materials are on hand, and shall be put into a readable shape as soon as time can be found to do it.

Enlargement.—We are anxious to enlarge the Recorder at the commencement of the next volume, so as to make it a more complete chronicle of passing events in the religious and political world. The earnest co-operation of our friends, such as we have had for a time past, will ensure this desirable result. The question is to be decided in a few weeks. Meanwhile we hope that those who wish for an enlargement will spare no efforts to secure it by increasing our subscription list.

Matters at Washington.—The session of Congress is rapidly drawing to a close, and several of the most important questions still remain unsettled. The Oregon Bill, it is thought, will not be disposed of. The Postage Bill is said to be in great danger. The vote upon the question of annexing Texas will probably be taken during the present week, and there is some reason to fear that the annexationists will carry their point. Mr. Polk, the President elect, is now at Washington. Speculation is active as to who will compose his Cabinet. Probably nothing definite will be known until the 4th of March—at any rate, not until the Texas question is decided.

Later.—On Monday the House of Representatives was occupied with the Postage Reform Bill. It was at length decided, that the debate should close at the expiration of two hours. Probably the bill passed to a third reading on Tuesday—possibly clear through. Its prospects were thought to be brightening.

The Northern Luminary is the title of a semi-monthly quarto paper, proposed to be issued from Watertown, N. Y., by Rev. Joel Greene, "devoted to Evangelical Christianity, Voluntary Associations, and General Miscellany." The first number is before us; the second is to appear when sufficient subscribers have been received to warrant it. Terms—$1 per year, of 24 numbers, invariably in advance.

Smith's Weekly Volume is the name of a new paper issued from Philadelphia, designed to furnish in a cheap form many of the modern books of travel, biographies, etc. It is conducted by the original editor of Waldie's Library. Mr. William Freeman, at French's Hotel, Fulton Street, is agent for New York.

General Intelligence.

CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

[Compiled for the Recorder.]

Monday, Feb. 17.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.—A bill to restrict and grant pensions in certain cases was passed. The bill to regulate the pay of the army came upon which Mr. Adams made some remarks, and took occasion to advert to the questions about Oregon, Texas, and slavery, in connection with the subject. Mr. Raynor also spoke upon the subject, setting forth that if Texas should be annexed we should want all our army to meet the war which would follow. The bill was passed and the House adjourned.

In SENATE, several petitions were presented against the annexation of Texas and in favor of the annexation of Canada. Several reports from committees were likewise presented. The Texas debate was then resumed. Mr. Woodbury of N. H. spoke for two hours in favor of annexation. Mr. Choate next obtained the floor, soon after which the Senate adjourned.

Tuesday, Feb. 18.

In the HOUSE, a bill proposing $20,000 for furnishing the President's House, and $8,000 for repairs, was discussed for a long time and lost. The civil and diplomatic appropriation bill was under discussion till adjournment.

The SENATE chamber was crowded at an early hour to hear Mr. Choate on the subject of Texas. The probability that this would be his last speech in the Senate gave unusual interest to it. The speech was two hours and a half long, and is spoken of as a very successful effort of the eloquent Senator.

Wednesday, Feb. 19.

The HOUSE had again under consideration the appropriation for furnishing the Presidential mansion, which was again rejected. The House was engaged till a late hour on the general appropriation bill.

SENATE.—Mr. Choate presented a memorial praying that Canada may be annexed to the U. S. whenever Texas is admitted into the Union. Mr. Dickinson presented resolutions of N. Y. Legislature in favor of the bill for reducing postage. Mr. Henderson made a speech in favor of the constitutional right of admitting new States into the confederacy.

Thursday, Feb. 20.

The HOUSE, in committee of the whole, discussed the general appropriation bill, and ordered that propositions for amendment should cease to-morrow. Several amendments were proposed, after which the subject was laid aside to hear a Message from the President, transmitting despatches from Mr. Wise our minister at the court of Brazil, upon the slave trade.

The SENATE listened to a speech by Mr. Colquitt of Georgia in favor of annexation, and another by Mr. Simmons of R. I. in opposition to it.

Friday, Feb. 21.

HOUSE.—Several bills from the Senate were read twice and referred. A bill was passed granting to a railroad company the right of a way through public lands in Alabama. The general appropriation bill was discussed. Several amendments were adopted—one appropriating $72,000 for outfit of Foreign Ministers, and another appropriating $9,000 for salary for a Minister Plenipotentiary to China. Several amendments were rejected—one for paying Mr. A. H. Everett $10,000 for expenses while Minister to Spain, and another for paying $1069 to B. E. Green for expenses while Charge at Mexico. The bill was then reported to the House, which soon after adjourned.

In the SENATE, a communication was made from the treasury department relative to some chemical experiments in sugar. A resolution was passed making the Texas question the order of day at 12 o'clock until disposed of. The bill of appropriations for several pensions was passed. A bill was introduced for the relief of the Washington Corporation. The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the Texas resolutions. Mr. Simmons of R. I. finished a speech begun the day before. Mr. Merrick of Md. took the floor in favor of annexation. Mr. Huntington of Conn. replied in a speech of two hours long, which was cut short by a motion to adjourn.

Sabbath, Feb. 22.

In the HOUSE, the general appropriation bill was taken up, and those items to which no objections had been raised were concurred in. Among the amendments passed was one appropriating $6000 for repairing and painting the presidential mansion, and $14,000 for furnishing the same with furniture of American manufacture; another appropriating $8000 for defraying the expenses of the magnetic telegraph between Washington and Baltimore. The bill as amended was concurred in, and the House adjourned.

In the SENATE, Mr. Huntington concluded his speech against annexation; Mr. Ashley of Arkansas followed him in favor of the measure; Mr. Dickinson of New York also spoke in favor of annexation. A proposition was made to close the debate on Wednesday next, which was left unsettled when the Senate adjourned.

SLAVE TRADE.—The following is an extract from the message of the President in relation to the slave trade in Brazil:—

"There are many circumstances to warrant the belief that some of our citizens are deeply involved in its guilt (slave traffic.) The mode and manner of carrying on this trade are clearly and fearlessly set forth in the accompanying documents; and it would seem that a regular system had been adopted for the purpose of thwarting the policy and evading the penalties of our laws. American vessels, with the knowledge, as there are good reasons to believe, of the owners and masters, are chartered or rather purchased by notorious slave dealers in Brazil, aided by English brokers and capitalists, with this intent. The vessel is only nominally chartered at so much per month, while, in truth, it is actually sold, to be delivered on the coast of Africa, the charter party binding the owners, in the mean time, to take on board, as passengers, a new crew in Brazil, who, when delivered on the coast, are to navigate her back to the ports of Brazil with her cargo of slaves. Under this agreement, the vessel clears from the United States for some port in Great Britain, where a cargo of merchandise, known as 'coast goods' and designed especially for the African trade, is purchased, shipped, and consigned, together with the vessel, either to the slave-dealer himself or to his agents or accomplices in Brazil. On her arrival a crew is put on board as passengers, and the vessel and cargo consigned to an equally guilty factor or agent on the coast of Africa, where the unlawful purpose originally designed is finally consummated. The merchandise exchanged for slaves—the vessel is delivered up—her name obliterated, her papers destroyed, her American crew discharged, to be provided for by the charterers, and the new or passenger crew put in command to carry back its miserable freight to the contrivers of the voyage, or their employees in Brazil. During the whole progress of this tortuous enterprise, it is possible that neither the American crew originally enlisted, nor the passenger crew put on board in the Brazilian ports, are aware of the nature of the voyage, and yet it is on these principally, ignorant, if not innocent, that the penalities of the law are inflicted; while the guilty contrivers, the charterers, brokers, owners and masters—in short all who are most deeply concerned in the crime and its rewards, for the most part escape unpunished."

FOREIGN NEWS.

The steamship Hibernia, brought Liverpool papers to the 4th inst., from which the following summary is made:—

The Cotton market, says the European Times, is tolerably brisk.

Another result of the operation of the new tariff has been seen, the last few days, in the importation of Hops from the United States. The samples have been pronounced, by competent judges, as quite equal in flavor and quality to any produced in the country.

There is no intelligence of the missing ships, England and United States.

Mr. Everett, the American Minister, entertained Sir. R. Peel and a distinguished party at dinner on the 21st ult. at his mansion in Grosvenor Place.

Feb. 1.—The American Minister, and Mrs. and Miss Everett, arrived at Windsor Castle, on a visit to the Queen.

The Queen and Prince Albert have been paying royal visits—one of state to the Duke of Buckingham at Stowe, and one of more private and friendly kind to the Duke of Wellington.

Sir Charles Metcalf was recently raised to the dignity of a 'Baron of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland,' under the title of Baron Metcalf of Fernhill.

Parliament was to open on the 4th, and had the packet waited a few hours longer, it would have taken out the Queen's speech. The general impression is, that Ireland will be alluded to in soothing terms, and that another modification of the sugar duties will be announced.

There was a violent storm at Liverpool on the 1st and 2d inst. It caused much destruction to the shipping on the West coast of England. Many vessels were driven ashore and lost. Among them was the ship W. Pitt, which lost ten of her crew, drowned.

THE CHURCH.—The difficulties in the established church seem likely to be arranged by the introduction of some measure, in Parliament, which shall bring matters to a final settlement. The Archbishop of Canterbury has issued an address, in which he recommends the clergy to abstain from any further attempt to introduce changes into the church service, unless they are acceptable to the laity, and to let the controversy lie over under the prospect to which we have alluded. Under these circumstances the Bishop of Exeter withdraws from the contest with the laity of his diocese, and has declared that he thankfully accepts the prospect of an adjustment of their present diversities by some general measures which shall have the sanction of the whole Church.

The city of London mercantile committee on postage have presented Mr. Rowland Hill with a cheque for £10,000, with an intimation that they reserve, till some future opportunity, the pleasure of making a more public presentation of the fruits of their labors on his behalf.

IRELAND.—The repeal question in Ireland has been thrown into the shade by an agitation of a very different and unexpected character. The bequest act has created a difference in opinion not only among the Catholic laity but among the higher orders of the clergy. The excitement occasioned by this measure had in no degree subsided, when it was rumored that the Government had opened a negotiation with the Pope for the purpose of connecting the Irish Catholic Church with the State, either by making a provision for the clergy, or by obtaining a concordat giving the Crown the nomination of the prelates.

This rumor apparently took all parties by surprise, but before there had been much time for the expression of public opinion on the subject, Archbishop Crolly, the Catholic Primate of Ireland, published a letter addressed to him by the Progaganda, at the command of the Pope, charging him to admonish all ecclesiastics, and especially those of Episcopal rank, to abstain from taking any part in political meetings or dinners, and "studiously avoid whatever may even lightly excite or agitate the flock committed to them."

O'Connell, at a meeting of the Repeal Association, admitted with expressions of regret, that there was some truth in the statement that the discussions produced by the bequests act, had tended to damp the agitation for the repeal. He proposed that Lord French and his son, Mr. John O'Connel, should be sent to Rome as delegates from the Association, in order to lay their case before the Pope, and implore his Holiness not to thwart them in their exertions to obtain a restoration of their domestic legislature. No Protestant speakers in the days of the "No Popery" agitation could have surpassed the leading Catholic members of the Association in the vehemence of their protestations against the Pope's right to interfere in the temporal affairs of the people of Ireland.

ARREST AND EXECUTION OF THE SPANISH INSURGENT CHIEF ZURBANO.—Letters from Bayonne of the 23d January confirm the news of the arrest of the unfortune Zurbano. It appears that the rumor of his escape into Portugal had been circulated by his friends with a view to lull the suspicions of the government, and enable him to avail himself of a favorable moment for making his escape. The opportunity having, as he fancied, arrived, he left his hiding place near Logrono, with his brother-in-law Cayo Muro, but was immediately tracked and seized. The Governor of Logrono forthwith placed the prisoners in Capelia, and in twenty-four hours from their capture caused them to be shot.

The seizure of Zurbano led to the summoning of a cabinet council, the result of which was the expedition of an order to suspend the execution of that unfortunate man—an order which arrived too late.

A Barcelona letter of the 18th states that a few days before a band of armed men, thirty in number, attacked a detachment of troops escorting a remittance of 10,000 piasters, (25,000f.) on its way from the company of salt works to Barcelona, and carried off the booty.

DISTURBED STATE OF SWITZERLAND.—The latest accounts from Switzerland reported that country to be in a state of increasing agitation. At Argovies they were making preparations to attack Lucerne. Attempts are making to induce other cantons to join some confederation which they call the "Popular Helvetique Association." The Council of Zurich has resolved by a majority of nine to four to send federal commissioners to Lucerne to insist upon the impropriety of their receiving Jesuits—to oppose the formation of the free corps, while at the same time interference in their affairs by other cantons would be promised to be put down by force if necessary.

ITALY.—Letters from Rome state that the Pope is in a most alarming state of health, and that the cardinals are on the qui vive for what may happen. His holiness is upwards of seventy-nine years of age.

AUSTRIA.—Most of the persons who had been found guilty of political conspiracy in Austrian Galicia, in 1840, have been pardoned by the Emperor of Austria. The punishment of those who were condemned to death has been commuted to imprisonment.

MOROCCO.—News from Morocco has been received by way of Gibraltar, giving a most deplorable account of the internal state of the empire. The Kabyles were pillaging the towns, whilst the Emperor is described as having lost authority since the battle of Isly.

ALGIERS.—The greatest tranquility reigns throughout Algeria. Such is the safety of the roads that the diligences are no longer protected by a military escort. Abd-el Kader has not moved a single step since the treaty of Tangier—his adherents have, in a great part, deserted him, and those who remain faithful are in such a deplorable condition that they live on the charity of the Angads and Beni-Seassens.

LATEST FROM TEXAS.—By the arrival of the steam ship John S. McKim at New Orleans on the 13th inst., we receive Galveston dates up to the 9th instant.

The news from the interior represents every thing as quiet. The Texan Congress adjourned on the 3d inst. Previous to the adjournment, the nominations of Gen. Terrell as Charge d'Affairs to England and France, and of Colonel Reily as Charge to the United States, were rejected by the Senate. It is said that the chief cause of opposition to those gentlemen was their hostility to Annexation.

Congress refused to receive the petition of a meeting of the citizens of Rush county against Annexation, from which it may be inferred how strongly the members yet are in favor of that measure.

Jose Antonio Navarre, the last of the Texan Santa Fe prisoners who recently escaped from Mexico, has been treated with marked honors and attention in Texas.

Nine Bremen vessels have arrived at Galveston since the 1st of November, with an average of one hundred and fifty passengers. It is computed that 1,500 German emigrants have arrived within three or four months.

FROM HAVANA.—By the arrival of the schr. Henry Jenkins at Savannah, we have Havana dates to the 7th inst.

The grinding of the Cane is general throughout the island, and we regret to say that the estimates of the crop, now resting on well-ascertained facts, are every day lower. It is feared that the exports this year will not exceed 600, or at most 650,000 boxes, against 850,000 last year.

Of Coffee the exports are 13,031 against 145,557 at the same time last year. The crop will barely yield a fourth or at most a third of the usual quantity. The stock at market is quite insignificant, not reaching 1,000 bags, and moves off chiefly in the direction of Spain."

WATER-SPOUTS.—A Bermuda paper of January 30, contains the following account of water-spouts:—

"On Sunday last, about 2 P. M. two large water-spouts formed at a short distance from the shore on the north side of these Islands; one of which passed in an easterly direction so close to the land that nearly the whole length of the column, from the cloud to the sea, was distinctly observed to revolve with rapidity in a direction contrary to that of the hands of a watch. The dense thunder cloud out of which these water-spouts formed is supposed to have been accompanied with heavy hail-stones. A water-spout, seen from the Signal Post at Mount Eangton, on the 15th August, 1839, revolved in the contrary manner. Their mode of revolution is doubtlessly regulated by some law of nature which we are as yet unable to explain; but we cannot suppose it is by mere chance that they sometimes revolve in one direction and sometimes in another. Science, we trust, will yet unravel the mystery."

DEATH BY JUMPING OR FALLING FROM A ROOF.—On Tuesday morning Feb. 18th, a young Spaniard, aged 24, a native of Havana, and student in the medical college in this city, whose name is Gonsalo Aldama, came to his death in a most singular and painful manner. He had been deranged for some two or three days, and this morning ascended the roof of his boarding house No. 59 Barclay street, through the scuttle, with only his pantaloons, shirt and stockings on; he went to the dormer window, laid down on the roof of it on his back, kicked up his heels, and getting to the edge, jumped off—a hight of 60 feet—and falling on the back of his head crushed it terribly, and almost instantly died. He was the son of a wealthy Spaniard, had an abundance of money, and no cause can be assigned for the fatal act.

The Courier des Etats Unis says of the young Spaniard, Aldama, who killed himself in Barclay street a few days ago, that he followed a course of dissipation, and squandered in one year some fifteen or twenty thousand dollars. His father at length sent him to New York, on an allowance of $100 a month. The ardor of his attachment for a young lady in Havana did not prevent him from keeping a mistress in New York, or from indulging in excesses which did him no good nor credit.

JOHN FITCH, THE STEAMBOAT MAN.—While John Fitch, celebrated in his connection with steamboat, was confined on Prison Island, he made himself a set of tools, without scarcely any means at his command. His tools were an axe, hand-saw, chisel, iron wood-wedge, shoemaker's hammer, fore-plane, auger, grindstone, jack-knife blade, and some old hoop iron. With these tools he constructed 9 wooden timepieces, 800 pair of brass sleeve-buttons, 80 pair of silver ones, repaired watches and engraved names. John Fitch was one of the most ingenious and contriving men who ever lived. [Tribune.

ANTI-RENT DISTURBANCES.—The subjoined extract from a letter received this morning, would seem to show that the spirit of open resistance to the laws, which has been so rife in Columbia, Rensselaer and Schoharie Counties within a few months past, is still wholly unsubdued in Delaware County.

Extracts from a letter dated at Delhi on the 16th instant, to a gentleman in this city.

"It may be safely affirmed that the Anti-Renters are insincere in their professions of submission to the Laws, and that they are determined to persist in their defiance of Law and order to the utmost extremity. No less than 400 persons, disguised as Indians, armed with muskets, rifles and pistols, were seen on the mountain to-day to attend a sale of property to collect a rent of Sixteen Dollars. The Sheriff immediately adjourned the sale.

"I am satisfied that the Sheriff acted discreetly in calling out the militia to prevent the rescuing of the Roxbury prisoner lately arrested, as it is understood that on the morning of the arrest, hundreds were collected at Middletown, and resolved to attack the jail on Friday night, in case the prisoner should not be bailed out. Threats have been heard to-day from a collection in a different quarter of further outrages."

FAIRBANK CONVICTED.—Fairbank, indicted for stealing slaves in connection with Delia Webster, was tried at Lexington, Ky. on the 13th inst. When arraigned, he plead not guilty to the several indictments found against him; but after the jury were empanelled and sworn, that plea was withdrawn, and the plea of guilty entered, by the desire of the prisoner, who threw himself entirely upon the mercy of the jury. Being allowed to make an address to the jury, he avowed himself an Abolitionist, but plead the force of education to palliate the enormity of his offence, which he declared was more plain to him on reflection, than heretofore. The jury sentenced him to five years' confinement in the Penitentiary on each of the three indictments, making fifteen years in all; but the judgment of the Court was reserved till the following day.

SUMMARY.

The number of passengers and their crews in the two missing packets, the England and the United States, was 164. In the cabin of the United States was a Rev. M. Tullock, who, it is understood, left Scotland in consequence of having forged a check for £125. The anxiety about the safety of the vessels has increased since the arrival of the steamer.

It is said that an electro-magnetic printing apparatus has been invented, by which the intelligence conveyed from one end of a telegraph to the other will be given in a clear printed form, making a great improvement in the machine.

The Territory of Wisconsin has an area equal to six of the large class of States in the Union. Some of the papers are urging emigrants to settle in northern Wisconsin, and erect a new Territory by the name of the Superior Territory.

A Magnetic Telegraph has been constructed in New York between the Express buildings and the Lyceum Buildings in Broadway.

A New York editor paid fifty cents last week for the postage on a letter containing a one dollar bill. Another paid fifty cents for a letter containing half a dollar.

The Bostonians have succeeded, on the eighth trial, in electing a Mayor. The American republican candidate, Mr. Davis, had a majority of 174 votes over all the other candidates.

The Pensacola Gazette says that on the 5th inst., Jonathan Walker, who is imprisoned in the jail of that place for negro stealing, attempted to escape, and so far succeeded as to get the jail door open.

The Hudson River is again open, and steamboats are plying between New York and Albany. Several new boats of the first class are to be placed upon the river early in the season.

There is considerable commotion again at Nauvoo, occasioned by the apprehension of an officer from Warsaw charged with being one of the murderers of the Smiths.

On Friday evening last, between 7 and 8 o'clock, a slight shock of an earthquake was felt on Staten Island. Many houses were shaken, but no material damage was done.

The body of a young lady, about 20 years of age, richly dressed, was taken from the water at Hoboken on Monday morning last.

The Governor of Connecticut has issued a proclamation recommending that the 21st day of March be observed as a day of humiliation, fasting and prayer, throughout that State.

Rev. Elisha Scott Williams, of Beverly, Mass., the oldest graduate of Yale College, departed this life on the 2d instant, aged 87 years. He was a Baptist clergyman, and was graduated in 1775.

Our own opinion is that a fashionable pew in a fashionable church, soft cushions of velvet and gold clasped prayer books, a good organist and choir, a fine coach and horses, with coachman and footman, make the path of religious duty somewhat smoother than John Bunyan has described it.

During the week ending February 15th, 107 individuals have been admitted into the Alms-House, Bellevue, 63 of whom were foreigners, and 44 Americans.

Mr. Blackford, before leaving New Grenada on his present visit home, succeeded, though without any instructions to that end, in forming a treaty with that Government, which places American products upon the same terms as British.

The bill for the repeal of the charter of Nauvoo has become a law.

By reason of the great number of new Railroads in progress, both in England and in this country, the cost of their construction is materially increased. The Iron manufacturers find it as much as they can do to keep up with the demand. On the arrival of the steamer Iron went up from 10 to 15 per cent.

The Washington Globe states that the council for Dorr will move for a hearing of his case at this term of the Court, if practicable, on the ground of its being a question affecting personal liberty.

Another case, Luther vs. Bordon, is also pending, brought up by writ of error from the U. S. Circuit Court of Rhode Island, upon an agreed statement between the parties, and which will test the validity of the Dorr Constitution.

The Supreme Court have granted the writ of error prayed for in the petition of Thomas W. Dorr. The Governor and Attorney General have been cited in behalf of the State to appear on the first Monday in December next, to hear the question argued. The effect of this will be merely to try the question whether the constitution and laws of the United States have been violated by the action of this State in the trial of Dorr for treason.

John Ross, principal chief of the Cherokees, Richard Taylor, John Looney, William S. Coody, Aron Price, Moses Daniel, T. Walker, and John Spears, have been appointed a delegation by the National Council of the Cherokee Indians, and directed to proceed to Washington without delay, with full powers to negotiate a Treaty that will embrace and settle all matters which are open between their people and the Government of the United States.

No less than 45,000 Valentines have gone through our Post Office this season, and more are coming.

The whole number of new buildings erected last year in Boston was 1625, excess over 1843, 507.

The steamboat Pathfinder was burnt on the 8th inst., between Grand Gulf and Rodney. She had on board 1481 bales of cotton, a part of which were tumbled overboard, and many passengers saved themselves on bales, planks, chairs, &c. There were seven lives lost of persons known to the officers, and doubtless many more who were not known to them.

SPOTS ON THE SUN.—By a communication in the Boston Daily Advertiser, we learn that there is a spot now visible on the disc of the Sun, which is more than ten thousand miles in diameter, and its area greater than that of the Pacific Ocean. It is nearly in the centre of the disc, and will occupy seven or eight days more in passing across to the western limits, where it will disappear. The theory most generally adopted be astronomers in regard to these spots is, that they are portions of the solid and opaque mass of the Sun, seen through openings in the luminous atmosphere or phosphorescent clouds with which that body is surrounded.

MARRIED,

In Hopkinton, R. I., on the 6th inst., by Rev. Christopher Chester, Mr. GEORGE D. CHESTER, of Hopkinton, to Miss CHARLOTTE S. VARS, of Westerly.

In Shiloh, N. J., on the 20th inst., by Eld. Solomon Carpenter, Mr. EBENEZER D. WOODRUFF, to Miss MARY JANE AYARS, all of Shiloh.

DIED

In Alfred, Allegany Co., N. Y., of croup, on the 24th of January, JOHN, aged 6 years, and on the 29th, ANN, aged 10 years, children of James and Martha Allen.

In Alfred, on the 13th of February, in a full hope of immortality, ELIZA, daughter of Widow Susan Langworthy, late of Hopkinton, R. I., aged 16 years.

In Providence, R. I., on the 16th inst., at the house of Charles Saunders, RHODA ANN, daughter of Russel and Lucy Bliven, in the 13th year of her age.

She fell a victim to consumption, to which she had evidently been inclining for some time, and for which there is reason to believe she was fully prepared. It was some three years ago that she made a profession of religion, since which time her life had been remarkably exemplary. Her natural endowments were of a high order, and had been so cultivated and exercised as to secure the strong attachment of her friends and associates. Her last hours were characterized by resignation and cheerfulness, and will be long remembered by those who were permitted to be with her and listen to her parting expressions of affection and interest.

She was buried at Hopkinton, R. I., where a funeral sermon was preached by Eld. Daniel Coon, followed by some remarks and a poetic tribute to the memory of the departed by Eld. Alfred B. Burdick.

THE TIMES, THE MANNERS, AND THE MEN.

BY JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

New times demand new measures and new men;
The world advances, and in time outgrows
The laws that in our fathers' day were best;
And, doubtless, after us, some purer scene
Will be shaped out by wiser men than we,
Made wiser by the steady growth of truth.
We cannot bring Utopia at once;
But better almost be at work in sin,
Than in a brute inaction browse and sleep.
No man is born into the world, whose work
Is not born with him; there is always work,
And tools to work withal, for those who will;
And blessed are the horny hands of toil!
The busy world shoves angrily aside
The man who stands with arms akimbo set,
Until occasion tells him what to do;
And he who waits to have his task marked out,
Shall die and leave his errand unfulfilled.
Our time is one that calls for earnest deeds.
Reason and Government, like two broad seas,
Yearn for each other, with outstretched arms
Across the narrow isthmus of the throne,
And roll their white surf higher every day.
The field lies wide before us, where to reap
The easy harvest of a deathless name,
Though with no better sickles than our swords.
My soul is not a palace of the past,
Where outworn creeds, like Rome's gray senate quake.
Hearing afar the Vandal's trumpet hoarse,
That shakes old systems with a thunder-fit.
The time is ripe, and rotten-ripe for change:
Then let it come. I have no dread of what
Is called for by the instinct of mankind.
Nor think I that God's world will fall apart
Because we tear a parchment more or less.
Truth is eternal, but her effluence,
With endless change, is fitted to the hour;
Her mirror is turned forward, to reflect
The promise of the future, not the past.
I do not fear to follow out the truth,
Albeit along the precipice's edge.
Let us speak plain: there is more force in names
Than most men dream of; and a lie may keep
Its throne a whole age longer, if it skulk
Behind the shield of some fair seeming name.
Let us call tyrants tyrants, and maintain
That only freedom comes by grace of God,
And all that comes not by His grace must fall;
For men in earnest have no time to waste
In patching fig-leaves for the naked truth.

VICES OF THE METROPOLIS.

LETTERS FROM AND ABOUT THE CITY.—No. VI.

My dear Eusebius,—We parted at the City prison. While here, I have gathered some facts worthy of attention, and which I will introduce with a single remark. The statistics of crime, pauperism, &c., which I have drawn out, are derived from actual examination of the proper documents, and may be relied on. This remark is made necessary by the fact that some of the sovereign editors of our land have been pleased to pronounce them incorrect simply because, in their ignorance, they knew nothing of the facts before. Many of the statements have been published in statistical tables, duly certified, and there they attract no attention; but the moment they are spread out in a form for every body to read, these very wise people lift up their hands in wonder and say, "There must be some mistake here; I don't believe a word of it." Well, if disbelieving it would make the truth less painful, I would willingly let incredulity have its perfect work. But facts are facts, and figures will not lie.

Of the causes of crime in this city, there are two worthy of distinct mention; Intemperance and licentiousness. I call them causes of crime, yet why are they not written CRIMES in the law books, and punished as such? I have asked a question hard to be answered, but which I mean to answer before I drop the subject.

To make laws to punish theft and murder, while intemperance and licentiousness are licensed or winked at by law, is about as rational poltical economy as it would be for the State to employ the Eccolabeion or Egg Hatching machine, which was exhibited in this city last winter, and set it at work, with 3000 more ovens of the same sort, to hatch rattlesnakes, which should be permitted to escape into the streets, and then offer a reward for their destruction. The Government first sets upon the nest of criminal-eggs, and when the whole swarm has been hatched into life and motion, it sends its agents to catch a few of them, and now and then it hangs one of its own victims. Does this sound like the anti-government preaching of the day? Quite the reverse. Because I love a strong government, that shall protect society, begin at the beginning of things, and lay its hand on the springs of crime, I set this error in this new and odious light. Think of the startling fact that the Mayor and Corporation of the city of New York have licensed 3116 persons to sell ardent spirits in the last year, and probably as many more sell without license, and the government pays no attention to the evil! And when the natural result of this traffic appears in the pauperism and crime of this city, so fearful that the truth is not believed when you tell it, then the Common Council talk of a new Police system, and more vigilance, and all that, as if they were really in earnest, to guard the morals and property and lives of those who pay the taxes! This is the "penny wise and pound foolish" policy which all government exhibits in our country, and I doubt not that the government of the city of New York is as wise, pure and efficient as any other.

So of the licentiousness of the city. Of all anomalies in Legislation, the indifference of government and of society to this evil is the strangest. Pauperism runs back to intemperance as its source, but I have not a doubt that among the crimes of this city, punishable by law, the vice of licentiousness is a far more fruitful source than you imagine. To obtain the means of sinful indulgence, the young are tempted continually in crime; indulgence sears the conscience, and steals the sensibilities of the soul more rapidly and fatally than any other vice, and the avenues to this vice are so many, alluring and deceitful, that he would be the Reformer of the age, and worthy of a monument of Parian marble, who shall devise a remedy to arrest the evil. But this parent of vice is tolerated in our city, licensed in others, and treated in all as a necessary sore, to be kept running on the body of society.

Now let us study a few statistics. There are four criminal courts in the city of New York for the trial of offences committed in the city, viz: the Oyer and Terminer, General Sessions, Special Sessions, and the Police Court. From the first three I have the statistics for the last five years, furnished by H. Vandervoort, Esq., Clerk; but the returns from the Police office, of the number of commitments, &c., I have failed to obtain. I hope to have them soon. The following table will give you an idea of the nature of the crimes committed in this city last year:—

Statement of Convictions, Acquittals, &c., in the Courts of Oyer and Terminer, General and Special Sessions in the year 1844:

COURT OF SPECIAL SESSIONS.

Petit Larceny,	896	148
Assault and Battery,	551	89
Total,	1447	234

The sentence passed upon the criminals convicted were the following:—

Sentenced to State Prison by Court of Oyer and Terminer,	Men 1,	Women —
Do. by Court of General Sessions,	" 116,	" 10
Aggregate amount of time of sentences, 564 Years and 4 months.
Sentenced to Penitentiary in Oyer and Terminer and General Sessions,	Men 66,	Women 2
Do. to City Prison by General Sessions,	Men 19,	" 4
Do. to House of Refuge " "	Boys 11,	Girls —
Do. to Penitentiary by Special Sessions	Men 615,	Women 117
Do. to the City Prison, " "	" 558,	" 68
Do. to House of Refuge " "	Boys 49,	Girls 7

But this exhibits a small part only of the actual vice in the city. For this you must go into the Police Court. The Police Office is open before day light every morning, when a magistrate is present to dispose of prisoners arrested during the night; and this court is in session constantly until sunset. There are two Offices, the upper and lower; in 1842, there were committed to the city prison, from the lower office alone, 9,530 persons; and the clerk told me the other day, that, last year, there were abont 14,000.

A large proportion of these commitments are vagrants; a term that includes drunkards and harlots, who are seized and committed without much ceremony.

Look at the comparative crime of this city for the last five years, taking only the convictions in the Oyer and Terminer, the General and Special Sessions:—

You see a regular increase until the last year when there is a falling off, but in this time the population has been increasing rapidly. The comparison is therefore gratifying, and encouraging, for we have no reason to believe that the administration of justice has been less efficient the last year than before. With the statistics of intemperance I shall not trouble you, as they are so often spread before the public that you must be familiar with them. But I cannot do justice to the subject of the present letter without making you acquainted with some painful facts respecting the licentiousness of the city, though it would be more agreeable to me and to you to spread a veil of sackcloth over the matter, and say nothing about it. We will not draw for facts upon the Moral Reform Reports, for some would question their correctness. We will take the official returns!

Just a year ago, Alderman Tillou and Woodhull presented to the Board of Aldermen a report in relation to the Police of this city, in which they bring to view the details of vice that ought to be known to the public, but which being buried in "public documents," are never read. When I brought together the facts, and proved that one out of every seven certainly, and perhaps one out of every five persons in the city, receives aid at the hand of charity every year, the fact was denounced a libel on the city, and I was waited on by several gentleman with a request to re-examine the subject. I did, and made the matter worse. I shall therefore not say that one out of every seven females in the city over the age of sixteen and under thirty-six is an abandoned woman; for should I say so, nobody would believe it, and I should be read out of society. But I will give you the facts in the case, and you must draw the inference. The committee of the Board of Alderman estimate from actual examination of certain parts of the city, that there are ten thousand of these bad women residing among us. The average life of those thus given up to vice is not more than ten or fifteen years. In a population of 350,000 persons there are about 70,000 females over the age of sixteen and under thirty-six, and within these ages may be reckoned nearly all those of whom we are speaking. Now take the number 70,000, divide it by 10,000, and you shall find the proportion of the vicious to the virtuous to be one in seven!!! It does seem to me that the Aldermen must be mistaken. But I am serving them as others serve me, when I thus call in question the results of their examination, and I will let it stand for others to correct, if they can.

You will like to know how this state of things compares with other cities. I have statistics of some places in Great Britain, and we do not care to compare ourselves with Continental Europe. Their pre-eminency in vice is not to be called in question. But look at England. Supposing that there are 400 brothels in the city of New York, our place in the scale will be learned from the following table, which I have prepared, taking the population of N. Y. from the last census:—

New York,	population 313,000,	Brothels	400
Liverpool,	" 223,000,	"	770
Manchester,	" 380,000,	"	308
Birmingham,	" 197,000,	"	797
London,	" 1,900,000,	"	5,000

I have returns from other cities, but these are enough. You will readily perceive that there is no great difference between us and our trans-Atlantic sisters, on the score of morals. Our report is better than some, and worse than others. But I believe we are better in one particular. I never heard that any Bishop in our country, or clergyman of any name, derived any part of his living from the rent of brothels. But it is a well known fact, having been exposed in the House of Lords, that the rent of a large number of brothels flows into the coffers of one of the Bishops; and not long since was seen the Rev. J. Holmes figuring at the Marylebone police office, as the landlord of a furnished brothel, and preferring a charge against his tenant for having stolen three looking glasses! These are not solitary cases. Not long since, another clergyman of the Church of England being reproached with the ownership of six of these houses, replied—"Why blame me; my masters have hundreds." But, my dear Eusebius, it has been said by some writer, whose name does not now recur to me, that "people who live in glass houses must not throw stones!" and after the late developments in our own country and our own city, it will not be prudent for us to say much about the morals of the church of England.

To come back to our own city. When our present popular and excellent chief magistrate, Mayor Harper, came into office, measures were taken to drive the offence of this vice from the public streets, and scores of vile women, whose flaunting in Broadway was a nightly and intolerable nuisance, were committed under the vagrant act. But the energy of law soon yielded, and the evil is now as unblushing and abundant as ever. Whether legal restraints can be imposed, so as materially to check the evil, seems to be a question which legislators usually answer in the negative. But our laws are radically defective on the whole subject I have not a doubt, and I wish that the minds of those who make and administer our laws might be put right.

It is said that if severe enactments are made against the sale of ardent spirits and also against violations of the seventh commandment it will be impossible to enforce them; that the appetite and passions of man will be gratified, in spite of law, and public opinion will never sustain the magistrate in the execution of a law that inflicts a heavy penalty upon the offences which are committed by the free will of both parties concerned. Thus the man who buys and the man who sells ardent spirits, consents to the transaction, and why should the seller be punished? So of the seducer. But this reasoning goes upon two false positions. 1, That these are the only parties; and 2, That the consent of the victim absolves from guilt. Society has an interest in this matter; and the good of the whole number should be looked at in law-making. Nor is it true that a member of society has a right to injure himself to the injury of his neighbors: as he does when he becomes a drunkard and a seducer. There are others who suffer besides the victim of the rum-seller and the seducer; and these others have rights which the law should protect. And if a house is kept open in this city for the sale of ardent spirits to be drank as a beverage, if a house is kept open in which temptations to licentiousness are exposed for sale, why, in the name of everlasting right, does not the law make such houses nuisances, to be exterminated from the heart of society. It licences the one class, and lets the other alone! If a miserable hole in Orange street becomes so offensive that the peace of the city requires its purgation, the old hag who keeps it will be snaked to the Police office, and tried for "keeping a disorderly house." But hundreds of houses close by the houses of our magistrates spread their allurements before the eyes of our youth, and tempt them into the vortex of hell, and the shield of law protects the portal, though all that enter, enter to be damned.

It is said that if these vices are made penal, they will still be practiced. So there will be thieves and murderers, in spite of law. But surely no sane man will be for having no laws against theft and murder. We ought to have laws built, as God's laws are, on the right and the wrong of things, with penalties proportioned to the nature and consequences of crime; instead of laws that are based confessedly on the prejudices and ignorance and depravity of those who hate all laws because they interfere with their lusts.

A great many people seem to think that the devil has the majority on his side, and therefore there is no use in trying to vote him and his down. But God's side is the strongest, and even in this country where governing is done by voting, if the friends of God and virtue were half as wise in their generation as the devil's people in theirs, the right would prevail. There are hundreds and thousands of people in this city who expect to go to heaven, who never give themselves any trouble about the vices of the times, leaving laws and politics, and consequently the morals of the people to take care of themselves; when they hear of a horrid crime in the streets or in a den of shame, they groan heavily, but as to moving in a work of reform, to secure better law makers and better laws, or even to secure the triumph of a moral reformation, so as to make public sentiment what it might be, they never dream of such a thing, not they! The friends of virtue should awake to the moral dangers that lurk and riot and reign in this city; they should strive together to reclaim the vicious, to restrain the erring, to strengthen the weak, to dam up the currents of evil, exterminate the seeds of vice, expel or imprison the wretches who make their bread by tempting to perdition our sons and daughters, and gloat, like harpies, over the blasted hopes and crushed hearts of their victims. There are thousands of houses in this city, over whose door might be written, as it is written over one of the doors of the theatres—"TO THE PIT." Edmund Burke said, in reference to the vices of London, that were it not for the lofty spires of their churches, which serve to conduct away the lightning of of heaven, God's fire would long ago have consumed the city; and who that knows the abominations of ours, but trembles when he thinks that the Holy One is Almighty!

Pray for us, dear Eusebius, and thank God for a home in the country. Yours, IRENÆUS.

HOWARD THE PHILANTHROPIST.

He was a singular being in many of the common habits of life; he bathed daily in cold water; and both on rising and going to bed swathed himself in coarse towels, wet with the coldest water; in that state he remained half an hour or more, and threw them off, freshened and invigorated, as he said, beyond measure. He never put on a great coat in the coldest countries; nor was ever a minute under or over the time of an appointment for 26 years. He never continued at a place, or with a person a single day beyond the period prefixed for going, in his life; and he had not for the last 10 years of his existence, ate any fish, flesh, or fowl; nor sat down to his simple fare of tea, milk, and rusk all that time.—His journeys were continued from prison to prison; from one group of wretched beings to another, night and day; and when he could not go in a carriage he would walk. Such a thing as an obstruction was put out of the question.

Some days after his first return from an attempt to mitigate the plague of Constantinople, he favored me with a morning visit to London. The weather was so very terrific, that I had forgot his inveterate exactness, and had yielded up the hope of expecting him. Twelve at noon was the hour, and exactly as the clock struck, he entered my room; the wet—for it rained in torrents—dripping from every part of his dress, like water from a sheep just landed from its washing. He would not have attended to his situation, having sat himself down with the utmost composure, and began conversation, had I not made an offer of dry clothes. 'Yes,' said he smiling, 'I had my fears, as I knocked at your door, that we should go over the old business of apprehension about a little rain water, which though it does not run off my back as it does from that of a duck, does me as little injury, and after a long drought is scarcely less refreshing. The coat that I have on has been as often wetted through as any duck's in the world, and indeed gets no other cleaning. I assure you, a good soaking shower is the best brush for broadcloth. You, like the rest of my friends, throw away your pity upon my supposed hardships with just as much reason as you commisserate the common beggars, who being familiar with storms, necessity, and nakedness, are a thousand times (so forcible is habit) less to be compassioned than the sons and daughters of ease and luxury, who accustomed to all the enfeebling refinements of feathers by light and fires by day, are taught to shiver at the breeze. All this is the work of art, my good friend; nature is intrepid, hardy, and adventurous; but it is a practice to spoil her with indulgencies from the moment we come into the world. A soft dress and a soft cradle begin our education in luxury, and we do not grow more manly the more we are gratified; on the contrary, our feet must be wrapt in wool or silk, we must tread upon carpets, breathe, as it were, in fire, and fear the least change in the weather. "You smile," said Mr. Howard, after a pause, "but I am a living instance of the truths I insist on. A more puny youngster than myself was never seen. If I wet my feet I was sure to take cold. I could not put on my shirt without its being aired. To be serious, I am convinced that what emasculates the body debilitates the mind, and renders both unfit for those exertions which are of such use to social beings. I therefore entered upon a reform of my constitution, and have succeeded in such a degree that I have neither had a cough, cold, the vapors, nor any more alarming disorder, since I surmounted the seasoning. Formerly mulled wines, and spirits, and great fires, were to comfort me, and to keep out the cold, as it is called; the perils of the day were to be baffled by something taken hot on going to bed; and before I pursued my journey the next morning, a dram was to be swallowed to fortify the stomach!" "Believe me," said Mr. Howard, "we are too apt to invert the remedies which we ought to prescribe for ourselves. Thus we are forever giving hot things when we should administer cold. We bathe in hot instead of cold water, we use a dry bandage when we should use a wet one, and we increase our food and clothing when we should, by degrees, diminish both.

"If we would trust more to Nature, and suffer her to apply her own remedies to cure her own diseases, the formidable catalogue of maladies would be reduced to one half, at least, of their present number."—Pratt's Gleanings.

NO EFFORTS TO DO GOOD ARE LOST.—I have heard of some seeds which will sleep in the earth for ages, and I have read of the young of certain insects which lie in a state like death for eighty years together, and yet when the hand that scattered the seed has been long mingled with the dust, and when the insect that has deposited its young had ended its flight for generations, the seed would come forth and form a forest of mighty trees, and the slumbering insect would awake to life, and become the mother of an endless multitude. And so it may be with us. We are scattering the seeds of knowledge, and piety, and immortality, but we see not the seed spring forth. Our instructions seem to be forgotten; the fruits of our liberality seem to have perished; and our labors appear to have been in vain. But be of good courage; the seed is still in the earth undecayed, and the time will come when it shall spring forth, and yield a plenteous harvest. It is watched over by the God of heaven, and not a seed shall perish.—The hand that scattered the seed may be withered, but the seed itself shall swell and send forth its germ, and become a mighty tree. The voice that uttered the sermon may be silent, but others that received the truth shall come forth and declare it afresh to the generations that are yet unborn.—J. Barker.

IMPROPER LANGUAGE.—Never use improper words or indecent language. It betrays a grovelling mind, and does not speak well of the society you keep. Such language offends the ear of modesty, and makes your presence an offence to respectable society. True it is,

> "Immodest words admit of no defence,
> For want of decency, is want of sense."

The young should early habituate themselves to the use of language which is becoming at all times and in all places. A coarse and vulgar young man is loathed and abhorred by all—although for the sake of his relatives, he may be sometimes admitted into respectable society.—Avoid, then, all expressions, all faint allusions to what is indelicate and improper; unless you do, you may early be tainted.—Portland Tribune.

"Envy is fixed only on merit; and like a sore eye, is offended with every thing that is bright."

In injuries it is better to take many than to give one; in benefits the contrary. I will requite the first with bearing them—the second with requiting them.

TO A CHILD.

Never, my child, forget to pray,
Whate'er the business of the day;
If happy dreams have blessed thy sleep,
If startling fears have made thee weep,
With holy thoughts begin the day,
And ne'er, my child, forget to pray.

Pray Him by whom the birds are fed,
To give to thee thy daily bread;
If wealth her bounty should bestow,
Praise Him from whom all blessings flow;
If He who gave should take away,
O ne'er, my child, forget to pray.

The time will come when thou wilt miss
A father's and a mother's kiss;
And then, my child, perchance you'll see
Some who in prayer ne'er bend the knee;
From such examples turn away,
And ne'er, my child, forget to pray.

HONORING PARENTS.

What can be more tender and beautiful than the following simple narrative? As a stranger went into the church-yard of a pretty village, he beheld three children at a newly made grave. A boy about ten years of age was busily engaged in placing plants of turf about it, whilst a girl, who appeared a year or two older, held in her apron a few roots of wild flowers. The third child, still younger, was sitting on the grave, watching with thoughtful look the movements of the other two. They wore pieces of crape on their straw hats, and a few other signs of mourning, such as are sometimes worn by the poor, who struggle between their poverty and their afflictions.

The girl soon began planting some of her wild flowers around the head of the grave, when the stranger addressed them:

"Whose grave is this, children, about which you are so busily engaged?"

"Mother's grave, sir," said the boy.

"And did your father send you here to place these flowers around your mother's grave?"

"No, sir, father lies here too, and little Willy, and sister Jane."

"When did they die?"

"Mother was buried fortnight yesterday, but father died last winter; they all lie there."

"Then who told you to do this?"

"Nobody, sir," replied the girl.

"Why, then, do you do it?"

They appeared at a loss for an answer, but the stranger looked so kindly at them, that at length the eldest replied, as the tears started into his eyes, "O we did love them!"

"Then you put these grass turfs and wild flowers around where your parents are laid, because you love them?"

"Yes, sir," they all eagerly replied

What can be more beautiful than such an exhibition of children honoring the memory of departed parents? Reader, are you an orphan? Never forget the dear parents who loved and cherished you in your infant days. Ever remember their parental kindness. Honor their memory by doing those things which you know would please them were they now alive; by a practical regard to their dying command; and carrying on their plans of usefulness. Are your parents still spared you? Ever treat them as you will wish you had done, when you stand a lone orphan at their graves. How will a remembrance of a kind and affectionate conduct towards those departed friends, then help to soothe your grief and heal your wounded heart.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

THIS Institution has a pleasant and quiet location thirteen miles south-east of Angelica, and six miles south of Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y., under the care of W. C. KENYON, as Principal, and Miss CAROLINE B. MAXSON, as Preceptress, aided by able and experienced assistants.

Teachers' Classes will be exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining every facility of a Normal School, without its usual disadvantages. Within the past year, more than one hundred and fifty students of the institution have been employed as teachers in this and the adjacent counties—a number much larger than from any other institution in the State.

Students are prepared for entering any class in College. Ample advantages are also secured to those pursuing Modern Languages and the Fine Arts. The institution is liberally endowed and supplied with a choice and valuable library, and apparatus sufficiently extensive to illustrate every department of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. It has also well selected cabinets of Geological, Mineralogical and Conchological specimens.

The plan of instruction aims at the development of the moral, intellectual and physical powers of students, so as to render them thorough, accurate, and practical scholars.

Lectures on Chemistry, accompanied by a full course of experiments, will commence with the second week of the fall term, and continue daily to its close. During the fall and winter terms, daily lectures will be given on School Teaching. Lectures on Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Physiology, illustrated by experiments, will be given each term of the year.

TUITION, per term of fifteen weeks, from $3,50 to $5. Board per week, in private families, $1. The entire expense of the academic year, including tuition, board, washing, light, and fuel, need not exceed $60. No extra charges incurred.

AN ADDRESS TO THE BAPTISTS OF THE UNITED STATES, from the Seventh day Baptist General Conference; wherein is shown the perpetual obligation upon Jew and Gentile to observe God's Holy Sabbath, as INSTITUTED IN PARADISE upon the SEVENTH or last day of each week; and the subsequent substitution of the FIRST day is shown to be inconsistent with the institution, and subversive of the Bible as a perfect rule of faith.

Published at this office for the Conference, and for sale also by Leavitt, Trow & Co., 194 Broadway; Mark H. Newman, 199 Broadway, and E. Walker & Co. 114 Fulton street, ($3 per 100,) and at the bookstores generally price 6 cents.

THE VOICE OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

It is often urged, by way of objection to the observance of the fourth commandment, that the New Testament no where positively enjoins it. Let it be granted, for the sake of argument, that the New Testament does not enjoin it; the objection still amounts to nothing, unless it can be proved that no part of Scripture is binding except the writings of the New Testament. As there is a large class of persons, whose ideas in regard to the binding authority of the Old Testament are far from being clear, we will just consider for a moment what would be the consequence of maintaining, that nothing of Scripture is binding except the New Testament. For the error of a position often becomes more glaring by following it to its legitimate results.

In Stephens' Incidents of Travel, it is related of a certain Russian nobleman, that he had married his own sister! "Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature," is the command of the Lord of life; and in obedience to this command, one of our brethren who rejects all but the New Testament, goes into the very vicinity of this nobleman. Fired by a martyr spirit, like John the Baptist who felt bound to say even to a king, "It is not lawful for thee to have her," he wishes to declare faithfully to this nobleman his great sin. Yet nothing but transgression of God's law is sin; and that law he supposes to be all contained in the New Testament. But how is he astonished to find, on searching this part of the sacred volume from beginning to end, that there is not one word on the subject of a man's marrying his sister! He can hardly believe his own eyes, concludes he has overlooked it, and searches again. But at length he is constrained to confess, that on this point at least the New Testament is silent. Happening, however, to cast his eyes upon Lev. 18 : 9, he finds the thing forbidden in plain words. But that is in the Old Testament; and not only so, but right in the very midst of those statutes, which he has always viewed as merely Jewish, or ceremonial. 'How is this?' says he; 'here is a whole chapter devoted to the degrees of consanguinity, within which it is wrong to marry.' He reads with care, and discovers that the things which were forbidden, were viewed as abominations in the Canaanites, on account of which they were cut off from the land; v. 24—28. Consequently, there must be a moral heinousness in them, independent of that peculiar service imposed upon the Jews as a nation. "In all these the nations are defiled which I cast out before you. And the land is defiled: therefore I do visit the iniquity thereof upon it, and the land itself vomiteth out her inhabitants." How could those nations be DEFILED by such things—how could they be chargeable with INIQUITY on account of them—if those laws concerned none but Jews? The good brother reads with still closer attention, and in the 19th verse he finds a plain prohibition of a certain sin, which the strong language of the prophet, shows to be abomination in the sight of a holy God. Ezek. 18: 6, and 22: 10. Yet in the New Testament he looks in vain for any such prohibition.

Now, while the brother has been making this investigation, and pondering the subject with deep anxiety, he has in the mean time preached earnestly the great truths of religion, maintaining that by the word of God, and that only, the principles and actions of men are to be tried. The nobleman himself has been one of his hearers; "and when he heard him, he did many things, and heard him gladly." But what shall be done in regard to this incestuous life which the nobleman is leading? Loth to abandon his creed, the missionary would endeavor to fasten a sense of guilt on the conscience of his hearer by some other rule than the law of God. But how are men to be convicted of sin by any thing else than the law of God? 1 John 3 : 4. Rom. 3 : 19, 20. The idea is preposterous; it cannot be done. Besides, he has already told the man of noble birth, that by the word of God, and that only, the principles and actions of men are to be tried. He has told him, that the law of God is PERFECT—no defect—so perfect that nothing is to be added to, or taken from it; and that this law is all contained in the New Testament. 'Now prove to me by this law,' says the nobleman; 'prove to me by the New Testament, that I have sinned against God in marrying my sister.' The herald of Jesus Christ stands before him confounded, his own creed being the weapon that is hurled back upon him.

From the foregoing case, the consequence of maintaining that the New Testament is the only code of duty under the present dispensation, is seen to be glaringly absurd. The New Testament becomes a complete rule of duty no otherwise, than by recognizing the binding force of some law that has been previously given out by Jehovah.

The notion of discarding the Old Testament, except as a book of history, seems to have grown out of the Baptismal Controversy. In their zeal to maintain baptism in its native simplicity as given by Christ, in opposition to that system which, while it finds the ordinance in the New Testament, goes back to the Old for the subjects, many Baptists have incautiously, and very much to their own prejudice, assumed that we have nothing more to do with the Old Testament, than we have with last year's almanac—a position which is perfectly correct, so far as the arrangement of the church and its ordinances are concerned; but sadly erroneous, when the simple relation of mankind at large to the moral government of God is regarded. The Sabbath, therefore, cannot be at all affected by it, unless it can be proved to have been strictly a church ordinance, with which men at large have nothing to do.

That the New Testament should be a complete code of duty, does not seem to have been designed by the great Lawgiver. The principal design of it seems to be to render clear, and obvious to the understanding, the way of salvation. It was never clear before. To the Old Testament saints it was a dark subject. 1 Pet. 1 : 11. They understood it not. That it was to be somehow or other through the interposition of the seed of the woman, they knew. But precisely in what way the promised seed would interpose, so as to destroy the works of the devil, they understood not. As long as the first tabernacle was yet standing, the way was not manifest. Heb. 9 : 8. Light on the subject, to be sure, was gradually increasing from the first ray which glimmered to our first parents—Gen. 3 : 15—down to the time of Malachi. But darkness was never fully dispelled until after Christ's resurrection. Hence Paul declares it to be a system, which was kept secret from ages and generations, since the world began, but now is made manifest. Rom. 16 : 25, Col. 1 : 26, Eph. 3 : 5. Compare Matt. 13 : 17, Luke 10 : 24.

The object of the New Testament, then, is to make this great subject plain. It was impossible to make it plain under the former dispensation; for the great facts, which lie at the foundation of it, had not yet taken place. Before it can be understood, the great Atonement must first be offered on Calvary, and afterwards presented before God in heaven. Heb. 9 : 12, 24. Messiah must first be humbled; then exalted. Phil. 2 : 7—11. The exposition of the whole subject consists in spreading out these two great facts—the humiliation and exaltation of our Redeemer. To develop their deep meaning, and show their connection with the salvation of sinners from first to last—to explain their bearing upon the moral government of God—and to evolve from them such arguments as might tend to quicken men to obedience—the New Testament was written. He must be a superficial reader, who does not observe how large a portion of this division of Scripture is taken up in the elobaration of this subject.

In explaining the Way of Salvation, it is but natural—indeed it is unavoidable—that there should be repeated references to the law, which sinners have broken. But to expect that every precept of it should be noticed in such a way as to be distinctly and positively enjoined, is most unreasonable. A jurist, who should write a treatise upon the nature of the power vested in the Executive, might have occasion, for the illustration of his subject, to refer to the greater part of the laws that had been enacted by the Legislature. But any one, who would maintain such a treatise to be a digest of the laws of the State, and that no laws were binding except such as were particularly referred to in this treatise, would be thought weak-minded. In the New Testament we have a treatise upon the PARDONING POWER of the great Lawgiver. In illustrating the doctrine of pardon and all its attendant blessings, the writers have occasion to refer to the most of those laws, which God as the Moral Governor of mankind has enjoined. But it need not thence be inferred, that no other laws are binding than those which are thus referred to.

We do indeed—we have said, it is perfectly correct to do so—confine ourselves to the New Testament in regard to the laws which are given to the church as such. To look for such laws hundreds of years before the organization of the body to be governed by them, is in our opinion a great error. Indeed, the laws and institutions of the church have such a direct reference to those facts upon which the way of salvation depends, and are so manifestly founded on them, that they could not be enacted with any propriety until after the facts had transpired.

But mankind at large are not connected with the church of Christ. The children of promise only are counted for the seed. Rom. 9 : 8, Gal. 3 : 29, John 3 : 5, Acts 2 : 37. These children of promise are called out, and separated, from the world, for the work of showing forth the praise of Christ. 1 Pet. 2 : 9. To those who FEAR God is the banner given. Ps. 60 : 4. None others will be faithful to display it. It is true, there were children of promise under the former dispensation. But they were not then called and separated from among the fleshly seed by a church organization. The church organization which then existed, embraced both the children of the flesh and the children of promise, all in one fraternity—all engaged in shadowing forth by the Levitical ritual "the good things to come." But Christ being come, it is no longer so. That organization was dissolved by his death; and by the preaching of the Gospel the spiritual seed were separated, and embraced in a new organization adapted to their renewed state, and to the peculiar work henceforth devolving upon them. But to confound this new organization with the moral government of God as exercised over mankind at large, evinces a lack of discrimination. Mankind at large were not bound by the organization of the Jewish church, neither are they bound by the organization of the Christian church. But they are bound by certain laws, which are entirely independent of church organization. They are bound by certain principles, which are not founded either on the Old Covenant or on the New, but upon that natural relation which they all sustain to God as the CREATURES of his hand. It is natural that such principles should be developed in ALL parts of a Book claiming to be a revelation from above; and we know of no sound principle of theology, which would lead us to think, that they were all incorporated into that division of Scripture commonly called the New Testament.

We do not believe, that such precepts of the law as are found in the New Testament, are made binding simply by the fact of their being there. They were binding before. When we say they were binding before, we do not refer to the obligation growing out of their incorporation into the Old Covenant. They were binding even before that. But what is it, that determines them to have been binding before? The mode of reasoning employed by some, insinuates that it is their incorporation into the New Testament, which determines the point. Hence—we cannot conceive from what other premises—their inference, that none others are obligatory than those which are thus incorporated. This incorporation, according to them, is the rule by which we distinguish with certainty between what was moral and perpetual, and what was ceremonial and temporary of the Old Testament Scriptures. But if by such a rule we distinguish between the ceremonial and the moral, how did the Old Testament saints themselves distinguish between them? It was certainly as necessary for them to make the distinction, as it is for us. For otherwise, how would they know what law it was that they had violated by sin, so as to make them need a Redeemer? How could they ascertain their deep moral pollution, be humbled before God on account of it, and by faith look forward to the Messiah for the cleansing of their conscience? They could not do it without the law; for by the law is the knowledge of sin. Rom. 3 : 20. They must therefore have had some rule, by which to draw the line of distinction between the moral law which convicted them of sin, and the ceremonial institutions, which typified redemption from sin. Now, whatever was their rule for distinguishing between them must be our rule. As the New Testament was not then written, of course it could not be their rule; consequently it is not ours.

What then is the rule by which the moral is distinguished from the ceremonial? We reply, that all laws are founded in certain relations which are supposed to exist. For examples:—The law which binds the child to reverence his parents, is founded in the relation of one to the other. If there was no such relation, there could be no such law The law which binds the wife to reverence her husband, is founded in the relation they bear to one another as husband and wife. If there was no such relation, there could be no such law. The law which binds the subject to honor the king is founded in the relation of the king to the subject. If there was no such relation, there could be no such law.

Now the Moral Law—that law which we have violated by sin—that law which shows man his need of a Redeemer—and of course that law to which the atonement of Christ has a particular respect—is founded in the natural relation which men bear to the Almighty, which is the relation of creature to Creator. If there was no such relation, there could be no such law. If this relation could be destroyed, then the moral law could be destroyed. But as it cannot be destroyed, so the moral law cannot be destroyed, but must of necessity remain an unchangeable standard of rectitude.

We use the term moral in reference to the law, notwithstanding we are aware of the objection, that the Scripture never draws the line of distinction between moral and ceremonial law. But although the Scripture does not make use of these very terms, it is idle to say that the relation, which all men hold to the Creator as the creatures of his power, is not to be distinguished from that special relation into which the Israelites were constituted at Mount Sinai. There is a very palpable distinction. Consequently the laws which are founded on these different relations, must be widely distinguished from each other. We are not particularly tenacious, however, of the terms used to express the distinction. If natural law is considered a better term than moral, we have no objection. Some term, however, which shall be expressive of the system of law built upon the natural relation of mankind to their Creator, without the necessity of resorting to circumlocution, is important, and is all that we contend for.

Now in order to determine what portion of Scripture properly belongs to the Moral Code, rather than to the ceremonial or any other, we have only to determine whether the precepts in question are founded in the natural relation which God sustains to all men as their Creator. If they are, they belong to the moral law. But if instead of being founded in the natural relation of creature to Creator, they are founded in that peculiar relation which God entered into with the Jewish nation, they are either ceremonial, or judicial, according as they had for their object the shadowing forth of the Messiah, or the regulation of the civil polity of that people. This is the principle by which Old Testament saints were enabled to determine what portion of their Scriptures constituted the moral law. The same principle is our rule. We may add, that such precepts as are founded in that special relation which God holds to believers of all nations as their Redeemer through Jesus Christ, may be denominated Gospel precepts. [The reader is here referred to an article in No. 30 of this paper, headed "Connection of the Day with the Institution."]

Having ascertained the principle by which to distinguish with certainty between the moral and ceremonial parts of Scripture, we need not ask whether a precept is in the Old Testament, or in the New—whether it is in the Pentateuch, or in John's Gospel—whether it is in Job, or in the Apocalypse,—in order to determine whether it is our duty to keep it. We have only to ask, Is it in the Bible at all?—and, What is the relation in which it is founded? Should we learn that it is founded in the natural relation we sustain to our Creator, that settles the question at once that it is our duty to keep it, even though the New Testament is profoundly silent about it.

It hence follows, that our proper inquiry with regard to the Sabbath is—not, is it positively and particularly enjoined in the New Testament?—but, Is it a necessary and important part of the Moral Law?—Is it founded on the relation which God sustains to us as our Creator? That it is founded on this relation, is evident from the very wording of the fourth commandment. "For in six days the Lord made heaven, the earth," &c. The Sabbath is therefore a part of the Moral Law. Consequently, though the New Testament were entirely silent about it, it is the duty of all men to keep it holy.

But here we are met with the objection—That the Sabbath cannot be a part of the moral law, because it is a positive institution, there being a wide difference between moral and positive institutions. Moral duties are binding prior to external command, and they arise obviously out of the nature of the case. But positive duties are not binding prior to external command; but become binding in consequence of such command, inasmuch as without a command they are not obvious to human reason. Only the former class of duties can be considered the moral law, while positive institutions are not embraced in this code. Now the Sabbath is a positive institution, as it could not, prior to the appointment of Jehovah, be ascertained by any exercise of human reason, that the seventh is any more holy than any other day; nor is it ascertainable by reason, that God took six days rather than any other length of time for making the world, and that he rested on the seventh; nor would human reason ever have discovered, that one seventh part of time is better adapted to the purposes and ends of the Sabbath, than one tenth, one fifth, or any other proportion. So that, taking into consideration any or all of the supposed grounds of the institution, the Sabbath must be considered a positive rather than a moral precept, and therefore cannot be a part of the Moral Law.

We believe the foregoing is one of the strongest objections ever brought against the observance of the Sabbath; and we have endeavored to state it in such a way, that its full force may at once be seen. Taken in connection with the fact, that there is no express injunction of the fourth commandment in the New Testament, it forms one of the most plausible arguments that our opponents can hold. It is, however, fallacious, as we will endeavor to show.

Perhaps as good a way as any of approaching the objection, is by presenting a parallel case. The word Gospel, in its most literal sense, signifies good news. The preaching of the Gospel, therefore, is simply the proclamation of the good news, or glad tidings, of salvation by Jesus Christ. It contains no injunctions—no duties. Duties grow out of law; for the proper and literal signification of law is a rule of duty. So that if the strict signification of terms is followed, rather than the appropriated sense of them, the preaching of the Gospel is not the preaching of any duty at all. Yet who ever imagines, that a sermon, which is wholly taken up in urging duty, is for that reason not a Gospel sermon? Who does not know, that conjoined with the good news of salvation, repentance, faith, mortification of sin, and a great number of other duties—which in the most rigid sense are laws—are urged; and that the whole together are denominated under one general term, the Gospel? So that he who should maintain, that repentance and faith are not a part of the Gospel, because they do not answer to the strict meaning of the word, would be considered not a very discriminating observer of the use of terms. Yet he might just as well maintain it, as for our opponents to maintain that a positive institution cannot be a part of the Moral Law, because it does not answer to the strict meaning of the word moral.

Now the truth is, that terms have an appropriated sense, as well as a strict etymological or original sense; and though it is often the case that the appropriated sense is much more restricted than the original one, yet it is often, on the other hand, that it is more comprehensive. Now although in the strictest sense the term moral law is used to signify such duties as are supposed to be ascertainable by human reason, and binding prior to any external command, yet in its more comprehensive sense it denotes that whole system of religion, which is founded on the natural relation of creatures to their Creator, and which may be called Natural Religion. So that if a positive institution is found to be included in this system, we may nevertheless say it is a part of the Moral Law with just as much truth, as we may say that repentance is a part of the Gospel.

The Scripture writers, however, knew nothing of a division of duties into moral and positive. Religion with them consisted in obedience to the revealed will of God. They did know that God enjoined upon man in his state of primitive holiness a system of religion, that was exactly suited to that state. They also knew that as soon as man became a fallen creature, another system suited to his fallen state was enjoined upon him. Yet it never seems to have entered their minds, that the former system, for the transgression of which man became a fallen creature, consisted entirely of moral duties to the exclusion of positive. On the contrary, the transgression of a positive precept was the very beginning of his fall. Contemplating therefore the law which concludes all the world under sin, they did not see fit to apply the cognomen moral, or to employ any metaphysico-theological dissecting knife for the purpose of parting between such duties as are moral and such as are positive.

We find then two different systems of religion, or modes of worshiping God, developed in the Bible, corresponding to the two different states or conditions of men as holy and as fallen creatures. The latter system, or that which is suited to his fallen state, consists of two parts, that which goes before the manifestation of Christ in the flesh, and that which follows after; the one we call Judaism, the other Christianity. These are the grand divisions, or systems, which the sacred writers clearly recognize. In settling the obligation of any particular precept, they did not inquire, like our modern doctors of divinity, whether it was positive, or whether it was moral. But, to which of the great systems does it belong? Does it belong to that system which was imposed upon man as a holy creature, or to that which is enjoined upon him as a fallen creature? If to the former, then for the violation of it he is a sinner, and stands in need of the help provided for him in the latter. OR, does this precept peculiarly belong to Judaism, or is it of Christianity? Does it originate in that system which went before the manifestation of the Redeemer, and typified him, or in that system which comes after? Does it pertain to the "shadow of the good things to come," or to "the very image of the things?" If to the "shadow," the Gentile Christian church had nothing to do with it.

We repeat it then, that the sacred writers knew nothing about a division of duties into moral and positive. We do not say this, because the terms are not scriptural; for the reader will have already discovered, that we are not opposed to the use of terms which do not appear in the Bible, when the ideas implied by them are clearly scriptural. Nor do we undertake to say, that there is in reality no difference between moral and positive institutions. But we do say, that whatever the difference may be, it concerns not our practice. The introduction of a new system of worship does not necessarily abrogate the positive institutions of a former system, unless it abrogates the system itself. On the contrary, the very design of a positive institution is to promote a conformity to that system of which it makes a part. Unless it were an object, therefore, to weaken the hold of the system upon the conscience, and to obliterate it eventually from the affections, its positive institutions must be retained. Hence if Natural Religion, or that system of religion which devolved upon man as a holy creature, embraces one or more positive institutions, the introduction of Christianity does not effect the abrogation of them. In regard to Judaism, the whole system was abrogated by the introduction of Christianity. But Natural Religion, so far from being abrogated, is urged with new motives, and devolved with an increase of obligation.

From what we have offered it appears, that the fact of the Sabbath being a positive institution does not in the least invalidate its claims to a place in the Moral Law. It is appropriated to that code by the special appointment of the Almighty, and is designed to promote a conformity to it by affording a weekly opportunity to attend to religious exercises It takes cognizance of the very relation on which all other precepts of the moral law are founded, and is a perpetual memorial of that relation, bearing witness against Atheism and Idolatry. Be it so, that it does not arise necessarily and obviously out of this relation, but is arbitrarily attached to it, it is none the less binding on that account. Were God calling to account the heathen, who never enjoyed the benefit of a revelation, it might, and no doubt would, make a difference. They will be judged only for such sins as are obviously breaches of the law—for the neglect of such duties as arise necessarily out of the relation they sustain to their Maker. But we are not heathen; we have the Book of God, and by it we shall be judged. Let the inquiry then be—not, What are the duties which are dictates of reason?—but, What are those which God has commanded?

☞ A valuable article from the pen of Rev. Thomas B. Brown will be found on our first page. We bespeak for it a careful perusal.

THE DECEITFULNESS OF SIN.

It would be next to impossible for a thoughtful man to yield himself up to any high degree of wickedness with a clear view of its true character. Hence it is the policy of the great author of evil, to beguile us by false and deceitful appearances, in order to attain the mastery over us, and lead to our own undoing. The Scriptures frequently insist upon this deceitful character of sin, and admonish us to be on our guard against it. The history of even good men has often furnished most mournful illustrations of it.

Various are the forms in which the deceitfulness of sin is manifested. At one time it leads to idolatrous covetousness, under the plea of necessary foresight. At another time it encourages seeking honor from men, irrespective of the means of attaining it, under the plea of justifiable and praiseworthy self-respect. But of all errors into which it leads men, there is scarcely any one more fatal than that of regarding some favorite sins as too insignificant to justify the fear that they will be noticed by a gracious God. This impression overlooks the fact, that it is the will of God which constitutes the difference between right and wrong in such cases, and that to depart from His will is positive guilt and merits punishment. The only difference between great sins and small sins is a difference of degrees and consequences. Those which we call small may perhaps be less deleterious in their influence upon moral character and the interests of community, than those we call large. But in the one case as much as in the other, the principle of disobedience to God is allowed—a principle which is both insulting and rebellious. Every transgression of law is a sin, whether it be in wilful thought or deliberate act—whether against a law of general moral obligation, or one of special divine appointment. Hence the Scriptures have laid down the broad principle upon this subject, that "Whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all." By this we are not to understand that guilt does not increase by the repetition of transgressions; but simply, that transgression in a single point cuts us off from the divine favor and exposes us to punishment as truly and effectually as transgression in all points. It is difficult to see how any one, with such a Scripture principle before him, can expect to escape the consequences of even the smallest transgression.

But there is among men a mischievous restlessness under the restraints of the law of God. Even those who acknowledge that the divine law is perfect, are prone to interpret it by their own feelings and desires, or according to their own notions of the fitness of things. If, in these circumstances, they allow their understandings to be swayed by the pleadings of custom, or interest, or pleasure, they may be deceived into regarding the wrong as right, the laws of man as the laws of God. The only safety against this, is in making the Bible the exclusive rule of judgment. Questions of convenience and profit must be laid aside, and the great question must be, What saith the Bible, that Book which is designed to be the standard of duty here and of judgment hereafter?

The Christian's best protection against the deceitfulness of sin is to be found in a habit of strict and universal obedience. This will enable him to see through the false glosses with which human speculations have covered up many plain truths. It will give him a nice discrimination in regard to moral obligation. It will naturally lead him to strive, in every thought and action, to approve himself unto an all-seeing God; to do whatever He commands, and refrain from whatever He forbids; in short, to count nothing unimportant upon which His eye is directed.

The Jews and the Sabbath.—We are glad to find, in the February number of the Occident and Jewish Advocate, an article by the Rev. Mr. Isaacs on the Violation of the Sabbath. The writer speaks of the Sabbath as having received the impress of the Divine Architect, when the seventh day was ushered in as a day of rest after the work of creation was completed. "It is the Alpha and Omega of the Pentateuch; and our prophecies, from the first book to Malachi, are replete with lessons highly instructive, all tending to demonstrate that 'the Sabbath is equal to all the precepts in the law.'" Although there are many Jews who desecrate the day by attending to their ordinary business, yet Mr. Isaacs thinks that great improvement has been made, inasmuch as many who formerly violated the Sabbath now repose on faith and find that God does not forsake them. In conclusion, he expresses a hope that the list may be greatly increased—a hope in which we join with him most heartily.

Baptist Mission to China.—By letters from Rev. Mr. Shuck, missionary at Hong Kong, dated Nov. 8, 1844, it appears that Dr. and Mrs. Devan had arrived, and had been favorably received by the mandarins at Howloon. Mr. Devan was complimented by them for the benevolence that had prompted him to his work. They approved of his plan for opening a dispensary at that place, and professed a readiness to assist him with their influence. A long conversation was had upon the subject of religion, which was carried on in a friendly manner. The civil mandarin, Ma-tai-yay, offered Dr. Devan one of the temples for a dispensary; and the Doctor accordingly selected one in excellent repair, admirably adapted to healing the sick and spreading the Gospel. It is in a beautiful grove at the edge of the town, and will answer every purpose without the expense of either building or renting. This reception is encouraging, and promises well for the results of the mission.

MISSION IN CHINA.

The Missionary Herald for March gives some pleasing intelligence from the different mission stations in China. Mr. Abeel, stationed at Amoy, speaks of an imperial commissioner who came on some secret mission to that place, and to whom he had given instruction in geography and history. He was exceedingly friendly, communicative, and anxious to obtain information in regard to the location, political importance, and commercial relations of foreign countries—particularly America, England, and France. The following is Mr. Abeel's account of a more public dinner with this gentlemen:—

> "By invitation of the Imperial commissioner and the chief rulers of Amoy, a party dined to-day at the 'white deer cavern.' The place is nearly on the summit of one of the hills, running back of Amoy. Here Chinese taste has been displayed in forming cool and romantic retreats, beneath immense overhanging rocks, and between others which either support each other or approach so near together as to shut out the rays of the sun.
>
> "Several buildings occupy the eligible situations among the rocks. The whole was originally designed for a Budhist temple, and a few priests still reside here; but the officers of government and the gentry make it a place of resort, where they can escape the extreme heat of a Summer's day and entertain their friends. The dinner consisted of a great variety of rare and costly dishes; after which the foreign guests amused themselves in examining the objects of curiosity in the vicinity, and in viewing the extensive prospects from different parts of the hill."

HOW SHALL PAPACY BE RESTRAINED?

1. It is believed that the power to restrain the Roman influence is in God, from whom all authority and influence is derived.

2. God will perform his promise to the faithful, and for their sakes will restrain the evil designs of their enemies. Christians may resist the influence of Antichrist when they are in the strict performance of their duty. Whatsoever they shall ask in the name of Christ, it shall be done. The exercise of the power of God in extending the blessings of the Gospel being the duty of the faithful, it follows—

3. That they may restrain the influence of Papacy by a practical exhibition of the doctrines of the Bible. It must be "in spirit and in truth," in word and in deed. If the power and progress of the Church of Rome is to be restrained, it must be done by the influence of truth, by the spiritual working of the faith of the Gospel, in opposition to the unholy working of the Man of Sin. Popery must be renounced with all its deeds. It is not enough that we deny the authority of the Church of Rome; we should refuse to practice her falsehoods, or in any manner countenance her corruptions. Nor is it enough that we suppose ourselves free from the "mark of the beast;" we must be so in truth, for we cannot deceive God. We may deceive ourselves, and find at last that all our conformity to God's law was but in imagination. That we may manifest the Gospel, our hearts must be rightly affected in the sight of God, our consciences void of offence towards God's law, and in all things we must be truthful witnesses of the faith of Christ. Then shall we be favored of God with that power which will confound all our adversaries.

4. When men forget that God is an intelligent and discriminating observer of all their ways; that it is He who wages war against the works of darkness; and that He is against all that work iniquity, as well Protestant as Papist; against every false way, whether in professed friends or declared enemies; that He is without partiality in the law, not being more favorable to the false witness than to the worshiper of images, nor more favorable to the murderer than to the Sabbath-breaker—when these things are forgotten, men are easily fortified by sectional or party considerations against the strongest claims of the law of God; they become followers of men, adopt their opinions, are called by their names, and affect to be under their responsibility and direction, to believe as they believe, to practice as they practice, and alas, too often perpetuate the false doctrines of the Church of Rome without examination or preference. Let Protestants examine themselves, and see if there be not some secret abomination practiced among them. Let them not scruple to examine the pretensions of their great men, doctors of the law, and even their martyrs. Let the abominations of Rome be abhorred as the most loathsome pestilence. Then may we look for the true church to come up out of the wilderness, leaning upon her beloved. Then may the power of the beast be seen broken—her consecrated days, her deceptions and idolatrous sacrifices, at an end.

Alas! how long shall the strength of Protestants be wasted in sectarian wars and party strife. How long shall they refuse to adopt the legitimate conclusion of their own premise, "the Bible only." How long shall the Bible Sabbath, Bible ordinances, and Bible morals, be trampled under foot, in imitation of Roman practices, and in obedience to Roman precepts. "Know ye not that to whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are." Be not deceived. The war against Popery must not be with carnal weapons of man's device, but with the sword of truth. If the doctrines of Rome are retained, they will prove like the hidden treasure of Achan. Let Protestants examine themselves, and come to the light of truth. Then error will flee away. Luther.

MODERN EUROPE.

The Rev. Dr. Baird has just completed in New York an exceedingly interesting course of Lectures on the political, social, and religious condition of the several nations of Europe. Few men in this country are so well qualified to do justice to the subject as Dr. B., he having resided and traveled in different parts of Europe for nearly a dozen years past, and had personal interviews with nearly every sovereign. Reports of the Lectures were published in several of the daily papers, from which the following facts have been gathered.

RUSSIA.

Russia embraces full half of Europe, and has a population of about 62,000,000. The surface of the country is remarkably level. The central part contains excellent land, and is well cultivated; the northern portion abounds in rocks, and is wholly unfit for agricultural cultivation. The country is covered with vast forests of white pine trees, which are neither tall nor large. Wheat and Rye are two of the principal productions; but in the extreme north these are not raised, and the people subsist chiefly upon potatoes. Buckwheat likewise is raised in the central portion of the country, and a great variety of fruits in the southern. The commerce of Russia is mostly interior and very extensive. Much trade is carried on by means of Fairs, which are the largest in the world, and resemble those of the Middle Ages. The Roads generally are exceedingly poor. There is one, however, extending from St. Petersburgh to Moscow, which is the grandest in the world. The mode of traveling is by a large kind of stages, stuffed with feather beds and pillows, and drawn by eight fleet horses. In cities the nobility have handsome carriages, but the most common mode of getting about is by means of uncouth four-wheeled vehicles resembling a large saddle, upon which passengers get astride. Russia resembles this country in its extensive forests, its rail-fences, and the hospitality of its inhabitants. St. Petersburgh is called a city of palaces, from the number of noble edifices it contains. Its population is only about 500,000, although it covers as much ground as the city of London. The government is endeavoring to encourage the establishment of schools, hospitals, &c. There are also societies for this object. Russia has 19 military schools, with 10,000 students, all sons of noblemen. The people are divided into four classes. The first consists of nobles and their families, numbering about 1,000,000, who are well educated and very wealthy. The second class embraces the clergymen, who are mostly of the Greek Church, simple-hearted and laborous men, though quite ignorant. They must be married, and together with ther families number half a million. The third class are citizens, chiefly merchants, and number near 3,000,000. The fourth class embraces the serfs, numbering 48,000,000, of whom 21,000,000 belong to the Emperor. The emperor is now taking a course which will terminate slavery, probably in thirty or forty years. The Government is the most absolute monarchy in all Europe, the Emperor being the sun of the system. The present Emperor is the best man the Russians ever had, and probably the best fitted to govern of any man living.

POLAND.

Poland is generally very level. Its principal productions are Rye and Barley. The Poles resemble the Russians in appearance, habits, and language. Four hundred years since, Poland was the most powerful country in Europe excepting Spain. It then included the western part of Russia, and Bohemia, with a population of 22,000,000. Christianity was introduced into Poland in the tenth century. In the fourteenth century many Jews came there through the favor of a prince who had married a Jewess. They are now numerous and live a hard life, not being allowed to live in cities or to own land. Petty traffic is their chief business. Their complexion is darker than that of the Poles or Russians, though they are finer looking than either. Some of their ladies are very beautiful. They are quite ignorant, many believing what their Talmud teaches, that the world is flat. Warsaw is the only city worthy of note—population 130,000, of whom 25,000 are Jews. There is more literature in Poland than in Russia. The country is completely under the influence of the Pope.

DENMARK, NORWAY, SWEDEN.

Denmark is the most beautiful country in Europe. Norway and Sweden are mountainous and rocky, and abound in lakes. Not more than one-twentieth part of Norway can be cultivated. Its islands are innumerable, and new ones are constantly coming into sight, which renders navigation along the coast exceedingly dangerous. At Stockholm the land rises five feet annually, showing that great changes are going on below the surface. Gustavus Adolphus is one of the greatest of modern Princes. Norway has a Congress of one hundred men. Sweden has a Legislature consisting of clergy, burgesses, farmers, and nobles. Their jurisprudence is good in many respects. The Universities of Sweden are excellent, and have produced some of the ablest men in the world. The population of these countries amounting to 800,000, is Protestant, chiefly of the Lutheran Church.

HOLLAND AND BELGIUM.

These countries are almost perfectly level, highly cultivated, and wealthy. In Belgium manufacturs are numerous; in Holland more attention is paid to grazing. The two nations have a great antipathy to each other. King Leopold is a Protestant, well-informed and amiable, but wanting in decision of character. The country has many internal improvements, and is in a prosperous condition. Holland has a good government, and a talented, brave, proud, austere King. Every house in Amsterdam is built upon piles or trunks of trees, and there are at least fifty large canals in the city. The streets are generally very wide, and have a canal in the center, next a row of trees on each side of the canal, then on each side a passage sufficiently wide for carriages, then rows of trees again, and sidewalks next to the houses. Belgium has four Universities, and Holland three. The school systems of both countries are good. The inhabitants of Belgium are French, Flemish, German, and Dutch, and all of those languages are spoken. The Flemish language, in which there is no literature, is chiefly spoken by the lower classes. The Dutch are equal to the English in accomplishments, and many of them are immensely wealthy.

SWITZERLAND.

Switzerland is situated in the central part of Europe, and has a population of 2,200,000. Its scenery is surpassing and abundant. Clocks and musical instruments are the most important articles of manufacture. Each canton has a government of its own; and the inhabitants of each have their own peculiar dress, which they retain from generation to generation without change. About two thirds of the inhabitants are Protestants, and the remainder Catholics. Switzerland is not destitute of Universities and Schools, yet the people generally are poorly educated.

FRANCE.

Few countries in Europe have greater natural advantages than France, with its 260,000 square miles, and 34,000,000 inhabitants. The vine grows in about two-thirds of the country. It has been too much cultivated, and taken the place of grains. There is not so much wine drank in France as used to be drank with us. New York, before the temperance reformation, exceeded Paris in drunkenness. In the south of France, where the people make their own wines, there is scarcely any drunkenness. The Government of France is much like that of England. The mass of the people do not vote—only about 210,000 men having that right. Much talent is concentrated in the Legislature of France, more than in any other in the world. The French are behind in education; not more than one half of the men who enter the army can read, and not half can write. The King is the first sovereign in Europe in point of talent, and his character in private life is beyond reproach.

SPAIN.

No part of the world is more beautiful as to its physical appearance than Spain. The soil is productive, but not well cultivated. Spaniards are remarkable for firmness, perseverance, and pride—yet they are amiable. They are admirable friends, but dreadful enemies. True religion would make them a noble people.

ITALY.

A population of 22,000,000 comprises all who speak the Italian language. Their country would be productive if the people had enterprise enough to cultivate it. The western part of Italy is very desolate, the eastern is better. Commerce and manufactures are in a stagnant state. The country is divided into eight separate governments, which will undoubtedly be united at some future day. There is one republic standing, which elects a President once in six months, and is well governed. The people are glad to see an American, and proud to talk of their largest sister. The Austrian power is predominant. The principal cities abound in ancient relics. Although Italy has about a dozen Universities, an extensive literature, and several distinguished writers, yet the state of education among the common people is deplorable.

GREAT BRITAIN.

England is cultivated like a vast garden, in comparison with which France and Italy appear desolate. Her commerce is greater than that of all Europe beside. The country has never been so powerful as at present. There are less speech-makers in the British Parliament than in our Congress; consequently business is more rapidly despatched. The number of literary men in England is immense, yet they are not superior to our countrymen in the departments to which they are devoted. For patriotism, the English are a model worthy of imitation. Although they have strong party feeling, yet they at once unite when the national honor is endangered.

In concluding his course, the lecturer presented some interesting general views in regard to Europe. He spoke at length of the progress of civilization as seen in the multiplication of the comforts of the people, the modification of penal laws, the growing facilities for internal communication, the increase of education, the progress of temperance, and the improvements which have taken place in the character of the rulers. To this he added some suggestions in regard to the increase of pure Christianity, and the new vigor which has been infused into Protestantism, and which is rapidly restoring it to what it was soon after the Reformation.

Temperance Anniversary.—The 16th Anniversary of the New York State Temperance Society was celebrated at Albany on the 12th of February. Addresses were made by Rev. Dr. Nott of Union College, and Hon. W. H. Van Schoonhoven and Hon. W. C. Bloss of the Assembly. Resolutions were passed expressing gratitude for the success which has attended the efforts of the friends of temperance; approving of the prayer of the petitioners for an alteration of the License Law; recommending that especial attention be given to the organization of Youths' Temperance Societies, etc. An effort is to be made during the coming year to raise the sum of $10,000, to be invested for the purpose of paying the present debt of the Society, and enabling it to carry on its future operations. The sum was apportioned among the different counties, and the Executive Committee was directed to issue a circular urging immediate efforts to carry out the plan. The deliberations of the meeting were quite encouraging, and indicate a growing interest in the temperance cause.

Temperance among the Presidents.—Before the death of Mr. Madison, he gave his signature to a document expressing his conviction that ardent spirit, as a drink, was needless and hurtful; that the entire disuse of it would promote health, happiness, and virtue; and that the citizens of the United States, especially young men, would promote their own interests and the interests of the country, by discontinuing entirely to use it. The document has since been signed by Andrew Jackson, John Quincy Adams, Martin Van Buren, John Tyler, and James K. Polk. This is indeed a good beginning, and if the individuals named would give a practical demonstration of their belief, the result in the end would be most happy.

◆

Catholic Missions.—The Catholic Church has had but few missionaries for the last hundred years until quite recently. They seem of late to have entered upon the work of missions with great ardor, prompted, as they avow, by the number and success of Protestant missionaries. During five years past, they have greatly enlarged their plans for the education of youth, and have likewise brought the press considerably into use. It remains to be seen what shall be the result of this increase of effort.

◆

Catholic Movement in Germany.—An excommunicated Romish priest in Germany is endeavoring to unite the lower order of the Roman clergy for the purpose of forming a German Catholic Church independent of Rome. He opposes auricular confession, the celebration of the mass in Latin, the making of proselytes by money, and several kindred evils. He claims for clergymen the right to think and investigate freely for themselves, and to marry if they please. In some parts of the country the excitement in favor of this movement is very great. A number of the most influential men in Prussia, including several of the professors in the University, have united in an address to the priest, Czerski, expressing their sympathy with him.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:

We are much pleased with the exhibition of the state of our Tract Operations, which recently appeared in your paper. It is to be hoped that the work will go on and prosper. It would be interesting to see more frequent accounts of the proceedings of the Society, as well as of the doings of the Missionary Association and the Missionaries. It would be gratifying to know where they are laboring, that our prayers might follow them. Please suggest this.

Revival in Waterford, Ct.—It may be interesting to the readers of the Recorder to learn, that God has visited this place with a precious revival of religion. Brother Alfred B. Burdick came here about three weeks since, and through his labors, the Lord working with him, the church has been revived, backsliders reclaimed, and sinners converted. Several have been baptized, and more are expected soon to follow in the same steps. The work is evidently progressing, and extending into other sections. Lester T. Rogers.

MISSIONARY REPORT.

The following extract from the Quarterly Report of one of our Missionaries will doubtless be interesting to the members of the Missionary Association who read the Recorder. We hope to have many similar accounts to give hereafter.

S. Davison, Cor. Sec. of S. D. B. Miss. Ass.

Persia, N. Y. Feb. 9, 1845.

Dear Br. Davison:—In November last I received in a letter from Br. Gillet an appropriation from the Missionary Association. The following is my first quarterly report:—

My field of labor is peculiar. To the little church here I sustain a pastoral relation; and yet it is so circumstanced, being located in two groups, with central portions seventeen miles apart, that I have to act the part of the itinerant, preaching in each vicinity alternately; and in the surrounding and intermediate sections, I try to discharge the duties of the Missionary. My appointments are from three to five in each week, requiring more than one hundred miles travel in each month to meet them; and I am constantly, as one may say, hearing the Macedonian cry, "Come over and help us," from places to which I am not able to respond.

I preach upon the subject of the Sabbath wherever I have an opportunity; distribute tracts and papers in public and in private. But the few tracts I had gathered are now nearly gone. I wish I had many more, for I have great confidence in their salutary effects. We are organizing for the purpose of doing something in the tract cause; but it must needs be small.

Two individuals have embraced the Sabbath within this quarter; and it is thought that many others are severely tried on the subject. There are indeed very many within the field of my labor, who allow that our position is impregnable, and who cannot be induced to undertake any labored effort for the defence of their own, among whom are several ministers. Yet upon the principle of non-essentialism and expediency they find subterfuges enough to put themselves beyond reach at present. I find it much easier to convince men of the truth in this matter, than to make them feel the necessity of obeying it.

We have seen some encouraging prospects of a revival here, but the tardy progress seems to indicate that there is a wedge of gold or some Babylonish garment in the camp which should be removed. Two have been added by baptism.

CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

[Compiled for the Recorder.]

Monday, Feb. 24.

The House spent the whole day in discussing the Post Office Bill. The opponents of the bill endeavored to waste time and defeat the measure by such means; but the friends of reform were firm upon every motion.

In the Senate, after some unimportant private business, the Texas debate was resumed. Mr. Dayton of N. J. spoke ably against the resolutions of the House. The floor was then given to Mr. Berrien of Georgia.

Tuesday, Feb. 25.

In the House, several committees reported, and considerable talk arose about the Texas map, which was said to be incorrect. The Post Office Bill was then taken up. Remarks were made by Messrs. Cobb, Yancey, Dana, and Cousin, until the hour to which the debate was limited. Votes were then taken upon several of the amendments.

In the Senate, Mr. Allen of Ohio spoke in favor of annexation, and Mr. Berrien in opposition to it.

Wednesday, Feb. 26.

The House was full in expectation of action upon the Post Office Bill. An amendment was adopted providing that the bill go into operation July 1st, 1845; another providing that the rates of postage shall be, under 300 miles 5 cents, over 300 miles 10 cents. The main question was then put, and the bill passed; yeas 128, nays 74. The House then went into committee of the whole on the bill making appropriations for the improvement of harbors and rivers.

In the Senate, Mr. Miller of N. J. made a speech in opposition to annexation. Mr. Bagby of Alabama then obtained the floor, after which the Senate went into executive session. In the evening, Messrs. Bagby, Upham, and Bates, made speeches upon the Texas question.

Thursday, Feb. 27.

The House spent the whole day upon the bill for the improvement of the navigation of certain rivers, which bill was finally rejected.

In the Senate, the morning hour was given to petitions and private bills. The Texas resolutions then came up, and Mr. Crittenden of Ky. made a long and able speech against them as unconstitutional. He was followed by Mr. Archer and Mr. Johnson, after which Mr. Walker offered Mr. Benton's bill as a substitute for the resolution from the House. This amendment was discussed in the Evening Session. At length the question came upon the passage of the Joint Resolution as amended. The vote was taken about 9 o'clock, and carried by 27 to 25.

Friday, Feb. 28.

House.—The Harbor and River Bill was passed. The report was presented on the Rhode Island affairs and the accompanying resolutions, upon which Mr. Elmer, and Mr. Williams of Mass., made speeches. The House then went into committee of the whole on the Resolutions for the Annexation of Texas, which had been brought in as amended by the Senate. Five minutes were allowed for discussing the amendment. After several attempts to alter or resist the measure, the yeas and nays were finally ordered, and the amendment of the Senate was agreed to by a vote of 132 to 76. The Navy Appropriation Bill was then passed, and the House adjourned about 10 o'clock.

The Senate voted 30,000 extra copies of the Report of Commissioners of Patents. Several petitions were presented. A bill was passed to enable the Chickasaw Indians to try the validity of their claims. The Senate refused to take up the Iowa and Oregon bill. The Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation Bill was amended by striking out the $18,000 for a minister to China, and was ordered to a third reading.

Sabbath, March 1.

The House and Senate did little of importance except to pass the Post Office Bill. It came from the Senate with only a slight amendment as to the time of going into operation. This was concurred in by the House, so that the bill only awaits the signature of the President to become the law of the land. Both Houses took a recess at 3 o'clock, preparatory to a long evening session.

Evening Session.—The House passed the bill to grant land to aid in the construction of the Erie and Wabash Canal. The General Appropriation Bill was taken up, and several amendments passed. On the amendment of the Senate appropriating $275,000 to pay instalments of indemnity due under the treaty with Mexico, and which has been paid by Mexico, a separate vote was taken by tellers, who reported 57 in favor of the amendment, and 57 against it. The Speaker voted against the amendment, and it was rejected. The Fortification Bill was discussed. The Senate's amendments to the Military Academy Bill were passed.

The Senate passed the bill from the House for the admission of the State of Florida and Iowa into the Union, so that it only requires the President's signature to become a law. The Indian Appropriation bill was discussed until midnight, after which the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill was taken up. The Senate adjourned at a late hour.

Monday, March 3.

In the House, a report was made upon the memorial of Asa Whitney, of N. Y. for a grant of lands to enable him to construct a railroad from lake Michigan to the Pacific ocean with a view of making it the thoroughfare to China. The Chickasaw Indian Bill was reconsidered and rejected.

The Senate listened to a report on Indian Affairs, passed the civil and diplomatic bill, and voted a compensation to Mr. Mangum for his able discharge of the duties of President of that body.

An Evening Session of the House and Senate was held, both occupied chiefly on the same business, and frequent messages passing between them. The Harbor Bill and Foreign Postage Bill were passed. After some unimportant business, the House adjourned at 2 o'clock with a speech from Mr. Speaker Jones.

The New Cabinet.—It is now conceded, we believe, that President Polk's Cabinet is to be made up as follows:—

JAMES BUCHANAN, of Penn. Secretary of State.
R. J. WALKER, of Miss. Secretary of Treasury.
GEORGE BANCROFT, of Mass. Secretary of Navy.
WM. L. MARCY, of New York, Secretary of War.
CAVE JOHNSON, of Tenn. Postmaster General.
JOHN W. JONES, of Virginia, Attorney General.

The Postage Reduction Bill has been signed by the President, and goes into effect on the first of July.

THE INAUGURATION.

The Inauguration of James K. Polk as President of the United States, took place at Washington on Tuesday, March 4. The scene was imposing, and was witnessed by several thousand spectators. A Government Express reached New York at 10 o'clock P. M., bringing the Inaugural Address, of which the following is a summary:—

ADDRESS.

The Address commences with an allusion to the President's unsolicited election; his feeling of dependence upon the Almighty Ruler; his determination to adhere to the Constitution; and his high estimate of the blessings secured to our happy land by the Federal Union. Any attempt to disturb the compromises upon which the Union was formed, must be fraught with disastrous consequences. There is one danger, to which the Address alludes as follows:—

"It is a source of deep regret, that, in some sections of our country, misguided persons have occasionally indulged in schemes and agitations, whose object is the destruction of domestic institutions existing in other sections—institutions which existed at the adoption of the Constitution, and were recognized and protected by it. All must see that if it were possible for them to be successful in attaining their object, the dissolution of the Union, and the consequent destruction of our happy form of government, must speedily follow." * * *

"With these views of the nature, character, and objects of the government, and the value of the Union, I shall steadily oppose the creation of those institutions and systems which, in their nature, tend to pervert it from its legitimate purposes, and make it the instrument of sections, classes, and individuals. We need no national banks, or other extraneous institutions, planted around the government, to control or strengthen it in opposition to the will of its authors. Experience has taught us how unnecessary they are as auxiliaries of the public authorities, how impotent for good, and how powerful for mischief.

"Ours was intended to be a plain and frugal government; and I shall regard it to be my duty to recommend to Congress, and, as far as the execution is concerned, to enforce by all the means within my power, the strictest economy in the expenditure of the public money which may be compatible with the public interests." * * *

"I congratulate my fellow citizens on the entire restoration of the credit of the general government of the Union, and that of many of the States. Happy would it be for the indebted States, if they were freed from their liabilities, many of which were incautiously contracted." * * *

The Tariff.

"I have heretofore declared to my fellow-citizens, that, in 'my judgment, it is the duty of the government to extend, as far as it may be practicable to do so, by its revenue laws, and all other means within its power, fair and just protection to all the great interests of the whole Union, embracing agriculture, manufactures, the mehcanic arts, commerce, and navigation.' I have also declared my opinion to be 'in favor of a tariff for revenue,' and that, 'in adjusting the details of such a tariff, I have sanctioned such moderate discriminating duties as would produce the amount of revenue needed, and at the same time, afford reasonable incidental protection to our home industry;' and that I was 'opposed to a tariff for protection merely, and not for revenue.'" * * *

Texas.

The republic of Texas has made known her desire to come into our Union, to form a part of our confederacy, and enjoy with us the blessings of liberty secured and guarantied by our constitution. Texas was once a part of our country—was unwisely ceded away to a foreign power—is now independent, and possesses an undoubted right to dispose of a part or the whole of her territory, and to merge her sovereignty as a separate and independent State, in ours. I congratulate my country that, by an act of the late Congress of the United States, the assent of this government has been given to the reunion; and it only remains for the two countries to agree upon the terms, to consummate an object so important to both.

I regard the question of annexation as belonging exclusively to the United States and Texas. They are independent powers, competent to contract; and foreign nations have no right to interfere with them, or to take exceptions to their reunion. * * * * * *

Perceiving no valid objection to the measure, and many reasons for its adoption, vitally affecting the peace, the safety, and the prosperity of both countries, I shall, on the broad principle which formed the basis and produced the adoption of our constitution, and not in any narrow spirit of sectional policy, endeavor, by all constitutional, honorable, and appropriate means, to consumate the expressed will of the people and government of the United States, by the reannexation of Texas to our Union at the earliest practicable period.

Oregon.

Nor will it become in a less degree my duty to assert and maintain by all constitutional means the right of the United States to that portion of our territory which lies beyond the Rocky Mountains. Our title to the country of Oregon is "clear and unquestionable;" and already our people are preparing to perfect that title by occupying it with their wives and children.

* * * * * *

The President concludes his Address by promising, that in our foreign relations great respect shall be had to the rights of other nations as well as to our own; that the laws shall be faithfully executed, without yielding to party influences; and that for aid to do all this, he relies upon the Divine Being.

The Texas Resolutions.—The Joint Resolutions for Annexing Texas to the United States were signed by President Tyler on Saturday, March 1. As this settles the question, and is likely to lead to most important results, we publish below the resolutions with the amendment annexed:—

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That Congress doth consent that the territory properly included within, and rightfully belonging to, the Republic of Texas, may be erected into a new State, to be called the State of Texas, with a republican form of government, to be adopted by the people of said Republic, by deputies in convention assembled, with the consent of the existing government, in order that the same may be admitted as one of the States of this Union.

Sec. 2. And be it further resolved, That the foregoing consent of Congress is given upon the following conditions, and with the following guaranties, to wit:

First. Said State to be formed, subject to the adjustment by this Government of all questions of boundary that may arise with other governments; and the constitution thereof, with the proper evidence of its adoption by the people of said Republic of Texas, shall be transmitted to the President of the United States, to be laid before Congress for its final action, on or before the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and forty-six.

Second. Said State, when admitted into the Union, after ceding to the United States all public edifices, fortifications, barracks, ports and harbors, navy and navy yards, docks, magazines, arms, armaments, and all other porperty and means pertaining to the public defence, belonging to said Republic of Texas, shall retain all the public funds, debts, taxes, and dues of every kind which may belong to or be due or owing said Republic; and shall also retain all the vacant and unappropriated lands lying within its limits, to be applied to the payment of the debts and liabilities of said Republic of Texas; and the residue of said lands, after discharging said debts and liabilities, to be disposed of as said State may direct; but in no event are said debts and liabilities to become a charge upon the government of the United States.

Third. New States, of convenient size, not exceeding four in number, in addition to said State of Texas, and having sufficient population, may hereafter, by the consent of said State, be formed out of the territory thereof, which shall be entitled to admission under the provisions of the Federal Constitution. And such states as may be formed out of that portion of said territory lying south of thirty-six degrees thirty minutes north latitude, commonly known as the Missouri compromise line, shall be admitted into the Union, with or without slavery, as the people of each state asking admission may desire. And in such state or states as shall be formed out of said territory north of said Missouri compromise line, slavery or involuntary servitude (except for crime) shall be prohibited.

Mr. Walker's Amendment.

And be it further resolved, That if the President of the United States shall, in his judgment and discretion, deem it most advisable, instead of proceeding to submit the foregoing resolution to the Republic of Texas as an overture on the part of the United States for admission, to negotiate with that Republic, then—

Be it Resolved, That a state, to be formed out of the present Republic of Texas, with suitable extent and boundaries, and with two Representatives in Congress, until the next apportionment of representation, shall be admitted into the Union, by virtue of this act, on an equal footing with the existing states, as soon as the terms and conditions of such admission, and the cession of the remaining Texan territory to the United States, shall be agreed upon by the governments of Texas and the United States.

And be it further enacted, That the sum of one hundred thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby appropriated to defray the expenses of missions and negotiations, to agree upon the terms of said admission and cession, either by treaty to be submitted to the Senate, or by articles to be submitted to the two Houses of Congress, as the President may direct.

Mexican Views of Annexation.—The Washington Correspondent of the N. Y. Express writes as follows under date of March 1:—

It is with deep regret that I inform you that Gen. Almonte, the Mexican Minister, is only waiting for President Tyler to sign the Texan Annexation Resolutions, and to make the usual proclamation, which will soon be done, to DEMAND HIS PASSPORTS AND MAKE HIS PROTEST, and to retire and break up all official relation with the Government of the United States.

Despatches were forwarded by the Mexican delegation, yesterday, by express, to New Orleans, to be sent to the city of Mexico, informing the Government of the passage of the Texan Resolutions.

Private letters from the highest sources, from that city, state that the instant the intelligence is received there, the Government of Mexico will declare war and issue letters of marque and reprisal.

Letters also received from Mexico, of the latest date, state that the prostration of Santa Ana has reconciled all parties, and that the most influential men of both sections are opposed to the Cabinet, that Santa Ana will not be executed, but that he will be banished; and that he will retire to the island of Cuba.

It is represented that the greatest enthusiasm prevails, both with the people and the Government, that Texas shall not be touched by the United States, and on this question all parties are agreed and united.

Santa Ana in Mexico.—A gentleman just from Mexico informs us that it is impossible, for those who have not witnessed it, to conceive the full measure of indignity which is now heaped upon the head of the tyrant. Santa Ana himself says that the treatment he received at Texas, while a prisoner, was infinitely more humane than that he experiences at the hands of his own countrymen. The long-pent-up wrath of the Mexicans now finds vent in a thousand different ways. Every portrait, every statue, everything, in short, that might keep alive a remembrance of the tyrant, has been insulted, mutilated and destroyed; his name is introduced in ribald songs, and sung at every corner; caricatures are hawked about showing him in every conceivable odious light; rude jests and obscene pasquinades are let off at his expense, and his past acts are coupled with every thing infamous. But a few weeks since, and this same populace dared not breathe his name save to praise. [N. O. Pic.

Singular Explosion.—As Mr. James Griswold and son, J. Griswold, Jr. of Wethersfield, were coming to the city in a boat, they picked up near the Hartford bar a piece of timber with a cord attached. On getting it on board they found that an India rubber bag about the size of a man's hat was attached to the other end, with a tube protruding from one side. When they came to the wharf several persons gathered around to examine it. The India rubber cloth was fastened to the tube by a cord. This was untied, a piece of the tube slipped off, when the under tube appeared with a cork in it, tightly sealed. The cork was removed, and as it was pulled out an explosion followed as loud as the report of a swivel. It must have contained about two pounds of powder. Alva Squiers, Joseph S. Pease, Philo Thrall and James Griswold, Jr. were badly injured and lacerated. It is surprising that Mr. Squiers, who pulled out the cork, was not killed. It is supposed this torpedo was designed for mischief.

Extraordinary Decision.—A great sensation has been created in this city, we are told, by a recent decision in one of our courts. It is stated that a large extent of property in Philadelphia, valued at from four to six millions, and covering whole squares of dwellings, was lately laid claim to by the heirs of one James Patrick, all of which property in the course of years got into the hands of a variety of owners. The property had been originally confiscated, it was said, and each proprietor conceived his title therefore a good one. The decision of the court in favor of the heir of Mr. Patrick is therefore astounding! It renders hundred of title deeds worthless as so much brown paper!

What a tremendous fall from affluence to poverty this will occasion to hundreds of our reputedly wealthy citizens. [Phil. Spirit of the Times.

Important Supreme Court Decision.—The U. S. Supreme Court has given its decision—it is said unanimously—affirming the decision of the Court of Appeals of Maryland in the case of Washington County against the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company. This suit was brought to recover one million of dollars from the Railroad Company, because the road was not carried through Washington County. In both Courts the decision has been unanimously in favor of the Railroad Company.

Suicide by a Medical Student.—The Coroner held an inquest on Friday on the body of James S. S. Olcott, aged 27, a native of Savannah, (where he had highly respectable connections,) who committed suicide by hanging himself with his handkerchief to his bed-post last night, at his boarding house No. 648 Broadway. He had got into bad company, became dissipated and drank to excess, which tended partially to alienate his mind. He took ladanum first and that not proving sufficient he terminated his life by hanging.

Slavery in Illinois.—The correspondent of the St. Louis Republican, at Springfield, Ill., writes, that the Supreme Court of that State, on the 11th instant, decided a very important case, which was taken up on the part of Joseph, a man of color, from the St. Clair Circuit Court. They decided that all the children born of French slaves in the State since the ordinance of 1798, are FREE. This will destroy and wipe away every thing like slavery in Illinois. The opinion was delivered by Justice Young, and the bench was divided—seven being in favor of the opinion and two against it.

SUMMARY.

Religious Persecution seems not to have ceased in Denmark. Mr. Moenster, of whose imprisonment we published an account some weeks ago, is now in prison for the fifth time in consequence of his dissent from the established church, and his perseverance in preaching the Gospel in its simplicity.

A public debate was recently held in New York, between Dr. Smith (a colored gentleman,) and a Mr. Grant, growing out of an assertion of the latter gentleman, that the negro race is at present incapacitated for a high state of civilization. It is said that Mr. Grant argued his position with much shrewdness, but found more than a match in Dr. Smith, whose reading and observation not less than his own intellectual character, eminently qualified him for the discussion.

The "Occident" for March informs us that the Jewish Synagogue at Cleaveland, Ohio, was destroyed by fire on the night of Feb. 5th, and that nothing was saved but the manuscript copies of the law. An appeal is made to Israelites and others to assist in rebuilding it.

By the report of the Croton Aqueduct Board, for the quarter ending January first, it appears that the receipts for the quarter were $3,817 68; expenditures $11,021 88.

In New Hampshire, it appears by the "Congregational Journal," that one out of every 38 of the adult male population, bears a civil or military title. Probably the proportion is nearly the same in other States. The remark that accompanies the statement is a pungent and just one. "Is not such a multiplication of officers absurd, and such affectation of titles ridiculous? With all their boasted democracy, our countrymen exceed all nations in the passion for titles, as silly as they are innumerable."

A resolution in favor of appointing a State Superintendent of Common Schools, after able speeches in its favor by Rev. Dr. Eddy of Newark and others, was adopted by a large majority.

MARRIED,

In Verona, N. Y., on the evening of the 20th ult., by Eld. Charles M. Lewis, Mr. Albert Babcock, of Brookfield, to Miss Orletta S. Green, of the former place.

DIED,

In Shiloh N. J., Feb. 26, 1845, Mrs. Rebecca A. Davis, wife of Enoch J. Davis, in the 34th year of her age. At the age of 18 Mrs. Davis made a profession of religion. That profession she adorned by a walk and conversation in a high degree consistent and pious. Her last illness, (pulmonary consumption,) she bore with exemplary patience, composure, and fortitude. While passing through the dark valley of the shadow of death, she was enabled to adopt as her own, the language of Him, who, going before, had illuminated that darkness: "The cup which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?"

Not for life's sunny hours,
  I took the vows of God;
Not for the way side flowers,
  The narrow path I trod;
Not for the blest communion
  Of gentle friends on earth,
I sought a holy union
  With those of heavenly birth,—
But for a land, where never
  Is seen the cloud or thorn,
Where friends commingle ever
  With Christ, the elder born.

Then seek not to detain me;
  Friends, sister, let me go!
Brothers! why longer claim me,
  Ye know not what ye do.
And ye, whose love still stonger
  My trembling heart-strings thrill,
Ye may not clasp me longer,
  Husband, and child, farewell!
While strength my soul receiveth,
  Even at the grave's dark brink,
The cup my Father giveth,
  Shall I refuse to drink? L. M. C.

REMORSE.

Wo! wo to him whose he[illegible] is black
With evil deeds that sting and stain,
And blasted like the lighting's track,
That stretches o'er the summer plain!
To him! for all it doth contain,
Its sun and sky, its flowers and streams,
The earth is but a dark domain,
All swarming with terrific dreams!

The flowers that open to the sky
And sparkle in the morning rays,
Remind him of the purity,
The loveliness of former days;
The stream that all untroubled strays
Through lily banks and palmy bowers,
Reminds him of his blissful ways,
Ere sin had withered all their flowers.

His memory of the seasons past,
Is but of pleasures that have fled
Away, like rose-leaves in the blast—
Away, like the departed dead;
His future hopes, that wont to shed
A radiance through his hours of gloom,
Are dreary as the shades that spread
Around a murderer's midnight tomb!

His waking thoughts are like a flame
That burn within him—fierce, though dim!
Like fever in his wasting frame,
That thrills through every quaking limb:
His dreams of rest—no rest to him—
Are filled with phantoms of affright:
Phantoms of happy days, that swim
Around him on the clouds of night.

His life is an oppressive load,
That hangs upon him like a curse,
For all the pleasure-thoughts that glow'd,
Are now extinguish'd by Remorse!
And death—oh death? 'tis worse! 'tis worse!
How dreadful in the grave to lie,
Yet sleep not! ever more to nurse
The worm that will not, cannot die!

Wo! wo to him—his name is felt
Like poison on the pious tongue,
He dare not kneel, as once he knelt
In prayer to God, when pure and young;
Yet cling to God, as thou hast clung,
Lorn wretch! amid thy spirit's strife
Repent, while thus thy heart is wrung,
For there is hope while there is life.

KNOX.

THE TRUE END AND AIM OF WOMAN.

"Can any thing new be said on this trite subject?" my youthful reader may perhaps exclaim, as the above caption meets her eye. Perhaps not, my young friend; yet there are old truths of so much importance that their frequent repetition is not only excusable but necessary, and such are the truths which pertain to the character and destiny of woman. Occupying as she does, a social position in which her influence must be widely and permanently felt, it is of the first importance that she should rightly understand her own nature, her own capabilities, and her own duties. She has too long been the victim of mental and moral empiricism, and the sad consequences of this treatment may be traced through all classes of society, in a general deterioration of manners and morals. At one time, our sex have been extolled as goddesses, and worshipped with a blind devotion that partook strongly of the ludicrous. At another, they have been looked upon as inferior beings, created only to minister to the gratification of man, and unfit to share his thoughts, his cares, or his responsibilities. It has been found in the nineteenth century, that neither of these opinions are true. Woman has been found to be neither an angel nor a fiend; neither too good for censure, nor too bad for confidence and trust; neither above nor below the ordinary duties of humanity, but a rational, immortal being, possessing substantially the same powers and faculties as man, and like him, placed here for a little while, in preparation for a future and endless state of existence. If this view of the subject be correct, it follows then, that those who would make woman all heart, and those who would make her all intellect—those who would have her all yielding softness, and those who would endow her with unbending stoicism; those who would limit her entirely to the range of domestic duties, and those who overlook these duties, while soaring with a Bacon, a Locke, or a Newton, are all erroneous in opinion and wrong in practice. Let her be what God has made her,

> "A spirit, yet a woman too;
> A household creature, not too good
> For human nature's daily food."

A being like her fellow, man, moulded by circumstances, and capable of becoming by right training, an ornament and blessing to the world.

I have been led to these reflections, by the perusal of an article published recently, entitled, Love and Courtship. A well known writer has remarked that there are falsehoods so subtle and so pernicious, that a single drop would be sufficient to poison the well in which Truth herself dwelt. This remark is, I think, applicable to a sentiment advanced in that article more than once, and which, accompanied as it is with just and noble ideas on the subject, is calculated to do immense mischief.

The following is the sentiment to which I allude.—Speaking of love, the writer says, "that which is reality the essence of woman's being, and the highest and holiest among her capabilities," &c; and again of love, "it is woman's all, her wealth, her power, her very being woman centres all in that one feeling, and

By love here, the peculiar affection existing between the sexes, called par excellence the "tender passion," must of course be meant, else the remarks would have no connexion with what precedes and follows them. Now is it true, that love in this sense, constitutes the "essence of woman's being," that without which "she has no life?" Let us see what consequences follow this admission.

A very large and highly respectable class of females, have always been found, who for various reasons, lead a life of "single blessedness." Some perhaps have never known the feeling of love in its full strength; some have lost the object of their affections by death, and others by a trial still more severe, have been separated from him they loved, by unworthiness, or desertion. In all these cases the result is the same. "Love's young dream" is forever over, and the stern realities of life are to be encountered without "a protector and guide." By the sentiment alluded to, this large class of single women are summarily blotted out of existence. They may continue to vegetate, but cannot be said to live. True, they are social beings still, bound by a thousand ties to the great family of which they form a part, and surrounded by numerous channels in which generous feeling and action may expend itself.—True, they are intellectual and moral beings still, gifted with noble mental powers, and allied to angels and to God, by a nature, capable of unlimited expansion and progression through the boundless ages of eternity. But what avails all this, to those who in outliving the heart's first love, or having never experienced it, have lost "the essence of their being," the very life of life? Alas for such women as Hannah More, and Joanna Baillie, and Maria Edgworth, and Harriet Martineau, and I may add, our own Catharine Sedgwick, if the propositions of this writer be correct. One thing, however, must, I think, be conceded, that though dead, these ladies have done far more for society, than very many who are living in the full enjoyment of happy and requited affection.

I have referred to Hannah More. As her case is one in point, let us look at it a little more in detail. In early life, her affections were sought and won, by a gentleman whose character and standing in society promised her a settlement in life every way unexceptionable. From what we know of Miss More, we cannot doubt that she truly loved him, for the matter went so far, that the preparations for the marriage were all concluded. For some cause not stated by her biographer, the gentleman at that late hour broke off the negociation, and declined fulfilling his engagement. Those of my youthful readers who have imbibed the sentiment I am opposing, will consider it the duty of the lady in such a case, to die of a broken heart—or if this is impossible, at least to wear the willow, and ever after to languish in interesting melancholy. Truth obliges me to say, Miss More did neither. Whatever she may at the time have felt, she gave way to no feelings of gloom or sadness, but addressed herself with sober earnestness to the every-day duties of life. Her four sisters, all of them single women, had charge of a seminary for young ladies, and until she devoted herself entirely to literary pursuits, Miss More was their able assistant. Possessed of an enlarged and highly cultivated mind, a brilliant imagination, a refined taste, and a heart alive to every noble and generous emotion, she soon became an authoress, and her earliest works were received by the literary public with an enthusiasm never before elicited by the first productions of an unknown aspirant for fame. While still a young woman, she took her place among the literati of the land, the friend and associate of such men as Garrick, and Reynolds, and Burke, and Johnson, and of such women as Miss Aikin, Mrs. Barbauld, Mrs. Delany, and Mrs. Montagu. At this time she was a stranger to vital godliness, but a few short years sufficed to show her the emptiness and vanity of earthly fame and earthly pleasures, and she turned from them to seek a more durable portion in the kingdom of God, and his righteousness. From that period, this admirable woman, though in the great and fashionable world, was not of it. She preserved her simplicity of heart, and singleness of purpose, in the midst of fascinations and allurements such as we, in this different state of society, can hardly conceive. The honored and cherished guest of nobility, and even of royalty—the idol of the great and the gay, who read her works and admired her example, though they would not imitate it—she was at the same time, the sympathizing friend, the venerated counsellor and guide of the poor and afflicted among whom she lived, and to whom she was indeed a guardian angel. While her larger works, though full of unwelcome truths, were hailed with delight in the circles of fashion, & were to be found in every drawing room and boudoir in the land, her "Cheap Repository Tracts" were equally welcome at the fireside of the humble cottager, and performed a work of love there which angels might have coveted. During the whole of a long life she was constantly employed in doing good by her conversation, her example, her personal labors, her purse and her pen, and died at the advanced age of eighty, beloved and lamented by all ranks, from the prince to the humblest peasant. And yet Miss More was what is termed "an old maid," and after her disappointment in youth, probably never felt the passion of love again. Had she no existence separate from that of the "affections," in this peculiar sense?

But there is another point of view, in which this error appears still more pernicious. It is precisely the sentiment advanced in all the trashy and disgusting fictions with which our country is flooded, and which has done so much to degrade our literature and corrupt our morals as a nation. "All for love, or the world well lost," is the leading idea stamped on every page, and it finds a ready echo in the romantic imagination of the young girl by whom it is eagerly devoured. She has been told on good authority, that love is the "whole of a woman's existence," and unable to see the difference between the compound of vanity, frivolity and selfishness, which she calls love, and the noble passion intended by the writer in question, she surrenders herself to the guidance of impulse, without an attempt to reason correctly or act prudently. If the man she loves is a villain, woe to the unsuspecting creature who has trusted her all in his hands! Her story will be that of thousands before her, who believing in the omnipotence of love, and the impossibility of resisting its claims, have become the prey of the spoiler, and sunk to rise no more. God forbid that the friends of virtue should ever incautiously give utterance to a sentiment, which can lead to a result so deplorable.

I trust no one will imagine, from what I have said, that I wish to depreciate the passion of love, or the holy relations to which it gives rise. Far from it. He who made the race, and knew best what would conduce to our happiness, instituted the domestic relations, and implanted in our nature the desire of loving and being beloved. There can be no doubt that married life, where there is a union of hearts, and congeniality of temper and sentiment, is productive of a greater amount of happiness, than celibacy can boast. Let our daughters be taught this, and let them be taught to look forward with rational hopes and expectations to this most important and interesting relation. But, in the name of all that is valuable in this world and the next, let them be made to feel that love and marriage are not essential to their respectability, usefulness, or comfort. Thousands, from the dread of being called "old maids," have rushed into an ill-assorted union, and thus entailed upon themselves wretchedness for life. We who are mothers, owe it to our daughters, to save them, if possible, from a fate like this. Let us teach them that as members of the human family, and creatures of God, there are duties which they owe to themselves, to society, and to Him who died for them, entirely independent of courtship, love, or marriage. Let their minds be fortified and strengthened by sound and practical views of life, instead of being enervated by false sentiment. Above all, let us never rest satisfied until we have the assurance that they are under the guidance of religious principle, and can say from the heart, "Whatever my Father appoints for me, is best." Then should they feel the anguish of disappointed affection, (from which maternal love and vigilance cannot always save them,) they will still be in possession of rich resources,—and while passing alone through the world, may diffuse blessings around them, and find in the various social and domestic relations they sustain, ample exercise for every power and faculty of mind and body with which God has endowed them.

[Adv. Moral Reform.

COQUETRY.

Coquetry is a vice. This position is evinced both by its intrinsic nature and its tendencies. The world has ever spontaneously concurred in thus regarding it. Not only the virtuous and intelligent, but those who are more or less destitute of these characteristics, have visited it with frowns and indignant reprobation. This general hostility, however, has consisted rather in mere temporary excitements of feeling, in view of special cases, than in an intelligent array of opposition, founded on the intrinsic sinfulness and pernicious tendency of coquetry in every form and instance of its exercise. It has, therefore, failed to arrest the evil, as is evinced by the extent to which it is practieed, and the amount of unhappiness which it produces. What is needed is that the subject should be investigated and seen in its true light, so that instead of an abatement, there shall be an increased intensity of public sentiment against it. The youth of both sexes must be taught, from their first commingling with society, to hold the affections as sacred, and to consider it both an immorality and a cruelty, to trifle with them in any way.

Coquetry is not confined to sex or circumstances. City and country, wealth and poverty, the most refined and educated, as well as the less cultivated circles—in short, all ranks and conditions, alike, furnish their examples of treachery and trifling with the purest and tenderest affections that ever flowed from a human soul towards its fellows.

One has denominated the coquette "a hypocrite in love affairs." It would perhaps be a better description, to say, that he or she is one who seeks to gain the affections of the opposite sex, without designing to reciprocate them. In short, the coquette is, in the worst sense, a thief of the heart. Professing, or manifesting honorable intentions, but inwardly meaning no such thing, they secure their victim's heart, and use its richest forthgoings and treasures, as the playthings of the passing hour—to be cast lightly away when the hour is gone. They little reck how much it may bleed, and, in some cases, would scarce heave a sigh, should life ebb away. The consequences of their course are perhaps seldom distinctly contemplated, but if they are, the temptations to pursue it overcome their scruples respecting its propriety, and awakened regrets give place to a more reckless indifference as to its results.

The inducements to such an unworthy practice are various. Mirror forth to public gaze the heart of a coquette, and in a most conspicuous place would appear, in legible characters, Pride of conquest—the moving spring. An inward self-complacency swells the heart of the man or woman, who, by insinuating arts, can sway the emotions and engross the affections of those who come within the reach of their influence. When such pride is stimulated by the conscious possession of a beautiful countenance or pleasing manners, success is much surer, as these are, at once, means to secure, and inducements to attempt, these guilty and cruel conquests. We cannot but admire beauty, wherever found. The beautiful flowers which deck the green earth and breathe sweet fragrance in our pathway, thrill us with delight—and when the skilful artist portrays Nature's beauties with pen or pencil, we bow, by constraint, to the same charm. With how much more complacency do we behold the productions of Heaven's Artist in man—his form erect in symmetry and grace, and his face with its two-fold beauty, the physical and the intellectual. Think, then, of the facility with which mind can influence mind, when acting through a prepossessing exterior. A lady, conscious of her personal charms, strives to set them forth in their strongest attraction, that she may the more easily gain admiring glances—her wardrobe and her toilet are consulted with the strictest care, and her attire adjusted with the most perfect taste. Every word, every motion, every glance of the eye, she seeks to inspire with a charm which will secure the admiration and dear esteem of her gentlemen associates. And when those hearts are won, she feels no pang in chilling by cold rejection their ardent applications for a reciprocation,—and, among her companions, boasts of her numerous offers, and speaks with disdain of the very persons she has thus cruelly encouraged, and then repulsed.

The gentleman, whom nature or education has adorned with unusual endowments, is at no less expense of pains to render himself the object of admiration—he appears with most insinuating address, with graceful look and gesture, his conversation fraught with interest, and his expressions of regard uttered in "passion's tenderest cadences," but woe to her whose heart is beguiled by his fascinations.—The man who thus prides himself upon his power of conquest, or winning traits of character, is prepared to dash the cup of anticipated pleasure from her lips, or fill it with disappointment's bitterest dregs. And, to enhance her misery, will pretend that ladies in general are so easily enlisted, that he cannot mingle in their society without trouble! The character of such conduct, when compared with the true standard of morality, needs scarcely a comment. Every heart that loves humanity will accord in saying—let such be proscribed as undeserving even of the privileges of friendship.

As is the case with most immoralities, the tendencies of coquetry develope its glaring deformity. While the coquette sways a ruling power over unwary hearts, and exults in such conquests, the merited retribution, which must sooner or later be endured, is quite forgotten. Upon their own character is exerted an influence deleterious in many respects. Sympathy, that cordial for life's woes, that heavenly balm for wounded hearts, becomes perpetually dormant in their bosoms, or its susceptibility entirely extinguished. They have so long and so often witnessed and occasioned scenes of agony and real torture, without permitting their soul to be moved, but rather glorying in their power to charm, that their feelings naturally and necessarily become hard as the flinty rock at sight of such exhibitions. Is not this their real loss? Who, that knows the bliss of exercising such sympathy, would be denied the privilege?

Another tendency is to diminish the capability of pure, strong, and ardent affection, in any of our constituted relations. How bleak and dreary would this world be, should this tendency of coquetry be fully realized. Its wintry blast would sweep over the soul, without being mitigated by one enlivening genial ray. Thank God, for the ties, which, like the tendrils of the vine, cluster about, and bind reciprocating hearts in friendship or love—for the sacred, social sympathies which tune harmonious thoughts and wake the melodies of life. The enjoyment of such melodies, in all their sweetness, the coquette cannot expect.

Fancy, too, has gained so much the ascendancy, that Reason's voice is disregarded. The choice of a companion is made to turn upon the slightest circumstance. A gentleman or lady may possess every qualification which reason would demand, to render life useful and happy—but perhaps one is too tall, another too short, another too homely, and another too deficient in etiquette. Thus fancy misguides and perverts the mind that has been used to coquetish arts. But she sometimes brings her own retribution—a choice, at length, is fixed by some unessential quality, accompanied by others, (perhaps unperceived.) which doom all future life to unmingled misery. Not unfrequently, "the inaudible and noiseless foot of Time" comes on apace, and finds them in lonely happiness, with wrinkled brow and silvered locks, when Reason and Fancy are both denied their wonted privilege.

> "Woe to the youth whom Fancy gains—
> Winning from Reason's hand the reins!
>
> * * * *
>
> And woe to those who train such youth,
> And spare to press the rights of truth—
> The mind to strengthen and anneal,
> While on the stithy glows the steel!
> O teach him, while your lessons last,
> To judge the present by the past;
> Remind him of each wish pursued,
> How rich it glow'd with promis'd good:
> Remind him of each wish enjoy'd,
> How soon his hopes possession cloy'd!
> Tell him, we play unequal game
> Whene'er we shoot by Fancy's aim!"

Who shall describe the lacerated and bleeding affections, the blighted hopes, the painful remembrances, the sense of wrong and outrage, the universal desolation of soul, which the victims of coquetry experience? None but those who have felt them can—and such will not. Their bitterness rejects and shrinks from publicity, and, of course, they derive slight consolation from sympathy. How naturally would any young gentleman—the victim of a coquette's conquest and rejection—confine the knowledge of the treatment he has received within his own bosom! How naturally would a young lady seek to hide it from notoriety! Under such circumstances, she often conceals the ordeal through which she is passing, even from a sympathizing mother or friend. She adopts the course of Viola—

> "Who never told her love—
> But let concealment, like a worm i' th' bud,
> Feed on her damask cheek; she pin'd in thought."

Anguish seizes her inmost soul, and unless she have an indomitable will, which nerves her energies to rise above the trial, or an unwavering confidence in a faithful Heavenly Friend, to strengthen such resolution, she often broods over her sorrows, till, like a consuming fire, they exhaust her vitality, and the grave becomes her resting-place.

In addition to the consequences already mentioned, it deserves to be noticed, that during the engrossment of the victim's affections, by the coquette, other and preferable alliances might have been formed, the recollection of which is no slight ingredient in their cup of misery. Also, should the knowledge of their rejection come abroad, it has a depreciating influence upon their standing in society, and operates unfavorably upon their future prospects.

What must be the saddening, sickening reflections of a coquette, who turns to memory's scroll, and reads the record there of burning tears, aching hearts, and the wreck of human hopes? and what must be their forebodings, when the searching monitor within points to the retributions of a future world?

Adv. Moral Reform.

ROMANTIC INCIDENT.—In 1837, a citizen of Connecticut removed to Michigan. One day, shortly after his arrival in that country, his son, a lad of four years old, went into the woods with a girl to pick berries. He started to go home, which was in sight of the spot, alone—but never reached there. Search was made for the wanderer without effect, and he was finally given up as lost. Within a few weeks, the father found, and recognized by infallible marks, his lost child, in the employ of a citizen of Greenville, Connecticut, to whom he had been apprenticed by the overseers of the poor of Albany. It appeared that the child had wandered into the woods, when he left his companion seven years before, and there had been met and carried off by a party of strolling Indians. In this family he had wandered about, a portion of the time in the state of New York, until, on a visit to Albany, he had been taken from his kidnappers by some citizens, who noted that he was a white child, and placed in the alms-house. Here his employer found him, and he was taken to his native state, to be restored in a wonderful manner to his parents.

A TRIUMPH OF ART.—We witnessed a very satisfactory triumph of the dental art over a sad deformity, or rather deficiency of nature, in the case of a young man, of twenty-three years of age. He was born with a hair-lip, and without a palate. In the front of his upper jaw, and along the roof of his mouth, and especially at the back part, was a hideous chasm, making it quite impossible for him to articulate. Dr. Morton had fitted him with an artificial roof of the mouth, palate, and front teeth, and not only hiding the deformity, but restoring, or rather creating a faculty of articulation. The blessing conferred by such a triumph of ingenuity and skill, can scarcely be estimated by one to whom nature has given all the organs of our wonderful frame in perfection. It is like adding a new sense or new life.—Emancipator.

"ROME is in its single self a whole world of wonders, ancient and modern, and the newly arrived traveler finds himself bewildered in the 'embarrassment of riches.' St. Peter's calls him on one side, the Coliseum on another; a living Pope rivals a dead Emperor; the Apollo Belvidere is a mile from the Dying Gladiator; the Forum, the Pantheon, the Tarpeian rock, the Temple of Vesta, the Catacombs, and the thousand other objects of deep interest are scattered over an immense area, and attract you in every direction, so that if their magnetic powers were all equal, they would keep you balanced immoveably in their centre, like Mahomet's coffin at Mecca, and you would see nothing because there was so much to see."

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

THIS Institution has a pleasant and quiet location thirteen miles south-east of Angelica, and six miles south of Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y., under the care of W. C. KENYON, as Principal, and Miss CAROLINE B. MAXSON, as Preceptress, aided by able and experienced assistants.

Teachers' Classes will be exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining every facility of a Normal School, without its usual disadvantages. Within the past year, more than one hundred and fifty students of the institution have been employed as teachers in this and the adjacent counties—a number much larger than from any other institution in the State.

Students are prepared for entering any class in College. Ample advantages are also secured to those pursuing Modern Languages and the Fine Arts. The institution is liberally endowed and supplied with a choice and valuable library, and apparatus sufficiently extensive to illustrate every department of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. It has also well selected cabinets of Geological, Mineralogical and Conchological specimens.

The plan of instruction aims at the development of the moral, intellectual and physical powers of students, so as to render them thorough, accurate, and practical scholars.

Lectures on Chemistry, accompanied by a full course of experiments, will commence with the second week of the fall term, and continue daily to its close. During the fall and winter terms, daily lectures will be given on School Teaching. Lectures on Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Physiology, illustrated by experiments, will be given each term of the year.

TUITION, per term of fifteen weeks, from $3,50 to $5. Board per week, in private families, $1. The entire expense of the academic year, including tuition, board, washing, light, and fuel, need not exceed $60. No extra charges incurred.

President of the Board of Trustees

ANTIQUITIES AND CURIOSITIES OF LONDON.

St. John's Gate is an object of interest from the historical events with which it is associated. It was once the head-quarters of the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem; and near by it, as is now supposed, Wat Tyler and his men held their great feast. It is the entrance to St. John's Square, Clerkenwell, and consists of a large pointed arch, with a Gothic window directly over the street, and a square tower on either side. At one time it formed part of the ancient priory of Clerkenwell Subsequently, however, the publisher of the Gentleman's Magazine resided there, during which time Garrick, Dr. Johnson, and other eminent characters, were frequent visiters at the place. At present, the building on one side of the street is occupied as a tavern, and on the other as a watch-house. The room over the gateway has recently been fitted up somewhat after the ancient style, and is the place of meeting for a club which assembles there for the purpose of cherishing the memory of the Knights.

The London Stone is supposed to have been that from which the Romans measured their distances to the several stations in different parts of the country. It is probably the oldest relic in the city. Shakspeare represents Jack Cade as striking his sword upon it when he exclaimed, "Now is Mortimer lord of London." It is imbedded in the outer wall of St. Swithin's Church, Cannon street. Frequent touches from the hands of passers have worn it smooth.

Temple Bar is a stone building of the Corinthian order, thrown across a thronged thoroughfare near the junction of the Strand and Fleet street. It consists of a large centre arch with gates, on each side of which is an arched postern for foot passengers. Over the center arch, on both sides of the building, are Gothic windows and royal statues. It was built by Sir Christopher Wren about 1670, and is the only city gate now remaining in a perfect state. It marks the western point of the old city, and of the Corporation's influence. On certain state occasions it is a scene of considerable display. The gate is then closed against the official agents of royalty; the heralds come forward and ask of the lord mayor, in the king's name, permission to enter the city; and the lord mayor hereupon issues his special order, granting the request. When the king visits the city in person, the lord mayor meets him here, delivers to him the sword of state, and then precedes him to his place of destination. Upon this gate, in days gone by, the heads of persons executed for high treason were exhibited to "fright the souls of fearful adversaries."

Charing Cross, in sight of Westminster Abbey and the Houses of Commons and Lords, is the spot from which heralds proclaim the accession of a new monarch to the throne. The old "cross" was removed in the time of Charles I. to give place to a bronze equestrian figure of that monarch, said to have been the first erected in England. During the civil war Parliament sold the statue to a brazier, with strict orders to destroy it. Instead of doing so, however, he concealed it under ground until the restoration of Charles II., when he brought it forth to the wonder and admiration of every body. It was then placed upon its present pedestal, which is ornamented with the royal arms and trophies.

The Monument erected to commemorate the great fire of 1666, stands on Fish-street Hill, about 200 feet from the spot where the fire broke out. It exceeds in height the famous pillars of Trajan and Antoninus at Rome. Twenty thousand square feet of Portland stone were worked into it, and six years were necessary to complete it. Inscriptions on two sides of the monument describe the desolation and restoration of the city. On the other two sides are various emblematical figures. One of them represents Time as raising London from its despondency; several figures are seen in the center, while in the back ground to the left is the city in flames, and to the right workmen are erecting new buildings. A flight of 345 steps leads to a balcony at the top, from which can be had a delightful view of the city and adjacent country.

In one of the alleys running from Paternoster Row to Newgate street, is a curious little figure, in low relief, of an infant Bacchus in a basket, under which may be read this inscription, 'When ye have sought the Citty round, yet still this is the highest ground.' Not far from this place, over the entrance to Bull's-head Court, is another stone, on which is sculptured a representation of William Evans, the gigantic porter of Charles I., and Geoffrey Hudson, the dwarf. Near by is a basso-relievo of an armed figure marking the site of the ancient mansion of the Earls of Warwick.

—But there would be no end to a description of the curiosities and antiquities of London. They have been accumulating for ages past, and have been preserved with such care that they will continue for ages to come. One meets with them in every part of the old city. Perhaps a marble slab over some door will attract his attention, and inform him that "This is the inn where Geoffrey Chaucer, knight, and nine-and-twenty pilgrims, lodged in their journey to Canterbury, in 1383." Or, perhaps an inscription upon the corner of some building will announce to him the fact, that near the spot where he stands John Milton was born. By such means, an interest is thrown around many sections of the city that are far from being attractive in themselves. They are thought of as connected with the civil, literary, or religious history of past times, and when so thought of, can hardly fail of being objects of interest. It is not surprising, in view of these circumstances, that many citizens of London deem no other place comparable with it, and ask no higher boon than to live and die there.

THOUGHTS ON THE PERPETUITY OF THE SABBATH.

NUMBER SIXTEEN.

The Weekly Sabbath is not included in that Observance of Days censured in the Apostolic Epistles.

Any writer, on any subject, may easily be misunderstood and made to appear to teach sentiments altogether foreign to his design, if his language is always interpreted as absolute and unlimited. For this reason, all logicians teach their pupils to "investigate the scope or design of the writer;" and all professors of theological exegesis teach their pupils to "interpret Scripture by Scripture." This appears also to be a divine rule, 2 Peter 1: 20. A very few examples will make the importance of this rule apparent. In Luke 9: 50, our Saviour says, "He that is not against us is for us." But he says, Matt. 12: 30, "He that is not with me is against me!" Take these passages as absolute and unlimited, and one is a direct contradiction of the other! But read the context, and consider the different occasions on which they were spoken, and all is plain and harmonious. The occasion on which the first was delivered, evidently points out the limitation which it requires. John having seen one casting out devils in the name of Christ, had forbidden him to do it. Jesus said, "Forbid him not; for he that is not against us is for us;" i, e, Forbid him not to do good in my name; for he who doth good in my name promote my cause. But the sense of the passage referred to in Matthew is, that no man can be neutral in respect to a kingdom which demands his allegiance.

The manner in which Paul and James have treated the doctrine of justification, affords another illustration of the absolute necessity of this rule of interpretation, in order to understand them aright. James 2: 24, says, "Ye see how that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only." Paul says, Gall. 2: 16, "By the works of the law shall no flesh be justified." Without attending to the scope of the apostles in these places, the reader might be led to say one apostle plainly contradicted the other. By reading carefully the context, however, it will appear that James is writing against those who trust in their profession, and manifest their insincerity by a disobedient and lawless life; while Paul is writing against those who trust in their self-righteousness, and manifest that their hearts are wrong, by their opposition to Christ and salvation by grace. So then James was not opposed to faith as necessary to salvation, nor Paul to obdience to the holy law of God as requisite to the character of a holy man.

The same rule of interpretation must be applied to the apostle's doctrine respecting the observance of days. In Romans 3: 31, he says, "Through faith . . . we establish the law;" but in Ephesians 2: 15, he says, Christ "abolished in his flesh the enmity, even the Law of commandments contained in ordinances." Now, if the apostle referred to the same law in both instances, he contradicted himself, and made himself a transgressor by destroying that which he had builded. But the true interpretation is, that his language is limited in both instances by the nature of the subject of which he is treating, and by certain expressions contained therein. If the reader will turn to Rom. 3: 9, and throughout the whole chapter, he will see that there the apostle writes of a law by which all men, Jews and Gentiles, became sinners before God, and which was consequently binding upon all. That holy law is contained in the ten commandments. Let him turn again to Ephesians 2: 14, 15, and he will find that the apostle is writing of a law that separated Jews from Gentiles; and that the object of abolishing it was that Jews and Gentiles might be united in one religious body, having one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all. Chap. 4: 5, 6. This makes all consistent—all harmonious.

Of the same character is Coloss. 2: 16—"Let no man therefore judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of a holy day [festival,] or of the new moon, or of the Sabbath," [days is not in the original.] The word Sabbaths is limited by considerations similar to those by which the word law is limited in each of the passages mentioned above.

Holy days, or festivals, among the Jews, were of two classes; first, those of Divine appointment; second, those appointed by the officers of the Jewish government. Of those not of divine appointment, several are mentioned in Zech. 8: 19; and Neh. 10: 34; and 13: 30, 31. But the most considerable were, first, "the feast of Dedication," appointed by Judas Maccabeus, which is mentioned John 10: 22; second, the feast of Purin, which commemorated the deliverance of the Jews from the plot laid against them by Haman. Est. 9: 1. The festivals of divine appointment, were divided into the greater and lesser. Of the latter were the New Moons, Num. 28: 11; the feast of Trumpets, Lev. 23: 24; and the day of annual Expiation, Lev. 16. Then there were the three great annual festivals, or Sabbaths, so distinguished because they lasted seven days; viz. the Passover, the Pentecost, and the feast of Tabernacles. In Lev. 23: 4, 37 these, are called the feasts of the Lord, and in verses 3 and 38, are expressly distinguished from the "Sabbath of the Lord," and "the Sabbaths of the Lord." That is the weekly return of that day on which Jehovah rested from his work of creation; while their annual festivals, on which no servile work was to be done, but which are commanded to be kept as Sabbaths, are expressly called, verse 32, your Sabbath; and chap. 26: 35, your Sabbaths.

This distinction is referred to, in order to remind them that they are to keep the weekly Sabbath, even in those weeks when the annual festivals, or Sabbaths, occurred. The same distinction is referred to in Isaiah 1: 11 to 14, where Jehovah says, "The new moons, and Sabbaths, the calling of assemblies, I cannot away with;" "Your new moons, your appointed feasts, my soul hateth." But in Isaiah 56; 4 he says, "Thus saith the Lord unto the eunuchs that keep my Sabbaths, and choose the things that please me, and take hold on my covenant; even unto them will I give in my house and within my walls a place and a name better than of sons and of daughters." And in chap. 58: 13, 14, "If thou turn away thy foot from the Sabbath, from doing thy pleasure on my holy day, and call the Sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, and honorable, and shalt honor him, not doing thine own pleasure, nor speaking thine own words; then shalt thou delight thyself in the Lord, and I will cause thee to ride upon the high places of the earth, and feed thee with the heritage of Jacob thy father."

This distinction is founded in the nature of the institutions. The Jewish Sabbaths commemorated certain events in their history as a nation, and typified other events to come. The weekly Sabbath commemorates the rest of Jehovah from the works of creation, and the appointment of worship unto him, and is a type of heaven. Heb. 4: 10, 11. The Apostle, Col. 2: 16, limits the use of the words, holy days, and Sabbaths, by this distinction, for he says, "Which are a shadow of things which were to come, but the body is of Christ." Those annual Sabbaths, Passover, Pentecost, and the Feast of Tabernacles, were figures of grace and salvation, of which Christ is the real author. It was in this respect, that the law was a schoolmaster to lead men to Christ; but he being come, there is now no more need of that schoolmaster. The things those institutions taught in figure, are now plainly revealed. If then they are observed at all, (as Paul observed the Passover,) it must be by Jews only as national institutions commemorative of Jehovah's favor to that nation. In this way, the observance or non-observance of a particulay day, was not sin. See Rom. 14: 5, 6. It is not so, however, with the weekly Sabbath. It having been instituted in Paradise, before man sinned, could not have immediate reference to redemption, but remains a memorial of Jehovah's rest, and a type of rest to man, when his day of probation is ended.

The proposition, then, at the head of this paper, is provable—

1st. Because, as the weekly Sabbath is an integral part of the holy law of God, by which all men are shown to be sinners, the Apostle could not teach that this was abolished, by the coming of Christ, inasmuch as he says its authority is established by the doctrine of faith. Rom. 3: 31.

2d. The Sabbaths mentioned in Col. 2: 16, could not include the weekly Sabbath, because the Apostle calls them shadows of things which were to come, and which things were brought by Christ's appearing in the flesh; but the weekly Sabbath was established before Christ was promised.

3d. The institutions which the Apostle says were done away in Christ, were designed to teach the mediatorial work of Christ; but man did not need this when the Sabbath was first instituted.

4th. The things nailed to the cross of Christ, were such as had made a separating between Jews and Gentiles; but our Saviour and the Jewish prophets say the weekly Sabbath was made for MAN, i. e. all men. Mark 2: 27; Isaiah 56: 5, 6.

5th. The days which the Apostle censures the Gallatians (4: 9, 10) for observing, he calls weak and beggarly; they could not therefore belong to that institution which Jehovah calls holy and honorable, nor to that law which the Apostle calls holy, just, and good, and in which he delighted after the inner man.

Lastly—The Apostle could not censure the observance of the weekly Sabbath, because he and his companions in travel are mentioned as regularly observing it in four Gentile cities where they came to preach the Gospel, which it was the custom of the holy women to observe, who waited on Christ, which Christ himself observed, and of which he claimed to be Lord and regulator.

Will there not be a sad account chargeable to popular prejudice and prepossessions, in wresting the holy Scriptures to escape the duty of Sabbath-keeping? S. D.

BLESS AND BE BLESSED.

It often takes good men a long time to learn, that the enjoyments of religion are to be found in doing its duties rather than in speculating about its doctrines. Yet nothing is more true, or more clearly proven by Christian experience. The following extract from the works of Andrew Fuller of Kettering, furnishes a happy illustration of this truth:—

"There was a period in my ministry marked by the most pointed and systematic effort to comfort my serious people; but the more I tried to comfort them, the more they complained of doubts and darkness. Whenever I went amongst them, one lamentation met my ear—Ah, Sir, I can get no comfort! I am unable to appropriate any of the great and precious promises to myself. I looked for light, and behold darkness!

"I knew not what to do, nor what to think; for I had done my best to comfort the mourning in Zion. I was therefore at my 'wit's end.' At this time it pleased God to direct my attention to the claims of the perishing heathen in India. I felt that we had been living for ourselves, and not caring for their souls. I spoke as I felt. My serious people wondered and wept over their past inattention on this subject. They began to talk about a Baptist mission. The females, especially, began to collect money for the spread of the gospel. We met and prayed for the heathen, met and considered what could be done among ourselves for them, met and did what we could. And whilst all this was going on, the lamentations ceased. The sad became cheerful, and the desponding became calm. No one complained of a want of comfort. And I, instead of having to study how to comfort my flock, was myself comforted by them. They were drawn out of themselves; sir, that was the real secret of the whole matter. God blessed them when they tried to be a blessing."

STUDY OF THE BIBLE.

Much is said at the present day about the excellence of the Bible, and strenuous efforts are making to disseminate the book through our own country and foreign lands. Yet the observation which we have had opportunity to make, leads us to doubt whether the written word is as carefully and prayerfully studied by Christians as in some former ages of the world. In such matters it is easy to deceive one's self. It is customary for evangelical Christians to read the Bible daily, and the custom cannot be too highly commended or too earnestly enjoined.

But the daily reading of the word does not necessarily embrace the study of the truth. A man may read and not think; or he may think and not pray; or he may think and pray, and straightway forget both the thought and the prayer. To feed upon the truth, he must take time to meditate; he must retain in memory, and frequently recall, and try his thoughts and actions by what he has read. And this must be done not occasionally, but habitually. The very tone and temper of his mind will thus become assimilated to the truth. He will grow in grace as well as in knowledge. His temper will become of a heavenly sweetness, and occasionally his soul will be lifted up within him as if he were in the chariots of Aminidab.

Reader, how is it with thee? Art thou a constant student of God's word? Dost thou examine it to become subtle in knowledge, or wise unto salvation? to gratify curiosity, or satisfy the cravings of the renewed nature? to preserve appearances, or to grow in grace? Does the regard of men, or the love of Christ constrain thee? Answer these questions conscientiously, and thou wilt satisfy thyself whether thy study is conducing to spiritual profiting. [Bap. Adv.

A Miracle.—A London paper states, on the authority of a letter from the duchy of Nassau, that the clergyman of a village in the duchy related to his congregation from the pulpit, that in a procession going to Treves to see the coat of our Lord, there was an infidel; the coat, however, when the procession appeared before it, perceiving that the sinner was near, had leaped out of its case and given him a box on the ear. The coat afterwards returned to its case. Whether this helped the patient to become a believer does not appear. The priest did not need to work a miracle. His faith was so strong that he counseled his parishioners to sell all they had, and even to borrow, in order to enjoy a sight of the holy coat.

A Solemn Calculation.—The aggregate population of the surface of the known habitable globe is estimated at 895,300,000 souls. If we reckon with the ancients, that a generation lasts 30 years, then in that space, 895,300,000 human beings will be born and die; consequently, 81,760 must be dropping into eternity every day; 3,407 every hour; or about 56 every minute!

WHAT IS WANTED FOR A REVIVAL?

We want such a spirit of prayer as was exhibited in the striking incident that is related of Dr. Backus, former President of Hamilton College. The doctor was upon his death-bed. His physician called upon him, and after approaching his bedside and examining his symptoms with interest and solemnity, he left the room without speaking, but as he opened the door to go out, was observed to whisper something to the servant in attendance. "What did the physician say to you," said Dr. B. "He said, sir, that you cannot live to exceed half an hour." "Is it so," said the great and good man, "then take me out of my bed and place me upon my knees: let me spend that time in calling on God for the salvation of the world!" His request was complied with, and his last breath was spent in praying for the salvation of his fellow men: he died upon his knees. This is the earnest, agonizing spirit of prayer that the church needs to feel. Such prayer moves the arm that moves the world. And why should not all Christians feel the same interest in a revival which was felt by this dying saint?

The Prayer-Meeting.—Will a true disciple of Christ be so unmindful of his great obligations to his Saviour, so forgetful of his solemn and oft-repeated vows to God, that he will unnecessarily stay away from the prayer-meeting? Can religion be so low in my heart that trifling excuses, such as "I have worked very hard to-day," "It rains a little, "It is quite cold out," will satisfy my conscience so that I can remain at home with contentment? Does not the place of prayer bear some resemblance to heaven? Is it not the place where we may have some foretaste, some earnest of the blessedness of heaven? If I have no heart to meet a few Christians here to engage in the worship of God, shall I, need I expect to be admitted to the general assembly, to praise God and the Lamb forever? [Ch. Reflector.

Mr. Bagshore.—The Rev. Mr. Bagshore going one day to preach at some distance from his own house, passed by the cottage of an indigent shoemaker, who was sitting at work. He asked him if he would accompany him to the preaching. The poor man replied, "I have not time to spare, for I have a wife and family to maintain." The pious minister asked him, what he could earn in about an hour and a half. Being informed, he gave it him, and the man went with him. The next time Mr. Bagshore was to preach, he passed by the cottage without calling, but had not proceeded far, till the shoemaker ran after him. Mr. Bagshore, on seeing him, said, "What! art thou going? I thought thou couldst not spare time to hear preaching, for thou hadst a wife and family to maintain. I cannot afford to pay thee every time." But the poor man's heart had been affected under the word, and he hastily answered, "Thou shalt never pay me any more: I'll never stay behind any more: it was the best money I ever earned."

Going to Church.—The world go to church to be quiet, and take it amiss to be interrupted in a calculation of the price of cotton, by a personal reference to any of its own bosom sins. The world has engaged the preacher to accuse the Scribes and Pharisees, and not to be looking too nicely after its own conscience. The world believes firmly that the whole race of Scribes and Pharisees was dead and buried two thousand years ago, and sees no harm in being a little severe upon their foibles, especially as there are no surviving relatives whose feelings can be set on edge by it.

Solicitude About Reputation.—If good men, in every age and nation, (says Wilberforce,) have been often unjustly calumniated and disgraced, and if in such circumstances, even the darkness of paganism has been able contentedly to repose itself on the consciousness of innocence, shall one who is cheered by the Christian's hope, who is assured, also, that a day will shortly come, in which whatever is secret shall be made manifest, and the mistaken judgment of men, perhaps even of good men, being corrected, that 'he shall have praise of God,' shall such an one sink? Shall he even bend or droop under such a trial?

The Waldenses.—This wonderful people once numbered some hundreds of thousands, afterwards they were reduced to less than one thousand, and now there are about twenty-four thousand. They have endured thirty-seven persecutions. They still maintain, as did their fathers, the essential doctrines of the Gospel, and are rising in intelligence. They are very poor, but cheerful, industrious, and many of them are devotedly pious.

Eastern Mode of Measuring Time.—The people of the East measure time by the length of their shadow. Hence, if you ask a man what o'clock it is, he goes into the sun, stands erect, then, looking where his shadow terminates, he measures the length with his feet, and tells you nearly the time. Thus the workmen earnestly desire the shadow which indicates the time of leaving their work. A person wishing to leave his toil, says, "How long my shadow is coming!" "Why did you not come sooner?" "Because I waited for my shadow." In the 6th chapter of Job we find it written—"As a servant desireth his shadow." [Roberts' Illustrations.

The humble current of little kindnesses which, though but a creeping streamlet, incessantly flows, although it glides in silent secrecy within the domestic walls, and along the walks of private life, and makes neither noise nor appearance in the world—pours, in the end, a more bountiful tribute into the store of human comfort and felicity than any sudden and transient flood of detached bounty, however ample, that may rush into it with a mighty sound. The Sabbath Recorder.

NEW YORK, MARCH 13, 1845.

LEGISLATION IN FAVOR OF SUNDAY.

It will be seen, by reference to the proceedings of the New York Legislature in another column, that prayer has again been made to that body in behalf of closing the canal locks on Sunday, and that the Canal Committee has reported in favor of granting the prayer. It would be uncharitable, and perhaps unjust, to impugn the motives of the persons who have sent up this request, since they doubtless believe they are doing God service as well as themselves. But while we would not impugn their motives, we must seriously doubt their wisdom. Indeed, we believe that the leading Conventions upon the subject, which have been held within a year past, have decided that in the existing state of public sentiment, it is impolitic to invoke legislative aid to sanctify the first day of the week. Be that as it may, we think there are weighty objections to such a course, which ought to deter every real friend of the sabbatic institution from giving it his sanction.

Foremost among the objections to invoking legislative aid in favor of Sunday, we place the principle which it allows, that the aid of civil law is necessary to give effect to divine law. Our Saviour put a veto upon this principle, when he declared that his kingdom was not of this world. His Apostles did the same by maintaining that they ought to obey God rather than man. And the best representatives of the Apostles from that day to this, have claimed that human legislation in favor of any specific religious duty, was hurtful rather than helpful. It is only when the spirit of true piety has given place to formalism and worldliness, that Christians have felt it necessary to lean upon the arm of the civil law. The history of the church shows plainly enough, that in every instance where they have done so, the result has been only evil. This would be true upon the supposition that the observance of the first day of the week was really enjoined by the divine law. But when we consider that the case is very different—that the claims of the first day to divine appointment are doubted by many, and positively denied by not a few—the danger becomes still greater. If the principle of legislating in favor of the religious opinions of a majority be allowed in this case, who can tell in how many other cases it will be applied? It might lead to legislation in favor of keeping Friday, should that notion become popular; or against keeping any Sabbath at all, should the advocates of the no-Sabbath doctrine happen to gain the ascendancy. We are heartily opposed to allowing a principle which is liable to such applications.

A second objection to invoking legislative aid in favor of Sunday, is, that facts have proved such legislation to be worse than useless. Time and again have our National and State Legislatures been petitioned upon this subject, until nearly every State in the Union has enacted laws to protect the Sabbath so-called. But it is notorious that these laws remain a dead letter upon the statute books. They do not find a response in the hearts of the people, and are therefore wholly inoperative. Even if it were possible to enforce them, they could do nothing towards securing that regard for the institution which it justly claims—a regard which would make men call it "a delight, the holy of the Lord, honorable." This can spring only from a spirit of love and obedience to God—not from any compulsory human enactments. In view of such facts, it becomes an important question, whether it is wise to continue to ask for that which has done no good when granted. We think it is not, because it diverts attention from those efforts in behalf of a day of rest which might be useful, and at the same time creates an impression that the whole question is one of policy, rather than of piety—of obedience to man, rather than of obedience to God.

A third objection to invoking legislative aid in favor of Sunday, is, that such legislation would do injustice to a respectable portion of the community. It is well known, that there are in the State of New York several thousand Christians who conscientiously observe the seventh day of the week, and have no scruples about pursuing their ordinary avocations on the first day. Some of these persons are engaged upon the canals of the State, where they "rest the Sabbath day according to the commandment." When the Sabbath is past, and the first day of the week has commenced, they naturally wish to go on their way. But the Legislature is asked to pass a law which virtually requires them to wait another day for their neighbors to rest. Is this justice? Is it encouraging the "free exercise of religion?" We say, No. It is true, that the number of persons so situated as to be effected by this law is comparatively small. But that does not change the character of the law, or make the principle which it involves any the less objectionable. If there were but half a dozen persons, and they either Christians, Jews, or Mohammedans, their feelings should be consulted and their rights regarded. They should not only be left free to worship God according to the dictates of their consciences on the Sabbath, but also to go about their ordinary business on the following day if they so pleased. To refuse them this freedom is to do them an injustice.

We have spoken thus much of Sunday legislation in general. When the report of the Canal Committee comes before the public, as it will in a few days, we shall have something to say of it in particular.

THE DEAF AND DUMB.

The New York Institute for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, situated near this city, is said to be in a very flourishing condition. An exhibition was held on the 8th inst., at which the scholars evinced as great an average development of intellect as would be found among scholars of like ages in the common schools and academies of the country. The personal appearance of the pupils, and their freedom from that animal look which is so common to uninstructed mutes, was a gratifying feature of the exhibition. This institution has been in existence about 25 years. Its income in 1844 was nearly $25,000, of which $18,490 was from the State, and the remainder from pupils and the proceeds of work. The number of pupils is 185, of whom the State supports 128, the city 13, New Jersey 3; 11 are supported by their friends, and 12 by the funds of the institution. The pupils are taught industry as well as letters. For this purpose shoe-making, book-binding, cabinet-making, and tailoring, are extensively carried on, so that each attendant is taught some honorable way of obtaining a livelihood when he goes into the world. By this means educated mutes become no longer burdens upon society, but skillful and useful members of it. Happy would it be if provision were made sufficiently extensive to accomodate the whole eleven hundred mutes in this State.

THE PULPIT AND THE PRESS.

In the early ages of the Christian Church, religious instruction was conveyed chiefly by means of preaching and personal conversation. In later times, however, the press has opened a new medium of communication with the popular mind, which ought not to be overlooked. Of the comparative merits of these two agencies, it were perhaps unwise to speak with confidence, since they would be differently estimated by different individuals, and might each have their advantages in particular districts of country or conditions of society. For this reason they ought to go hand in hand, and to be regarded as equally praiseworthy and honorable means of carrying on the Christian warfare. If so regarded, one would contribute most effectually to the success of the other, and they would together form an almost impassable barrier to the spread of error.

It may be said, in favor of the instructions of the pulpit, that they are better adapted to young and uncultivated minds than are the instructions of the press. The living preacher can easily simplify his expositions of the truth to meet the capacities and condition of his hearers. He can thus often give a new beauty and force to familiar thoughts, and bring them to bear upon the heart so as to produce their natural effect. In addition to this, there is much in the address, the voice, the gesture of the preacher, as well as in the influence of an assembly of worshipers, which is calculated to give effect to the truth orally presented. Hence it is through this instrumentality that most of the reformatory movements from the days of the apostles to the present time have been carried on. And hence we may expect, that in the future, as well as in the past, preaching will be made a powful means of promoting the cause of religion and the salvation of men.

But while these things must be allowed in favor of the instructions of the pulpit, many things may be said for the press. One of its principal advantages over the pulpit is the wide range of its influence. A preacher of the Gospel may gather around him a few hundreds, and speak to them true words, but they are soon forgotten. Not so with words spoken through the press. They are conveyed speedily to the most distant parts of the land, and afford matter for study and reflection in future years as well as at the present time. They reach a thousand places where the voice of the preacher is never heard, and find auditors among those who would never listen to oral instruction. They speak to man in his hours of quietness and meditation, when the excitement of public assemblies is past and his ear is open to hear the still small voice. They leave thought in a form which is almost indestructible, the influence of which it is impossible to estimate. The apostles, it is true, were devoted mainly to the work of preaching the Gospel, because at the time when they lived men knew not how to print it. But who will venture to say, that the preaching of those men exerted a greater influence than has since been exerted by their printed narratives and epistles, which are now to be found in nearly every cottage of Christendom, and are the daily study of their inmates?

It is to be feared that Christians have attached too little importance to the aid of the press in promoting religious objects. It has been made the strong arm of unblushing infidelity, and the medium for the more refined, but not less dangerous, attacks of rationalism and scepticism. It ought now to be wrested from the exclusive service of such masters, and made to subserve the interests of pure Christianity. In this way only can the adversaries of truth be met and vanquished upon their own ground.

FAITH.—"FAITH," according to the translation of Wm. Tindal, "is a sure confidence of things hoped for, and a certainty of things which are not seen." This is certainly a clearer definition of the term than that found in the received translation. For, how can faith be the substance of things hoped for? If we now enjoy the substance, what have we in prospect to hope for? Though we see not God, yet believing in him, we have hope. Having faith, we look for the fulfillment of the promises relating to things unseen, which inspire in the believer a hope or expectation that he shall at some future time receive the substance or things promised.

MR. POLK'S REGARD FOR SUNDAY.—On his way to Washington, Mr. Polk was unexpectedly detained, so that he reached Wheeling on Sunday morning instead of Saturday evening as he intended. Hereupon some of the papers read him long homilies about the evils of desecrating the Sunday. But when his first Sunday in Washington came, Mr. Polk gave directions at the bar that he should receive no visitors thereon; and straightway this fact is trumpeted abroad as an evidence of the new President's devout regard for that day. Mr. Polk's explanation of the matter is simply that it neither comports with his convenience nor inclination to travel or receive company on Sunday. It is difficult for us to conceive how these letter-writing wiseacres can discern in the above facts such portentous or hopeful omens as they pretend.

THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.—The annual letter from missionaries at these islands has been received. It is twenty-five years since the mission was planted, and two of the first missionaries are still living. Thirty thousand converts have been admitted to the churches, of whom more than one thousand were admitted during the last year. The progress of civilization is encouraging, and barbarism is giving way before it. An important object of the mission now is to raise up a class of men qualified to take the lead in the affairs of the Church and the State. A school has been established to educate the children of the chiefs, and other arrangements made to promote general education. The churches manifest a growing interest in supporting the institutions of the Gospel. The intelligence, though not so animating as in some former years, is yet quite encouraging.

MISSIONARIES FROM TAHITI.—The London Patriot says that a party of missionaries who left Tahiti on account of the outrages of the French, had reached London. They came by the way of Valparaiso, and numbered in all eighteen. Several efficient missionaries remained on the island when they left. Probably the missionary ship John Williams has called there ere this to leave a reinforcement from England. When the returned missionaries left, the island was in a state of entire disorganization, almost the whole native population having taken to their places of natural defence in the mountains. The Queen, with her family and attendants, were in the fastnesses of Raiatea, firmly resolved to accept no alternative between the full resoration of her rights and the worst doom to which she could be consigned. The transactions at Tahiti will make a dark page on the history of French naval exploits.

RELIGION IN TEXAS.—It appears from the correspondence of the New Orleans Protestant, that the Romanists are making great efforts to obtain a foothold in Texas, and that considerable numbers of emigrants are pouring in from the papal countries of Europe. This fact has made the Protestants quite solicitous to have the colporteur system introduced into Texas. Several individuals have made liberal offers to secure it. The Presbyterians have several churches in different parts of the country, which are said to be in a tolerably prosperous condition, though in need of more ministerial aid. They have also two or three schools. The Methodist Church has a flourishing school at San Augustine, and another literary institution of some years standing at Rutersville, in the west. There are nearly fifty Sunday Schools in the Republic, and the number might be easily increased if the requisite books could be obtained

HONG KONG, CHINA.—The Missionary Magazine for March contains an interesting account of the state of religious feeling at Hong Kong. Under date of July 8, Mr. Shuck says that a revival is going on in his Chinese congregations, without stir or bustle, but in which it is evident that the Spirit of God is moving upon the hearts of between twenty and thirty individuals. Twelve Chinese converts had been baptized, one of whom in particular had proved himself an able and worthy man. The cause of the Master in that place seems to be onward.

Henrietta Hall, wife of Rev. J. L. Shuck, Missionary of the American Baptist Board, died at Hong Kong on the 27th of November. She was an excellent woman, and has left a family of five children. The European Police solicited the privilege of bearing her remains to the grave.

BAPTIST MISSION BOARD AND SLAVERY.—Again this Board has been applied to from Alabama for an unequivocal answer to the question whether a slaveholder could be appointed as a Missionary. The Board has replied in a long and very candid letter, containing the following passage, which will probably be regarded as sufficiently definite:—

> "Should you say, 'the above remarks are not sufficiently explicit; we wish distinctly to know, whether the Board would or would not appoint a slaveholder as a missionary;'—before directly replying to this we would say, that in the thirty years in which the Board has existed, no slaveholder, to our knowledge, has applied to be a missionary. And, as we send out no domestics or servants, such an event as a missionary taking slaves with him, were it morally right, could not in accordance with all our past arrangements or present plans, possibly occur. If, however, any one should offer himself as a missionary, having slaves, and should insist on retaining them as his property, we could not appoint him. One thing is certain, we can never be a party to any arrangements which would imply approbation of slavery."

CLERICAL BALL.—It is stated in an English paper, that at Grantham, England, a ball was recently held under clerical superintendence, at which there were present nine clergymen of the church of England.

MATTERS AT WASHINGTON.—There has been but little doing at Washington during the past week, except among office-holders and office-seekers. The Senate has had several sessions for the purpose of considering new appointments; but the result has not yet been made public. It is thought, however, that no great overturn will be made immediately. The Cabinet stands as we gave it last week, with the single exception that JOHN Y. MASON takes the office of Attorney General instead of JOHN W. JONES.

BIBLICAL LEARNING.

We deem it an encouraging sign of the present time, that nearly every religious denomination is making provision for more thorough ministerial education. Among the Free-Will Baptists especially, much interest has been manifested in the subject for a time past, and a Biblical School has recently been established. But even after the means of instruction are provided, there seems to be difficulty in inducing young men to take the advantages they offer. A correspondent of the Morning Star, the denominational paper, speaks of this fact in the following language:—

> "Truth compels us to say, that a class of young men are springing up among us, who are far inferior to the fathers of our connexion, and who are deplorably deficient in energy of character. They enter the ministry with no preparation at all, and then blame the churches for not supporting them, when in fact their preaching is not worth a support. It is time to speak to these young men in a language which they shall not misapprehend, or we shall soon be overrun with them."

Another correspondent of the same paper, after referring to the fact that so few persons avail themselves of the advantages of the Biblical School, speaks thus of the comparative usefulness of educated and uneducated preachers:—

> "What a contrast there is in the success and usefulness of young preachers. Some avail themselves of all the means within their reach, to discipline the mind and prepare for the great conflict, the overthrow of Satan's empire; and such are doing honor to the cause of Christ and his holy ministry. They are stable-minded, not carried about by every wind of doctrine. I speak from observation. Not one, to my knowledge, who has for any length of time attended to biblical literature, has been infected with the late delusions and heresies afloat in our country; while, on the other hand, it is painful to observe the downward course of many young ministers who are too wise to study the Bible. They start full of hope and expectation, but finding their labors not appreciated as they had expected, they soon meet with some anomaly which Satan has set to decoy them into his snares, and soon their ministry ends in some fatal delusion, or they quit the field."

For the Sabbath Recorder.

MISSIONARY INTELLIGENCE—ELD. AZOR ESTEE.

In a communication published in the Recorder some time since, I gave a brief sketch of a few weeks of missionary labor. At the date of that communication, I was at Ephrata, Pa. I was received with great cordiality by my German Seventh-day Baptist brethren in that place, and formed a very pleasing acquaintance with them. They manifested an interest in the mission in which I was engaged, and a readiness to co-operate with our denomination in promoting the cause of truth.

Leaving Ephrata, I pursued my journey to Lancaster. While in that city I conversed with several clergymen and other professional men on the subject of the Sabbath. In many instances the prospect appeared encouraging that the truth as presented by conversation and by means of tracts would exert a salutary influence upon the mind. One Baptist brother, after I had conversed with him some time on the subject, became much interested, purchased some of the publications, and when he received them observed that perhaps a careful examination of them might result in causing to become a Seventh-day Baptist. I conversed with several families of Jews, and they all appeared to manifest a deep interest in the Sabbath cause. One of them remarked, that it appeared certain to him that Jews were right in relation to the day they kept for the Sabbath. He then asked me if Jesus Christ had not himself said that he came not to destroy the law or the prophets. I answered in the affirmative; and when I repeated the passage to which he referred, he observed that he had supposed the object of Jesus Christ was to make things better and not worse, and that no good could result from either an abrogation or a change of the fourth commandment. I tarried during the night with a family of Jews, and was treated with much kindness and hospitality. This individual who invited me to stop with him observed to me, that if a reform could be brought about in relation to the Sabbath, he would cheerfully pay one hundred dollars. He expressed the hope that I might be successful in the accomplishment of the object of my mission, and politely invited me, if I ever came to Lancaster again, to call on him and make his house my home as long as I wished to stay in the city.

From Lancaster I pursued my way to Gettysburg, and stopped for a few days with Br. Samuel Fahnestock. He and his family treated me with great kindness and hospitality. Br. Fahnestock manifested his interest in the missionary cause by giving twenty-five dollars to aid the Missionary Association in its operations, and so constituted himself a life member of the Society.

Leaving Gettysburg, I proceeded to Waynesburg, and arrived at the residence of Br. George Fahnestock on Christmas day. This father in Israel received me with much cordiality, and on the following day kindly conducted me to Snowhill, where there is an interesting society of German Seventh-day Baptists. With this people I formed a very pleasing acquaintance, and their kindness to me, although a stranger among them, was such as to awaken in my heart emotions of the deepest gratitude to my Heavenly Father for his goodness, and to them for the favors which they so generously bestowed. They manifested a willingness to co-operate with us in accomplishing the great work of Sabbath reform in which as a denomination we are engaged. They highly approved of the plan adopted of sending out missionaries beyond the limits of the denomination, having for one object of their mission to diffuse light on the subject of the Sabbath, and in the most judicious manner to call the attention of the religious community to a consideration of this important matter. While at Snowhill I preached several times on the subject of the Sabbath, and also on other subjects. On the day appointed for fasting and prayer, I preached twice on the subject of the Sabbath under quite favorable circumstances, and felt much pleasure in presenting the truth, while I believed my brethren were earnestly praying for the success of truth. At the close of a discourse on this subject, my custom is to say to the congregation that if they wish to examine the question still farther by reading, they may come forward and receive the publications, which will enable them at their leisure to investigate the whole subject. While at Snowhill I had the privilege of distributing many of our publications, and I trust by the blessing of God they may be read with profit, and eventually result in great good.

From Snowhill I went to Morrison's Cove in Bedford County, Pa., where there is another settlement of German Seventh-day Baptists. These brethren manifested a deep interest in the Sabbath cause, and a strong desire that the subject might be presented to the consideration of the surrounding population. While among them, I preached on the subject several times under very encouraging circumstances, and circulated many of our publications, which were taken with great avidity. A member of the Lutheran Church, after listening to a discourse which I preached at Waterbury, took me by the hand and expressed a strong desire that I would go to Martinsburg and preach on the subject, that his minister might have the privilege of hearing me. He said, that the minister desired to hear me preach on the subject, and would have been present that day had it not been for sickness in his family. I had a strong inclination to accept of his invitation, but my other engagements rendered it impracticable.

Several of the brethren having witnessed the salutary influence of truth upon the public mind, felt a strong desire that the subject might be presented in the village of Bedford. Two of the brethren proposed to accompany me, for the purpose of obtaining a house in which the services might be performed, and to give notice of the appointment. Reaching the place in company with these brethren, one of them called on the Lutheran clergyman and inquired if the privilege could be obtained of holding a meeting in the Lutheran meeting-house that evening. As a previous appointment had been made for that evening he could not grant the privilege. In the course of the conversation he expressed an unwillingness that the subject should be discussed in that place, assigning as a reason, that the first day was not kept or regarded as sacredly as it should be, and he feared if the stranger spoke on the subject the influence would be to diminish the regard which the people at present had for the day. He expressed a desire, however, to see the stranger, and requested that I should call on him. After the arrangements were made where to hold the meeting, I was introduced to the Lutheran clergyman agreeably to his request. When he informed me that he had been invited and was expected soon to preach in the Presbyterian Church on the subject of the Sabbath, and that his object was to urge the better observance of Sunday, I was not surprised that he should regret to have the attention of the community called to a consideration of our arguments in favor of keeping the original Sabbath, and against the idea of regarding the first day of the week as holy time. I remarked to him that I could sympathize with him in the pain which he experienced when he saw people secularizing the first day of the week; that in one part of my life, I had similar feelings, and was greatly distressed at the increasing disregard of what I considered to be God's holy day. I informed him that by endeavoring to convince a man of sin for laboring on the first day of the week I was led into an examination of this question. I then presented the reasons which influenced my mind and resulted in a change of principle and practice. He listened to a relation of my experience with apparent interest, and expressed a desire to receive our publications, that he might examine the arguments in support of our sentiments on this subject. Having very pleasantly talked with this man about two hours on the subjeect, and canvassed the conflicting theories in relation to the question, I furnished him with publications to enable him to pursue the investigation. As I took my leave of him, he expressed a desire to hear me preach on the subject, and were it not for the appointment previously made he would attend. In the evening I preached, having in the congregation some of the principal men in the village. There were several lawyers and students of law, as well as other professional men, present. After the discourse, a strong desire was manifested to obtain the publications, and the village was well supplied. In conversing with one lawyer on the subject, he remarked, that he could perceive no more reason, from any thing the Bible had said on the subject, for selecting the first day of the week for the Sabbath than for selecting the third, or fourth, or either of the working days. I have no doubt the truth presented in that village by the discourse delivered and publications distributed, will result in much good. The Lord grant, that the people may be inclined to seek for truth as for hid treasures, and when it is discovered receive and obey it.

Having received about twenty dollars from the brethren in Morrison's Cove, as a token of their interest in the missionary cause, and enjoyed a pleasant, and I trust a profitable season with them, I proceeded to visit another branch of this denomination located in Somerset County. Here also I met with a kind reception, and found the people willing, according to their ability, to give of their substance to promote the missionary cause. I was among them several days, found the people anxious to learn our reasons for keeping the original Sabbath, and I gratified them by preaching several times on the subject. I found here an important field of labor, and my hope is, that the seeds of truth scattered in that region may spring up and bear much fruit.

From Somerset County I went into Fayette County, where I found a few of our own brethren, and continued in that region more than a week. During this time I had the privilege of preaching six times on the subject of the Sabbath to attentive congregations, and the opportunity of distributing many of our publications.

Having performed this labor in Fayette County, I returned to Philadelphia by the way of Baltimore, and have been permitted to reach Plainfield, N. J., after an absence of about three months. I have from day to day witnessed much to encourage me in the work in which I have been engaged, and have felt a deep anxiety that our whole denomination might arise as one man, and, trusting in the Lord, combine their strength, unite their exertions, and bring into requisition all their means, to consummate the great work of reform upon which we have entered in relation to the Sabbath.

A. ESTEE.

Plainfield, N. J., March 2, 1845.

General Intelligence.

NEW YORK LEGISLATURE.

The Legislature has been mostly occupied up to the present time in disposing of the Governor's long Message. This is now referred to its appropriate committees, and business of a general nature is receiving attention. We shall have an eye upon the proceedings, and report such parts as are of special interest.

Wednesday, March 5.

In the Senate, after some unimportant business, the bill in relation to State Prisons was reached, and briefly considered. This is an important bill, proposing to establish a department, under a commissioner, to supervise all the prisons of the State, and to abolish the office of Inspector, the agent of each prison to be appointed by the Governor and Senate. Mr. Bartlit explained the bill, when, after some amendments had been offered by Mr. Backus, in relation to transporting convicts, the committee rose and reported progress. A bill in relation to distress for rent, was taken up, when Mr. Wright offered a substitute, abolishing the right of distress in all leases hereafter to be made. Mr. Hard supported that amendment, and the discussion was continued until near the hour of adjournment. The Senate then held an Executive session.

In the House, the petitions were numerous, particularly on the subject of the license law, the regulation of railroads, the closing of the canal locks on Sunday, the location of the New York and Erie Railroad, &c. Among the bills reported, was one by Mr. Garretson, granting farther aid to the New York Eye and Ear infirmary. Also an interesting report from the Canal Committee (through Mr. Howard) favorable to the closing of the locks on Sunday, and conclnding with a joint resolution instructing the Canal Commissioners not to require canal officers to perform official duties on Sunday. Mr. Van Valkenburgh offered a substitute for the resolution, directing the Canal Commissioners imperatively to forbid the canal officers to perform official duty on Sunday. Mr. Van Valkenburgh sustained his amendment at some length. Mr. Huntington followed on the same side, and moved the printing of ten times the usual number of the Report. Mr. Bailey took ground against printing so large a number, insisting that so long as we had laws against Sabbath-breaking, which were not enforced, it was useless to enact more. The debate was prolonged until twelve o'clock, when the special order, the constitutional amendments, came round, and the House took them up. Mr. Morrison having the floor, addressed the Committee at great length, in o position to the amendments generally, and in favor of a State Convention. He avowed himself in favor of extending the right of suffrage to colored citizens and excluding aliens, and advocated a convention as the only mode of effecting these objects. Without concluding, he gave way for a motion to rise—which was agreed to.

Thursday, March 6.

In the Senate, a petition was presented from the Utica and Schenectady railroad company, for an increase of their capital stock, to enable them to re-lay their road with H or T rail. A charter was asked for a railroad from Catskill to Schenectady. Also permission to extend the New York and Erie Railroad into Pennsylvania. The Committee of the Whole then took up the bill to amend the act to increase the revenues of the State by extending the market for salt, coal and lead. The substitute of Mr. Wright that the provisions of the bill as far as relates to salt, should be extended for one year and after that time that the duty on the article should be reduced to three cents per bushel, was also under consideration.

In the Assembly, most of the time after the reception of petitions was taken up in discussing a bill for the relief of certain purchasers of land in the Oneida Indian reservation.

Friday, March 7.

In Senate, a bill was introduced to authorize the Utica and Schenectady railroad company to borrow a sum not to exceed $500,000 to enable them to relay their track. The bill "to increase the revenues of the State, by extending the market for salt, coal, and lead," was passed.

In the Assembly, nothing of general interest was done excepting to pass the bill for the relief of certain purchasers of land on the Oneida Reservation, and the introduction of a bill to incorporate the New York Industrial Association. The Constitutional Amendments were discussed in committee of the whole, and Mr. Morrison made a speech about the anti-republican tendencies of the Catholic religion.

Sabbath, March 8.

In Senate, a great number of private bills were introduced. A bill was also introduced in relation to the redemption of bank notes, providing for a par redemption at Albany or New York.

The Assembly had under discussion a memorial from the Common Council of the city of New York in relation to alien passengers arriving at that city. The House went into committee of the whole on the constitutional amendments.

Texas Annexation.—It is a mistake to suppose that the Texas question is fully settled. The Joint Resolutions of Congress are a mere consent that annexation may take place if acceptable terms can be agreed upon. These terms are yet to be adjusted, and then receive the consent of both parties. It is probable, however, that a measure which has been pressed thus far, will be pushed through if possible. The Boston Daily Advertiser speaks of the matter in the following language:—

"To give legal efficacy to this measure two or three additional acts seem to be necessary. We can hardly persuade ourselves that the President elect will regard it as any thing more than an authority to negociate for the Annexation of the territory of Texas, or that, after all, a treaty will not be found to be necessary to effect this object. Texas herself has not given her assent to the Annexation, either in the present form, or on the conditions now named. Without her assent the resolutions are of course void. With her assent they cannot constitute a treaty, which is valid under our Constitution. It is difficult to conceive, therefore, how there can be any validity in the resolutions, either as acquiring Texas as a part of the territory of the United States, or as incorporating it, as one of the States of the Union, with the right of representation in the government of the Union."

A new counterfeit on the Orange Bank, New Jersey, has been presented.

United States and Mexico.—In confirmation of the reports which have been in circulation here, and have already found their way into the Eastern papers, we learn that the Minister of Mexico to this country (Gen. Almonte) has signified to this Government the termination of his mission, in consequence of the passage of the act for the annexation to the United States of the Province of Texas. He has addressed a letter to the Secretary of State entering a solemn protest, in the name of his Government, against that law, which he declares to be an act of aggression the most unjust that modern history records, being, as he alledges, the spoilation of a friendly nation of a considerable part of its Territory.

The Minister has further asked for his passports, it being his purpose to leave this city for New York as early as practicable, and there to embark for Mexico. [Nat. Int., Monday.

Fire in Washington.—On Wednesday evening, March 5, about 8 o'clock, a fire broke out in Burton's National Theatre, which resulted in a heavy loss of property. The Theatre was full of spectators, when some of the scenery took fire. The rush and scramble out of the Theatre was great, and many bones, not to say dresses and bonnets, got an awful squeezing.

The Globe office joins immediately on the Theatre, but the wind blowing in a contrary direction from the Globe office, saved the building, which would otherwise have been consumed. Two large brick houses, and several wooden buildings, east of the Theatre, were destroyed.

Steamboat Explosion.—Ten Lives Lost.—The Muscogee (Ga.) Democrat says: "The mail steamboat Syren, Capt. Sharpless, plying between Cattahooche, and Apalachicola bay, burst one of her boilers on Wednesday night last, about midnight, as the boat was rounding out from Toney's landing, and killed at least ten persons, all belonging to the crew, with the exception of one negro boy, who was a passenger. Of the killed, six were whites and four blacks, and among the former a son of Mr. Tilley, a lad, who acted in the capacity of a cabin boy. The Capt. was thrown aloft and fell into the water, from which he escaped unhurt. A lady passenger was rescued from the water by one of the engineers. One person was saved by the sinking of the boat, which floated off a bale of cotton which had been thrown on him by the explosion. Cause of explosion, defective boilers.

New Brunswick.—The House of Assembly of New Brunswick, by a vote of 22 to 9, have passed a Resolution which declares that the present Executive Council of the Province does not possess the confidence of the House or the country at large. This was followed by an Address to her Majesty—passed by a vote of 24 to 6—which sets forth the malfeasance of the Lieutenant Governor, he having appointed for Provincial Secretary his son in law, who was also his private Secretary, which caused the retirement of four Members of her Majesty's Executive Council, the Governor concluding to keep him in office against their wish. This split between the Governor, the Executive Council, and the House of Assembly, has warmed up the blood of the New Brunswickers, and Fredrickton has become for the moment the scene of fervent political excitement.

Anti-Rent Troubles.—A letter from Major General J. S. Smith, dated Kingston, March 7th, states that on the previous Friday, a Mr. Lasher, who had been employed to remove some timber which had been felled by some trespassers on the Livingston patent, was surrounded by a gang of fifteen or sixteen men, disguised as Indians. After a struggle, in which Mr. L. resisted manfully, he was overpowered, tarred and feathered, and finally thrown from a rock some ten feet in hight: in his fall he dragged two of the Indians with him, whose masks falling off, he was able to recognize them. They were arrested but escaped. The proprietors of the land are bent upon collecting all their rents, and it is thought military assistance will again be necessary.

Sagacity of a Dog.—In the recent fire which destroyed the dwelling of Mr. Thompson, in West Haven, he was indebted for the preservation of his own life and that of his family, to the instinct and fidelity of his dog. This animal, observing the progress of the flames, leaped upon the bed where his master was still asleep and unconscious of danger, and by loud and vociferous howlings awakened him from his dangerous slumber, just in time to enable him to escape uninjured from his burning apartment, and arouse the other inmates of the house.

Shooting Birds.—No man, with a soul so large as a flea's gizzard, could possibly be so mean, so cruel, so cowardly, as to go round, pop, popping at the little birds in the briars and bushes, wing-breaking sparrows and maiming chickadees—and yet there are things in human shape just base enough to do it. These, where they bury their depravity in some dark glen or vast wilderness, may escape human observation; but in the vicinity of our cities they subject themselves to the disgust and loathing of every one in whom the image of God is not defaced and obliberated.

Magnificent Railway Scheme.—It is proposed to have a railway from Cairo to Suez, upon which steamers with all their freight and passengers, are to be transported on tracks by a locomotive, from the Nile to the Red Sea. At the termini inclined plains are to dip under water sufficiently to have large trucks surmounted with proper cradles run under the body of the steamer to be transported. It will require a road considerably wider than the ordinary one, and a locomotive three times as powerful will draw a vessel of 800 tons. The cost of the plan is estimated to be less than that of a ship canal. Sir W. C. Harris is the projector. [Boston Chronicle.

Success of a Yankee Boy.—Mr. Coleman, the inventor of the piano attachment, which has attracted the admiration of the musical world, is among us, having returned in the Hibernia. We understand that he has disposed of his entire right in the invention in Europe for six hundred thousand dollars, cash down. Before leaving this country he had sold the right for Massachusetts for ten thousand dollars, and for New York for one hundred thousand. He thus receives seven hundred and ten thousand dollars—a pretty fair sum for a Yankee not yet thirty years old. Mr. C. has a handsome estate at Saratoga, where he resides. Some ten years ago he advertised an exhibition in this town of a miniature steam engine and railroad car—tickets of admission twelve and a half cents. There were not a dozen present. He afterwards manufactured accordions with such tools as his means enabled him to procure or to borrow, and subsequently gave lessons on that instrument. His successful career since then is known. [N. B. Bulletin.

Increase of Popery.—William Hogan, Esq. in his "Synopsis of Popery," just published, says the increase of the Romish church in this country, since 1836, amounts to 12 bishops, 293 priests, 772 churches and other stations; 1,400,000 individuals, and other things in proportion. Should the said church go on increasing, he remarks, for the next thirty years, as she has done for the last eight years, the Papists would be the majority of the population of the United States, and the pope our supreme ruler. The amount of funds sent to this country from Europe, for the propagation of Romanism, is stated by the same writer as follows: In 1841, $103,891; in 1842, $85,799; in 1843, $97,745. [Recorder.

Hundreds Renouncing Popery.—More than six hundred in Villefavard, France, with their Mayor and their former priest, have cast off the delusions and errors of the Romish faith and embraced the doctrines of the Gospel. This moral revolution, achieved by the Bible in the hands of the colporteurs, is an interesting testimony to the efficacy of truth—a cheering voice from Providence, animating the friends of the Bible cause to more persevering and more enlarged efforts in diffusing through France the radiance of the Divine Word.

A Profitable Periodical.—The December number of the London Baptist Magazine, speaks of itself as the last of the thirty-sixth volume. Since its establishment, it has not only paid all the expenses, but yielded of clear profits more than five thousand pounds sterling, to the necessitous widows of deceased ministers. What a lesson to the American churches of our denomination, which scarcely support their periodicals. [Vt. Obs.

The English Church at Jerusalem.—The English bishop stationed at Jerusalem, reports, in his third annual letter, the accession of thirteen converts to the Church during the last year. Since the commencement of the mission, there have been thirty-seven cases of baptism; of those baptized twenty-six have been confirmed, or added to his church. His congregation was increasing. He has ordained nine deacons and five priests, four of them converted Jews. These are laboring as missionaries. In September he ordained three, who are to be stationed at Hebron, Beyroot, and Bagdad. [Ch. Obs.

Sunday at the French Court.—On Sunday evening, at nine o'clock, the Grand deputation of the Chamber of Peers, charged with the presentation of the Address, was received by the King. The Duke de Nemours, the Prince de Joinville, and the Duke d'Aumale, were on the right and left of the throne. The President of the Chamber, Duke Pasquier, read the Address, and the King replied.

Change of Fortune.—St. George Randolph, the full nephew of John Randolph, of Roanoke, and who by the recent compromise of the claims under his will, comes in for two-fifths of $125,000, was for a number of years, and perhaps now is, a resident of Fayette county, Ky. He married a second wife in Lexington or its neighborhood, and was in very moderate if not needy circumstances. He always, however, bore the character of an honorable man, and all who knew him will be gratified by this turn of fortune in his favor. He was a printer, and has worked at his trade in many of the printing offices of Kentucky.

SUMMARY.

Two Germans were drowned on Saturday last in the Allegheny river, at the foot of Wayne street, Pittsburgh. One of them in backing a small wagon into the river, where the current was very strong, went beyond his depth, and his brother coming to his assistance, was also carried down, in spite of great efforts made to save them.

A young man, named Chalkley McIlvaine, aged 26, was accidentally drowned on Saturday, by falling into the Delaware from the pier at the mouth of the Southwark canal, Philadelphia.

The citizens of Buffalo are taking a deep interest in the construction of a railroad from Attica, to connect with the Erie Railroad, at Hornellsville, and thus afford a direct railroad communication with New York, at all seasons of the year, and in twenty-four hours time. A bill has been introduced into the Legislature for the incorporation of a company.

The receiver of the Bank of Buffalo, J. A. Blossom, gives notice that he is prepared to pay at his office in Buffalo, a dividend of a fraction less than 74 per cent upon all claims against the bank, of which proof was made, before a master in chancery, prior to the 20th day of November last.

In Wales, there is a living man aged 120 years, having been born in 1724—he has consequently lived through the reigns of the four Georges, William IV. and into that of Queen Victoria. His health and faculties are sound, and he walks two or three times a week to a neighboring village, to visit a daughter, aged 88.

A report made to Congress by the Naval Committee, states that out of 109,000 seamen sailing out of the United States, only 9,000 were Americans. The Ohio, ship of the line sailing from New York on a three years' cruise, with a crew of 1000 men, only 182 of whom were Americans.

The Philadelphians and Bostonians, under the new act, will have to pay five cents a letter for the carriage of only two miles; the distance being just 302 miles between the cities.

The amount of postage of the members of the Legislature of Pa. from April 1, 1841, to Jan. 6, 1845, was for the House $42,970 93; for the Senate, $28,320 62—total $65,991 55! A pretty snug sum this would be toward the payment of the August interest!

The number of persons admitted into the Bellevue Alms House, for the week ending march 1st, was 73; of whom 45 were Foreigners and 28 Americans.

The Providence Gazette states that Thomas W. Dorr is at present so feeble in health, as to be unable to perform any labor in the prison workshop.

A man named Cowdrey was killed in Malden, by the bursting of a gun used in firing a salute in honor of the inauguration of the new President.

Six Iron Barges, of 250 tons burden, to form a daily line on the Hudson, between New York and Troy, have recently been finished.

Everybody has heard of "Day and Martin's blacking." As an illustration of the profits of blacking, and the extent of the business of the parties, it may be mentioned that the executors of Day and Martin have, under an order of the master of rolls, to pay £4,000 a year out of the profits of the business, to various legatees. Mr. Martin also bequeathed £100,000 to a Blind Asylum.

Seven Plough Manufactories in Maysville, (Ky.) turned out last year ploughs to the value of $46,672. The establishment of J. F. Ballenger made 1675 ploughs, the average price of which was $7 50, and the total value $9,212.

A German farmer named George J. J. Geyer, who lives near the village of Lewistown, Fulton Co. Ill., is about to start for Europe to take possession of property amounting to $2,600,000. His wife was one of the heirs at law under a contested will decided in her favor.

The Delevan House at Albany is nearly ready for its furniture. Its interior arrangements, in elegance, comfort, and convenience, are superior to the Astor House of New York. Its dining room is 96 feet in length and 40 in width—forming a splendid hall—capable of comfortably dining 400 persons at once. It is very light, and finished in the most elegant style.

The New Orleans Black List has this singular notice: "Detained in the goal of St. John the Baptist, a negro named Nero." What a strange application of names!

The case of Daniel McLaughlin, an attorney of Philadelphia, against J. S. Du Solle, "Editor of the Times," for an aledged libel, the damages in which were laid at $10,000, resulted in a verdict for plaintiff giving him six cents damage.

As one of the locomotives of the New Jersey Company was traversing the road, on Friday afternoon, in the immediate vicinity of Elizabethtown, it came in contact with a covered wagon, driven by a man, and with one woman in. The first intimation the driver had of the concussion was, in finding himself seated on the cow-catcher of the engine—from which he soon removed himself, without having received even a scratch. The woman had her collar bone dislocated, and was otherwise bruised.

The Rev. Dr. Rice, of Princeton, N. J., was robbed of all his money on his passage to New Orleans on board a steamboat. His fellow passengers so soon as they ascertained his situation, voluntarily supplied him with the means necessary to prosecute his journey.

The expediency of corporal punishment in schools has been debated at an Education Convention in New Jersey.

The Inaugural Address reached Rochester in 43 hours from Washington. Of this time fourteen hours were occupied in carrying it from this city to Albany.

On the site of the old Tribune office, a large and commodious building is now being erected. The foundation is up and the first tier of beams is already laid.

In cases of hydrophobia the proper treatment is now said to be that of keeping the wound open for some time, so as to prevent any absorption of the virus into the system.

The wheat crops in Maryland present a very promising appearance.

A splendid new ship, of 1400 tons burthen, is now building in this city, to be called the Henry Clay. There are to be superior accommodations for passengers, and at different prices.

Prof. Lock, of Cincinnati, has been practicing some experiments in "Electrology," in that city. Among other matters, a small model of the "iron coffin of Mahomet" is raised in the same vortex and suspended in space. The coffin is drawn up, and a blade passed all around it, to show that there is no real attachment to the coil which has drawn it up; it is also alternately drawn up and dropped, by forming and breaking the electrical circuit.

A writer in the Christian Watchman, in view of Thanksgiving day in Massachusetts, calls upon all Christians to give thanks for the great blessing of well-conducted religious papers, to pay up what they owe for them, and set about getting new subscribers.

Apple trees live to a great age. There is a tree on Peal's Island, Portland harbor, that has been known to bear fruit every season for more than a hundred years.

A German paper states that Austria has appointed a commissioner for the protection of Christians in the Holy Land, in order that France may not assume the exclusive protectorate of Palestine.

The great mass of the population in Nauvoo are reported to be in a state bordering on starvation.

Dr. Lardner has closed his lecturing tour in the United States, and intends, ere long, to return to Europe. He is preparing a work, (says the Philadelphia Gazette,) to contain all the lectures he has delivered in this country, to be accompanied by a personal narrative of his tour.

A Novel Concert was given in Salem on Wednesday evening, by Mr. Francis Williams, the Northern Whistler, a colored man, resident in that city. Mr. Williams has often excited applause while engaged in his work, by his remarkable whistling powers, which he has been often urged and at length prevailed upon to exhibit in public. His debut was perfectly successful, to his reputation and his profit, showing that Yankee genius has only to show itself to be duly appreciated by a Yankee audience. [Boston Chron.

The Presbytery of Chillicothe, Ohio, (Old School,) has adopted a resolution, by a vote of 25 to 7, declaring that if the General Assembly at its next meeting, shall refuse or neglect to take such action as is calculated immediately to free the Church from the sin and scandal of slaveholding, then the Presbytery ought to cease all further ecclesiastical connection or fellowship with said Assembly, and that they ought not thenceforth to acknowledge their authority by sending delegates to their meetings, or in any way support their proslavery organizations with money, which is intended to countenance and extend slaveholding Christianity, until they exhibit all their power in expelling the great sin and scandal from the Church.

THE MYSTERIES OF NEW YORK.

If the following Communication had not come to us from a perfectly reliable source, we could scarcely believe that its appalling revelations are any thing else than libels upon the fair fame of our City. It unfolds a tale of crime which must fill every virtuous breast with horror and at which even ordinary villany must stand aghast! Here, in the midst of all the restraints of Civilization and Christianity, is a man who has sustained the sacred and endearing relation of a husband and father, whose heart has been so defiled by lust and so dead to every sentiment of honor and every virtuous affection, that he could deliberately betray the unsuspecting confidence of girls whose poverty and friendlessness should have secured his pity, even if their innocence failed to command his respect. Five poor, but virtuous girls (and who can tell how many more?) seduced by one man in the midst of our happy firesides and under the very shadow of our Courts and of the temples of our Religion! Will not revelations like this, chilling the very blood in our veins by their black-hearted atrocity—arouse our whole community to apply every means in their power to stay the ravages of the Seducer? Shall Innocence any longer be the sport and prey of unhallowed Lust.

—Reader! as your eyes runs through the following lines and your heart swells with indignation toward the perpetrator of these deeds of damning wickedness, and with pity towards his victims, remember that the laws of the State of New York provide no adequate punishment for his crimes! In the name of Humanity, either call upon your legislators to repeal our whole criminal code and leave rogues of all grades to enjoy a general jubilee over prostrate Law, or else send up your petitions beseeching them no longer to trifle with the obligations of virtue by refusing to make ample provision for the punishment of the Seducer and the Adulterer! Why should the perpetrators of these worst crimes against Society enjoy a monopoly of wickedness? Fathers! Mothers! Husbands! Wives! Sons! Daughters!—you who prize these sacred and endearing bonds of our Social system! speak to your legislators on this subject in a voice which they shall not dare to disregard or disobey.

THE SEDUCER AND HIS FIVE VICTIMS!

Shall we have a Law or no Law?—The following facts are fully authenticated and may be relied on. They are given with the name of the foul seducer that the mark of Cain may be set upon him by an outraged community, and the innocent and unguarded be saved from his wiles.

Gardner C. Hiscox, residing at 15 Centre street, Agetn for a number of Owners of Real Estate in this City, was left by a worthy wife and family in August last, in consequence of his unkind and abusive treatment of them. Since that time he is known to have hired five young girls, from Intelligence Offices and other places where they were respectably employed, under the pretence of engaging them as seamstresses, at higher wages than they were receiving, each of whom he has seduced and outraged These young women were all under twenty, and the youngest but fifteen years of age. They have made affidavit before the proper officers of his conduct toward them while in his house. Two of his victims, (by the way he detained but two at a time,) recently escaped to the basement of his dwelling—a room occupied by a respectable family—and made complaint.—An officer was called in, and hearing their statements, took them before a Magistrate, who issued a writ on which Hiscox was arrested for assault and battery,—the only action that the case would admit under the present laws, except upon a civil suit. He was taken to the Police Office and committed, but finding ready bail, was suffered to go at large.

The assertions of the complainants were corroborated by the testimony of other victims, and it having been ascertained that all the five were fatherless girls, one an orphan, and the others, children of destitute widowed mothers, who had no means by which to seek redress, Officer Dunshee was employed to collect the existing testimony and make farther investigations—and arrangements were immediately made for commencing a civil suit. Several gentlemen of the Bar—to their honor be it spoken—came forward and offered their services gratis. In the mean time Hiscox apprehending farther trouble, took himself off. It is hoped however that he will soon be reached by the Police, and the law, such as it is, take its course.

Now, Mr. Editor, we want to ask in the name of humanity—in the name of insulted virtue—if our State does not need a law that will guard the feeblest, most exposed and dependent of her citizens, from hyenas in human form, who hunt their prey among the poor and defenceless, the hapless ones, who, driven from home and friends by stern poverty, must apply to Intelligence Offices for employment among strangers? Does she not need a law that may be appealed to in cases like the above, upon some other pretext than that of "assault and battery?" Will not fathers and brothers, whose daughters and sisters may, for ought they know, be exposed to similar indignities when their arm has become palsied in death, rise at once in their might, and demand of those whom their votes have elevated to office, the speedy passage of the Bill now under discussion in our Legislature. If tears and groans—crushed hopes and hearts plead in vain much longer, may we not expect the stones to cry out!

Friends of Justice.

Another daily paper has the following on the same subject.

The Law to punish Licentiousness, now before the Legislature, appears to have more friends in that body than during any previous session. There is some reason to expect that it will pass. A case recently came before our city Police, where a man residing in Centre street, not a thousand miles from the City Hall, seduced five young girls, under pretence of employing them as servants or housekeepers at greater wages than they were receiving elsewhere. Our laws could not reach him in any effectual way, being a person of small means. The evil is growing to a fearful extent, bringing upon our cities all the moral pollution of the old world; corrupting our youth, and destroying the beautiful fabric of social happiness which has been the boast of our country. Another year has passed away since the people petitioned the Legislature for this reform. We believe that the rejection of the petitions last year caused the election of better and purer Legislators; at least we have reason to hope so. The licentious laugh and ribald jest with which Hon. members of the Legislature were wont to greet the bill or its presentation in Committee, have been far less frequent this year than formerly; truth and virtue appear to have found a lodgment there, but how far their influence extends can only be ascertained on taking the ayes and noes on the passage of the bill.

FOR SALE—A BARGAIN.

THE well-known premises of the late Jonathan R. Dunham, deceased, situated in the township of Piscataway, County of Middlesex, N. J., about one quarter of a mile from the New Market Depot on the Elizabethtown and Somerville Railroad, within about two hours' ride of the city of New York, the cars making three trips each way daily—including 12 acres of excellent land, with a good Apple Orchard and other fruit trees. On the premises is a large and convenient DWELLING HOUSE, two stories high, with seven rooms on the first floor; also a large TAN-YARD, with a sufficient number of vats; a Shoemaker and Currying Shop, and Bark House; a Barn, and other necessary out-buildings. Adjoining the premises is a small Dwelling House and Garden. Terms reasonable.

THE NORTHERN WINTER.

I love it—though its very name doth send
An iceberg to your heart. The quickened breath,
The impatient shrug, and the ill-stifled sigh,
Forestall the word. Yet judge it not, I pray you,
By these fierce winds that sweep the bare brown heath,
As if enraged at their own impotence
To change the landscape's face. They have been wont,
In hyperborean climes, to steal away
Among the hills, and through the forest boughs,
Tossing the snow wreaths, even as a child
Sends up the summer flowers. Thence, truant like,
From his cold chambers, the storm-spirit comes
Careering o'er the waste. True to the soul
Of social life, he has a sigh for each,
And a new mode for every snowy fold
In winter's ample cloak. Yet this recedes
As he hastes onward, with a growing rage
At want of spoil, until you hear his howl
Contemptuous, o'er the grey dismantled earth,
Or shriek of bold defiance, as he meets
The Austral tempest's gathered strength, that sends
The tamed usurper back.
                                        Your fancy weaves
A shroud of these rude blasts, in which to wrap
Our frigid latitude. O you should breathe
Its healthful oxygen, and gaze a while
On the reposing earth. The ascending sun
Kindles a liquid radiance through the air
That teems with arrowy crystals. You would see
Beneath its horizontal rays lit up,
The polished surface of the crested drifts
With all prismatic tints; would hear the shout
Of happy children, as they fearless glide
Across the icebound stream, or down the hill
Guide the light, self-propelling vehicle;
The bounding, homeward step of merry groups,
Inhaling eagerly the breath of Heaven,
From the close school room all too long shut out.
And many a tiny foot is lightly prest
Into the wayside snow; and infant hands,
With the slight fingers, playfully are laid
Upon its yielding surface; or perchance
The indented image of some youthful hero,
Knight of the satchel, wrought in base-relief
Upon the driven heaps.
                                        And then at eve,
The fireside gatherings, when the weary ones
Have laid aside the stern habiliments
Wherewith they screened them from the stormy power
Of the external world, and brought unchilled
The best affections of our nature back,
Like sunlight to its source. Here the heart learns
How much of life, how much of heavenly bliss,
Is garnered in that spirit-motto "home,"
And learns to wear it as an amulet
Through all life's changes. L. M. C.

SHILOH.

QUARRELLING.

Don't quarrel—we beg of you—don't quarrel. It is better to have a fit of sickness, or the toothache for a week, than to quarrel with a neighbor. It would not be so wearing— half so perplexing. Why not live in peace? You appear to think you are not to blame when you quarrel. It is a mistake. You are. There never was a difficulty between two individuals when one was determined not to be angry. You would never quarrel if you were not more or less to blame; this you may rely upon. What a hell upon earth, where the people live in constant broils—each laboring to say or do something to displease his neighbor, and both speaking against each other, and when they meet, cast a sneering look, or fling out a provoking word! A savage life must be preferred.

O man, did you ever quarrel? Have you an enemy? Is there one of God's creatures, whom you despise and turn from, as if he were a venomous reptile? Do you labor to make him feel your indignation and scorn? Wicked and wretched man that you are—as miserable as you can live. You will never be happy till you divest yourself of this malignant disposition, and become reconciled to your brother. Reflect seriously on your duty and interest, and twenty-four hours will not pass away before you become reconciled. Did you ever read what the poet says? Every word is true. Attend to it.

"The fine and noble way to kill a foe,
Is not to kill him; you with kindness may
So change him, that he shall cease to be so;
And then he's slain. Sigismund used to say
His pardons put his foes to death; for when He multiplied their hate, he killed them then."

DEFINITIONS.

CANDIDATE.—Another word in every-day use with us—namely, candidate—had a similar origin in the custom of the common people, and has been preserved, though the custom, as in the former case, has been long disused. The root is candidus, an adjective, signifying white; and competitors for offices in Rome were called by the derivative term candidates, because they were obliged to wear gowns or robes of that color, when going round the city soliciting the votes of the people.

BANKRUPT.—Few words have so remarkable a history as the familiar word bankrupt. The money-changers of Italy had, it is said, benches or stalls in the bourse or exchange, in former times, and at these they conducted their ordinary business. When any of them fell back in the world and became insolvent, his bench was broken, and the name of broken bench, or banco rotto, was given to him. When the word was adopted into English, it was nearer the Italian than it now is, being "bankerout," instead of bankrupt.

ACADEMY.—The word Academy is derived from a strange source. A private and obscure person in Athens, called Academus, was possessed of a house, which at his death became a school, and in its gardens the illustrious Plato filled the ears of his pupils with wise and eloquent discourse. "See there," says Milton—

"See there the olive grove of Academe, Plato's retirement."

The house of "Academe" being the school of so famous a teacher, other teachers also, though no Platos, would have their petty seminaries called "Groves of Academe," until by degrees the word came to be applied in this sense universally, and its derivation from the name of honest Mr. Academus, citizen of Athens, was entirely forgotten.

FORCE OF IMAGINATION.—Some years ago, a celebrated physician, author of an excellent work on the force of imagination, being desirous to add experimental to his theoretical knowledge, made application to the minister of justice to be allowed an opportunity of proving what he asserted by an experiment on a criminal condemned to death. The minister complied with his request, and the criminal agreed to the proposal, counting himself happy in being freed from the painful exhibition of a public execution. At the time appointed, the physician repaired to the prison, and, the patient having been extended on a table, his eyes bound, and, every thing being ready, he was slightly pricked near the principal veins of the legs and arms with the point of a pin. At the four corners of the table were four little fountains, filled with water, from which issued small streams, falling into basins placed there to receive them. The patient, thinking it was his blood that trickled into the basin, became weaker by degrees, and the remarks of the medical man in attendance in reference to the quality and appearance of the blood, made with that intention, increased the delusion, and he spoke more and more faintly, until his voice was, at length, scarcely audible. The profound silence which reigned in the apartment, and the constant dropping of the fountains, had so extraordinary an effect on the brain of the poor patient, that all his vital energies were soon gone, although before a very strong man, and he died without having lost a drop of blood.

THE PILOT'S EXPERIENCE.

A pilot relating his experience in Cincinnati, said, "My home had become a domestic hell. I drank all I could get, and for three weeks had not once been home to my family without being intoxicated. Of course I was always ready for a quarrel. I went one night to a Washingtonian meeting. I was sober—I listened to what was said. My heart leaped for joy at the hope that I might be reformed, and I signed the pledge. I went home to my family; I took a seat but said nothing. I observed a frown on the face of my wife, as if she expected abuse as usual. But presently the cloud cleared away, and after observing me for some time she inquired, 'Husband, are you sick? what is the matter with you?' 'No,' I said, 'I am not sick. I have been to the Washingtonian temperance meeting, and have signed the pledge.' In a moment, (said the pilot,) all the wife was up in her bosom. She clasped me around the neck with her arms, and I thought she would have absolutely smothered me with her kisses."

ORPHANS.

In the course of fifty-two years the City Council of Charleston, S. C. have supported and educated at their institution between 1700 and 1800 orphans. They are dismissed at the age of fourteen, with a good English education, and are generally apprenticed to those trades and occupations for which they have a natural inclination. Some, whose talents are above mediocrity are sent to the high schools, and even to college. Nearly all of them have conducted themselves well. Some occupy enviable stations. Twenty boys have been sent to the United States naval service. One has risen to the rank of captain. Another is Captain Gedney of the United States Navy. A third is a Lieutenant who was wounded in the battle of Lake Erie, and afterwards honorably located in the navy yard at Philadelphia. A fourth is a country judge in Alabama; a fifth is a district attorney of the United States in Florida; a sixth is a respectable minister of the Baptist church in Greenville, S. C. Others now in Charleston hold a lofty stand at the bar, for intellect, influence and moral worth; and others elsewhere have secured an elevated standing as lawyers, physicians, instructors of youth, and merchants. "Blessed is he that considereth the poor," and neglects not the widow and the orphan. [Boston Recorder.

THRILLING FACTS.—We find the following in the New York Observer, forming part of a letter from Washington:

Look at some of the outrages protected by law even in the enlightened city of Richmond. Not long ago, a free colored girl living in Manchester, near Richmond, paid a visit to a friend in R., and happened to remain all night on the Richmond side of the river. She was arrested by some officers and imprisoned. Ignorant of the law, friendless and alone, she was kept in jail forty-five days, and then by order of the court, sold for forty-five years to pay the sum of forty-five dollars, jail fees! A negro-trader bought her and carried her to the far South, where she was sold again into hopeless captivity. And all this perpetrated on a poor, helpless girl, whose very weakness should have secured the protection of some merciful heart and strong arm. The account of this may be found in the Richmond Whig, in which it was published at the time. What a system! Yet how many vote to extend it! Sometimes—indeed, quite often—a poor woman may be seen going from door to door in this district, with a subscription to "buy her freedom" in sight of the temple of liberty on the capitoline hill. A few days since, such a paper was presented to me. Here is a literal translation: "E——, a free woman of color, invokes a generous and liberal public to aid her in purchasing her daughter (!!) who has recently been sold by her former master to Mr. ——, who is willing to take for her $550. The mother appeals to the rich and the great to assist her in effecting an object so naturally dear to every mother's heart, to wit: that of rescuing a dutiful, gentle, and moral child from the justly apprehended ills of bondage."

It would have moved a heart of stone, but not that of a slave-trader, to see the poor old mother in her grief and tears trying to raise this sum in dribblets to purchase a child whom God had given to her. This case, not solitary, and all like it, grow out of the system, and remind one of that powerful passage—"I beheld the tears of such as were oppressed, and they had no comforter; and on the side of their oppressors there was power, but they had no comforter: wherefore I praised the dead, who are already dead, more than the living who are yet alive." The repose of death seems preferable to the agonies of such an existence.

THE BLESSING AND THE CURSE.—The Charleston Courier publishes the following sad tale, which could never have become true, if the toils and tears of Slaves had not moistened the soil of South Carolina.

Since the discovery that cotton would mature in South Carolina, she has reaped a golden harvest; but it is feared that it has proved a curse rather than a blessing, and we believe that she would at this day be in a far better condition, had the discovery never been made. Cotton has been to S. Carolina what the mines of Mexico were to Spain, it has produced us such an abundant supply of all the luxuries and the elegancies of life, with so little exertion on our part, that we have become enervated and unfitted for other and more laborious pursuits, and unprepared to meet the state of things which sooner or later must come about. It is out of place here to predict that the day is not far distant, yea, close at hand, when we shall find that we can no longer live by that which has heretofore yielded us not only a bountiful and sumptuous living at home, but has furnished the means for carrying thousands and tens of thousands of our citizens to squander their gold in other countries—that we have wasted the fruits of a rich, virgin soil, in ease and luxury—that those who have practiced sufficient industry and economy to accumulate capital, have left, or are leaving us, to populate other States?

ATMOSPHERIC RAILWAY.—At a late meeting of the Society of Arts, held in London, a paper on an atmospheric railway, invented by Mr. Pilbrow, Civil Engineer, was read. It is thus described: A pipe or tube is laid in the earth, midway between the rails, and secured to wooden sleepers, at intervals of about thirty feet, and fixed to boxes cast on to the tube on each side: in each box works a vertical spindle or axis, to which are fixed two small cog-wheels or pinions, the one being inside the box and the other outside. A diaphragm or piston works within the tube, as in the original atmospheric railway tube; but to the piston is attached a rack, so that when the piston is moved by the exhaustion of the tube in front of the piston, the rack is moved with it: and that, acting upon two or more of the lower or under pinions, causes the upper pinions to revolve at the same time, and with the same velocity. A second rack, of the same length as that within the tube, is attached to the first carriage; and, as the upper pinions revolve, the rack, and consequently the carriage to which it is attached, moves with it. Thus the longitudinal valve required in Samuda's railway is dispensed with.

INDIRECT LOSS OF PROPERTY BY WAR.—War not only demands for its support vast sums of money, but dries up the main sources of a nation's wealth. Its victims are mostly men in the vigor of life. It cripples almost every species of business. It cuts the sinews of enterprise in every department of gainful industry. Fields lie untilled; factories stand still; the shop and the counting-room are deserted; vessels rot at the wharves; every kind of trade is interrupted or deranged; immense masses of capital are withdrawn from use; the entire energies of a nation are turned into the channel of war, and its resources whelmed in the mighty vortex of ruin.

THE CHIEF QUALITY REQUIRED IN A SOLDIER.—It is health of body—physical strength, that enables man to endure the hardships of the tented field. It is the good condition of the animal that enables him to fight. We need mere machines for the ranks of the army. To obey is the only duty. Forward is the command. Sufficient intellect to load and fire a musket is all that is wanted; the number killed is the test of merit. A well-trained horse is often more valuable than a score of men with souls! [Adv. of Peace.

THE WASHINGTON FAMILY.—A letter is published in the U. S. Gazette from a member of the Washington family, Baron Von Washington, who is a resident in the city of Munich. It contains some interesting details regarding the ancestors of the family, several of whom sprang from noble stocks and were connected with the family of Shirley, Earl Ferrers; Sir Lawrence Washington married Elizabeth, a daughter of the second Earl Ferrers. The Baron Von Washington has appended to his name no less than eight stately titles, and is evidently a person of much consideration in Bavaria.

ST. MARY'S RESERVOIR.—This work was constructed to supply the summit level of the Miami Extension Canal, and is one of the most stupendous of the kind in this country, at least, if not in the world. It covers an area of 17,000 acres, with an average depth of 10 feet. A little steamboat has been employed upon it the past season, to convey passengers across it for pleasure and business. The town of Celina, the county seat of Mercer, stands upon its margin; and there is a lift lock, so that boats from the Miami Canal can pass into the Reservoir, through a feeder 3 miles in length, and of the same size of the canal boats already run up to St. Mary's which is within a short distance of the Reservoir, and 132 miles from Cincinnati.

THE WASHINGTONIANS OF BOSTON.—During the last year 3,969 persons have signed the Pledge at the meetings of this Society. An Asylum is kept, adjacent to the Hall, supplied with suitable bedding, where unfortunate persons are allowed to sleep, and, if sick, they are taken care of until they are able to take care of themselves. During the year, 750 persons who have signed the Pledge have been lodged. For 1,050 meals to such persons, $131 25 have been expended; for rent and lighting Hall, $575. The net income of the Society has been $1,230 62; its expenses, $1,347 5.

A tunnel of Roman construction has recently been discovered and explored at Marseilles. It connects the ancient Abbaye of St. Victorie—running under an arm of the sea—with a tower of Fort St. Nicholas. The tunnel, one fourth longer than that under the Thames, is formed of a single vault of 60 feet span, and has recently been explored from end to end. The sum of $1,000,000 would, it is estimated, put it in complete repair, and render it serviceable for modern use.

Dr. Warren recently delivered a lecture on digestion. The following remarks, on the use of tobacco, differ from the commonly received notion:

"Tobacco is among the most powerful narcotic substances we are acquainted with; a very small portion of it, as even a decoction of the eighth of an ounce, has been known to prove immediately fatal. Its influence on the stomach is highly debilitating; it directly lowers the tone of this organ, and diminishes all its healthy actions. Every way in which tobacco is employed has this effect; the practice of chewing in a much greater degree than others, since a greater quantity of the deleterious substance is introduced into the body."

A writer in the Christian Register proposes a Society founded upon the true Christian charity and benevolence, which "thinketh no evil," "rejoiceth in the truth," to be called the "Anti-Evil-Reporting," or "Golden Society." A sort of "Mutual Insurance Company," for the protection and preservation of character! The object and duty of the members shall be to bind themselves together by the bonds of Christian sympathy and love; and not only protect each other, but all others, as much as they can, from that detestable, and insidious foe, Detraction!

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

THIS Institution has a pleasant and quiet location thirteen miles south-east of Angelica, and six miles south of Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y., under the care of W. C. KENYON, as Principal, and Miss CAROLINE B. MAXSON, as Preceptress, aided by able and experienced assistants.

Teachers' Classes will be exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining every facility of a Normal School, without its usual disadvantages. Within the past year, more than one hundred and fifty students of the institution have been employed as teachers in this and the adjacent counties—a number much larger than from any other institution in the State.

Students are prepared for entering any class in College. Ample advantages are also secured to those pursuing Modern Languages and the Fine Arts. The institution is liberally endowed and supplied with a choice and valuable library, and apparatus sufficiently extensive to illustrate every department of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. It has also well selected cabinets of Geological, Mineralogical and Conchological specimens.

The plan of instruction aims at the development of the moral, intellectual and physical powers of students, so as to render them thorough, accurate, and practical scholars.

Lectures on Chemistry, accompanied by a full course of experiments, will commence with the second week of the fall term, and continue daily to its close. During the fall and winter terms, daily lectures will be given on School Teaching. Lectures on Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Physiology, illustrated by experiments, will be given each term of the year.

TUITION, per term of fifteen weeks, from $3,50 to $5. Board per week, in private families, $1. The entire expense of the academic year, including tuition, board, washing, light, and fuel, need not exceed $60. No extra charges incurred.

President of the Board of Trustees

THOUGHTS ON THE PERPETUITY OF THE SABBATH.

NUMBER SEVENTEEN.

The Gospel's being attended with glory superior to the Mosaic Economy, did not necessarily do away the ancient Sabbath.

Every revelation of the will of God to man, has been attended with symbols of his glory, so that the holy men to whom those revelations were made, were never left to conjecture the source from whence they came. The Hebrews have justly exulted in the fact, that from the days of Abraham, they and their fathers have been pre-eminently distinguished by these manifestations of Jehovah's glory. The most distinguished of all those manifestations prior to the coming of Christ in the flesh, was the giving of the law from Mount Sinai.

They have likewise ever considered it the glory of their religious code, that it was given to Moses by Jehovah himself, and that the great laws of the Decalogue were spoken in the hearing of their fathers by the voice of Jehovah, while they beheld the awful symbols of his glory. And they were taught thus to exult in these facts; for Moses says, Deut 4 : 32 to 36, "Ask now of the days that are past, which were before thee, since the day that God created man upon the earth, and ask from the one side of heaven unto the other, whether there hath been any such thing as this great thing is, or hath been heard any thing like it? Did ever people hear the voice of God speaking out of the midst of the fire, as thou hast heard, and live? Or hath God essayed to go and take him a nation from the midst of another nation, by trials, by signs, and by wonders, and by war, and by a mighty hand, and by a stretched out arm, and by great terrors, according to all that the Lord your God did for you in Egypt before your eyes? Unto thee it was shewed, that thou mightest know that the Lord he is God, and there is none else besides him. Out of heaven he made thee to hear his voice, that he might instruct thee; and upon earth he shewed thee his great fire, and thou heardest his words out of the midst of the fire." As Moses here asserts, no event equally glorious had ever occurred among men—none of equal glory was ever pretended to by other nations. With this event and all its attendant glory the apostle Paul compares the revelation of Jesus Christ and the establishment of his gospel; and in 2 Cor. 3 : 7 to 11, he affirms that this so far exceedeth that in glory, that the Mosaic economy had no glory in comparison of the superior glory of the Gospel. As the moon and the stars lose their lustre before the brightness of the rising sun, so that lustre which attended the revelation of the law, was lost, done away, in the superior brightness of Jehovah's glory, which attended the bringing in of the Gospel.

Upon a mistaken view of the Apostle's design in this argument, many persons have formed a general and sweeping conclusion, that all the institutes of religion enjoined under the Sinaitic covenant are done away, and that consequently all obligation to observe the ancient Sabbath of the Lord our God ceased with the bringing in of the New Covenant by our Lord Jesus Christ and his Apostles. But that this is a false conclusion, and altogether foreign to the Apostle's design, may be seen by the following observations.

1. Observe the character which the Apostle gives to the Sinaitic Law. That it is this, in its covenant character, which the Apostle compares with the Gospel, is plain, because he calls it that which was written and engraven in stones. This was not the law of the Passover, nor Pentecost, nor Tabernacles, nor Expiation, nor any other that regulated their ceremonial rites; but the ten commandments, which bind all men to the government of God, the great Creator. And that it is between this and the Gospel, in their covenant character, that he makes the comparison, is equally plain; because he says that the same God who wrote and engraved that law upon tables of stone, had made him and his fellow Apostles "able ministers of the New Covenant."

The Sinaitic law the Apostle calls "the ministration of death." Why? From his own experience, Rom. 7: 9, 10. He says, "I was alive without the law once; but when the commandment came, sin revived, and I died. And the commandment which was ordained unto life, I found to be unto death." The Apostle, in his unregeneracy, like all carnally-minded Jews and Gentiles, had rested in an external conformity to the letter of that law, and on account thereof, was in his own esteem a righteous man, and had hope of the favor of God. But when arrested in his sinful course as he went to Damascus, the commandment came to his heart in all its spirituality; all his self-esteem died within him, and his hope of the favor of God from the law perished. Thus it must be with every sinner in whose heart is written the law of God.

Again, he calls it "the ministration of condemnation." Why? From the just results of a holy law upon the transgressor of its precepts. The law says, "Cursed is every one who continueth not in all things written therein, to do them." Rom. 4. 15. "For the law worketh wrath; for where there is no law there is no transgression." Is the law then evil? By no means! The law is holy, just and good, or it had never convicted the transgressor of sin. "Was that then which is good, (i. e. the good law,) made death unto me? By no means. But sin, that it might appear sin, working death in me by that law which is good." Rom. 7 : 13.

Is that good law then done away? Or, as the apostle puts the question, Rom. 3 : 31, Does the doctrine of faith make void the law? By no means! It establishes the law. It is by recognizing the claims of the law that we feel our sinfulness and need of a Saviour. Would the apostle do away that good law by which alone the moral government of God in this world is known? If the law be done away, it ceases to condemn men, and they no longer need a Saviour.

What then is done away? "If that which is done away was glorious, much more that which remaineth is glorious." 2 Cor. 3 : 11.

Observe, the apostle says, Rom. 7 : 10, "The commandment, which was ordained to life I found to be unto death." The law said, "The man that doeth these things shall live by them." Rom. 10 : 5. But as the law can never justify the ungodly, when God gave it in covenant from Mount Sinai, he gave it by the hands of a mediator, (i. e. Moses) and by his hand, annexed thereto a body of rites, that should teach by figurative representations, the mediatorial work of the great Redeemer. Thus the law became a schoolmaster, to bring the worshipers to Christ, that they might be justified by faith. See Gall. 3 : 19 to 24. It was thus that Jehovah said, Levit. 18 : 5, "Ye shall therefore keep my ordinances and my judgments, which if a man do, he shall live in them, I am Jehovah your God." But "after that faith is come, we are no longer under the schoolmaster." Gal. 3 : 25. That is, when Christ the great object of faith is come, that covenant character of the law ceased; he became "the end of the law for justification to every one that believeth." Rom. 10 : 4. So that by believing in him, through grace, we become children of God by the New Covenant.

That which was done away, then, was the Sinaitic Covenant; not the ten commandments which bind men to God's government, but that covenant form of the law given upon Mount Sinai, which in the hands of a mediator said, "The man which doeth those things shall live by them." It is in this view of the subject that we see the harmony of the doctrine of Paul with that of James. Paul says, Abraham was justified by faith, which was counted unto him for righteousness. James says, "Was not Abraham our father justified by works?" The doctrine of the Bible, of the Old Testament as well as the New, is that no man is ever saved whose heart remains at enmity to the law of God; and yet no sinner is ever saved by the works of that law, but by faith in the great atonement. Hence the evidence of a carnel mind is, enmity to the law of God, and insubjection to it; and the great design of the ministry of the New Covenant is, so to minister God's law and the gospel of Christ, that by the Spirit of God it shall be engraven in the heart, not in the letter merely, but in the spirit. See 2 Cor. 3 : 3, and Heb. 8 : 10.

Although the Sinaitic Covenant is thus done away, its first ministration was a glorious event. Nothing had equaled it until the coming of Christ. "When Jehovah came down upon the Mount, in Horeb, the mountain burned with fire unto the midst of heaven, with darkness, clouds and thick darkness; and the Lord spake out of the midst of the fire; and the people heard the voice of the words, but saw no other similitude but the devouring fire, with thick clouds and darkness." Deut. 4 : 11, 12. But when the Lord Jesus Christ was baptized, the heavens were opened, and the Spirit in the form of a dove descended upon him; and a voice from heaven said, not in the terrors of Sinai's thunder, but in the accents of love and mercy, "This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased." Moses was honored as a servant of God; but Christ as God's only begotten Son. Moses' rod brought the ten plagues upon Egypt. Jesus Christ said, "I came not to destroy men's lives, but to save them." Hence he swayed a sceptre of love and mercy. He healed diseases, assuaged afflictions, and raised the dead to life. His disciples saw his glory, "as the glory of the only begotten of the Father, full of grace and truth." While Moses was in the Mount with God, encompassed with the Shekinah, his face acquired such a brightness that the children of Israel could not steadfastly behold it for the glory of his countenance, which glory passed away. But in the character of Jesus Christ there is such a display of the beauties of holiness, "that we all, with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image, from glory to glory, even as by the Spirit of the Lord." That dispensation had types and shadows, which had to be repeated daily, because of themselves they could never take away sin; but Christ, after he had offered one sacrifice for sin, forever sat down on the right hand of God. The high priests of the Jews ministered in an earthly tabernacle, but "Christ has entered into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us." In many other particulars the ministration of the Spirit, "the ministration of righteousness to justification, exceedeth in glory" the ministration of condemnation.

It was in this manner that Paul reasoned with the Jews of the abrogation of the Sinaitic Covenant, and the superior glory of the New Covenant brought by the great Mediator, the Lord Jesus Christ. He did not attempt to disparage the law; but he showed that the Gospel did what the law never could do of itself, bring pardon to the guilty and life to the dead. Farther, that although the Sinaitic Covenant was greatly honored, that glory was done away; and the New Covenant, in the person of Jesus Christ, was made much more glorious; as likewise it is in the permanent blessings which it confers upon the subjects thereof. So far from the new covenant doing away the law, Jehovah says, Jer. 31 : 33, and the Holy Spirit is also a witness, Heb. 10 : 16, "This is the covenant that I will make with them after those days, saith the Lord, I will put my laws into their hearts, and in their minds will I write them." Paul says, God had made him and his fellow apostles able ministers of that New Covenant; not in the letter merely, but in the Spirit, so that, ministered by them, it was not with ink and pen or in tables of stone, but with the Spirit of the living God, in fleshly tables of the heart. If, then, it is written in the heart, surely the law must remain, and that heart must approve and love it. If the law remains, the fourth commandment remains, for there is no exception made in the covenant! How then can Christians be at enmity with the Sabbath, or willing knowingly to violate it?

SUPPORT OF THE GOSPEL.

BY DR. BEECHER.

It is a sad mistake, too often countenanced by ministers themselves, that small congregations are unable to support the Gospel; when the fact is, that no congregation is able to do without the Gospel; for the tax of desolation is four times as expensive as the tax which is requisite to sustain the institutions of religion. This is no fiction. Go to those societies which have judged themselves unable to support the Gospel; go to parents, and demand the items squandered by their prodigal children, besides breaking their hearts by their undutiful conduct. Go to the tavern on the Sabbath-day and on week days—attend the arbitrations, the courts, the trainings, the horse-racings, and the midnight revels—witness the decayed houses, fences, and tillage, the falling school-house, and tattered children of barbarous manners; and then return to your own little paradise, and decide whether you will exile the Gospel as too expensive to be supported. If you are too poor to support the Gospel, you are demonstrably too poor to do without it—if the one would severely press you, the other will grind you to powder. A few families may thrive in waste places, but it will be upon the vices of the rest—the greater portion will be poor, and ignorant, and vicious.

Do you demand how a poor people can support the Gospel? Let them first appreciate the privilege according to its importance, and then let the father, and the mother, and the son, and the daughter, and the servant, lay, weekly, a light tax upon their pride, and another upon appetite needlessly gratified; and add to these savings another item acquired by some special effort for the purpose; and another as God shall have prospered their lawful industry—and the result of the whole would be an abundant supply. Any ten families of ordinary property, could better afford to support the Gospel, than to do without it. When societies calculate what they can afford to give for the support of the Gospel, they go upon the supposition, that what they do give, is so much subtracted annually from the whole amount of their income—a supposition which is utterly erroneous; for in fact, as it respects the diminution of property, they give nothing. The Gospel is not a debtor to those who support it, but they are debtors to the Gospel. It does not subtract from the property of a society, but adds to it more than it takes away. It is God himself who has said, "Honor the Lord with thy substance, and with the first fruits of all thy increase, so shall thy barns be filled with plenty, and thy presses shall burst out with new wine." This duty of supporting the worship of God, has not ceased with the Jewish dispensation, nor has this promise been repealed; and the whole providence of God to this day, has been a practical confirmation of his faithfulness in its fulfillment. The Jews often distrusted this assurance, and robbed God to save their property; but they were always reduced by the experiment. They sowed much and brought in little, and when it was gathered, God did blow upon it. The dew of heaven was stayed, and the earth did not yield her increase. "Ye are cursed with a curse, for ye have robbed me, even this whole nation. Bring ye all the tithes into the storehouse, that there may be meat in mine house, and prove me now herewith, saith the Lord of Hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it. And I will rebuke the devourer for your sakes, and he shall not destroy the fruits of your ground; neither shall your vine cast her fruit before the time in the field, saith the Lord of Hosts, and all nations shall call you blessed, for ye shall be a delightsome land, saith the Lord of Hosts."

The same rule of administration is regarded still; the curse of heaven still fastens upon communities that despise the Gospel, and neglect its support. Their decline in outward prosperity is notorious; and their restoration is no less manifest when, convinced of their folly, they make a competent provision for the public worship of God. Nor is the fact mysterious or miraculous; since the life of man, his health, his wisdom to plan and strength to execute, the life and vigor of his flocks and herds, every stalk of grain and every blade of grass are in the hand of God. In ten thousand ways he can add to, or subtract from your income. A fit of sickness, a broken bone, a profligate child, a vexatious law-suit, a death or a flood, a murrain among your cattle or a blast on your field, may cut off at once all your sacrilegious savings, while his blessing can, in as many ways, make you rich and add no sorrow with it. You may give, therefore, as exigencies demand, for the support of the Gospel, and it shall be given unto you again, good measure, pressed down, and shaken together, and running over. Your cruse of oil shall not fail, and your barrel of meal shall not waste.

VISIT TO A JEWISH RABBI.

From the Narrative of a Mission to the Jews.

"On the forenoon of Monday, (April 29,) we visited an Eastern Rabbi, named Bolaffi, whose acquaintance we had made on Saturday. He was seated on a sofa in the eastern fashion. His dress was that of the east—his appearance imposing, and his action and elocution were very striking. We found him frank, intelligent, and learned. He liked better, however, to speak on general subjects than on religion; but at length did enter into some religious discussion. We spoke of the nature of Messiah. Bolaffi said, "He is to be a king and a prophet, but not a priest." We quoted Ps. 90. He denied that to be spoken of Messiah; and thought that David was meant. We maintained his divine nature, and among other passages quoted Isaiah 9 : 6. He admitted that the rendering "Mighty God" was justified by the Hebrew, but evaded the application, by bidding us notice that the Prophet says only, "he shall be named" so. He argued that the Protestants ought to return to the observance of the seventh day as their Sabbath, because the change was an act of the Romish Church. We came back to more vital questions, and referred to Ps. 51, "Purge me with hyssop." He got away from this by turning his remarks to ruach, "Spirit," arguing that that word applied even to beasts. As to the way of pardon, he maintained that repentance was all that was needed, ~~quoting 2d Samuel,~~ where David said, "I have sinned," and Nathan answered, "The Lord hath put away thy sin." He had read the New Testament, and his knowledge of it enabled him to object that Christ was not Prince of Peace, because he himself says, "I am not come to send peace, but a sword." He contended that the Sabbath should be so kept that a fire ought not to be lighted on that day even in Siberia. At parting, he said, Christians shut us out of Paradise, but we think that all who do good works may enter, whether they be Catholics, Mahometans, or Protestants."

JEWISH PERSECUTION.

To say nothing of their more obvious sufferings for many centuries, the tide of public opinion raged against the Jews vehemently and incessantly. They were addressed with sneers and contumely; the finger of vulgar scorn was pointed at them; they were hunted through the streets in open day, and when protected from the extremity of violence, it was with tones and looks denoting that only a little lower hate sanctuaried their persons. In conversation and in books they were a by-word and a jest.

A work printed in 1628, for popular entertainment, entitled, "A Miscellany of Seriousness with Merriment, consisting of Witty Questions, Riddles, Jests," &c., tells this story as a good joke. A sea captain on a voyage with thirty passengers, being overtaken by a violent tempest, found it necessary to throw half of them overboard in order to lighten the vessel. Fifteen of the passengers were Christians, and the other fifteen were Jews, but in this exigency they unanimously agreed to the captain's opinion, and that he should place the whole thirty in a circle, and throw every ninth man over till only fifteen were left. To save the Christians, the captain placed his thirty passengers in this order, viz. four Christians, five Jews; two Christians, one Jew; three Christians, one Jew; one Christian, two Jews; two Christians, three Jews; one ~~Christian, two Jews; two~~ Christians, one Jew. He began to number from the first four Christians thus:

CCCC. JJJJ. CC. J. CCC. J. C. JJ. CC. JJJ.
C. JJ. CC. J.

'By this device, the Captain preserved all the Christians, and deeped all the Jews.

THE TRUE APOSTOLIC SUCCESSION.—When the venerable Lyman Beecher was a young man, and returning to his native town in Connecticut, he fell into conversation by the road side with an old neighbor, an Episcopalian, who had been mowing. "Mr. Beecher," said the farmer, "I should like to ask you a question. Our clergy say you are not ordained, and have no right to preach. I should be glad to know what you think about it." "Suppose," replied Dr. Beecher, "you had in the neighborhood a blacksmith, who could not see what descent from Peter had to do with making scythes, as long as they were well made, and this man made scythes that would cut. Where would you go to get your scythes?' "Why, to the man who made scythes to cut, certainly," replied the farmer. "Well," said Dr. Beecher, "that minister who cuts, is the minister whom God has authorized to preach." In a recent conversation on the same subject, Dr. Beecher gave his opinion by relating this story. BEAUTIFUL APOLOGUE.—A shepherd was mourning over the death of his favorite child, and in the passionate and rebellious feelings of his heart, was bitterly complaining that what he loved most tenderly, and was in itself most lovely, had been taken from him. Suddenly a stranger, of grave and venerable appearance, stood before him and beckoned him forth into the field. It was night, and not a word was spoken till they arrived at the fold, when the stranger thus addressed him:—

"When you select one of these lambs from the flock, you chose the best and most beautiful among them. Why should you murmur because I, the Shepherd of the sheep, have selected from those which you have nourished for me, the one that was most fitted for my eternal fold?"

The mysterious stranger was seen no more, and the father's heart was comforted.

THE BEST PLANK.—Mr. M'Laren and Mr. Gustard were both ministers of the Tallbooth Church, Edinburgh. When Mr. M'Laren was dying, Mr. G. paid him a visit, and put the question to him, "What are you doing, brother?" His answer was, "I'll tell you what I am doing, brother; I am gathering together all my prayers, all my sermons, all my good deeds, and all my ill deeds; and I am going to throw them all overboard, and swim to glory on the plank of free grace."

Sermons, prayers, and good works, are all well in the place which God intended they should occupy, but they are worse than useless, they are actually ruinous as the foundation to rest our hopes upon. It is one of the most important doctrines of the Bible, that "by grace we are saved."

BENEVOLENCE.—"Not for ourselves, but for others," is the grand law of nature, inscribed by the hand of God on every part of creation. Not for itself, but for others, does the sun dispense its beams; not for themselves, but for others, do the clouds distil their showers; not for herself, but for others, does the earth unlock her treasures; not for themselves, but for others, do the trees produce their fruit, or the flowers diffuse their fragrance and display their various hues. So, not for himself, but for others, are the blessings of God bestowed on man. He who lives only to himself, and consumes the bounty of heaven upon his lusts, or consecrates it to the demon of avarice, is a barren rock in a fertile plain—he is a thorny bramble in a fruitful vineyard; he is the grave of God's blessings; he is the very Arabia Deserta of the moral world.

THE HUMAN VOICE.—God has made the whole earth vocal with sweet sounds. The untraveled forest echoes the notes of the wild bird, and the habitations of men are made glad by the song of the feathered minstrel. But above all, the human voice, that combines the highest charm of sweet sound, with the inspiration of thought, is given for no ordinary purpose of earthly pleasure. In its whisper of affection, how grateful! In its expression of religious devotion, how exalted! For its solace in trouble, how dear! For its participations in joy, how unspeakable!

GENIUS AND TALENT.—A man may possess talent without possessing a spark of genius. Talent is the power of exertion and acquisition, and of applying acquisition in a judicious and effective manner. Talent is cool-headed, and genius is hot-headed; talent may be cold-hearted; genius can never be other than warm-hearted; talent is generally prudent, genius is often imprudent; talent moves steadily and regularly forward, genius goes on impetuously, and lags indolently by turns. The feeling of talent is judgment; and the judgment of genius is feeling. Genius is proud and confident, talent is humble and unpretending. The mind, in which both are united, makes the nearest approach to perfection; since the coolness of talent corrects the impetuosity of genius, and the conceptions of genius dignify the operations of talent.

PSHAW! YOU DON'T DO IT RIGHT.—The following is one of Mr. Gough's admirable illustrations: "I don't believe in any one man looking on and grumbling—finding fault with the work of others. Many men will say, 'You don't go the right way to work,' who never take hold themselves. It puts me in mind of a circumstance which happened in Boston. A cartman was driving a heavy load down the street, when one of the wheels got into a hole. A gentleman on the side walk seeing the difficulty said, as he stood with his thumbs in the arm holes of his waistcoat, 'Now, driver, take hold of the horse's ~~head—give him a cut~~—now. Crack went the whip; 'Get up!' shouted the driver; the horse made a desperate effort, but all in vain. 'Oh, pshaw!' said the gentleman on the sidewalk, 'you don't do it right!' This operation was repeated, but with no better success, and was followed with this exclamation of dissatisfaction by the good gentleman on the walk, 'Oh, pshaw! you don't do it right.' At length an old black man went out into the street, took off his coat, and laying his shoulder to the wheel, he said, 'Now boss, give him a cut!—altogether!' and away went the cart. There are a great many people just like this man; they stand off, make no effort to push forward the car of temperance themselves, and yet are continually complaining—'Oh, pshaw! you don't do it right!' Now, we want these gentlemen, who seem to know all about it, to do as the old black man did—put their shoulders to the wheel, and help us to do it right."

The number Seven is consecrated in the holy books, and in the religion of the Jews, by a great number of events and mysterious circumstances. God created the world in six days, and consecrated the seventh to repose. This is a type of the eternal rest in Heaven. It sometimes, and generally, stands for a definite number—but in other instances, it signifies an indefinite number. Isa. 4, 1: Sam. 2, 5: Jer. 25, 9: Lev. 26, 24: etc.

NEW YORK, MARCH 20, 1845.

"THE FATHERS"—WHO ARE THEY?

It was the glory and strength of Protestantism, that it taught the alone sufficiency of the Word of God as a rule of faith in religious matters. Hence Chillingworth exclaimed, "The Bible, I say, the Bible only is the religion of Protestants." Yet it is well known, that not a few persons who call themselves Protestants, practically deny the sufficiency of the Scriptures by their frequent references to the opinions and authority of "the Fathers." Without stopping to inquire whether in doing this they virtually abandon the cardinal truth of the Reformation, and necessarily bring upon themselves the darkness of Papacy, it may be worth while to inquire who are these Fathers to whose authority they ask us to bow? In pursuing this inquiry, it is found exceedingly difficult to draw thy line between those who lived in the comparatively pure ages of the church, and those who flourished at a time when all sorts of corruptions had spread over the world. There are two ways of getting over the difficulty. The first is, to adopt all as Fathers whose writings have been authorized, or not condemned, by councils and popes. The second is, to reject all but the writers of the first five or six centuries. Passing this difficulty, however, which neither of the above expedients at all remove, there are several other difficulties, equally perplexing, which at once stare us in the face, and deserve a notice.

1. The list of witnesses whose testimony we have is exceedingly meagre. Wm. Goode candidly confesses, that some twelve or fifteen persons make up "the sum total of our witnesses for more than the first three hundred years." Another writer, after referring to the thousands of churches which were scattered over the world during that period, says, "When we come to view the records that actually remain to us, we shall find that we can hardly reckon upon having one witness for a million." The faithful of those days were much more devoted to the work of preaching the Gospel by their words and deeds, than to perpetuating their opinions and controversies by committing them to writing. Hence we have the testimony of only a few witnesses, and these separated widely from each other by time and distance. It is altogether impossible, from so meagre a representation, to assert positively what were the opinions and practices of the mass of believers even in their days.

2. Only a very small part of what was written by these few witnesses has survived the lapse of time. Their books were all in manuscript, and of course perishable. They had for the most part a very limited circulation; the works of the most noted in the church being the only ones extensively copied and read. If we add to this the unsettled habits of the early Christians, and their exposure to persecution, it is easy to see how their books might be totally destroyed or irrecoverably lost. Many instances are known, in which imperial edicts were issued for the specific purpose of destroying every record of Christianity. One edict A. D. 303, under the reign of Diocletian, required not only that the churches of Christians should be razed to the ground, but that all their sacred writings should be burned. There were other edicts of a similar character and design, in obedience to which every manuscript to be found in favor of Christianity fell a prey to pagan rage. Hence it is, that although, as one author asserts, "myriads of books and innumerable writings were composed by the Fathers," yet only fragments of a few remain; and these few are insufficient to make us acquainted with the real spirit of the ages in which they were written.

3. The writings of "the Fathers" which remain, have been so altered and corrupted that no reliance can be placed upon them, especially in relation to controverted points. Alterations to a considerable extent would naturally result from the process of transcribing, to which their books were frequently subjected. It is exceedingly difficult to copy from any writing without more or less mistakes. A single fact will show how frequently these mistakes occurred among the early transcribers. In a small tract by Cyprian, on "the Unity of the Church," a comparison of several manuscript copies shows nearly three hundred various readings. Now if so many alterations could be made in a tract of a dozen pages, what might we not expect in a large work? Some of the early writers were aware of the danger that their books might be mutilated by transcribers, and did what they could to prevent it. Irenæus, in the second century, appends this admonition to one of his treatises:—"I conjure thee, whoever thou art that shall transcribe this book, by the Lord Jesus Christ, and by his glorious coming, when he shall judge the quick and dead, that, after thou hast transcribed it, thou compare it most diligently, and correct it according to the copy after which thou hast written; and then transfer also this injunction as thou findest it in the copy."

But transcribers have not been the worst enemies to the purity of the writings of the ancients. A practice commenced very early of stigmatizing as heretics those who did not fall in with the popular opinions, and then of condemning both them and their books. Some of these heretics were so called for refusing to invoke the saints; others for not worshiping towards the east; others for not observing Easter on a particular day; and others for holding that the seventh day ought to be kept as the Sabbath. Of such persons, the second council of Constantinople says, "If any one does not anathematize Arius, Eunomius, Macedonius, Apollinarius, Nestorius, Eutyches, and Origen, "together with their impious writings, and all other heretics, . . . let them be anathema." In the time of Constantine a law was enacted, requiring that diligent search should be made for the books of heretics, in order that they might be burned. It was enacted in 789, that "fictitious writings and doubtful narratives, or such as are altogether contrary to the Catholic faith, are neither to be believed nor read, but to be burned up, lest the people be led into error." In the Rhemish Testament, (notes on Acts 19: 19,) we are told, that "a Christian man is bound to burn or deface all wicked books of what sort soever, especially heretical books." Facts similar to these might be multiplied to almost any extent, and they would prove beyond a doubt the truth of what the Rev. Wm. Goode maintains, "that in the works which remain to us, we see antiquity through the medium of those records and writings only which the ruling party in the church has allowed to be preserved."

Well would it have been if the evil had ended with the mere destruction of what were called heretical books. But to this was added, alas, the corruption of nominally orthodox books. Dionysius of Corinth, in the second century, makes this complaint—"I have written many epistles at the request of brethren, and these the devil's apostles have filled with tares; expunging some things and adding others; on whom the woe resteth." A writer in the fourth century asserts, that "perverse men, in order to confirm their dogmas by the names of sainted men, inserted in their writings things which they never wrote." In short, nothing is more common than to find, on the one hand, the nominally orthodox of all ages charging the heretics with the most flagrant mutilations of the writings of the Fathers, in order to make them testify in favor of their own opinions; while, on the other hand, the heretics so called are equally bold and bitter in charging upon the orthodox the same practice. So extensively was this practice carried on in the controversies which raged between the fourth and ninth centuries, that it is next to impossible to find a single treatise of any one of the Fathers which has not been so garbled as wholly to impair its integrity.

Such are the writings of "the Fathers," about whose authority we hear much in these days, and to whose words we are referred as sufficient to end all controversy. If it were determined to what age the title properly belongs, it would be impossible to determine who of that age are justly ranked under the title. If it were determined who should be ranked under the title, it would be impossible to decide which are their works. If it were decided which are their works, no man could say what parts of those works were written by themselves, and what by more modern interpolators. There is an indefiniteness and uncertainty about the whole subject, which makes it unsafe to rely with any considerable confidence upon what are now given forth as the opinions of "the Fathers." Indeed, we know of no better way to characterize them, or to answer the question with which we commenced as to who they are, than by quoting the well-known language of JOHN MILTON, who once said, "Whatsoever time, or the heedless hand of blind chance, hath drawn down from of old to this present, in her huge drag-net, whether fish or sea-weed, shells or shrubs, unpicked, unchosen—THOSE ARE 'THE FATHERS.'"

"SABBATH ACCIDENTS."—It would be superlatively ridiculous and laughable, if the subject were a proper one for ridicule and merriment, to read the grave accounts of "Sabbath Accidents," occurring on Sunday, which are piously trumpeted through the land. We have now before us an article in which a certain wiseacre has collected numerous statistics of accidents during the last two years. He gives the number from using fire-arms, from explosions, from drowning, and last of all some half-a-dozen from "Sabbath-breaking." Now it so happens, that most of these Sabbath-breaking accidents occurred either from drowning or the use of fire-arms, and ought, therefore, to be included in his drowning or fire-arm list. Or, if the writer persists in naming the accidents from the day on which they occur, he ought to name them all in like manner, and so call some Monday-breaking accidents, and others Friday-breaking accidents, according to the day on which they happen. Indeed, he might carry his system farther still, and name them all from some events with which they were connected. Thus, for instance, the three dreadful and fatal casualties which have occurred within a few days from the firing of cannon in honor of the inauguration of James K. Polk, might be called Polk accidents. It would perhaps be amusing to see the system carried out, but that it would be either instructive or profitable we do not believe.

THE OLDEST TEMPERANCE DOCUMENT.—A correspondent of the New York Observer has copied from government papers the earliest temperance document under the present Constitution of the United States. It is a memorial to the Senate, and was communicated to that body Dec. 29, 1790. It sets forth that a great proportion of the most obstinate, painful, and mortal disorders, which affect the human body, are produced by distilled spirits; that they not only destroy health and life, but impair the faculties of the mind, and thereby tend equally to dishonor our character as a nation, and degrade our species as intelligent beings; that the habitual use of distilled spirits, in any case whatever, is wholly unnecssary, as they neither fortify the body against the morbid effects of heat or cold, nor render labor more easy or productive; that the memoralists therefore invoke the Legislature of the United States, to protect the lives of the people, the character of the nation, and the rank of the species in the scale of being, by imposing such heavy duties upon all distilled spirits as shall effectually restrain their intemperate use.

IMPORTANT CASE.—A correspondence has been carried on for some time past between Mr. Everett, the American Minister, and the British Government, which bids fair to make considerable stir. It appears that seven fugitive slaves took possession of a small vessel in which they coasted along the Florida shore. They landed at a certain place, for the purpose of obtaining food, where a man attempted to deprive them of their liberty by intimidation and the force of arms. They resisted and killed him, and then escaped to Nassau. They were indicted in Florida for robbery and murder, and demanded of the British authorities at New Providence, who refused to deliver them up; whereupon an appeal was made to the British Government. The treaty under which the surrender is claimed, binds each nation to deliver up fugitives charged with murder, robbery, &c., upon such evidence as would justify their apprehension according to the laws of the place where they are found. The real ground of the refusal to deliver them up is, that as the fugitives were held as slaves, and had committed the act complained of in self-defence, to prevent being deprived of their liberty, the deed was meritorious rather than criminal, and English law could not regard them as chargeable with a crime. This question, together with the question whether an indictment alone is sufficient ground for delivering up a fugitive, has been extensively discussed in the correspondence. Important results may hang upon its decision.

INCIDENTAL USEFULNESS OF MISSIONS.

In a letter to the Chaplain of the United States Senate, Mr. Cushing bears honorable testimony to the influence and character of the American Missionaries in China. They possessed the rare qualification of understanding the Chinese language, which enabled them to act as interpreters to the legation; their intimate knowledge of China and the Chinese, made them invaluable as advisers; and their high character contributed to give weight and moral strength to the mission. And while they were thus useful to this mission in particular, they have been not less useful to the general cause of humanity and religion in the East. The same has been true of the whole body of Christian missionaries in that country from the time when they were first established there. Other legations have been equally dependent upon them for the means of intercourse with the Chinese Government. Indeed, the great bulk of the general information we possess in regard to China, and nearly the whole of the philological information in regard to the two great languages of the country, has been derived from missionaries, either Catholic or Protestant. Mr. Cushing's letter closes with he following language:—"Permit me to add, that, eminently great as this their incidental utility has been, it is a small point, comparatively, among the great and good deeds of the religious missionaries in the East. There is not a nobler or a more deeply interesting chapter than this, in the history of human courage, intellect, self-sacrifice, greatness, and virtue, and it remains yet to be written in a manner worthy of the dignity of the subject, and its relations to civilization and government, as well as to the Christian church."

CHINA.—A letter from China, dated Nov. 1st, 1844, says that the French have concluded a treaty with China which secures several advantages over the treaty of the English or Americans. One advantage is, that Roman Catholic missionaries, on assuming the Chinese dress, are to have free access to any part of the empire, and that the Chinese are permitted to embrace the Christian religion whenever they please. Another advantage is, that several free ports are to be thrown open to all foreign vessels—an arrangement which will seriously affect the interests of Hong Kong, where the English have spent some millions of dollars.

NEW LICENSE LAW.—A bill respecting Licenses has passed the Assembly of this State and will undoubtedly pass the Senate. It meets with scarcely any opposition from any quarter. By its provisions each Town or City in the State is required to hold a special election on the Tuesday preceding the first Monday in May, at which the electors will vote on the simple question 'License' or 'No License.' If 'No License' has a majority, then there will be no Licenses granted for one year at least, or until another Election is demanded by at least one-fourth of the legal voters, and reverses the first decision. If 'License' prevails, then Tavern Licenses to sell liquors are to be granted, much as at present, only no charge is to be made for a License. The people are thus saved from sanctioning the sale of liquors. No Grocers' Licenses to retail liquors are to be granted in any event. If any sell without License, whether Licenses are granted or not, then the Overseers of the Poor may prosecute and recover the penalty. If they fail, any citizen may prosecute, giving security for costs and receiving half the penalty for his trouble.

KAREN CONVERTS.—Three thousand Karens have been baptized within the past four years. It is an encouraging fact, that they are exceedingly anxious to have the Gospel preached to the various tribes around them, and are ready to give liberally for this object. Their example should be a reproof to Christians of this favored land.

DISCUSSION OF SLAVERY.—The discussion which has been going on for some months past, by means of letters, between Drs. Wayland and Fuller, of the Baptist Church, has been brought to a close. It has been conducted in a very candid and friendly manner, and evidently with good results. The letters are soon to be published in a cheap pamphlet form for general distribution.

ANNIVERSARIES OF OUR SOCIETIES.

THE SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION will hold its Third Anniversary in Plainfield, N. J., on the fourth day of the week before the third Sabbath in May next, being the 14th day of the month, at 11 o'clock A. M. It is desirable that all missionary reports should be made to the Secretary previous to that time.

W. B. GILLETT, Rec. Sec., New Market, N. J.

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY will hold its Second Anniversary in Plainfield, N. J., on the fifth day of the week before the third Sabbath in May, being the 15th day of the month, at 10 o'clock A. M. Auxiliary Societies or Churches that have taken action to aid the Society, and Agents who have not already reported, are requested to make their reports with the least possible delay, that the Board of Directors may be able to present a full statement of their labors since the last Anniversary.

F. W. STILLMAN, Rec. Sec., New York.

THE MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.

To the Seventh-day Baptist Churches throughout the United States:—

DEAR BRETHREN,—In view of our Anniversaries to be held in Plainfield on the 14th and 15th of May, I now address you; more particularly, however, in behalf of the Missionary Association. This Association having been organized upon a platform sufficiently broad to cover the whole field of labor presented to us in our own land, and subsequently enlarged so as to embrace foreign lands, now stands before the denomination as an appropriate medium for the diffusion of its benevolence. It is sincerely desired, that the approaching meeting may give abundant proof of the interest you feel in the cause. To this end your delegates should be promptly on the ground, bearing your offerings to the treasury of the Lord, and prepared in the spirit of the Gospel to devise and execute such measures as may be necessary to promote the future operations of the Association. Brethren, we want your money, we want your prayers, we want your counsels, and your active co-operation. Do not, we entreat you, leave the business to be managed entirely by a few living contiguous to, or at most not very remote from, the place of our meeting. It is important to shape the proceedings of the Association so as to meet the views and wants of the entire denomination; of the West as well as of the East; of the South as well as of the North. But in order to this, it is evident that we must have the counsels of the brethren from these different points. A few brethren, living within the bounds of the Eastern Association, are but poorly qualified to judge of the wants of the Western portion of our country. If left entirely to themselves, they must be thrown into a disagreeable strait; either neglecting altogether such fields of labor as are open in the West, and confining their care to those of which they have more perfect knowledge; or else directing their efforts towards them in ignorance of their localities, relative importance, and such other matters as might guide to the most economical and profitable expenditure of the funds entrusted to them; in either case, exposing themselves to censure. It is desirable, that the entire denomination should be harmonized in these things; and for this purpose we entreat our brethren of all the different Associations, as well as those of unassociated churches, not to forget the approaching Anniversary.

As it is not unlikely that the propriety of laboring in a foreign field may come up for discussion, it is hoped that the brethren will make it a matter of prayerful consideration, and come up to the meeting prepared to offer such thoughts on the subject, as may help to guide the Association to that result which will be most for the glory of God.

THOS. B. BROWN,
President of the Seventh-day Bap. Miss'y. Association.
Milton, Pa., March 12, 1845.

AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY.

The Constitution of the American Sabbath Tract Society has been printed in pamphlet form, adapted to circulation for the signatures of members and donations to the Society. It will be forwarded this week to our friends in different parts of the denomination, to whom the near approach of the Anniversary will suggest the necessity of prompt action on their part. If they would see the Society placed in a creditable position, efforts should be made for that purpose before the meeting. Where copies are sent to friends who cannot personally give attention to their circulation, we hope they will be placed in the hands of those who can and will attend to it thoroughly—at the expense of the Society if necessary. If other copies are wanted, they will be immediately sent to those who request it. Where no other opportunity offers, they will be sent by mail, subject to one sheet pamphlet postage. A Constitution with blanks is also appended for such as wish to enter into auxiliary organizations. As these subscriptions, when filled out, will be the property of the Society, it is desirable that care should be taken to preserve them for future use or reference, guarding against defacing the signatures or otherwise injuring them by marking the subscription book. It is hoped that payments for the present year will be made when subscribed; and where this is not the case, paper should be provided to note the fact by those who circulate the subscription. Should our friends, in circulating this document, feel disposed to aid us by soliciting donations on other conditions than those prescribed for membership—and we hope they will—they will also provide other paper for it.

PAUL STILLMAN,
Cor. Sec. of the Am. Sabbath Tract Society.

"A PLEA FOR RELIGIOUS NEWSPAPERS," is the title of a sermon recently preached by a Connecticut Pastor. The subject is one of vast importance, and deserves a place among the instructions of the pulpit. It is encouraging to know, that there is a growing interest in the circulation of these messengers of truth, and a higher estimate of their importance as means of exerting a religious influence.

DEATH OF A SENATOR.—Senator Bates of Massachusetts, who has been sick at Washington for some days past of inflammation of the lungs, died on Sunday evening, the 1 th inst. Mr. Webster announced his death in the Senate on Monday. His remains were to be removed to Northampton, Mass., for interment. The last words which Mr Bates was heard to utter in the Senate, were spoken when the Texas resolutions returned to the Senate after having been concurred in by the House—"Wo! wo! wo! to this country!"

ANTI-RENT TROUBLES IN DELAWARE.—A fresh outbreak occurred among the "Indians" of that county on the 11th inst. It seems that a Deputy Sheriff named Steele was stopped on the road from Andres to Delhi, and compelled to return to Andres, where he was surrounded by about 100 men in disguise, for the purpose of taking away his papers and tarring and feathering him. This outrage was committed in consequence of Steele's having lately arrested one Squires on a bench warrant. It is said that frequent outrages have occurred for a time past, and that the county is in a state of actual rebellion.

Twelve "Indians" have since been taken, and the authorities are determined to enforce the laws.

THE NESTORIAN MISSION.—The permanency of the mission to the Nestorians is threatened by a predominant influence of the Russian government over Persia, and the rise of English Puseyism. The latter can do no more than set the ecclesiastics against the mission. But the Russian influence, since the Affghanistan war, and the withdrawal of the English Embassy from the Persian court, has been constantly gaining ground, until it is believed to sway the Persian government in all matters that are interesting at St. Petersburgh, and to decide upon the course that shall be pursued by that government in reference to all missionary efforts. God may interpose by his providence, but the introduction of Russian ecclesiastical law would be as fatal to the mission at Ooroomiah, as it was to the German missions in the regions of the Caucasus.

THE ARMENIAN MISSION.—The state of things in this important mission, in which the hand of God has been graciously revealed, appears to be drawing to a crisis. The new Patriarch appointed in the Armenian communion, has required all bankers and rich men, to withdraw their patronage from the evangelical men. Every parish priest is also required to see that all the people confess and receive absolution, and all who do not conform are reported to the patriarch, to be dealt with as he shall think proper. Mr. Holmes writes that six native evangelists are engaged in preaching the gospel among the people. They have disposed of a large number of books, and are very useful. Der Varteness, the well known evangelical priest, has been banished to a Greek convent near Cesarea. He was steadfast, and acknowledges his unworthiness thus to suffer for Christ. [Ch. Observer.

THE BAPTISMAL CONTROVERSY IN ENGLAND.—A correspondent of the Montreal Register, writing from London, says, "The Baptismal Controversy goes on in such a way as to promise the best results. I went into the office of one of our leading dissenting journals the other day, where a gentleman employed upon it called my attention to the declarations of the Bishop of Exeter as to baptismal regeneration. 'You,' I replied, 'ought not to find fault with the Bishop; without regeneration, of what use is baptism?' In the course of conversation he told me, that though he had been baptized in infancy, on his asking to be baptized again, when joining a Pedobaptist church, a number of ministers, of course Pedobaptists, had his case brought before them to advise upon it, and at their united advice, his Pedobaptist pastor performed upon him the rite, by sprinkling him a second time. Who are the Anabaptists now?"

REVIVALS.

The Baptist Record gleans from its exchange papers the following encouraging revival intelligence:—

At a protracted meeting, recently held at Bear Creek, in Clark county, Mo., eighty persons were added by baptism.

At Dover church, Clark county, Mo., during a meeting which commenced on Christmas day, ten were added to the church.

The first church at Louisville, Ky., has been much engaged in holding meetings through the week. Six have been added by baptism, during the last month.

Beech Fork church, Marion county, Ky., held a protracted meeting, commencing Jan. 1st. Six were added by baptism, and the church is in a prosperous condition.

The Bethlehem church, Washington county, Ky., held a meeting recently, continuing seven days, when twelve persons united upon the open profession of their faith in Christ.

In St. John's N. B. the work of the Lord is encouraging. During the last six weeks, (preceding Feb. 5th,) the ordinance of baptism had been administered five times.

In Ohio, thirteen have been added to the First Ten Mile church, Clermont county, where there has been held a series of meetings.

At Withamville, in the same county, a meeting was held, which commenced on the 31st of Jan. continued twelve days, and resulted in the conversion of fourteen persons, who were baptized.

At Mt. Union, Stark county, Ohio, after a season of prayer and preaching, six were received by baptism, all heads of families.

In Richmond, Va., on the 23d of Feb., Elder Smith, of the fourth church, baptized six candidates, and Elder J. B. Taylor, of the 3d church, baptized four.

In Waterbury, Ct., a revival has been in progress for several weeks; between 20 and 30 have expressed a hope in Christ, and backsliders have been reclaimed.

At Troy, N. Y., Elder Knapp has been laboring with the pastor of the 1st church, with evident success. Twenty-one were baptized on the 16th of February.

At North Salem, N. Y., 12 or 13 have professed conversion, and many are inquiring. The church at Cold Spring, L. I., is enjoying a revival.

The Eleventh St. Baptist church, N. York city, has been holding special meetings for two months past. Thirty have been baptized.

During the month of February, there were SEVENTY-FOUR baptisms in New York city churches, as reported at the ministers' monthly conference.

General Intelligence.

ONE MONTH LATER FROM EUROPE.

The Steamship Cambria, which reached Boston on Tuesday, brings European intelligence to the 4th of March. The Cotton Market in Liverpool was buoyant. The financial statement of Sir Robert Peel proposes to repeal the duty on cotton, wool, coal, glass, staves for casks, and partially on sugar, with 430 miscellaneous articles. This proposition is under discussion in Parliament, and is thought to be very favorable to American interests.

The American provision market was dull. A reduction in the price of Irish pork had impeded the sale of American. There was no American Butter in the market. Cheese commands good prices. This branch of commerce was steadily increasing.

The news that Pennsylvania had paid the interest of her debt for the current six months was received with much satisfaction. But poor Sidney Smith, who had said so much on the subject and perhaps contributed much to bring about the result, was dead before the news arrived.

The subject of railways absorbs no little time and attention on the part of the House of Commons.

The Bank of England is about to reduce the rates of discount at various branch banks.

The right of search—that irritating surveilance of the high seas, which has proved of late years an endless source of annoyance to American shipping—is virtually at an end.

A violent party conflict had again broken out in Switzerland in the affairs of the Jesuits. Matters looked threatening, but a reconciliation was hoped for.

Affairs in Ireland remained about the same as at last advices. Repeal meetings are regularly held, at which large sums are mentioned as having been received from the United States.

Three days of rejoicing with illuminations, celebrated the fact that on the 18th ult. the Queen of Prussia gave birth to a Princess.

The overland mail from India which left Calcutta on the 8th of January, brought news of a revolution in Nopaul. Also of a serious disturbance at Hong Kong in consequence of a registration decree. Also of a revolution in the Punjaub, in which Heera Singh, the Rajah, and Jella Pundid were killed.

New York Legislature.—But little was done during the last week of general interest, except the passage, in the Assembly, of the new License Law. A bill was introduced into the Senate to prohibit the binding of minor children to the people called Shakers, which led to considerable discussion, and the appointment of a select committee to inquire into the matter. Several petitions were presented in the Assembly for a peaceable dissolution of the Union. A bill was passed to pay the troops called out in Dec. 1843, and Jan. 1844, at the rate of $2 per day for each man, without distinction of rank. A resolution was passed by the Senate to adjourn on the 8th of April. A bill to provide for supplying the city of Utica and the State Lunatic Asylum with water, was discussed at length. A petition was presented against allowing the judges of county courts to draw their compensation on Sunday. A petition was received from Brookfield, Madison county, asking for some legislative action reproving the course of the Rhode Island authorities towards Thomas W. Dorr. Much time was spent in the discussion of the Constitutional Amendments.

Water Cure.—Dr. Tucker, editor of the Democratic Freeman, published in Syracuse, relates the following interesting case of water cure, occurring in his own family:

A few weeks since a member of our family, a daughter between five and six years of age, was attacked with inflammation of the lungs. Her symptoms were pronounced of an alarming character by a skillful physician who was called in to examine her, and the usual prescription of blister or bleeding with powerful medicines recommended. Her fever was so high, and the pain in her head, chest and limbs so severe, that she could not rest day nor night. We were advised by a friend to try cold water treatment, instead of the medicines. With some hesitancy and misgivings we resolved to do so—consequently put the medicines away, as a last resort. The child was divested of all her clothing and wrapped in linen sheets of four thicknesses, and then covered with blankets. After remaining in the sheets about an hour, they were changed; and so repeated during the first day of trial. On the return of the paroxysm of the fever on the second day, the wet sheets were applied, and prespiration produced with the first application. They were then removed and the patient placed in bed, in flannel sheets, where she slept quietly for three hours. The fever returned again in the evening and was broken up in the same manner. This course was pursued for five days, and nothing administered to eat or drink save cold water, or cold crust coffee; the paroxysms becoming less violent every day, until the sixth day, when there was none, and the patient was enabled to sit up and receive light nourishment. She soon recovered entirely, and is now well.

We have made the same application to our youngest son of 12 months, for a severe attack of croup, with like success—the application of cloths being confined to the chest and throat.

State Normal School.—This school was opened at Albany on the 18th of December last, with 29 pupils. Upwards of 90 are now in attendance; and it is believed that at least double the latter number will enter the ensuing term in April.

Of course, the beginning of an effort, hitherto untried in our State, has been made under embarrassments and interruptions, which must have interferred with the working of the experiment. These, however, have been in a measure overcome; and the result for the future may be expected to be still more encouraging.

Getting Ready for the New Postage.—We want to put our Yankee neighbors on the lookout in season to get ready for the new postage law, which takes effect on the 1st of July. After that time, the postage on letters will be regulated by weight, and not by the number of pieces of paper. Half an ounce weight passes for a single letter. The first thing required, then, will be a cheap scale to weigh letters, as every man of business will require such a convenience. There are several different patterns in use in England, but we have not the slightest doubt, of course, that Yankee ingenuity can improve on them all and give us a neat article for the writing-desk or center table, at a cost of less than half a dollar. The other article is the entire envelope. The half ounce will carry two sheets of common letter paper with an envelope, which will furnish complete security against the letters being pried into and read. These envelopes are made and sold in London for 6d sterling per hundred, and will go into general use here, and those who first go into the business will make the money. [Boston Chronicle.

American Mail Steamships.—The bill authorizing the conveyance of letters to foreign ports in our own steamships, was passed by Congress The National Intelligencer congratulates the country upon its passage, and says, "to Dr. Junius Smith, an American gentleman, who first stimulated English enterprise to carry the project of steamship navigation into effect, is our country indebted for this further movement, and we trust he will be adequately sustained in his efforts until he shall carry his great design into complete effect. He is fully determined to proceed forthwith in the construction of several magnificent steamships, and we may hope, in a year or eighteen months, to see their regular departures and arrivals announced in New York."

The May Flower.—Messrs. E. D. Hurlbut & Co., of New York, have added a new bark to their Southern Packet establishment, and called her after that little vessel which brought over the Pilgrims, and by that deed immortalized her name. The new May Flower is not only named after the ship of 1620, but her interior arrangement testify to the strength of the moral forces which were gathered on board that little vessel. On her stern is a shield, supported by Robinson and Standish, each in his proper habiliments as religious and martial leaders of the enterprise. On the shield lies an open Bible, and beneath, a crown reversed and a broken sceptre lying near it. Within is the Bible on the cabin table, and forward, a comfortable top-gallant forecastle for the sailors, supplied with the American Tract Society's Library of forty volumes, and no grog anywhere. The new May Flower was built by Messrs. Geo. Greenman & Co., of Mystic, Conn., of pasture oak and white chesnut, and is of 520 tons burthen, and of fine model. She is a great deal bigger than her predecessor, but she will never get a freight on board of one hundredth part the value.

The Jesuits and Eugene Sue.—Those who have read the Wandering Jew, know that it is a biting sarcasm throughout of the Jesuits. At this moment also there are two countries in Europe, Switzerland and Belgium, where the greatest exasperation against the Jesuits prevails. A recent mode of manifesting this feeling has been in honoring Eugene Sue their powerful foe.

Albany, March 11.—The bill to submit to the people at their annual elections in ward or town the question of license or no license for the retail of spiritous liquors, passed the House in committee of the whole yesterday afternoon after being amended so as to include within its provisions the city of New York. It was referred to the committee originally reporting the bill, to report complete.

Dedication of a School House.—Boston dedicated a new Grammar School on Wednesday. It bears the name of the 'Otis Grammar School' in compliment to the venerable Harrison Gray Otis. Mr. Otis was present at the dedication, with Gov. Briggs and the Mayor, and made an interesting speech, in which he dwelt upon the incidents of his own school-boy days. Among other amusing incidents of the olden times, he said that his schoolmaster used to reward all the well-behaved scholars, every Wednesday afternoon, with shellbarks, which he threw out of the window, allowing the boys the fun of scrambling for them!

A Wooden Library.—Among the curiosities in the collection made by the Exploring Expedition, is what is called the Library, which consists of several volumes of wooden books about nine inches long, six wide, and two in thickness, curious in design, and beautiful in execution. Each volume is formed of the wood of the tree, the name of which is inscribed on the bark attached to the back of the book. The interior contains specimens of the leaves, fruit, blossoms, and roots, with a cavity in the back for a paper containing a botanical description.

The Iron District.—The iron district, which spreads through New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Western Virginia, traverses regions exuberant with coal, and abounding in water-power; and traveling further West, we find in Ohio, Kentucky, and particularly in Missouri, immense stores of metaliferous wealth, adjacent to the most fertile agricultural districts. It is to Pennsylvania, however, we must chiefly direct our attention, where two fifths of all the iron in the United States is made. The United States contain 80,000 square miles of coal, which is about sixteen times as great as the coal measures of Europe. A single one of these gigantic masses runs from Pennsylvania to Alabama, and must embrace, itself, 50,000 square miles. Out of fifty counties of Pennsylvania no less than thirty have coal and iron in them; and, out of 46,000 square miles of Pennsylvania, which form superfices, there are 10,000 miles of coal and iron; while all of Great Britain and Ireland have only 2,000—so that Pennsylvania alone has an area of coal and iron five times as great as that of Great Britain. The quality of the coal or iron is as rich as that of Great Britain, and they have the advantage of lying near the water-level; while those of the latter country are sometimes more than one thousand feet below the surface, and are excavated through subterranean passages. [Hunt's Merchants' Mag.

Trinity Church, N. Y.—The workmen have been employed upon the interior of Trinity most of the winter, especially upon the stained glass windows. Twenty of them are already finished, including the large one in the Tower facing Wall street. The magnificent window behind the Chancel has not yet been completed, but it is designed to surpass every thing of the kind on this continent. The bishop's room at the extremity of the building, and extending its entire width, is a handsome apartment, containing in its walls the various impressive marble tablets which were placed in old Trinity. The room is lighted by four superb windows, each embellished with scriptural designs, exquisitely blended upon the glass. Nothing can be finer than the effect of these gorgeous windows; that they are "home productions" it is enough to say. They are prepared in a temporary building in Trinity church yard. [Com. Adv.

Murder in a Court House.—We learn from the Lexington (Ky.) Enquirer, that on the 5th inst. Clifton R. Thompson, Esq. was shot dead in the court House, by Henry Daniel, his brother-in-law. Daniel was immediately taken into custody by the civil authority and confined in jail. They were attending to a suit which had been continued from term to term, on the affidavit of Daniel, who was then making another application for a further continuance. Thompson was then heard by the Judge on the subject, and accused Daniel of stating a vile and false calumny in his affidavit; at this moment Daniel arose and observed to him, not to repeat that. Thompson with his face to the Judge said, 'I do repeat it,' and at that instant Daniel drew his pistol and fired, the ball passed through his body, killing him instantly.

Mineral Resources of Alabama.—In Randolph county, (Ala.) there are five large mines of silver and gold, and several minor ones, which produce annually about $125,000, and afford employment to 3 or 500 persons. Tallapoosa County is also rich in gold and silver mines. Goldville is supported by one mine. Gold has also been found in Coosa, Talladega and Chambers Counties. In Randolph there is an inexhaustible bed of Iron ore, which does not lose 15 per cent in melting. Nitre, Coal, Salt and lead ore, are found in other Counties.

Disgraceful Outrage.—A most shameful outrage was perpetrated in our bourough on Friday evening last. Stephen S. Foster and Charles Lenox Remond (the latter a colored man) had been delivering a series of lectures here on the subject of American Slavery; and on the evening referred to they were disturbed by a gang of ruffians who threw a stone through the window—striking Remond whilst speaking—and by firing offcrackers, and other acts of a base and cowardly a character. The outrage meets, as it should, the severest condemnation of all our respectable citizens, and only finds countenance in the breasts of a few contemptible, low-lived miscrants, who, by this act, and others of a similar nature, have degraded themselves far below the level of that unfortunate class of our citizens, which is the object of their especial enmity. [Newtown (Pa.) Jour.

Cruelty to a Slave.—A most inhuman sight presented itself to the residents of Chesnut street, this morning. A negro boy was seen to issue from near the corner of Third and take down Chesnut street at full speed, stripped to his waist, and his back cut and lacerated in a most shocking manner; he took a straight line for the river, and plunged in, apparently with the intention of getting clear of some dreaded evil at all hazards; he was, however, rescued by some of the crew of a steamer lying at the wharf. We inquired what offence he had committed, and were told he had been severely beaten for running away. [St. Louis New Era, Feb. 25.

Life in Mississippi.—The Natchez Courier says: Within a few weeks the town of Woodville has lost two most estimable citizens. A rencounter first occurred between Mr. B. F. Herbert and Mr. Fenner, both said to be mild, placable, and strictly honorable gentlemen, which resulted in the death of Mr. Herbert. A few days after this, another rencounter took place between Mr. Fenner and a brother of the deceased Mr. Herbert, which has resulted in the death of Mr. Fenner. On last Friday week, at the Globe Hotel, a renconnter took place between a man named Gadbery and another named Farmer. G. shot F. and Farmer died.

More.—The Columbia (S. C.) Carolinian says:—"An affair of honor came off near the Hampton Course, at Augusta, on Thursday, the 20th inst. between Major John Partlow, of Abberville district, and John G. Burton, Esq. of Newberry district, S. Carolina. They fought with muskets, at ten paces, and Mr. Burton fell mortally wounded at the first fire.

Two Irishmen, named John Morrison and James Connell, had a fight with knives at Mobile on Sunday, the 23d ult. in which both were severely wounded, Morrison particularly, who received seven dangerous wounds in his breast and shoulder. His life is despaired off.

A young man named Pierre Trapiguler, was stabbed by another young man named Bruneau, a few days ago, in New Orleans. He died immediately. They were creoles, had been on intimate terms, and were respectably connected.

Anti-Dueling in the South.—Mr. Chinn has given notice in the Louisiana Convention that he will offer a clause to be inserted in the new Constitution, by which all persons sending or accepting a challenge to fight a duel, and their seconds, shall be rendered incapable of holding any office of honor or profit in the State. We like to see this effort to put down the last relic of barbarism that disgraces our country.

Dueling in South Carolina.—The Grand Jury of Charleston have presented as a grievance the practice of duelling, and earnestly recommended to the Legislature the passage of an act to suppress the custom so pernicious to the happiness and good order of society. They also recommend the passage of a law for the punishment of persons carrying concealed weapons.

Three Children Frozen to Death.—A touching incident is thus related by the Auxilliary Breton: "During the last few days of cold, three young children of the town of Baines had been sent out by their parents to gather dead wood. These poor infants lost themselves in the wood, and night came on without their having been able to refind their road. The eldest, scarce six years old, sought some shelter, and there huddled up his little brothers: he then stripped himself of his waistcoat, and covered them with it, and made them a rampart from the cold wind with his body. It was in this condition that they were found in the morning, all three frozen to death."

End of the Slave Trade in Cuba.—It will rejoice every heart of flesh to learn that Cuba, heretofore the city of refuge of the traffickers in human bodies and souls, is to be henceforth free from that curse. The Captain-general has lately issued a proclamation declaring all vessels arriving at Cuba with slaves on board, to be confiscated. So much for English influence—would there were more of it. Three hundred and fifty millions of bricks have been made in Cincinnati, the last year.

SUMMARY.

There are in Ohio about 13,000 teachers, and 460,000 scholars, connected with more than 13,000 common schools.

There were only 553 deaths the year past in Charleston, South Carolina, which contains a population of nearly 30,000.

The working women have had several meetings recently to see how they can improve their wages and their condition, in New York city.

American Saws are sold in Sheffield, England, under the noses of the manufacturers of that country.

Marble and granite, from the time of the Pyramids, have been used as monuments for the dead, and they are no doubt durable; but in England they are now making them out of cast iron, which not only exceeds stone and wood in enduring character, but is susceptible of great and cheap embellishments, and can always be kept fresh and in good order.

The Iron Revenue steam-cutter "George M. Bibb" was launched at Pittsburgh on Saturday morning. Some fifteen or twenty minutes before the time set apart for launching, the boat started from its fastenings and rushed on its way into the river, which it nearly crossed. A Mr. Buckhart was dangerously injured, and a Mr. McKee had his arm broken. Several others were thrown into the river, but they were rescued.

It is rather a curious fact that the national incomes of France and England were last year very nearly the same in amount. The revenue receipts of the two countries were as follows: France 1,270,900,000f. at 25, £50,074.209; England, £50,071,643; difference between the two countries, only £2666.

Alvanus Fisk, of Natchez, Miss., has presented to that city for the establishment of a free school, a piece of property which a few years ago sold for $21,500, and is worth now at least $10,000 in cash.

Twenty-three boxes, containing some two thousand broom-handles, were shipped a few days since for London. We understand that some persons are rasing the brush in Ohio, and have obtained the handles from this valley, shipping the raw materials to England, and there manufacture the brooms. [Northampton Courier.

It is stated that several new iron establisments are about to be erected in the vicinity of Reading, Pa.

We are informed, by Col. Hatch, of the express, of the death of Mrs. Lafon, wife of Dr. Lafon, late missionary to the Sandwich Islands. She died at Fairhaven in the absence of her husband.

The Vicksburg Constitutionalist says that no smoking of cigars or pipes is permitted in any church in that city!

Gov. Briggs has commuted the sentence of York, the murderer, to imprisonment for life in the State Prison, with a proviso that if he escapes from prison he shall be liable to the original sentence.

A subscriber, who has been indebted to us a long while, writes that he is determined "to practice the most unremitting industry" in order to enable himself to pay us. He would please us better if he were somewhat remitting in his industry. [Louisville Journal.

The Catholic Church in Oswego was broken into on Sunday night, and the plate, priest's dress, &c., carried off. An attempt was also made to fire the Church. The Church lists and other papers were set on fire in a chest, where, from want of air, the papers only burnt.

A strong opposition on the Hudson River has reduced the fare in some cases to 50 cents.

The whole expense of turning the Old Dutch Church in Nasseu street, New York, into a post office, is said to have been forty thousand dollars.

In Woolwich township, Gloucester county, N. J. the people, in town meeting, last week, took for candidates two very respectable maiden ladies, Sally Rrown and Betsy French, and elected them Justices of the Peace by a triumphant majority.

Mrs. Martha Taber, who was born in Newport, R. I. March 10th, 1844, completed one hundred and one years on Monday last. She resides with her daugher, Mrs. Knight, and enjoys good health.

It is stated in some of the papers, that there are no less than one hundred and twenty towns in Massachusetts utterly destitute of a grog-shop.

The profits of the Connecticut State Prison from Oct. 1. 1837, to December 31, 1844—seven years and three months, have been $103,146 48.

The receipts into the treasury of the American Board in January, were $26,669 73. Total from August 1st to January 31st, $118,090 50.

The bell foundry of Andrew Meneely, of West Troy, turned out from Jan. 1st 1844 to 1845, one hundred and forty-five bells, weighing in the aggregate 77,158 lbs. Average weight, 532 lbs. each.

The New Orleans Picayune, of the 21st ult., says:—"When the pardon of Gov. Moulton was announced to one of the convicts in the penitentiary at Bouton Rouge, on Monday evening last, he dropped dead, it is supposed in con equence of the sudden sensation of joy produced by that delightful information."

The Governor and Council have appointed Thursday, April 3d, for the observance of the usual Fast in Massachusetts.

A bill to modify the license law, providing for submitting the question of license or no license to the people of the several towns, passed the Michigan House of Representatives by the very strong vote of 39 ayes to 7 nays.

The revenues of New Jersey for the present year are estimated by the Treasurer at $75,512 73. The balance in the Treasury is $15,523 87.

The census of the city of Cleveland, just taken, gives a total of 9,573. Population by census of 1840, 6,071. Increase in four years 3,502.

Benjamin Lett, who has remained in the State Prison at Auburn for several years, under a conviction for arson in burning the steamer Great Britain, has been pardoned by Gov. Wright, because it appeared from the testimony of the physicians that he was suffering under consumption, which must inevitably terminate his life if he were retained in confinement.

Missionaries for Jamaica.—The quarterly report of the West Indian committee, announces the arrival, at Jamaica, of the Rev. Lorin Thompson and lady, of Attica, N. Y. as missionaries to the emancipated negroes. Mr. Henry B. Newhall, of Chelsea, Mass. has also been sent to the same field as a teacher. The Rev. Mr. Beardslee, who has for some time been stationed there gives a favorable account of the mission.

Obituary.—Died at his residence in Pittsfield, Otsego county, N. Y., on the 7th of February, of apoplexy, Col. Rouse Clark, aged 54 years.

Some weeks previous to his death he was attacked with a severe pain in his head, and was confined to his room. He so far recovered from the first attack as to be able to ride out and partially to attend to business. The prospect of recovery seemed flattering and fair. While seated by the cheerful fireside of his family, engaged in reading a favorite book and enjoying the sweetest happiness of home, he was suddenly attacked with a severe pain in his head, screeched, and threw down the book. He soon so far recovered as to give a description of the attack, then exclaimed, "It is coming again," gave a scream, raised his hands to his head, and fell back insensible. He lay insensible for thirty hours, and then died without a struggle or a groan. [Cooperstown Journal.

DIED,

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

THIS Institution has a pleasant and quiet location thirteen miles south-east of Angelica, and six miles south of Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y., under the care of W. C. Kenyon, as Principal, and Miss Caroline B. Maxson, as Preceptress, aided by able and experienced assistants.

Teachers' Classes will be exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining every facility of a Normal School, without its usual disadvantages. Within the past year, more than one hundred and fifty students of the institution have been employed as teachers in this and the adjacent counties—a number much larger than from any other institution in the State.

Students are prepared for entering any class in College. Ample advantages are also secured to those pursuing Modern Languages and the Fine Arts. The institution is liberally endowed and supplied with a choice and valuable library, and apparatus sufficiently extensive to illustrate every department of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. It has also well selected cabinets of Geological, Mineralogical and Conchological specimens.

The plan of instruction aims at the development of the moral, intellectual and physical powers of students, so as to render them thorough, accurate, and practical scholars.

Lectures on Chemistry, accompanied by a full course of experiments, will commence with the second week of the fall term, and continue daily to its close. During the fall and winter terms, daily lectures will be given on School Teaching. Lectures on Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Physiology, illustrated by experiments, will be given each term of the year.

Tuition, per term of fifteen weeks, from $3,50 to $5. Board per week, in private families, $1. The entire expense of the academic year, including tuition, board, washing, light, and fuel, need not exceed $60. No extra charges incurred.

TRUTH.

BY R. C. WATERSTON.

> As for the Truth, it endureth, and is always strong.
> ESDRAS.

Theories, which a thousand cherish,
Pass like clouds that sweep the sky,
Creeds and dogmas all must perish;
Truth herself can never die.

From the glorious heavens above her,
She has shed her beams abroad,
That the souls who truly love her,
May become the sons of God.

Worldlings blindly may refuse her,
Close their eyes and call it night;
Learned scoffers may abuse her,
But they cannot quench her light!

Thrones may totter, empires crumble,
All their glories cease to be;
While she, Christ-like, crowns the humble,
And from bondage sets them free.

God himself will e'er defend her
From the fury of her foe,
Till she in her native splendor
Sits enthroned o'er all below.

"THY WILL BE DONE."

Short, but comprehensive petition! Uttered often by the careless lip of the proud worldling, as he repeats that inimitable prayer, of which it forms a part, without one thought of its significance; and yet embracing in its wide scope the whole range of God's providence, from the wisdom that guides a planet, to the care that marks the falling of a sparrow. Uttered too frequently even by the Christian, without a just sense of its deep and solemn import. "Thy will be done!" Who can say this from the heart, and yet retain any will of his own, in reference to temporal blessings, to friends, health, or even life itself? The will of Him who is possessed of infinite knowledge, wisdom, and benevolence, who sees perfectly the end from the beginning, and on whom all created intelligences depend, must of necessity often conflict with ours, who are not only of yesterday and know nothing, but whose views and feelings are so warped by sin, that our own judgment is never to be trusted for a moment, where the heart is concerned in the decision. Now in such a case, who shall decide for us?

"Oh, who so fit to choose our lot,
'And regulate our ways,"

as the God who created us, the Savior who died to redeem us, and the blessed Spirit who sanctifies, comforts, and fits us for heaven? Why should we shrink and tremble when His will is done, since we know that it is "the perfection of wisdom," and since we have his own gracious assurance—"What I do, thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter."

I have seen a mother, who as she knelt by the side of her sleeping infant, breathed forth, from a glad and grateful heart, the petition, "Thy will be done." She thanked God for the sweetest of all earthly gifts; and while thus recognizing the Giver, her deceived heart was ignorant of the tenacity with which it clung to that darling child. Day by day it grew more lovely and more intelligent, and while she watched the unfolding of the precious blossom, and witnessed every hour some new development of mind, some added charm of form or feature, she almost forgot that the cherished object of her love and care was mortal.

"To find" its "fairy footsteps following" her,
Its "hand upon her garments, or its lip,
Long sealed to hers, and in the watch of night,
The quiet breath of innocence to feel
Soft on her cheek; was such a full content
Of happiness, as none but mothers know."

But in the midst of all this enjoyment, while the conscious mother felt that a cloud had arisen between her soul and God, though she hardly knew how, the spoiler came and snatched the youngest and fairest of the flock, for his prey.

"Death found strange beauty on that cherub brow,
And dash'd it out"——

In an unexpected moment, the grim messenger was sent to bear away the treasure so lately lent, so highly prized, to the God who gave it. Those twining arms were unclasped from the neck, those soft eyes into whose blue depths she had so often gazed with unutterable tenderness, were sealed up forever; that sweet voice, whose faintest tone was music to her ear, was hushed, and her soul's idol lay before her, motionless and cold, unmindful of her anguish, and heedless of the tears that were raining on its marble brow. But in that hour of bitter anguish the stricken mother was not left alone. That glorious Redeemer, who in the days of his flesh, wept with Mary and Martha at the grave of Lazarus, and whose ear is still open to the softest call of human woe, came to her relief. Notwithstanding the folly and ingratitude which rendered the chastisement so needful, the compassionate Savior poured the oil of consolation into her bleeding heart, and "as one whom his mother comforteth," so he comforted his erring but penitent child, in this her time of need. Melted, subdued, penetrated by such wonderful love; the mourner raised her eyes from the precious dust on which they had rested, and as she followed with the eye of faith the now glorified spirit to the throne of God, exclaimed from the depths of a chastened and humbled heart, "thy will be done." Thus, "though afflicted, bruised and broken," the peace of God came down into her soul and though the world might never again be to her what it had been, the thought that it was a Father's hand which had smitten her, and the sweet assurance that her darling was forever safe in his arms, enabled her to go on her way rejoicing.

Bereaved mother! hast thou experienced a similar trial and found similar consolations? If so, thank God, and take courage, and be assured that no trial shall befal thee, under which the everlasting arms will not be abundantly able to sustain thee. He whom thou lovest, will be infinitely better to thee than sons or daughters, and soon, very soon if thou art faithful, thou shalt rejoin the loved and lost, in a world where sickness and sorrow and death can never come. Thus

"While the wounds of wo are healing,
While the soul is all resign'd;
'Tis the solemn feast of feeling,
'Tis the Sabbath of the mind."

Blessed foretaste of that eternal Sabbath on which many who were unspeakably dear to us have already entered, and which awaits us when we shall drop "this mortal coil," and go to him "whom having not seen we love, in whom though now we see him not, yet believing, we rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory, till we receive the end of our faith, even the full salvation of the soul."

[Adv. Moral Ref.

THE LADIES OF THE PRESENT AGE.

By one of the pupils of Mrs. Atkinson's Seminary.

The frivolity of the female sex has been a subject of remark among those, who, by the laws of nature, should protect and vindicate their rights and characters, ever since the wily deceiver banished peace and confidence from Eden's shade.—Their vanity, love of dress and want of strength of mind, furnish a most interesting topic of conversation, and the elegant sarcasm with which their faults are alluded to, could not be surpassed by even Pope himself. But satire is not the language with which public speeches are generally clothed; for when any great cause comes before the people, the aid and influence of the ladies are politely requested, amid flowing praises and delicate compliments. But, why the female mind is supposed to be incapable of those lofty pursuits which render that of man so noble, why the possession of a few accomplishments and exterior graces, is all of which she is thought worthy, has never been taken into consideration by those wise and learned men who act upon these suppositions.

There is an innate desire to please, within the hearts of all the human family, but more especially within that of woman. She dwells in smiles, and it is her chiefest joy, to create in other breasts, happiness corresponding to that within her own. Need we wonder then that she applies herself to that which she knows is best adapted to please. Were the pursuits of literature most esteemed by gentlemen, as becoming to the ladies, every one would be interested in intellectual acquirements, and every mind would leave its unnatural thraldom, the fame of the American ladies would sound throughout the eastern world, and Columbia would be envied for the wise and interesting productions of its gentle sex; but as it is, the females of America must rest within the bounds of popular taste, for there are but few who have not bowed to the altar of vanity and knelt to the despot of fashion. But though they have not realized the expectations of those interested in the youthful land of Liberty, there is excuse for them; they have not descended from the nobleness of our puritan mothers for a low object, for a mere bauble. No, it was to obtain the richest prize our land affords, the attention of great and gifted men; and this they cannot secure without paying the utmost consideration to the adorment of the person and the few trifling accomplishments of which the ladies of the present age are thought capable. They do not thus remain in fetters for the sake of fops and fools, for, to their praise be it spoken, there are some ladies who are not flattered by such attentions, nor won by the lisping nonsense of the drawing room. But it is to attract men of superior minds and glowing talents.

It is the lady that can with soft accents and engaging manners, discuss the common-place subjects of remark, and not the one who, with a countenance glowing with intelligence, can explain the various phenomena of nature, and admiringly speak of her curious handiwork; or whose mind has escaped from the entanglements of lace and silk, and dared to look from nature up to nature's God, that attracts their admiration.—No, she remains neglected, and unless her mind is cast in a very different mould from that of the majority of the human race, she will endeavor to copy the most successful, and win attention herself by lisping tones and fashionable manners.

You see a literary gentleman enter a mixed society where ladies of good sense and those of none at all are collected, this distinction causes not the least hesitation in his mind. It is the lady dressed in the farthest extreme of fashion, resplendent amid satin and pearls, and whom wealth has raised to rank, that he selects as one to whom to pay his devoirs. His artful flattery delights her ear, and presents greater allurements for dress than even dress itself.

What the ladies of our land are, the influence of our leading men has made them. They are thought of merely as engaging companions, with whom to pass a pleasant hour, and who are simply capable of constructing ingenious toys for fairs, or with elastic touch to wile away the tedious time upon the piano or guitar. The gentlemen think not that the female mind is able to keep pace and walk side by side with theirs—that where the spirit of man has braved its glorious way, there the spirit of woman is capable of soaring, and the ladies themselves have never, even in thought, aspired to such a path.

Many of the ladies of the present age, dare not to be sensible; for, in the character of a sensible woman, with few personal attractions, and destitute of the "factitious circumstances" of wealth and station, who would think to please? The gentlemen are supposed to form the standard in every thing. Their likes and dislikes are thought to actuate every motive. And since they form the standard of female excellency, (if so be there is any,) wherefore are those long pieces that swell the columns of almost every newspaper with the vanity and extravagance of woman? It were a pity indeed that the noble lords of creation, whose very being is consistency, should object to a standard of their own formation.

A SCENE IN THE BOSTON POLICE COURT.

The Police Court of Boston was crowded to overflowing, for it was understood that among the creatures which had been arrested the night before, were several females, who, led away by bad examples, and an unbroken train of temptations, had fallen victims to remorse and the world's scorn, and become degraded outcasts in society; and upon this scene of wretchedness, hundreds came to gloat their eyes, to mock and laugh, and treat with levity the sufferings of others, and to render still more bitter and polluted the state of the unfortunate. One poor forsaken female had just been sentenced to the House of Correction as a vagrant and abondoned one; as she stood upon the prisoner's stand, her appearance exhibited a wretchedness, want and misery, which would have excited the pity and feelof every good man; wretchedness, disease, and scorn had nearly driven her mad, and she appeared to feel as though the world had no communion with herself, and turning to the gaping crowd, she held her thin bare trembling arm on high and poured forth a curse loud and deep upon them while the officer hurried her away to the lock room. This act of wild insanity on the part of the poor creature, only created mirth for the unthinking, and scarcely a single expression of sympathy was awakened in any breast for her. And what is the history of that forlorn prisoner? A few, but a few years ago, she was a beloved daughter, the joy of a happy family circle, whose presence at all times created delightful emotions, in the heart of a tender mother, and a doating father. A base, a despicable villain, who lived only for the gratification of his own evil passions, saw her, and by a constant practice of his base arts, seduced her from the dear home of her parents, he poisoned the pure fountain of virtue within her breast, destroyed that holy passion; it was a long time before that divine and early gift, which her parents through God had planted in her heart, became destroyed, it was long before that heart became hardened by crime, but it at length yielded to his hellish lessons, and became totally corrupted and shameless; and the serpent guilt dwelt in the place of the pure spirit that once inhabited that loving and beloved girl, and infusing its deadly poison into her mind, left it a prey to remorse and horror. A few years had made sad havoc in her appearance; that cheek now so pale and sickly, was then fresh as the morning rose, and that eye, now so dull and leaden, was then full of lustre and sweetness, and that forehead now prematurely furrowed by the hand of intemperance, was once as clear and transparent as the marble; and that lip now livid with disease, lent a sweet expression to her face, which filled every beholder with rapture.

This case had hardly been disposed of by the Judge, when the door of the Court room was again thrown open, and another female, scarcely seventeen years of age, was conducted to the prisoner's seat. She was well dressed, but in that meritricious garb, which too plainly bespoke one of that class of poor misguided beings, who, having commenced their career of infamy, find in such a guise a fit companion for their arts. Her face was wan and pale, and her haggard countenance contrasted strangely with her bright and sparkling dress; her hair was of a rich auburn color and fell loosely about her neck, and a slight color tinged her cheek, while the clerk read the charge to her. There was something in that blush and downcast look which indicated that her deviation from the path of virtue had been recent, and that she had not yet wholly surrendered herself to the dominion of the destroyer. The life she had recently led had stolen much of the beauty of her person, but she was still beautiful. Poor girl; a victim of the insiduous arts of a villain, she had loved not wisely, but too well, and he had trampled upon that sacred passion, had cast her from him upon the wide world, had prepared her youthful mind to receive impressions from every scene of depravity. On the brink of what an awful precipice she stood! she who had been once so constant and devoted, the gentle and confiding being, snatched like a rose from its sweet and fragrant bower, and thrown into the dust to be trampled upon by every one. She was known as a wanton; while she stood upon that platform allotted to prisoners, all eyes were turned towards her. The libertine, in whose eye no principle of virtue was sacred, who regarded it only as administering to his own sensuality, gazed upon her with a smile, and made her feelings a jest for the ready ear of his comrade. There were several of these fiends in human form present, who laughed at the distress of this forlorn girl. She stood upon the brink of an awful precipice, and one step more and she would be beyond the power of man to redeem. She stood friendless and alone, disowned by her parents, excluded from the society of the good by a barrier, which public opinion had thrown before her; whichever way she turned her eye for hope, the finger of scorn was pointed at her. Poor victim of misplaced affection; betrayed and lost! for her no tear of pity fell, no heart beat in sympathy. Though that still fair brow had been dishonored, she was not beyond hope; the principles of virtue had not been entirely eradicated, but within her heart there yet lingered the living spark. The rose had been crushed; it had withered, but still lived. That flushed cheek, that moist eye, that heaving bosom, that weight of woe nearly sank her to the floor. She was still a precious jewel; on the one side the star of Hope yet feebly shone; on the other, an eternity of maddening guilt, of endless horror; it was but a step to one or the other. Will she be saved?

One by one the constables were sworn, who severally testified to the abandoned character of the defendant, and their words were not chosen in kindness towards the unfortunate girl.

"Have you any witness?" asked the Judge of the young girl.

Her reply was only in sobs and tears.

"Or any thing to say to me upon the charge, and testimony against you?"

She made no reply.

The Judge took his book, and dipped his pen in ink, and was proceeding to write the dreaded sentence, by which the girl would be sent to the abode of felons, when he paused, and while his head rested on his left hand, he gazed silently in the downcast face of the girl. There was something in that tearful eye, that seemed to interest him, and it was evident that he believed that this poor girl was not far abandoned, and that he held her future destiny in his grasp. Again he dipped the pen in ink, but his mind still dwelt upon the poor creature before him, and he could not write the sentence. That eye, which sees all things on earth directed what to do, and snatched a poor creature, overwhelmed by circumstances, like a brand from the burning.

"Is any one present acquainted with the history of this defendant, or disposed to do anything in her behalf?"

At this moment a middle aged gentleman who had been regarding this case with great anxiety, stepped forward and conversed with the young defendant for a few minutes apart. He took a scrap of paper from his pocket, and sat upon the prisoner's bench by the side of her, and wrote upon the paper her name and some facts in brief, in reference to her past life. He then addressed the Judge in her behalf.

"I will be her bail, your Honor," said the advocate of the unfortunate betrayed one; "and what is more, I will save her." The name of this gentleman was enough, and the clerk recorded the case as continued three weeks, and the order of the Court was, that at the end of that time, if she promised reformation, the case would be dismissed. The poor girl wept, but her tears were those of joy. The noble philanthropist assisted her to rise, and he conducted her to another part of the room.—Ex. Paper.

CHARACTER OF A TRUE FRIEND.

Concerning the man you call your friend—tell me, will he weep with you in the hour of distress? Will he faithfully reprove you to your face for actions for which others are ridiculing or censuring you behind your back? Will he dare to stand forth in your defence when detraction is secretly aiming its deadly weapons at your reputation? Will he acknowledge you with the same cordiality, and behave to you with the same friendly attention, in the company of your superiors in rank and fortune, as when the claims of pride or vanity do not interfere with those of friendship? If misfortune and losses should oblige you to retire into a walk in life in which you cannot appear with the same distinction, or entertain your friends with the same liberality as formerly, will he still think himself happy in your society, and, instead of gradually withdrawing himself from an unprofitable connexion, take pleasure in professing himself your friend, and cheerfully assist you to support the burden of your afflictions? When sickness shall call you to retire from the gay and busy scenes of the world, will he follow you into your gloomy abode, listen with attention to your 'tale of symptoms,' and minister the balm of consolation to your fainting spirit? And lastly, when death shall burst asunder every earthly tie, will he shed a tear upon the grave, and lodge the dear remembrance of your mutual friendship in his heart, as a treasure never to be resigned? The man who will not do all this may be your companion—your flatterer—your seducer: but depend upon it he is not your friend.—Enfield

FOR PARENTS.—The ordination of Providence, says a distinguished writer, is that HOME should form our character. The first object of parents should be to make home interesting. It is a bad sign when children have to wander from the parental roof for amusement. Provide pleasure for them around their own fire-side and among themselves. The excellent Leigh Richmond pursued this plan—had a museum in his house, and exerted every nerve to interest his little flock. A love of home is one of the greatest safeguards in the world of man. Do you ever see men, who delight in their own fire-sides, lolling about taverns and oyster-cellars? Implant this sentiment early in a child: it is a mighty preservative against vice.

DOMESTIC LIFE OF SAILORS.

Men—even seafaring men—frequently judge falsely as it regards the number of married seamen; and because the sailor does not more openly speak of his domestic ties, they conclude he has never formed any, since he broke away from a mother's arms.

Not long since an aged shipmaster said to the writer, "I have been a shipmaster forty years; and of all the different crews I have commanded, I don't think twenty of my sailors have been married men." When asked if he had made it a subject of inquiry, he acknowledged that he had paid no special attention to the subject, but presumed this to be the fact. The record of marriages kept by our oldest Bethel Chaplain tells a different story.

To his captain, unless the question was directly asked, or Jack desired to provide his wife with half-pay, in the event of a long voyage, there would be little probability of his communicating the information. The reserve imposed by discipline forbids it. True, among his shipmates in the forecastle, Jack would exult to tell of the ties that endeared one place more than another unto him; but before his superiors, nought but a sense of impending danger, would embolden him thus to speak.

Many a time has the sailor, when ordered on hazardous duty, humbly requested of his officers, in the event of his death, that a letter might be forwarded to such or such a place, "for my wife lives there"—and this would be the first known of the fact; and frequently, too, when the proud ship has become a shattered hulk, and the weary crew have drawn together on the deck to await their doom by drowning or starvation, (unless rescued,) have the captain and officers been astonished to hear the cry of "God help my wife and children," reiterated by the group around them.

And not only so, but there are some seamen who become disheartened by the trials of their domestic life, which a want of money to provide for exigencies constantly recurring in a family, occasion—and they decide it is best for them to do as landsmen have done before them, viz. leave them to shirk for themselves. These men will not be likely to own they are married! Every effort has been made and is still making, to elevate the moral condition of seamen, and that not without effect; and merchants and shipmasters, together with all who call themselves friends of the sailor, ought to remember that the sailor stands not now where he did twenty years ago. It is safe to allow, that at that time few seafaring men comparatively married. They were then, with few exceptions, "tabued" from intimate association with the virtuous of the female sex, as soon as they left the place of their nativity, and "he is nothing but a sailor," formed the excuse.

Now, thank God, because "he is a sailor," is a warranty that we are bound to do him all the good we can; and among the privileges now open to him, we may say without fear of contradiction, is an entree to the family circle, among those who have sat side by side with him in the house of God, at the Temperance meeting, or at the fireside of one of the many "Homes" erected for his benefit. And the result has been, despite Malthus, a necessity for some plan to benefit the sailor's wife, and eke out her scanty income, without crushing the spirit of independence in her bosom, and making paupers, where we sought to make heroic, self-sustaining women.

Another thing to be considered, is the pitiable situation of the sailor's widow. Mournful in all its aspects is the state of widowhood, but doubly so must it be to "a stranger in a strange land," to a sojourner in a strange city—and it is well known that mostly all who have in previous years been aided by the Female Bethel Association, or the Seamen's Relief Society, (formerly sustained for purposes of assistance in connection with the Mariner's Church in Roosevelt st.) belonged to the one or the other of these two classes. The sailor from a distant country, if married before he enters the American Marine, hastens to transport hither his wife and little ones. Higher wages for himself he is certain of, and sanguine it may be of promotion, he rests not till they bid farewell to kindred and home, and join him in the New World.

Alas! how often is it the case, that before they become familiar with our customs or our language, he finds a sailor's grave, and his widow has none to whom she can say, "Pity me, O my friends!" Even the families of the American sailor are more or less migratory; not only have we here women from many a foreign clime, but every state has also its representatives. Some educated and intelligent, some illiterate and vulgar, but each and all children of one common Parent, to whom we are bound to dispense of our abundance or our poverty, if we will fulfil the law.

Those who have visited much among seamen's families tremble when they read of shipwrecks on our coast or at sea, for well they know the cup of bitterness will be pressed to the lips of wives, mothers, and children in consequence thereof, and new applicants for advice, sympathy and assistance will inevitably be presented.

MRS. WESLEY'S MODE OF TEACHING HER CHILDREN.

She was an admirable woman, of highly improved mind, and a strong masculine understanding, an obedient wife, an exemplary mother, a fervent Christian. The marriage was blest in all its circumstances; it was contracted in the prime of their youth; it was fruitful; and death did not divide them till they were both full of days. They had no less than nineteen children; but only three sons and three daughters seem to have grown up; and it is probably to the loss of the others that the father refers in one of his letters, where he says, he has suffered things more grievous than death. The manner in which these children were taught to read, is remarkable; Mrs. Wesley thus describes her peculiar method in a letter to her son John. "None of them were taught to read till five years old, except Kezzey, in whose case I was overruled; and she was more years in learning than any of the rest had been months. The way of teaching was this: The day before the child began to learn, the house was set in order, every one's work appointed them, and a charge given, that none should come into the room from nine to twelve, or from two till five, which was school hours. One day was allowed to the child wherein to learn its letters, great and small, except Molly and Nancy, who were a day and a half before they knew them perfectly, for which I then thought them very dull, but the reason why I thought them so, was because the rest learned so readily, and your brother Samuel, who was the first child I ever taught, learnt the alphabet in a few hours. He was five years old the tenth of February; the next day he began to learn, and as soon as he knew the letters, began at the first chapter of Genesis. He was taught to spell the first verse; then to read it off hand without any hesitation, so on to the second, &c., till he took two verses for a lesson, which he quickly did. Easter fell low that year, and by Whitsuntide he could read a chapter very well; for he read continually, and had such a prodigious memory, that I cannot remember ever to have told him the same word twice. What was yet strange, any word he had learned in his lesson, he knew wherever he saw it, either in his Bible or any other book, by which means he learnt very soon to read an English author well.

"The same method was observed with them all.—As soon as they knew the letters they were first put to spell and read one line; then a verse; never learning till perfect in this lesson, were it shorter or longer. So one or other continued reading at school time, without any intermission, and before we left the school, each child read what he had learned that morning, and ere we parted in the afternoon, what he had learned that day.

TRY!

Little folks may have troubles, and great they may seem,
To those who will only recount them;
But the greatest may vanish away like a dream,
If only you try to surmount them.

Put forth your whole mind, and you'll quickly perceive,
While youth yet exults in its prime,
That what you call wonders, e'en you may achieve,
By trying one thing at a time.

THOUGHTS ON THE PERPETUITY OF THE SABBATH.

NUMBER EIGHTEEN.

The sabbatic law requires a specified and limited time for sabbatizing.

From my earliest reading and meditation on the sabbatic institution, I had supposed it to be an indisputable fact, that the terms of the original institution and the language of the law, required rest unto the Lord from the close of the sixth day unto the close of the seventh day. But supposing that a new epoch commenced with the resurrection of Christ, and that the new reckoning of time began at midnight, I had conscientiously refrained from secular employments and indulgences from midnight after the seventh day until midnight after the first day. When, however, I became convinced that there had been no divinely-authorized change of the sabbatic law or time, I felt bound to close all secular employment with the close of the sixth day's light. It has been a matter of surprise and grief to me, to find any who love the Sabbath of the Lord, and who profess submission to the requirements of the fourth commandment, holding so different a view of the matter as to follow another practice, viz. to secularize the night after the sixth day, and sabbatize on the night following the seventh day. As this is just now a practical question with some of my friends, I have thought best to diverge from the order I had intended in this series of articles, for the purpose of presenting at this time my thoughts as to what the institution and the law require of us in reference to these practices.

Passing by all the false philosophy of the wise of this world, I believe the holy Scriptures will furnish us with a plain and satisfactory solution of the question of duty in this matter. It would be an injurious reflection upon the great Lawgiver, to suppose that he has in the most solemn manner enjoined upon us the religious observance of a portion of time, and yet given no instructions by which an honest and devout inquirer can ascertain the definite boundaries of that portion of time! All laws, in order to have any strong hold upon men's feeling of obligation, must define the limits of their requirements, or refer to such circumstances as form well-known boundaries of those requirements. Thus it is with the sabbatic law. So far as I am acquainted with the history of past ages, no question or controversy ever arose respecting the commencement or close of the particular time required by the sabbatic law, until since the Christian world began to call in question the obligation to keep holy the Sabbath of the Lord. If this has been so, it must have been because the law, so long as it was exclusively followed, was so definite that it admitted of no dispute respecting its meaning upon this point. This is what it is just to expect respecting such a law, and what certainly obtains respecting the other nine precepts of the decalogue. If it be so respecting the fourth commandment, then the practice of those who deviate from its plain import, and the failure of those who have advocated the right practice to convince the erring, must have arisen from a departure from the law, and falling into disputes about the philosophy and traditions of men. Whether I think rightly respecting the law on this matter, let the reader of the following remarks judge.

First, I invite attention to the institution of day and night.

The first chapter of Genesis is not designed to be a philosophical history of the six days' creation, but such a history of it as is adapted to prepare us for a revelation of God's will respecting man, whom he has created and made; and in particular, to instruct us in respect to the observance of the Sabbath. The sceptical and disobedient will call this in question; but the repeated references to it in the sabbatic injunctions are sufficient proof that the position is correct. We learn from Gen. 1: 3—5, that "Darkness was upon the face of the deep. . . . And God said, Let there be light, and there was light. . . And God divided the light from the darkness. And God called the light day, and the darkness he called night. And the evening and the morning were the first day."

1. This inspired account says, that darkness covered the great chaotic deep, containing the elements of which this earth is composed, before there was any day. It does not say how long it had been there; but there it was before day was made.

2. By the fiat of the Almighty God light was brought forth. Light did not shine on earth before, but when God spake it came forth.

3. God divided the light from the darkness, and called the light day, and the darkness night. When did the first night close? Plainly when God had begun his work of the first of the six days of creation, and had made light. Night then existed before day in the order of creation, and the seventh night comes before the seventh day by God's appointment, although day is named first in the order of discourse. This is the natural order; day was present when the names were given, night was passed. God is thus represented as saying, This light shall be called day; that darkness which is passed shall be called night. Thus day succeeds to night in nature and in God's appointments.

4. God sets limits, appoints boundaries, to the day. "The evening and the morning were the first day." The evening and the morning, then, do not mean the darkness and the light; nor do they comprehend what in modern wisdom is called a natural day, i. e. the period included in the diurnal revolution of the earth. God counts this as two periods, day and night; and for all practical purposes, man is obliged to do so too. The inspired writers never use the name day for a definite period of twenty-four hours. When it is used in its proper sense, they uniformly mean the period marked by the duration of light. It is sometimes used also symbolically for a period of labor, and then may mean months or years. There are about sixty places in the Scriptures where "day and night" or "night and day," are used to denote distinct periods. Day is not reckoned exclusively from the appearance of the sun above the horizon, or its declining below it; but from the appearance of the light that emanates from his beams in the morning, to the departure of the same in the evening. The inspired history sometimes speaks of the commencing of day with the rising of the sun, and of its close with the going down, because he is supposed to be the great cause of day. Exod. 22: 3, Josh. 10: 26, 27. The darkness being called night, and the light being called night, it is plain that the "evening and the morning" are in God's account two distinct parts of the period of light, and named in the natural order of discourse, not in the order of their creation; the morning being that portion of the light which reaches from its appearance to its meridian, and the evening that portion which extends to the departure of the light. When even then was come, God said, this shall be one day; this is the first day. Nehemiah 8: 3, 2 Kings 18: 29. The same fact is equally apparent in the account of the fourth day's creation; verses 14 to 19. "God said, Let there be lights in the firmament of the heaven to divide the day from the night." See also Psalm 136: 8, 9. This order is to be regarded in ascertaining the limitations of the law respecting sabbatic time, since the law says, "For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is." This is not the reason for instituting the Sabbath, but the order in which the prohibition is to be observed. At the same period of the week at which God finished his work of creation, we are to cease our secular employments.

We are now prepared to attend to the institution of the Sabbath.

Genesis 1: 31, and 2: 2, 3,—"And God saw every thing that he had made, and behold it was very good. And the evening and the morning were the sixth day. . . . And on the seventh day God ended his work which he had made; and he rested on the seventh day from all his works which he had made. And God blessed the seventh day and sanctified it, because that in it he had rested from all his work which God created and made."

Here observe, God had created and made all things, and surveyed them, and pronounced them very good, before the sixth day's light was gone. But he had not ended his work until he had instituted, sanctified, and blessed the seventh day. Here then is the appointed order of time, which God has not yet abolished or altered, nor will he alter it. See Jer. 33: 20, Ps. 89: 34, 37. To this order of time the sabbatic law of Israel repeatedly refers. Exod. 20: 11, 31: 17. "Six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work . . . for in six days the Lord made heaven and earth the sea, and all that in them is." This specification of the time expressed in the law, plainly limits the labors of man to the time occupied by God in the work of creation, that is, to the close of the sixth day. In accordance with this order, every inspired reference to the duration of a day, makes it terminate with the departure of light. That this was the mode of reckoning among God's ancient servants, is plain from the following Scriptures. Nehemiah 4: 21, 22, "So we labored in the work, . . . from the rising of the morning till the stars appeared." "Likewise at the same time said I unto the people, Let every one with his servant lodge within Jerusalem, that in the night they may be a guard to us, and labor on the day." Nehemiah 13; 19, "And it came to pass, that when the gates of Jerusalem began to be dark before the Sabbath, I commanded that the gates should be shut, and charged that they should not be opened till after the Sabbath." This shutting the gates of Jerusalem at dark, to keep out the Tyrian traders, was not an arbitrary measure, merely for the sake of keeping out the Tyrian traders, that they might not sell on the next day; for if that had been the case, they had only to come an hour earlier, and they could enter and lodge within the city. It was a conformity to the requirement of the fourth commandment, which prohibited all Israel and the stranger within their gates, from bearing burdens after the close of the sixth day, as specified in the fourth commandment. See also Jer. 17: 21, 22.

That this is the proper time to commence sabbatizing, is farther manifest from Levit. 23: 27, 32. "On the tenth day of the seventh month there shall be a day of atonement, it shall be a holy convocation unto you, . . . it shall be a sabbath of rest, and ye shall afflict your souls; in the ninth day of the month at even, from even to even shall ye celebrate (margin, rest) your Sabbath." The time of its duration is here particularly specified, to show how long they were to fast, even as long as the rest lasted. That this regulation of the time did not belong to that Sabbath only, but was a requirement of the sabbatic law, and respected all Sabbaths, is farther manifest from John 19: 31, "The Jews, therefore, because it was the preparation, (of the Passover,) that the bodies should not remain upon the crosses on the Sabbath day, . . . besought Pilate that their legs might be broken, and that they might be taken away." Matt. 27: 57, 60, "When the even was come, . . . a rich man of Arimathea, named Joseph, . . . went to Pilate and begged the body of Jesus, . . . and laid it in his own new tomb." This was according to the law, Deut. 21: 22, 23: See also Joshua 8: 29. Plainly the institution and the law limited the permission to labor, and follow secular employments, to the close of the sixth day's light; and this limitation was observed in the practice of God's ancient servants.

The language of the first institution, and of the law, is equally precise in limiting the duration of the Sabbath. Gen. 2: 3, "God blessed the seventh-day, and sanctified it, because that in it he had rested from all his works which God created and made." Exod. 20: 11, "The Lord rested the seventh-day, wherefore the Lord blessed the Sabbath-day, and hallowed it." If the word day means the same here as in Gen. 1: 5, viz. that time comprised in the evening and the morning, the hallowed portion of time closes with the departing light of the seventh-day, and we are then at liberty to return to our secular employments.

That this is the view which the Jews had of the extent of the hallowed time, is manifest from their practice in the days of Jesus Christ. The Pharisees said it was not lawful to heal on the Sabbath day. Luke 13: 14. When, therefore, Jesus had been teaching on the Sabbath day in Capernaum, and had entered into Simon's house, and healed his wife's mother of a fever, his fame spread abroad. "Now when the sun was setting—[Doddridge, 'Was set'; Campbell, 'After the sun was set']—they that had any sick with divers diseases brought them unto him." Luke 4:40. Mark 1: 32. Matt. 8: 16. The reason for this course is obvious. Although Jesus healed on the Sabbath day, yet the Pharisees and rulers of the Jews would not permit them to carry even a sick man's bed; but now after the sun was set, it was lawful to do all these things.

If, then, the Sabbath time closes with the seventh day's light, and if the night following the sixth day is not sabbatic time, the Lord's Sabbath, at this season of the year, is but about twelve hours long! I do not believe that there is a pious Sabbath-keeper in the land, who wishes to rob God of one half of that sacred time on which Jehovah rested and which he blessed, yet such would be the result of the sentiments and practice of those who say that the night following the sixth day is no part of the Sabbath. God devided the day from the night, so that the night following the sixth day is as truly the seventh night as the following day is the seventh day. The very restrictions and prohibitions of the law as much forbid work on that time, as on the following day. The reason why the hortatory parts of the law are connected verbally with the day, and nothing specially said of the night, is because the Sabbath is not intended to interfere with man's natural diurnal repose, night being in the order of nature the time for sleep. Yet if we occupy any part of it in any thing besides repose, it must be in Sabbath employments.

I do not remember to have heard or seen but one passage of Scripture brought forward against the opinion that the law requires the Sabbath to close at the departure of the seventh day's light, and that is Matthew 28: 1—"In the end of the Sabbath, as it began to dawn towards the first day of the week." This passage evidently refers to the same fact mentioned Luke 23: 56. The women who followed Jesus from Gallilee, returned from the sepulchre, when Joseph had buried the body of Jesus, and prepared spices and ointments to anoint it, and rested on the seventh day according to the commandment. That being over, they now returned to perform this office. The difficulty in this passage all vanishes by reference to the original, for here it is, as rendered in several modern versions, "The Sabbath being over."

I know well enough, that an ingenious mind can by sophistry evade these plain teachings of the law when so disposed; but how can a candid and pious person, who sincerely wishes to conform to the requirements of the fourth commandment, seriously review these things and continue to secularize the night following the sixth day? Does not the law limit attention to secular things to the sixth day's close? Is not the night following it as much the seventh night as the following day is the seventh day? Does not all requirement in the sabbatic law cease with the close of the light of the seventh day? How shall we answer these things, brethren? I wish that my brethren would consider these things; and that those who now secularize the night following the sixth day would begin then to sabbatize, and secularize the night following the Sabbath day. Nothing would be lost thereby, but an error inherited from the fathers, while the gain would be truth, righteousnees, peace, and brotherly love. S. D.

COME TO THE PLACE OF PRAYER.

Pilgrim, whose tottering step and blanched cheek
Betoken life's last sands are ebbing fast,
Dost thou a blessing from thy Father seek,
To cheer thee onward as the moments haste?
Leave, then, the transitory things of earth,
And cease thy wanderings, rest from cankering care,
Come where the crystal fountain issues forth—
Come to the place of prayer.

Soldiers of Jesus, who the perils know
Of battle-field, of contests long and drear,
Who're doom'd to face a soul-destroying foe,
Or meet rebuffs from those ye fain would cheer;
Say, would you gain the victory, win the prize,
And in the conqueror's hopes and glories share?
Come, then, and draw your weapons from the skies—
Come to the place of prayer.

Child of the sparkling cup, hold! Thy career
Is tending downward to the world of woe!
Stop while you may, the precipice is near,
And waves of condemnation roll below!
O cease to revel o'er the midnight bowl!
Turn, and in Christ's salvation seek to share;
Drink at the crystal fountain—bow thy soul
In humble, fervent prayer.

Ye young and old, who tread life's thorny way
In search of bliss, who fondly hope to find,
Amid earth's pleasures, joys which ne'er decay,
Some lasting good to fill th' immortal mind;
O cease to longer bow at earth's vain shrine,
But seek for bliss in heaven, its blest abode,
Thy Maker hath done his part well, do thine,
Bow at the shrine of God.

THE IRISH.

The important political influence of the Irish in this country, has become quite apparent to all observers. For this reason, they are receiving perhaps their full share of attention from politicians and statesmen. But among Christians and philanthropists little thought has been given to their deplorable religious condition and the means of improving it. The fact that they are mostly Romanists, and strongly attached to that Church, has been regarded as a sufficient reason for leaving them very much to themselves. We are glad to know, however, that a different feeling is now springing up in some places, and that many are coming to think they have something to do for this people. In the American Messenger for March we find an interesting article upon the subject, from which the following extract is taken. It ought to awaken in every pious heart a spirit of prayer on behalf of the benighted residents among us:—

Ireland has been oppressed and debased by the influence of two hierarchies—each powerful enough to have crushed a less ardent, generous and trustful people. While the established religion is that of the church of England, and the people are taxed to sustain it, four-fifths of the population are Roman Catholics, and are roundly taxed a second time by their priests to sustain that faith. Resistance of Protestant oppression strengthens their attachment to their own religion, and gives color to their views of the Protestant faith. Their priests avail themselves of this prejudice, and thus the difficulty of reaching them is increased, while the motive for showing what true Protestantism is, is strengthened.

The influence of the oppressive policy of the British government has been to drive out the poor, half-starved peasantry of Ireland, and empty them by thousands upon our shores. The construction of our extended public works; the increase of our manufacturing interest, drawing girls from service, and leaving their places to be supplied from Ireland and Germany; the comparatively high price of wages for manual labor; the cheapness of provisions; freedom from taxation for the support of religion: these, and other causes, have brought hither perhaps 750,000, it may be 1,000,000 of Irishmen and their immediate descendants. Perhaps the proportion of nominal Protestants among this number will not differ much from that of Ireland, a little less than one-fifth, leaving, it may be, from 600,000 to 800,000 in nominal connection with the Romish church. These are but estimates; but they are formed on the best data we can command.

Here then we have a population five times as large as all the Sandwich Islands—crowding our cities, lining our railroads and canals, occupying our kitchens, driving our carriages, and electing our rulers. They are proverbially a religious people, in their way, and trust their spiritual guides with a fatal confidence. No where but in Ireland could the fable of purgatory have originated and received popular credence. They are priest-ridden and deluded, and what is worse, love to have it so. They do not reason and think, but feel. The Irishman is all feeling. With or without provocation, the shillelah performs its ready office; a kind word may turn the blow into a benison. The priests understand this trait, and turn it to good account, in Peter's pence and mass-money for deceased friends. This characteristic may be turned to account for a better purpose.

* * * *

We asked a recent convert from the Romish faith a few days since, to state what proportion of the Irish catholic population of his acquaintance, and within the range of his observation, gave any evidence of piety of heart? "Not one in a thousand," was his reply, as the tears started to his eyes. It is not uncharitable to believe that this is true of the whole. How can it be otherwise? without the Bible, without evangelical books, without faith—but with a corrupt priesthood, a religion of forms, the confessional, and palpable idolatry. The great mass, beyond all dispute, know nothing of practical piety, and their whole system is adapted, if not intended, to teach that it is not necessary to salvation.

Must it always be so? We are ashamed to say that the popular impression is that it must—that men being once Catholics must always be so, and that all efforts, especially in behalf of the Irish Romanists, must prove abortive. We believe there is no warrant for such an impression, and that it is a device of the devil to hold his prey as his own.

RELIGIOUS PAPERS.

Among the multiplied publications which daily issue from the press, perhaps a religious paper is one of the most important. It finds its way to the counting room, the workshop, the study, the parlor;—is seen in the railroad car, and the steamboat, the stage coach, and tavern. Among the almost countless political and secular periodicals, abounding in personal abuse and scandal, party strife, and vulgar trash, it is thrown to attract the attention of immortal beings from earth to heaven, to remind them amid the throng of worldly pursuits of their eternal interests. A paragraph may thus be presented to an indifferent person, which, if confined to a volume equally accessible, might never meet the eye, the favorable impression of which the waves of life may never be able to efface from the mind. A religious paper thus circulated, every column of which marks and sustains its character, rewarding but a single glance with something designed to exert a salutary influence upon society, is instrumental of incalculable good to the world.

But, to estimate rightly the value of a religious paper, witness its reception by the family removed from the abundant sources of literature possessed by the traveler or the citizen. No sooner is its arrival recognized, than the aged grand parent, seated in the "old arm-chair," waits its reception; while, from over the shoulders, and under the arms of its bearer from the office, as he extends the streaming pages preparatory to their being read, may be seen eager faces peeping for a glimpse of the welcome visitant. Subjected now to a long detention, by the slow perusal of an extended article, the raising of the spectacles is impatiently watched, and hailed as the signal for another candidate to monopolize its columns. Thus it is seized by each member of the family, till all are familiar with its contents. Contrast this family with one similarly located, equal in every respect, save the fact of being destitute of a well-conducted religious paper. Ignorant of all the important features relative to the kingdom of Christ, it is not actuated to constant and systematic efforts for its advancement, but selfishness supreme settles down upon hearts thus closed to the interests of Zion. The most thrilling appeals in her behalf would fall powerless on the ears of those whose sympathies had thus been permitted to lie dormant.

ILLUSTRATIONS OF REDEMPTION.

BY CHRISTMAS EVANS.

Suppose a large grave-yard, surrounded by a high wall, with only one entrance by a large iron gate, which is fast bolted. Within these walls thousands on thousands of human beings, of all ages and conditions, are bending over their yawning graves under the power of a fatal epidemic. They have no balm to heal them—no physician to administer to them. While in this deplorable state, Mercy came down from heaven and stood at the iron gate. She beheld the scene of wo within the walls, and wept over it, exclaiming, "O that I might enter. I would bind up their broken hearts, heal them of the deadly disease, and save them from death."

While Mercy stood weeping at the gate, an embassy of angels, commissioned from the court of heaven, and on their way to other worlds, passed over, paused at the sight, and heaven forgave the pause. Seeing Mercy at the gate, they cried out—"Mercy, can you look upon this scene and not pity? can you pity and not relieve?" Mercy replied, "I can pity, but I cannot relieve." "But why do you not enter and relieve them?" 'O,' said Mercy, 'Justice has barred the gate against me, and I must not unbar it.'

At this moment Justice himself appeared to watch and guard the gate. Why do you not let Mercy in? said the angel. Justice replied, my law is broken, and it must be honored. Die they must.

At this moment there appeared a form among the angelic band, a form like unto the Son of God, who addressing Justice, said, what are the conditions on which these sufferers may be relieved? what are thy demands? Justice replied, my terms are stern and rigid. I must have sickness for their health—ignominy for their honor—death for their life. Without shedding of blood there is no remission. Said the Son of God, I accept thy terms. On me be this wrong. Let Mercy enter. When, said Justice, will you take their place, or meet the claims of my broken law?

Four thousand years hence, said the Angel of the Covenant, on the hill of Calvary, I will suffer for them without the gates of Jerusalem in my own person. The deed was prepared and singed in the presence of the angels of God. Justice was satisfied, and Mercy entered, preaching salvation in the name of Jesus. The deed was committed to the Patriarchs; by them to the kings of Israel and the prophets; by whom it was preserved till Daniel's seventy weeks were accomplished. At the appointed time Justice appeared on the hill Calvary, and Mercy presented to him the important deed. Where, said Justice, is the Son of God? Mercy answered, behold him at the bottom of the hill bearing his cross, and then she departed and stood aloof at the hour of trial. Jesus ascended the hill, while in his train followed his weeping Church. Justice immediately presented him with the deed, saying, this is the day when this covenant must be fulfilled. Jesus took it from the hand of Justice, not to tear it in pieces, and give it to the winds, but to meet its claims and nail it to his cross. "He trod the wine press alone, and of the people there was none to help him." He died "the just for the unjust to bring us to God." Darkness, mantled the world, rocks rent, and the dead arose. Justice called for holy fire to come down from heaven—holy fire descended and seized on the sacrifice; the humanity was consumed as a sacrifice for sin, but when it touched the divinity it expired. "It is finished," said Jesus, "and gave up the Ghost." Mercy and Justice embraced each other, and Mercy entered afresh upon the work of "preaching the gospel to the poor, proclaiming liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison doors to them that are bound."

The Bible in China.—Rev. Dr. Bridgman, in a recent letter to the American Bible Society, says:

"The demand for Christian books is increasing, and doubtless will increase until the whole empire of China has received the Gospel. Repeatedly, in the course of this month, I have distributed more than two hundred portions of the Bible, among the Chinese, before breakfast, and all at the same spot, the door of our depository.

"Dr. Ball and myself have now arranged for a morning and evening distribution of books. And we try to improve these opportunities, not only to put the bread of life into their hands, but to sound the name of Jesus in their ears."

Revival of Religion in Turkey.—Rev. Mr Goodell, in a very recent letter from Constantinople says:—

"Some sixteen villages have been recently reported to us, in each of which the Holy Spirit is breathing upon a few individuals, and making them living men. They are waking up to a life and happiness, which belong exclusively to the 'children of light.'"

MINISTERIAL SUPPORT.

An impression prevails extensively among Christians, that a minister of the Gospel is bound by obligations altogether different from those which bind other church-members, to devote himself unreservedly to the promotion of religious objects. Hence it is expected that he will engage resolutely in his work, and persevere in it amid self-denials and discouragements, although at the same time his next-door neighbor and fellow-professor may go to his farm, his merchandise, or his pleasures, and perhaps set himself up as the severest censor of his "consecrated" brother. Now we have looked in vain for a passage of the sacred volume which makes this distinction, or imposes this peculiar obligation. We do find in that volume, that "Whosoever he be of you that forsaketh not all that he hath, he cannot be my disciple." And in view of this passage, and others of similar import, we are compelled to believe, that not only the minister of the Gospel, but every Christian, is bound by the most sacred obligations to do what he can to promote the cause of his Saviour. There are, of course, different spheres in which Christians are called to exert themselves. It may be the duty of one to serve his Saviour by attending to his farm, another to his merchandise, and a third to the work of the ministry. In each of these spheres they are to be actuated by a simple and cordial desire to honor God, and in each they have a right to expect a support. This rule is applicable as truly to the minister of the Gospel as to the farmer or the merchant.

A difficulty sometimes arises in determining what is a proper support for a minister of the Gospel. Some contend that it should be equal to what he can obtain in any other lawful calling, yet they find it no easy matter to decide what that would be. Others maintain that it should be all that is necessary for a comfortable living, yet their answer is equally indefinite, since different persons might judge very differently as to what was necessary in any particular case. It is doubtful, therefore, whether any definite rule can be laid down, which will be universally applicable. We believe it will be found expedient, in most cases, to fix upon some definite sum which may be expected, and some systematic mode of raising that sum. This arrangement will enable the minister to adapt his plans to his prospects, and the people to meet the expectations which they have awakened. It is a mistake to suppose, that such a contract as this is inconsistent with acting upon the voluntary principle. It is simply an expedient to carry out that principle, and does not in the least conflict with it. Where liberality characterizes the dealings of a church with its pastor, as should invariably be the case, little real difficulty will arise on this point. A church ought to feel, that it is a matter of interest as well as of duty, to make abundant provision for him who ministers in holy things. If he is set free from embarrassment, so as to devote his time to the work of the ministry, and is also provided with the means of becoming thoroughly furnished for the work, who can doubt that the outlay will be richly repaid? No one, surely, who believes that God works by means, and that it is through the use of appropriate means that we are to secure desirable ends.

Many evils have undoubtedly resulted, as is often alledged, from the payment of large salaries to ministers of the Gospel. To men who have entered upon the work without the spirit of their calling, such salaries have been in many cases a positive injury, while to others they have held out temptations exceedingly dangerous to their Christian character. But we believe that a neglect or refusal to render to the ministry an adequate support, has likewise been attended with evils. Let us mention two or three of them.

In the first place, the probability of inadequate support has for years kept back from the work men whose characters and qualifications eminently fitted them for it. It is easy to say, in reply to this, that those who are really called to the ministry, and would be useful in it, will not be kept back by such considerations. But it should be remembered, that the most worthy candidates for that sacred office, frequently look forward to it with great reluctance and trembling. They hesitate in view of the rare qualifications and arduous labors which the office demands, and the bare possibility that they may not be able to honor their Saviour in it. If to this is added the probability of inadequate support, it is no easy thing to make up one's mind to engage resolutely in preparation for the work. Doubtless the history of some men's severe and long-continued trials on this point, if it could be written, would reveal conflicts of which most persons know but little. It is impossible to say how many have been vanquished in this strife, or how many have come off victorious after a long struggle.

Again, inadequate support has greatly crippled the efforts of some of the best minds. Every body knows the depressing influence of pecuniary embarrassment, and the necessity to escape from it in order to successful mental exertion or spiritual exercise. But with a large class of preachers, extreme poverty, if not absolute indebtedness, is an ever-present evil. Startling disclosures would be made by an unvarnished statement of the financial affairs of some faithful and persevering men. Such a statement would perhaps show upon the same page the most criminal neglect on the part of men, and the most gracious interposition on the part of a faithful God. Who can estimate the absolute loss from a system of things which involves these evils?

Lastly, inadequate support has driven not a few ministers of the Gospel to abandon their calling and enter upon other employments. This is not an imaginary evil. In proof of it, we may mention the fact, that a letter now lies before us, from a ministering brother, whose praise is in the churches, and of whose usefulness the best evidence has been given, but who has, "after months and years of reflection, determined to resign the ministerial office and retire to private life." What is the reason? Simply this, that debts have accumulated upon him in the discharge of ministerial duties, which occasion care and anxiety, destroy equanimity of temper, and expose him to the censure either of prodigality or of indifference to creditors. These debts cannot be discharged by the small income to be derived from preaching. Hence a sort of necessity is felt to enter upon some other employment in order to secure relief from present embarrassment. Such cases, which frequently occur, call loudly for sympathy and assistance. And we must think, that he knows little of the human heart, or has but little heart within him, who, in view of such a case, can indulge in denunciations instead of expressing sympathy and rendering assistance.

THE AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY.

The Executive Committee of the American Tract Society was recently visited by a large delegation from a Society of the same name in Boston. The visit was occasioned by certain complaints which have been circulated in regard to the New York Society's publications, and had for its object a review of the principles and operations of the Society. Seven subjects of inquiry were brought up and discussed, viz. whether the publications of the Society have been evangelical; on what general principles books have been issued; the special case of D'Aubigne's History; the objections which have been raised against the course of the Society; the union of all evangelical denominations; the benefits of the colportage system; and the conduct of the Society's financial affairs. In regard to the evangelical character of the publications as a whole, and also in regard to the wisdom of modifying books so as to meet the views of different denominations, the members of the delegation were satisfied. The alterations in D'Aubigne's History are spoken of as unimportant, yet it is agreed, that the better course would have been to obtain the author's sanction of them before issuing his work, and it is announced that D'Aubigne is now preparing a new edition for circulation by the Society. A union of the different denominations in this one Society is regarded as most advantageous, since it secures a stronger hold upon the confidence of that portion of the community which most needs religious tracts and books, and also enables the Society more successfully to supply those who are destitute of books in the western and southwestern sections of the country. The Society now employs about one hundred colporteurs of different denominations, and the colportage system has fulfilled the most sanguine expectations. The financial operations of the Society have been conducted in a manner quite creditable to its officers, and quite satisfactory to the delegation. In conclusion, different members of the delegation expressed their high gratification at the results of their visit, and their increased confidence in the manner of conducting and the growing usefulness of the Society.

"HOLY WEEK."

Our readers are probably aware, that the last week was one of special interest among all good Catholics as well as some who call themselves Protestants. It was what they denominate "Holy Week." In the Catholic Cathedral of this city, service commenced on Wednesday, and was continued for several days. On Thursday the blessing of the holy oil took place, at which the clergy of the city generally were requested to assist. A special messenger was dispatched by the evening boat, as usual, to supply the holy oils to the clergy in Albany, Utica, Rochester, Buffalo, and the whole interior of the diocese, in season for the blessing of the Baptismal Fonts on Saturday. Three kinds of oil are used in their ceremonies; There is one with which to anoint the baptized on the neck and forehead, the bishops at their consecration on their heads and hands, also the churches, altars, cups, baptismal fonts, etc. Another is used to anoint the baptized between the shoulders and on the breast, also princes and kings on the arms and shoulders. Another still is called the oil of the sick, and is used in extreme unction. These oils must be consecrated by the bishop annually, since the blessing holds good for only a year. Every priest must have a supply in order to perform baptism and extreme unction, and it would be deemed a mortal sin for him to use that which had been consecrated longer than a year unless the case was very extraordinary. Hence the importance of the consecrating service, and the necessity for a special messenger to supply all the clergy before the regular time for blessing the baptismal fonts.

Now all this mummery is looked upon and spoken of with a sort of pious horror by most Protestants in this country. But it seems never to occur to them, while expressing their honor, that this is a necessary appendage to the observance of Holy-Thursday, Good-Friday, Easter, &c.—observances which all Catholics, and some of the most impartial historians, pronounce to be of "equal age and equal authority with the observance of the Lord's day." Knowing this fact, however, it is difficult to read these frequent expressions of contempt or grief without thinking of our Saviour's words—"First cast out the beam out of thine own eye, and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote that is in thy brother's eye."

REPLY TO "AN INQUIRER."

Mr. Editor,—In the Recorder of the 20th ultimo, "An Inquirer" propounds to me a query, which I cannot refuse to answer to the best of my ability. It is this: "What law is that which convinces a man of sin, and makes him feel his need of a Redeemer?"

I answer—In a general sense, the law of God, simply; for it is written, "Sin is the transgression of the law." 1 John 3: 4. Also, "Where no law is, there is no transgression." Rom. 4: 15. Of course, then, a violation of law involves the transgressor in sin against the Lawgiver.

In a more particular sense, however, the law which convinces one of sin is of course the law which is obligatory on him. A citizen of the United States is under no conviction or contrition for the violation of a law which is only binding on British subjects. Neither is a Gentile affected in his conscience for an act, which, had it been performed by a Jew, would have been a violation of a law prescribed for his government. For instance, a Gentile was not "convinced of sin" by not circumcising his son, whilst a Jew, for a like failure, might have trembled for the consequences. Thus we see that the various laws given by Moses "convinced" the Jews, who violated them, and to whom they were addressed, of sin, and, to escape the penalties, made them "feel the need of a Redeemer," or Mediator, (Gal. 3: 19, 20,) who was supplied in the person of Moses, the type of Christ, (Acts 3: 22;) afterwards in Joshua (who is called Jesus in Stephen's address, Acts 7: 45;) and afterwards permanently in the High Priest. See 9th chapter of Hebrews, particularly the 7th verse, and the 10th and 11th verses, where it is declared that this was the divine arrangement for redemption from, or atonement for, sin, "until the time of reformation." See the whole chapter. Certainly, then, by the Mosaic law was the knowledge of sin, (Rom. 7: 7,) to those who were under the law—to the Jews; but surely not to the Gentiles, who, Paul expressly declares, (Rom. 2: 14,) "have not the law," and who, therefore, cannot be now, nor ever could be, justly responsible for the violation of a law which had never been prescribed to them, especially when we remember that "where no law is, there is no transgression." It results then from these premises, that until Christ came, the law (of Moses) was that law which convinced those under it "of sin, and made them feel their need of a Redeemer;" i. e. their need of forgiveness, which it is the office of a Redeemer or Saviour to procure for us.

Adapting the answer to the above query to the present dispensation of religion, I would reply, that it is the law of the Spirit—that is, the Gospel—which, in this day, "convinces a man of sin, and makes him feel his need of a Redeemer." To prove this, I need only cite the words of our Saviour to his disciples, as contained in the 16th chapter of John, 7th to 12th verses:—"It is expedient for you that I go away, for if I go not away the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you. And when he is come, he [the Holy Spirit] will reprove the world of sin, and of righteousness, and of judgment," &c., &c. Now, is it not here plainly declared, that the Holy Spirit—(through the preaching—not of Moses—but of the apostles)—should reprove or convince the world (all men) "of sin," "God also bearing them witness, both with signs and wonders, and with divers miracles and gifts of the Holy Ghost, according to his own will?" Heb. 2d chapter. If we would know how this was done, which was not until after Jesus had "gone away," after his resurrection—(for "the Holy Spirit was not yet given, because Jesus was not yet glorified")—we must look to the book of the "Acts of the Apostles," to see how they interpreted their duty. In the 2d chapter, we read Peter's discourse, to "convince" the Jews "of sin." Does he preach to them the law? Read it, and see how directly and plainly he proclaims and proves the death of Christ for the sins of the world, and his resurrection for our justification. Thus he announced the good news of salvation through him—of remission of sins in his name—and forthwith enjoined those who believed the facts he announced, that God had exalted him to his right hand, and "made Jesus, whom they had crucified, both Lord and Christ," to "repent and be baptized every one of them in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins," &c. Verses 32—40. Here was indeed the annunciation of the Gospel—"glad tidings of great joy, which shall be unto all people." It is the same which has been ever since intended for the benefit of both Jew and Gentile, and is, when properly applied, in its gracious nature and its precious promises, "the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth."

That it is the Gospel which now convinces us of sin and points us to a Redeemer, is farther evident from the whole tenor of the apostolic speeches and writings, and especially from the impressive definition of the Gospel which the Apostle Paul announces to the Corinthians. 1st Epistle 15: 1—9. Here we learn that he had "delivered unto them, first of all, that which he had received, how that Christ died for our sins, according to the Scriptures, and that he was buried, and that he rose again the third day, according to the Scriptures," &c. Ques—Now when he had proved to them that Christ had died for their sins, (fulfilling what had been predicted in the Old Scriptures,) would they not have been convinced of sin by the Gospel—the law of the Spirit—and not by the Mosaic code, which was the law of the letter? How could they believe that Christ had died for their sins, without believing that they were sinners? And, if he "rose for their justification," would they not, in the persuasion of this truth, learn their need of him as their Redeemer? I argue, then, and I think it must be conceded that the Word of God justifies me in doing so, that it is by the Gospel we are convinced of sin against our Creator and our Redeemer; and it is through the same medium that we obtain the remission of our past sins, adoption into the family of God, and a title to a promised inheritance of life and immortality.

In the hope that this explanation may be satisfactory to your correspondent, "An Inquirer," I subscribe myself,

Very respectfully yours,
A. B. MAGRUDER.

LEGISLATION IN FAVOR OF SUNDAY.

At the annual meeting of the Seventh-day Baptist Central Association, holden at De Ruyter in June, 1844, the following preamble and resolutions were adopted:—

Whereas, efforts have been and probably will be made, to secure the action of the State Legislature to stop the transaction of business on the Canals on the first day of the week—therefore,

Resolved, That we regard it as our duty, as guardians of the truth, to oppose every such effort; and farther,

Resolved, That we instruct our Corresponding Secretary, by correspondence and otherwise, to obtain information as to the plan of operations to be pursued and the object to be obtained, and also to prepare and submit to the churches the best plan for opposing all such sectarian measures.

In conformity with the above instructions, I would state, that powerful efforts are being made to obtain the passage of a law prohibiting the transaction of business on the canals on the first day of the week. Should said efforts prove successful, great injury will be done to many Seventh-day Baptists, who have made investments in said business to a considerable amount.

In accordance with those instructions, also, I would recommend that a remonstrance against such legislation be got up in every Seventh-day Baptist church, and that every adult be requested to sign it, and that it be immediately forwarded (post paid) to some member of the Legislature, requesting him to present it to that honorable body.

The following is presented as a formula, which, if approved, may be copied and circulated.

ELI S. BAILEY.

To the Hon. Legislature of the State of New York:

We the undersigned, inhabitants of the town of County of and State of New York, would respectfully represent, That we have learned with deep regret that petitions have been presented to your Honorable Body, praying you to pass a law prohibiting the transaction of business upon the canals on the first day of the week.

We beg leave to represent, that, in our opinion, religion does not need the aid of legislative enactments in order to sustain it; that no Legislature has a constitutional right to enforce obedience to any dogma in religion by penal enactments; and that Christianity never flourished more than when left to its own intrinsic merit to command obedience to its claims.

We would also represent, that there are in this State thirty or more churches, (some of them very large,) composed of those who observe the Seventh Day of the Week, commonly called Saturday, besides many individuals who are not members of our churches, yet who observe the Seventh Day as a Sabbath; that many of us are situated near these great thoroughfares, and are in the habit of transacting business upon the canals. Some have made investments to a considerable amount. If the prayer of the above-named petitioners be granted, a deep injury will be inflicted upon such—in many instances, to the amount of one-sixth part of all their income.

We would farther respectfully represent, that, in our opinion, civil governments were instituted to protect men's rights, not to destroy them; and that should your honorable body grant the prayer of said petitioners, by so doing you would cleave down rights secured to us by the Constitution of the land in which we live.

The plea commonly urged, "that we are the minority, and therefore must submit to the dictation of the majority," is not only illogical but untrue. If the Seventh-day Baptists may be legislated down we can see no security for any other denomination who may be in the minority, nor can we see any stopping place short of an absolute Religious Despotism in the Majority.

Lastly, we would respectfully state, that we cannot see any necessity for such an act as is asked for. Can not any man who believes in the sacredness of SUNDAY refrain from desecrating it, as the Seventh-day Baptists do the seventh day, without a special penal enactment?

These are some of the many reasons why your petitioners think the above named act should not be passed.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' SEMINARY.—We have received a Catalogue of this Institution for the year commencing March 27, 1844, from which we judge that it is in a prosperous condition. The whole number of students during the year was 243, of whom 108 were ladies, and 135 gentlemen. The Instructors are W. C. Kenyon, J. R. Irish, Gurdon Evans, J. R. Hartshorn, Orra Stillman, Miss Caroline B. Maxson, and Mrs. M. B. Kenyon. An important object of the Institution is the qualification of School Teachers, for whose benefit daily lectures are given during the fall and winter terms on the subject of teaching. During the last two years more than three hundred teachers have been sent out—a larger number than from any other school in the State. The plan of instruction aims at the complete development of the moral, intellectual, and physical powers, in a manner to make thorough and practical scholars. The third term of the year commenced yesterday, March 26.

EPISCOPAL CHURCHES.—A statement of the number of congregations and members in the different dioceses of the Episcopal Church, has somewhat surprised us. It seems that the diocese of New York embraces 164 congregations, and only 13,436 members, or about 82 to each congregation. The diocese of Pennsylvania has 117 congregations and 8865 communicants, being less than 76 to each congregation. New Jersey has 46 parishes and 1946 communicants, or 42 to a parish. The Rt. Rev. Bishop of Delaware has under his supervision 17 parishes and 538 communicants—a smaller number in the whole diocese than many single churches of other denominations embrace.

WITHDRAWAL.—The Board of the Virginia Foreign Mission Society has taken a summary course in relation to the late decision of the Board of Foreign Missions at Boston touching the appointment of slaveholding missionaries. It seems that the Virginians consider the decision of the Boston Board as an unconstitutional violation of the rights of southern members. They have therefore withdrawn from all farther connection with the Board, and have directed their treasurer to retain for their disposal whatever money may come into his hands. They have also recommended the holding of a convention, in May next, of all those who feel aggrieved by the decision of the Board at Boston, to deliberate upon the best means of promoting the cause of foreign missions, and the interests of the Baptist denomination in the South. The Executive Committee of the Georgia Baptist Convention has also sent out an invitation for a meeting to discuss the question "whether the appointment of some southern organization for the encouragement and direction of all our benevolent designs, may or may not be indispensable." From these movements it appears probable that the line of distinction is soon to be drawn between slaveholders and non-slaveholders, notwithstanding the great watchfulness of northern Baptists against such a result.

METHODISTS AND SLAVERY.—The Baltimore Methodist Conference, which has just closed its session in that city, has reaffirmed its decision in the case of Rev. F. A. Harding. His case, it will be remembered, came before the General Conference by appeal last May and caused much excitement; the Baltimore Conference having suspended Mr. Harding for refusing to emancipate his slaves. The General Conference approved the decision, and now the Baltimore Conference has reaffirmed it. The proposition to divide the Church on account of Slavery was lost, 148 to 40.

SLAVERY AND THE SLAVE-TRADE.—A circumstance has just occurred, which shows the utter hopelessness of all efforts to put down the slave-trade while slavery continues. It seems that the brig Atalanta has been long and favorably known as a trader on the African coast. Relying upon her good reputation, an arrangement was made that she should visit Cape Mount at a set time, land her officers and crew, be delivered into other hands, receive a cargo of miserable human beings, and make the best of her way off the coast. This was done in a few hours; and the Atalanta, with upwards of four hundred slaves on board, sailed away in plain sight of a British cruiser, whose officers did not suspect her errand, and consequently took no notice of her, until she was far away beyond their reach.

A NUT FOR ANTI-PUSEYITES TO CRACK.

Rev. RICHARD WHATELY, D. D., Archbishop of Dublin, has on several occasions taken ground against the high-church influences at work among the Episcopalians of this country. For doing so, he has been applauded, both by low-churchmen and no-churchmen, as the scholar, logician, and honest man, whose words ought to be received with the greatest deference. Now we happen to have in our possession Dr. Whately's words upon another subject, which we take the liberty of commending to the particular consideration of these his admirers. In a work entitled "Thoughts on the Sabbath," the Doctor maintains, that the first day of the week, or Lord's Day, is in no sense the Sabbath of the fourth commandment, but is simply an ordinance of the Church, the claims of which ought to be enforced alone by the authority of the Church. He then gives his reasons for discussing the subject so fully, "in these days when the prevailing fault is rather a neglect than an over-scrupulous observance of religious ordinances and festivals." The following is the last of his four reasons. Let the opponents of church claims ponder it.

"Lastly, the prevailing dislike to acknowledge any divinely-sanctioned power in a Church, has greatly weighed with me. I am convinced that in many Christians who are strenuous advocates for the observance of the Lord's day, their anxiety to refer to the positive precepts of the Law, for the authority of the ordinance, is a consequence either of their aversion to admit any such power to be vested in a Christian community, and binding on its members, or from their never having known or thought at all whether there is or is not any such right existing. Now to such persons it is very useful to show, that an institution, which they would be very unwilling to see deprived of all Divine sanction, can derive such sanction from no other source than from the power conferred by Christ on every Christian Church. For, on the one hand, the rightful authority of any government or code of laws, generally, and, on the other hand, the obligation of any particular precept that rests entirely on that authority, are two points which mutually prove each other; whichever of them we admit, the other must be admitted also. Thus, as I have above said, not only does it follow that, if the Mosaic Law is binding, the Jewish Sabbath ought to be kept; but also, conversely, if the Jewish Sabbath is an ordinance we are bound to, on the authority of the Mosaic Law, then, we must admit also that the whole of that Law is binding. And so also in the present case; it not only follows, if we admit the authority of the Church, that we must observe the Lord's day as she has ordained; but also, if we hold as indispensable the observance of the Lord's day, and that, on the Church's authority (which we must do, if it can be established, as a binding ordinance, by nothing else), then, we must admit that our Church's claims to such a power are valid, and rest on the appointment of our Lord."

General Intelligence.

NEW YORK LEGISLATURE.

The following is a summary of the principal transactions of general interest during the las week:—

In Senate.—Remonstrances were presented against allowing N. Y. and Erie Railroad to run their line into Pennsylvania. Petitions were presented for a law making the common schools of N. Y. free schools. A bill was reported authorizing the city of N. Y. to loan $500,000 to complete the Croton water works. A bill was brought in authorizing the Governor to loan arms or despatch military to any part of the State in case of disturbance (leveled at Indian operations). A petition was presented from New Hartford to submit the question of belonging to a new confedracy to the people, (the petition having reference to the annexation of Texas.) Petitions were presented from N. Y. city for and against the passage of the excise law; one of the petitions against it purporting to be from 8065 citizens. A bill was presented to reduce costs and fees in courts of law.

In Assembly.—Many petitions and remonstrances were presented similar to those before the Senate. The constitutional amendments were more or less under discussion. The bill to relieve the N. Y. Institution for the Blind was passed. The Dorr petition from Madison County was referred to a select committee. A bill was introduced limiting the fare on railroads between Albany and Buffalo to 3 cents a mile. A report was made against incorporating the Skaneateles Industrial Community. The bill for the suppression of licentiousness was several times under discussion, during which heated and personal remarks were made by several of the speakers.

Important from Texas.—By the arrival of a steamship at New Orleans, advices have been received from Galveston to the 8th inst. The news is, that the Government of Texas will not consent to Annexation on the terms of the House Resolutions, but will oppose it to the uttermost. President Jones is said to be violent against the measure. The government paper at the Texan Capitol has come out in the most decided languaga against it. Other papers speak in much the same tone. The requirement that Texas shall pay her own debts from the sale of her public lands, and also that she shall deliver up her public property and leave the United States to settle with Mexico about the boundaries of Texas, is spoken of as a sort of insult to the nation. The opposition to Annexation, upon the conditions of the House, is said to be strong and growing. It would be amusing, if our greediness should lead us into trouble with Mexico, without giving us Texas.

FOREIGN ITEMS.

Convocation at Oxford has condemned the passages selected from Mr. Ward's publication, and degraded him from his academical honors. The proposition for censuring Mr. Ward's book was carried by a majority of 777 to 386, and that for depriving him of his degrees was also carried by a majority of 569 to 511.

It is rumored that the Queen and Prince Albert will, during the summer, pay a visit with great state to Louis Phillippe at the Tuilleries.

We learn from Hestingfort, in Sweden, that the magnificent observatory, lately erected in that town, has been destroyed by fire. This disastrous event is attributed to malevolence.

Lord Brougham is preparing a life of Voltaire. He is writing it both in English and French; and the work is to be brought out in the two languages simultaneously in London and Paris.

Sir Thomas Fowell Buxton, Bart., died on the 19th ult. at his seat, Northrepps, Norfolk.

The Rev. Dr. Wolff.—Letters from Erzeroam, dated the 3d of December, announce the safe arrival there of this intrepid traveler; but in so debilitated a state of bodily health as to be unable to journey on horseback, and therefore he will probably be induced to avail himself for a while of the hospitality of the British consul, Mr. James Brant, in order to recruit his strength, before proceeding onwards to Trebizond, en route for Europe.

York Tom.—The new bell intended for York Minster, manufactured at the foundry of Messrs. Mears, Whitechapel, weighs twelve tons, being seven tons heavier than "Great Tom of Lincoln," and five tons more than "Old Tom of Oxford." The metal took twelve days to cool, from the 18th to the 30th ult. The clapper is not yet put in, but will weigh from three to four cwt.

Game Laws and Crime.—In the report of the governor of the Lewes house of correction, on the description of persons now in confinement in that prison, out of 102 males, 20 are stated to be for offences under the game laws. A change in these laws would have the effect of materially reducing the country rates.

Railway Missionaries.—Messrs. Grissel and Peto, the contractors of the Brandon Railway, England, have presented every workman with a Bible and other books. Five railway missionaries are also employed between Norwich and Brandon, who specially devote themselves to the religious instruction of the men, both on Sunday and during the week. Two buildings have been provided by Mr. Peto, as temporary places of worship, and opened for that purpose.

Anticipated Brevet.—There is a report current, emanating from a quarter generally well informed, that his royal highness Prince Albert will shortly have a kingly title shared upon him.

Sad.—By the death of the Marquis of Westminster, two horses are disqualified for the ensuing Derby, Oaks, and Leger: namely, br. c. by Falstaff, a b. f. by Touchstone, besides many valuable two year old horses in other great stakes.

The Spanish ministry is seriously endeavoring to put an end to slavery. A circular has been sent to all the Spanish consuls in different countries, urging them to give every possible encouragement to the emigration of laborers to Cuba, in order that the white population may be increased, and the necessity of having slaves there become less and less urgent.

Melancholy Accident.—A most melancholy and heart-rending accident occurred in this city on Monday, 24th inst., at the foundry and blacksmith shop of Mr. Edward Duvall, No. 102 Charlton-street. The facts are these: Mr. Basterman, keeper of the Light House at Sandy Hook, has been in the habit for some time past of raking the bay around the Hook for old iron, &c., which he brought to the city and sold to Mr. Duvall. On Saturday last a load was brought to Duvall's shop by Mr. Basterman, among which was a bomb-shell or petard, about 16 inches in length and 10 in diameter, which Mr. B. had raked up a few days before. On Monday, while Mr. Duvall was removing the bomb from his shop to the side-walk for the purpose of weighing it, he discovered that it contained powder, and on taking a hammer and striking it for the purpose of getting the powder out, it exploded and instantly killed Mr. Duvall, the owner of the shop, Mr. Aaron O. Price, master mason, Robert Broderick, and so injured a boy, that he died in a few hours. The horse of Mr. Price, from which that gentleman had just dismounted, was also instantly killed. The windows in the neighborhood were very much shattered by the explosion, and a piece of the shell weighing over two pounds was blown to the corner of Varick and Carmine streets, a distance of nearly four blocks, and struck within a few feet of two children who were playing in the street. It is believed that this shell, with its contents, must have been in the place whence it was raked since the Last War. [Tribune.

An Enraged Elephant.—We learn by a gentleman who came passenger last evening on the steamer Princess, from Baton Rouge, that the large male elephant of Messrs. Hopkins & Co.'s menagerie, on Saturday morning, killed the person who had been for some length of time employed to take charge of it. It appears that the two elephants and a camel had been sent in advance of the other animals, en route for Clinton, the female elephant and the camel chained together. When about four miles from Baton Rouge, the male elephant refused to cross a small bridge, the keeper, who was on foot, procured a horse, (one which the elephant was not accustomed to) for the purpose of driving it over, and in attempting to mount, the horse shyed, and threw the man in the road. The elephant immediately rushed upon him, caught him upon its tusks, and threw him forty or fifty feet in the air, which was repeated a great number of times, the tusks frequently passing through his body. It then carried the body from the road towards the woods, tossing it in the air at intervals, until it fell between two fallen trees, which saved it from further violence. The infuriated animal then returned to the road, where the female elephant and camel had been chained to a tree by another keeper, and rushed upon them, his tusks passing through the camel, knocking down the female, and breaking the chain in two. The enraged animal then made off toward the woods, carrying the camel by its trunk, and throwing it at intervals in the air with its tusks. The other portion of the caravan now coming to the bridge, the elephant returned and made demonstrations of an attack upon it, when fire-arms were brought into requisition. A number of shots were fired upon it, but without any effect. Word was then sent to the United States garrison, and some thirty or forty of the soldiers were sent to despatch it with muskets. The neighbors also turned out with their rifles and shot guns, and some fifty or sixty shots were fired into or rather upon him, for the balls frequently flattened up upon striking, and fell to the ground. At length it was determined upon to send to the garrison for a field piece to despatch him, when one of the keepers procuring a spear, mounted a horse and succeeded in wounding the elephant until he caused it to scream with pain, and finally to yield to subjection, when it was driven off with the balance of the animals. This is the same animal which killed one of its keepers some two or three years ago at Algiers, opposite this city, and was only stayed from further mischief after fourteen shots had been fired into it. [New-Orleans Bee, March 10.

A Coincidence.—The late Mr. Bates, when quite a young man, delivered a fourth of July oration, at Northampton, which, we well remember, was regarded as an uncommonly beautiful performance. He was, in the political nomenclature of that day, a federalist, and took occasion to express his veneration for the character of Fisher Ames, then recently deceased; and in the course of his eulogium upon that distinguished orator, alluded to his dying hour in words likes these: "The last prayer of the dying patriot was not for himself, not for the companion of his bosom, not for the children of his love, but, O God, spare my country!" The papers now say that Mr. Bates's last words in the Senate Chamber, were uttered on the announcement that the amended resolutions for the annexation of Texas had passed the House of Representatives, "Woe, woe to this nation." The lapse of nearly forty years, leaving our Union and our government still unimpaired, has shown the groundlessness of the fears, honest and patriotic fears, which embittered the last days of Ames; let us hope that, through the blessing of our fathers' God, another forty years may shed a similar illustration upon the forebodings, equally sincere, of Mr. Bates. [Boston Chronicle.

A Dreadful Flood.—A letter from Macao, gives an account of the overflowing of rivers in the north of China, before which the European inundations that have been recorded during the last few years sink into relative insignificance. On the shores of the Yellow Sea the phenomena took the character of a second deluge. Whole provinces, with populations respectively larger than some of the second class kingdoms of Europe, were almost entirely submerged. The retreat of the waters left corpses in thousands. Touching episodes are given as pictures of this awful calamity. On the river Yange-Tse were found large floating casks, which, when examined, were discovered to contain the bodies of young children, whose mothers, when all hope for themselves was gone, had committed them to these floating arks, as a last slender chance of salvation. Upwards of seventeen millions of human beings, escaped from the inundation, have poured themselves over the adjacent provinces, beggared of all things and crying for bread.

Abduction.—A girl, under 14 years of age, named Sarah R. Harrison, was enticed from her parents, in this city, on Sunday last, by a young man named Isaac Sutton. He took her to Lawrence's Tavern, on St. Paul-street, and sent for his father and uncle. One of them pretended to be a magistrate, and united the couple in matrimony. He then took the girl to his father's and passed the night with her as his wife. The next day, on complaint of the parents, the two Suttons, father and uncle, were arrested, and after an examination before the Police Magistrate, both were committed to await their trial. The young man made his escape, and has not yet been found. He is said to have a legally married wife residing in one of the adjoining counties. The girl, finding herself imposed upon, returned to her parents. [Rochester Dem. 20th.

Beat Once.—A bill has passed both Houses, preventing the President from building vessels without the authority of Congress. The bill he vetoed, and it was taken up again and passed in both Houses, by more than a two-third vote. In the Senate only one dissenting, in the House 31. This is the first time the Veto was ever overruled. [True Wesleyan.

Five Cents.—The Philadelphia North American has seen a table of distances decided by the Postmaster General some ten years since, in which the distance from Philadelphia to Boston is set down at 296 miles. This estimate will suit the people of the two cities much better than that which makes the distance 302 miles. This subject is now attracting a good deal of attention among the Philadelphians.

Capt. Sangster.—The trial of Capt Sangster, for assault and battery on John Quincy Adams during the last Session of Congress, was brought before the Criminal Court, on the 19th inst. Mr. Adams appeared in Court, and stated that he had received a letter from Mr. Sangster, apologising for his conduct. Mr. Adams said that, as far as he was personally concerned, the explanation was sufficient. The Judge, however, sentenced him to 30 days imprisonment and a fine of $100. A petition was got up asking the Executive clemency, which Mr. Adams concurred in by his sign manual.

Away out West.—Weston is the town highest up the Missouri river. It was laid out in 1838, and now contains 1000 inhabitants. The Journal—a paper published at that place—estimates the export trade of the last year at upwards of $450,000; principally hemp, tobacco, wheat, &c. Within the same period, goods to the amount of $300,000 have been imported by the merchants.

Indian Corn.—The benefits of skillful cultivation are shown in the improvement of the corn crop, as much perhaps as is shown in any other way. A crop of seventy-five bushels per acre is now as common as fifty were twenty years since: and there can be little doubt that one hundred bushels per acre are now oftener reached than was seventy at that time.

A New Method of Grafting Grapes.—Take short pieces of wild or other vines, and insert grape cuttings into them, and bury them in the ground. The vine will grow better and faster than in any other way. [Chicago News.

A fire occurred at P. E. Island on the 25th ult. in which three sisters, of the name of McLean, (the youngest 19 years of age,) perished in the flames.

ITEMS OF RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

Religion in Calcutta.—We condense the following interesting statistics, says the N. Y. Telegraph, from the Baptist Missionary Magazine for March:

There are laboring in Calcutta nine Baptist, six Independent, five Scotch, and three Episcopal missionaries. The principal institution for the education of native youth, is under the care of the missionaries of the Free Church of Scotland. Upwards of 1000 pupils receive in the institution a good English education, religion being the basis. The schools conducted by the other missionaries number more than 2000. There are only about 300 native girls receiving education, owing to the very great aversion of the Hindoos to female education. The Hindoos readily embrace the means of education proffered by the government and mission schools, but the Mohammedans proudly reject it.

Example to Magistrates.—The governor-general of India has lately taken an important step, having published a government order, applying to the province of Bengal, requiring that those natives who distinguish themselves by their studies and attainments, shall have precedence in appointments to civil offices. This applies to those educated in missionary schools, equally with all others.

Mission in Greenland.—From the late English papers it appears, that on the ice-bound coast of Greenland, four Moravian settlements are made, to which are attached 26 missionaries; in a climate where the cold is often 50 deg. below the freezing point. These settlements now contain 1,864 native converts to Christianity, who gain chiefly from an icy and stormy sea, the needful support of their families.

Generous Example and Precept.—The Free Church Record, after gratefully noticing the donation, by an officer in the East India Company's military service, of $11,800 to the Scotch mission in Central India, says:—

"Too long have even the Lord's people contented themselves by giving mere fractional parts of their income to the missionary cause. If the kingdom of Christ is to be extended to all nations, his followers must contribute to send them the Gospel of that kingdom, with all the ability which God gives them."

China.—The number of Protestant missisnaries now in China proper is as follows: Sent from America 16, London Missionary Society 9, Church Missionary 2. Total 27. Miscellaneous 2, Native Assistants 6. Grand Total 35.

Many of these missionaries are married, and their wives are actively engaged in diffusing instruction.

Great excitement prevails in Canada, concerning the University Bill. Heretofore the principal college, in Canada West, has been entirely under the control of the Church of England. The other religious denominations seem to have combined and effected the passage of a bill, granting equal privileges to all evangelical sects. The Church of England will probably withdraw and establish a separate institution.

A Relic.—A traveler on the continent, visiting a celebrated Cathedral, was shown by the Sacristan, among other relics, a dirty opaque phial; after eyeing it for some time, the traveler said, "Do you call this a relic?" "Sir," said the Sacristan indignantly, "It contains some of the darkness that Moses spread over the land of Egypt."

In 1272, a man was paid about four cents a day for labor. At that time, a Bible cost $133, the wages of 13 years' labor. Now, less than half a day's wages of the common laborer will buy one. How striking and glorious the contrast!

SUMMARY.

Hon. Josiah Quincy, who for sixteen years has filled with distinguished ability the office of President of Harvard University, offered his resignation of that post on the 19th inst. to take effect at the close of the academic year in August next.

Hon. Edward Everett is spoken of as a proper person to fill the chair of President of this institution, about to be vacated by Hon. Josiah Quincy. The name of Rev. Charles Walker, D. D., has also been mentioned in the same connection.

The railways of Massachusetts which have been in operation for one or more years, have cost $23,000,000, and yielded a nett revenue of 6½ per cent, on that amount. The Canals of New York yielded last year 6 per cent on their cost.

The British bark Wilson, from Ichaboe, arrived at Charlston on Saturday evening last. The Captain stated that there was about 8000 tons of Guano on the island, and that there was about 150 sail of vessels waiting, which had gone out for cargoes, most of which will have to leave, as did the Wilson, in ballast.

At a recent town meeting in Erie County, a vote was taken in several of the Towns relative to a division or dismemberment of Erie County, which, in almost every instance, resulted in an almost unanimous vote against division.

The Skaneateles Community, located in Onondaga, has petitioned the Legislature for an act of Incorporation. This is rather a retreat from the ground of utter negation of all Government assumed by this Community at the outset.

The Canals of the State of New York, we learn by an official notice from the Board, will be opened for transportation on the 15th of April.

We have seen it stated in several of our exchange papers, that Dorr is unable to work in the prison, on account or his health. We state on the authority of one of the Inspectors of the Prison, that the report is not true. Dorr was at work on Friday last, and in his usual state of health. [Providence Transcript.

Some wag of a fellow took a ludicrous way of testing the number of green-ones about New York on Monday last. He posted a handbill in the vicinity of the Park, stating that at 11 o'clock the Giant Boy would mount the Mammoth Horse Columbus in front of the American Museum, ride four times round the Park, and then draw himself into a 3d story window by his teeth, on a wager of $500. Long before the time arrived, crowds of men and women assembled to see the wonderment, and waited with the most exemplary patience until the time was far passed. At length they began to smell the rat, and quietly walked off, one after another, each man to reflect upon his own gullibitity.

The Rhode Island Election comes on Wednesday, April 2. The contest is one of unusual interest from the fact that the Dorr party have nominated for Governor a prominent Whig, pledged to unite with them in efforts to procure the unconditional liberation of their hero.

WHY THUS LONGING?

BY LONGFELLOW.

Why thus longing, thus forever sighing,
For the far off, unattained and dim;
While the beautiful, all round thee lying,
Offers up its low, perpetual hymn?

Wouldst thou listen to its gentle teaching,
All thy restless yearnings it would still;
Leaf and flower and laden bee are preaching,
Thine own sphere, though humble, first to fill.

Poor, indeed, thou must be, if around thee
Thou no ray of light and joy canst throw;
If no silken cord of love hath bound thee
To some little world, through weal and wo;

If no dear eyes thy fond love can brighten—
No fond voices answer to thine own;
If no brother's sorrows thou canst lighten
By daily sympathy and gentle tone.

Not by deeds that win the crowd's applauses—
Not by works that give thee world-renown—
Not by martyrdom or vaunted crosses,
Canst thou win and wear the immortal crown.

Daily struggling, though unloved and lonely,
Every day a rich reward will give:
Thou wilt find, by hearty striving only,
And truly loving, thou canst truly live.

WELCH HISTORY AND CHARACTER.

The Rev. Dr. Williams recently delivered a lecture upon this subject, before a Society in New York established for the purpose of aiding and counseling needy Welch emigrants. The following report of a part of the lecture was given by a correspondent of the Baptist Register:—

"The Celt is the oldest inhabitant of Britain. It is the boast of Cambrian antiquarians, that they can trace their origin to within three centuries of the resting of the Ark on Ararat. However this may be, it is certain that in the days when Jeremiah was pouring out his complaints over the perverseness of his tribe, about 700 years before Christ, a nation boldly and bravely traversed the country adjacent to the Black Sea, and pushed their fearless way northward and westward into Germany and France. This nation was the Cimbri. It took root on the islands, now known as Britain and Ireland, and on the northwest corner of Gaul, now known as Brittany. Their real name is Coumri, whence the Latins called them Cimbri, and whence also we have the classic name of Cambria, for the Province of Wales.

"The lecturer then took a rapid review of the part Wales had played on the theatre of history. She could number great names in the brightest periods of English history; she had given the Tudor family to the English throne, and the Tudor family from Henry VIII. to Elizabeth, had given to England the Reformation. No noblemen shine amid the proud English aristocracy with a brighter or purer lustre than the titled heads of Pembroke, Caernarvon, and Anglesey; and if this was not enough, she might point with a haughty silence to that man, who laid the foundations of English greatness, the malign, the ambitious, the large-souled, the devout, the God-fearing, the indomitable Oliver Cromwell; and by the side of the great protector, Wales might place the man she also had given to stay Cromwell's ambition, who, when threatened with the tower and the scaffold for opposing the creation of Cromwell, King, replied that he would go to the block with the Bible under one arm and Magna Charta under the other. In our own country she can boast of having supplied three out of the four signers of the Declaration of Independence from the State of New York.

"In the department of mind she has not been idle. Metaphysics she delights in to a proverb. Her ancient Druids give fair tokens of intellectual culture, and their maxims are evidently the product of deep and various metaphysical speculation. She gave birth to Pelagius, the most philosophical heretic that ever was sent to try the faith of the church; and in conflict with whom Augustine, and Calvin, and Luther, and Jansenius, and Edwards, have won their greenest and noblest laurels. Yet Pelagius struck so deep, that he is not uprooted to the present day. Wales gave Lord Herbert to the world, who reduced Deism to a system, and from whose forceful writings sprung the infidelity of France, and from which again subsequently, by an incestuous commixture, proceeded the rationalism of Germany. But her metaphysics have also been practical; and within a hundred years after Columbus discovered a new continent, one of her sons discovered a new continent on the religious globe, even that of religious toleration; and if honor be due to the man of Genoa for venturing upon an untried sea with three ships and a few scores of men, double honor shall ever be due the conscientious Welchman, Roger Williams, for braving, in the strength of God, with his little craft, single-handed and single-oared, the stormy sea of religious persecution, and discovering the El Dorado of toleration beyond. The parentage of President Edwards, the glory of the American church, is Welch. Dr. Williams also advanced the opinion that good old John Bunyan was of Cambrian descent. In addition to the peculiarities of Bunyan's style, there was good reason to believe his name was Welch. Bunyan is not a Saxon proper name, nor is it wholly Cambrian. But the name Ainyon is very common in Wales. Now it is well known that the Welch mode of designating a descendant is by prefixing Ap, meaning the 'son of;' thus, Evan and Ap Evan; Owen and Ap Owen; Richard and Ap Richard; all of which are contracted into the English names of Bevan, Bowen, and Pritchard. In like manner Ap Ainyon is readily reducible to Bunyan, and such a change would be favored by the ignorance and degradation of the family from which Bunyan is known to have sprung. Last but not least in the list of worthies, Matthew Henry, the author of the best practical commentary on the Bible, was a Welchman.

"It is a proverb that 'two Welchmen never fight.' They are a sensitive, fiery, disputative, vehement-willed race; lacking the enterprise, and practical tact of the Saxon, but second to none in hatred of oppression, and obstinate refusal to yield. They are frank, blunt, upright and downright men; and if they are rude, they are not hypocrites. One writer says they have five virtues and three vices—fidelity, reverence, industry, neatness, and generosity. Of the three vices many are guilty of avarice, most of them have a contempt for women, and all are addicted to drunkenness. Dr. W. could answer that the last charge was now a libel; that of the other two he must confess to full half of the second, and nine-tenths of the first. While therefore he could eulogize much in the Cambrian character, it could still borrow much from the Saxon and Norman to insure for it a just balance in its organism; and it was his prayer that upon this happy soil the various elements of Celtic, and Norman, and Greek, and barbarian character, might so intermingle, that like the ancient Corinthian brass, formed out of gold, and silver, and iron, and tin, the compound might become more valuable than either of the metals in its native state—and in no way would this glorious consummation be secured more speedily and permanently, than by observing the old Druid maxim, 'Truth against the world!'"

FARMING.

The American Quarterly Journal of Agriculture and Science, contains an article on the question "What can be done for American Agriculture?" from which the following extract is taken:—

"It cannot be possible that agriculture alone of all the arts must stand aloof from the aids offered by science. All other industrial occupations owe their elevation and importance to it. And what may not farming be when the farmer, in the full realization of the dignity of his calling, becomes the thoroughly-informed man he ought to be; and there is no sufficient reason why any man in this country should be ignorant of all the improvements that have been made in agriculture; and equally true is it that, knowing them, there is no reason why he should not put them in practice. We are a reading people; we mingle with each other; what one does is seen and known by all. The distinction of classes is only nominal, and, in all that pertains to the common good, all meet on common ground. The interchange of thoughts and views is free as the air we breathe. The means of acquiring knowledge are cheap and abundant, and in every man's power. I say again, there is no reason why any man should not be well informed in all that concerns his business. But, before all are so, the barriers raised by prejudice and early training must be broken down, and that patriarchal respect for old customs and old usages and old ways must be done away.

"A few years ago, farming was regarded as little better than a menial service, and the farmer was looked upon as a little elevated above the serf or the slave. It was forgotten that agriculture, the manufacturing and the commercial interests, were all inseparably connected in the property of the State—or, rather, in the words of another, "that the land and the owners, and the cultivators of the land, form the primary essentials, and the mercantile and manufacturing establishments the accidental adjuncts of our State; and that the ruin of the solid walls and foundation of the stupendous fabric of the greatest nation upon earth, would involve in one common destruction its richest appendages and most ornamental decorations." No country can, and this country especially cannot, foster too fondly its agricultural interests. It is now and must continue to be, our national wealth; and this is, at the present time, eminently the direction of public feeling. To whatever cause it may be attributed—whether to the wish to be free from the anxieties and cares and insecurity of commercial life—to the sense of the greater security of the landed interests—whether to these selfish considerations, or the return of a healthy state of moral feeling, urging the conviction of the holier and happier influence of rural pursuits upon themselves and their children—to whichsoever of these circumstances it is attributed, it is a gratifying fact that many wealthy and intelligent men are forsaking the large cities and devoting themselves to agriculture."

Setting out Trees.—The spring season is now approaching, and with it the time to set out trees. Autumn is generally preferred for this work, but we believe it is conceded, especially, upon clay land, that trees can be advantageously set out in the spring. In regard to the manner of setting out a tree, it is presumed that there can be no doubt but that the trees should be set in soil; which is but a vague remark, when the term soil is taken in its general acceptation. Soil, agriculturally, should mean the admixture of earths and vegetable mould, which is the general characteristic of the surface of new land. Subsoil, although it may contain organic matter, is quite different, since the organic matter it contains is not in the form of vegetable mould. Trees should not be set in the subsoil, neither in a bed of mould, but in the mixture of mould and earth, constituting soil.

In setting out trees, then, open a hole by removing the surface of the soil and putting it aside in heaps, then dig to the proper depths, throwing the subsoil in separate heaps; now place the surface soil in the bottom of the holes, planting your trees in it. This soil should be sufficient to bed the roots and cover them well; if it is not, make into soil the subsoil that you have thrown out, by admixing with it the insoluble vegetable mould of the forest, or that of well dry rotted peat, straw, weeds, chips, &c.; this done, fill up, bedding well the roots of the tree. As to the depth of the holes, that must be left to the judgment of the farmer, as respects the nature of the land. The roots must be where heat, air, and moisture, can get at them.

If the land be sandy they should not be set too near the surface lest they get dry—if the land be clayey they should not be set too deep lest they become too cold. To form a proper judgment, step into different woods, notice the difference in the nature of the soils, and the depths at which trees plant themselves, make then a little allowance for open exposure, and your judgment will come about right. [N. Y. Farmer.

Subsoil Ploughing.—Col. Sherwood, of Auburn, made use of the subsoil plough the last season on fifteen acres. A part of the subsoil land was planted with corn, and a part sown with wheat in the fall. The soil was loamy, and the subsoil hard clay and gravel. He used the subsoil plough of Ruggles, Nurse & Mason. It required four oxen to draw it, and to work to the best advantage at the depth it was run in this case, which was one foot, Col. Sherwood thinks there ought to be six oxen. The team worked over from an acre to an acre and a quarter per day. The ground had not been ploughed for thirty years. It was naturally wet, so much so that in a wet time, the water would stand on it to the injury of the grass. The effect of the subsoiling was to render the soil and subsoil so friable, that the water immediately found its way through, and tho' a portion of the past season was very wet, the water at no time remained on or so near the suface as to do the least damage to the crop. That part which was put to corn, was first planted on the 20th of May, but the seed failed, and it was planted again on the last day of May and first day of June, and grew so vigorously that it got ripe as soon as other corn in the neighborhood. Several strips of twenty or thirty feet wide were left through the field not subsoiled. The difference in favor of the subsoiled portion, was very obvious in the ranker growth and larger size of the corn on that part—it was so plain that it might be seen to a row. The different portions were not measured separately at harvest time. The effect of subsoiling on the wheat crop, cannot be told at present. [Albany Cultivator.

Corn-Stalk Sugar.—The manufacture of sugar from corn-stalks, promises to become an extensive and profitable branch of business at the west. Mr. John Beal, of New Harmony, Indiana, has made 395 lbs. of good sugar this season, from the corn-stalks that grew on three-quarters of an acre. This is at the rate of 500 lbs. to the acre. His plan is thus briefly noticed in the Cleveland Herald: "When the ears begin to form they are pulled off. When the leaves are dead about half way up, the stalk is stripped of leaves, cut up at the root, the top cut off, and then ground in a sugar mill." Twenty stalks will yield about one pound of sugar. Mr. B. made 80 lbs. in a day, with a simple apparatus of his own construction. 500 lbs. at 4 cents per lb. is $20 per acre. It would have produced—say fifty bushels of corn, at 25 cents, $12. [Am. Farmer.

Bees.—Dr. Waterman gives in the Cleveland Herald, his mode of catching the bee-miller or moth. He says, "I took two white dishes, (I think white attracts their attention in the night,) or deep plates, and placed them on the top of the hives, and filled them about half full of sweetened vinegar. The next morning I had about fifty millers caught; the second night I caught fifty more; the third night being cold I did not catch any; the fourth night being very warm, I caught about four hundred; the fifth night I got two hundred. Most of these were most likely bee-moths."

Thomas Morris.—The sudden death of the lamented Thomas Morris is fresh in the memories of our readers. Dr. Brisbane recently pronounced a eulogy upon him at Cincinnati, from which the following facts were gathered:—

At the age of fourteen he made a full hand in the harvest field. At sixteen he shouldered his rifle against the Indians on the frontiers of Virginia and Pennsylvania. At seventeen he served in Captain Lewis Morgan's Company of Ward Rangers, stationed in the wilderness, in what is now the eastern part of Ohio. At nineteen, (about the year 1795,) he became a resident of Columbia, in this county, seven years before Ohio became a State. He was at that time a clerk in the store of John Smith, afterwards one of the first appointed U. S. Senators from Ohio. In 1797 he married the lady, who is now his widow, and about three years after that settled in Clermont county. In 1802 he commenced the study of law, with few books, and without a preceptor, and the next year was admitted to the bar. In 1806, he was elected a representative to the Ohio Legislature, and in 1809 was appointed Judge of the Supreme Court of this State, to fill out an expired term. The next year he was re-elected to the Legislature, and he continued to be sent either to the House or Senate, till 1832, when he was elected United States Senator for six years. In 1838–9, he made his great speech in the Senate of the United States, in reply to Mr. Clay on the Slavery question, and was discarded by his party. In 1841, he was nominated by the Liberty party as its Vice Presidential candidate, and re-nominated for the same office in 1844. His death took place just after the election. December 7th, 1844, from apoplexy; and his last words were, "Lord, have mercy upon me!"

Hints to Young Men.—Always have a book or a newspaper within your reach, which you may catch up at your odd minutes.

Resolve to edge in a little reading every day, if it is but a single sentence. If you can gain fifteen minutes every day, it will be felt at the end of the year.

Regulate your thoughts when not at study. A man is thinking even while at work. Why may he not be thinking about something that is useful?

Revolve in your mind what you have last been reading.

Remember that most of the matchless effusions of Robert Burns were conceived while he was toiling after the plough.

The Misses Rice and the three Bears.—The Portland Advertiser states that, in a secluded part of Oxford County, called "The Andover Surplus," there reside two female farmers, who occupy a few acres, and "do their own chores"—hiring male help only for haying and harvesting. Out in the woods lately with the ox team, cutting and drawing winter's wood, one of the Misses Rice was attracted by the barking of the dog at a hollow tree. One of the young ladies was absent for the moment, and the other chopped a hole in the tree and came to a bear skin! Nothing daunted at the sight, she gave a poke, and out scrambled bruin, whom she knocked down and despatched. A second bear immediately made his appearance, and she despatched him! A third bear then crept from the tree, and the same axe finished him! This Miss Rice considered a good morning's work, for there is a two dollar bounty on bears, and the skins and the grease are worth five dollars at least. We should like to see Miss Rice of the "Andover Surplus." [Eve. Mirror.

The church at Bethlehem, Gibson county, Tenn., has been much revived, and several have been hopefully converted.

THE DRUNKARD'S WIFE.

Composed by Miss S. E. Chadwick, of Gardiner, Maine, and sung at Mr Gough's visit there, Sept. 1844; and again, at the second Anniversary of his signing the Pledge, October 28, in the Tremont Temple, Boston.

'T was a woman's dying bed,
And a fair child bent with a tearful eye,
With an aching heart and a heavy sigh,
To raise that drooping head.
"Look again, daughter, thro' the dreary dark!
Hush! is it not my husband's step? Oh hark! oh hark!"

With a noiseless foot she crept,
And sadly looked through the broken pane;
But she naught could see, for the driving rain,
And she turned away and wept.
"Look again, daughter," &c.

"I shall rest soon with the dead—
Now, I think of the past with its happy hours,
When my brow was wreathed with its bridal flowers,
Of the time when we were wed.
"Look again, daughter," &c.

Will he bend o'er his wine cup now?
Will he yield to its mad'ning, dead'ning power?
Will he leave me thus in this dreary hour?
With the death damp on my brow?
"Look again, daughter," &c.

It is still, they have all passed by!
He, in whose griefs I have borne my part;
He, that I loved with a changeless heart,
He hath left me alone to die!
Come away, daughter! raise my drooping head,
Come, for my dying dream of hope has fled."

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

This Institution has a pleasant and quiet location thirteen miles south-east of Angelica, and six miles south of Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y., under the care of W. C. Kenyon, as Principal, and Miss Caroline B. Maxson, as Preceptress, aided by able and experienced assistants.

Teachers' Classes will be exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining every facility of a Normal School, without its usual disadvantages. Within the past year, more than one hundred and fifty students of the institution have been employed as teachers in this and the adjacent counties—a number much larger than from any other institution in the State.

Students are prepared for entering any class in College. Ample advantages are also secured to those pursuing Modern Languages and the Fine Arts. The institution is liberally endowed and supplied with a choice and valuable library, and apparatus sufficiently extensive to illustrate every department of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. It has also well selected cabinets of Geological, Mineralogical and Conchological specimens.

The plan of instruction aims at the development of the moral, intellectual and physical powers of students, so as to render them thorough, accurate, and practical scholars.

Lectures on Chemistry, accompanied by a full course of experiments, will commence with the second week of the fall term, and continue daily to its close. During the fall and winter terms, daily lectures will be given on School Teaching. Lectures on Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Physiology, illustrated by experiments, will be given each term of the year.

Tuition, per term of fifteen weeks, from $3,50 to $5. Board per week, in private families, $1. The entire expense of the academic year, including tuition, board, washing, light, and fuel, need not exceed $60. No extra charges incurred.

President of the Board of Trustees

CHRISTIAN MISSIONS—THE MINISTRY.

The subject of Christian Missions is one which should claim our attention among the many duties assigned to the Church. As a denomination, we have been far behind our neighbors in this great work; and therefore the blessing which we might have obtained has been imparted to others. Even at this late day, however, is there not an opportunity for us to enter the field, and be useful in the harvest of the Lord? If it was the duty of the Church to send the Gospel to the destitute in the days of the Apostles and early Christians, it is her duty still; and if we compose a part of that body, the obligation rests upon us. Every member of the church should be equally interested in this matter—the private member as well as the minister; and every member should be equally a laborer in carrying forward the work.

All will admit, that an adequate supply of ministers is indispensable, and that a call from God to preach is necessary to qualify a person for the work. Yet the fact that we have not men to send out, provided we had the means at hand, serves as an excuse for present neglect. It is not of course the duty of all ministers to embark in the missionary enterprise. Ability, age, local circumstances, may all forbid it, while as Pastors they may be abundantly useful in feeding the flock, and in furthering missionary operations. And that Pastor who does not use his influence to instil into the minds of his people a missionary spirit, and make it one of the prominent objects of his labor, is behind his duty, and is depriving his people of much that they might enjoy. It is justly expected, that the Pastor will take the lead in all the benevolent movements of the day. Yet an excuse sometimes arises in the mind of the minister like this, that the people do not pay him, and that he has not the heart to urge them to benevolence, lest they should think they were over-burdened, or that he intended indirectly to remind them of their duty to him. As to the first excuse, I have never known a people to overburden themselves in the support of missionary operations. Unless they should give more than a tenth to support the Gospel, there is but little danger that they will be over-burdened. As to the other excuse, I think the people who neglect him who is placed over them in the Lord, should be reminded of it, and that often and severely too. What could be more criminal than to engage a man in your service, and then refuse to compensate him, ever giving encouragement that you will do it, but continuing to neglect it until you have obtained his services for a long time, and then turning him penniless away. Pagans would not be guilty of such a crime. And yet some Christian churches have conducted thus, and looked upon it as a virtue. Such virtue the devils would be ashamed of.

A certain minister, who was Pastor of a church of some prominence, informed me that his people had been negligent, left his salary in arrears, and done but little for benevolent objects that year. He drew up a subscription for a benevolent object, and started with an intention to visit every member of the church. When he called on those who were indebted to him, and presented to them the subject, their first reply invariably was, I ought to pay you. Thus, in his mission of love, he obtained more than they had ever appropriated before; and they, in their giving, did not forget their Pastor. Indeed, it is generally the case, that the minister who teaches the people the importance of giving as God has prospered them to sustain the benevolent operations of the day, is better sustained in his calling than those who neglect this important work. Missionary operations depend upon the churches for support, and churches will not be efficient unless their pastors possess a missionary spirit. When they act efficiently, there will be men, and means, and a field to be occupied.

A deficiency of ministers must be attributed to the neglect of duty on the part of the churches; for God is not so inattentive to the wants of the world as to withhold a competent supply of ministers. No man, of course, ought to enter the ministry, whom God has not called to the work. Yet we do not know why a man may not neglect this duty as well as other duties. A miraculous intimation of God's will in reference to its being a man's duty to preach, is not to be expected at the present day. His will must be learned from the feeling which the Holy Spirit produces in the mind of the individual himself. From his gifts, his intellect, the course of Providence, and from other circumstances, he must judge as to what may be his duty. One great evidence of a call is a sincere desire to be thus employed—a full determination to overcome all obstacles, to forsake all things, to go and preach the Gospel, to search for a field to which he is adapted, and then faithfully to occupy that field. It becomes your duty, as Christians, in sustaining missions, to encourage such young men, if any you have, for the world has need of them. Let them have your best counsel and your prayers. In large churches, and where young men may have the best advantages to obtain an education and the necessary preparation for the ministry, there are but few who take upon them this great work. But from the more obscure and remote churches, individuals come forth as unexpectedly as David came from the sheep-fold of Midian. It is of vast importance that we, as Christians, should feel the responsibility resting upon us to use our utmost endeavors to have the design of God in giving the commission, fully accomplished, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature." And may we not be forgetful, as churches, to "pray to the Lord of the harvest, that he would send forth laborers into his harvest." Be careful, also, that such as have a mind for the work meet with all necessary encouragement. Not that we would wish to have novices in the ministry, but when the Church have judged them to be faithful, let them have all necessary encouragement to aid them on their way. This they will have, if they see that their brethren with them are with their substance consecrated to God. B.

DEATH OF REV. DANIEL H. GILLETT.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:

As you gave notice a few weeks since of the death of my brother, Rev. D. H. Gillett, who died at Mobile, Ala., on the 9th of February, I presume that the following extract from a letter written by his widow to his mother, will be interesting to that portion of your readers who were personally acquainted with the deceased.

— W. B. Gillett.

My very dear Mother,—You will doubtless have heard of the death of your dear son, my beloved husband, long before this reaches you. Though it may be no news to you, I thought it would be a great satisfaction, to hear the particulars of his last illness.

He had been very feeble ever since we arrived here in December; but I hoped, alas! too fondly, that he would be spared at least many months longer. He went to the church only two weeks before his death, and, feeble as he was, had a sermon prepared, which he could not preach, for he failed very suddenly while there. He had chosen a text, as he told me, adapted to his feelings. It was these words, "A man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief." He was brought from the church, and assisted to his room, remarking at the same time, that he should not go out again until he was carried. This was first-day afternoon. Two physicians examined his lungs, and pronounced the left lung nearly gone, and the right lung considerably affected. After they had gone, he said to me, "My dear wife, I am failing very fast; we must part soon. Try to keep as good spirits as you possibly can. It may be but a short separation." He wept aloud, and shed many bitter tears. He said, "You know it takes a great deal to make a man weep. Though I weep, I do not murmur; I only weep for you, and for my child, who will soon be fatherless, God will be a husband to you, and a father to the dear boy."

He took the babe in his arms, put his hand on its head, and said, "I consecrate this child to the Lord, and crave His blessing for my boy. Train him up in the nurture of the Lord, and make him meet to be an heir of glory. May we all be reunited, a happy family, in heaven."

The next day (Monday) he settled all his worldly concerns, that his mind might be entirely upon his rapidly-approaching change. After this he appeared perfectly composed, and longed for his Master's coming. He spoke often of his dear mother, and wished me to give you an affectionate farewell, hoping to meet you where all tears shall be wiped away, and parting be unknown.

O what a triumphant death bed! He said that the world had no charms for him; if he could not get well enough to serve his Master, he would desire to depart and be with Christ, which would be far better. It hurt him very much even to talk in a whisper; and though many came to see him, he could see but few. When any of his friends came in to see him, he said to them, "I am going home," pointing upwards with a sweet smile. He would often say to me, "If it be the Lord's will, I would like to go home to night; but the will of the Lord be done." He also said, "O that I had strength to shout, I feel so happy; I hope soon to be able."

You may mourn, dear mother, that your son has found a grave so far from kindred; I know that it must distress you. I write this letter, hoping that it may console you, though my own heart is bleeding, and daily mourns afresh. If the news of his death overcomes you, think of the anguish of my own heart, to watch by the bed-side of a dying husband, far from kindred and home, and day by day see life ebbing swiftly away. I have buried all my earthly hopes. Though we may mingle our tears, we will not murmur. That precious treasure was not ours, God only lent him to us, and in his own good time took him to himself. Consoling thought, that we can look forward to a meeting beyond the grave, there to join our beloved one, and sing the praises of the Lamb. Friends come to console me, but God alone can console the widow's heart. He has a gracious purpose in afflicting us.

There was a very large procession at his burial. All the ministers in the city met at the Baptist Church. All denominations here appear to mourn, that a pillar in Zion is fallen, so useful was he, and so promising. The ways of a kind Providence are very mysterious, and we cannot understand them; but what we know not now we shall know hereafter. His corpse had a placid and composed expression, and appeared only to have fallen asleep. He expired without the least struggle, on the 9th of January at evening. He asked me if I thought the crown fitted well, pointing to his head, and wiping the death sweat from his brow. He talked much for an hour before he died, saying, "O the precious Jesus; what is the world to me, with all its vanities? Give me Jesus." The last words he said were, "Do not weep for me; I am going home."

THE BIBLE.

A man of subtle reasoning asked
A peasant, if he knew
Where was the internal evidence
That proved the Bible true?

The terms of disputative art,
Had never reach'd his ear;
He laid his hand upon his heart,
And only answered—HERE.

THE REASON WHY.

"Why," said a young sceptic, "if Christianity be true, do so few comparatively believe in it and be influenced by it? Look at our lawyers, physicians, merchants, and people of wealth and fashion, do they believe in it?" "Why," said the person interrogated, "are you not acquainted with the Chinese language?" "I suppose," was the reply of the young man, "because I never studied it." "Just so," said the other, "you have never felt any particular interest in it, have never attempted to comprehend its character, and hence you are entirely ignorant of its structure. Now may it not be for similar reasons that the persons of whom you speak, and upon whose religion you rely as an argument against Christianity, have no knowledge of a faith in Christianity? Have they ever seriously studied the Bible which reveals this religion? Have they read what others have written in its defence and in illustration of its principles and influence? Are they not engrossed in other matters, prosecuting their schemes of ambition and wealth? Is it remarkable that they should not be acquainted with the nature and claims of religion, if they have never given to it a serious thought? In addition to this, may not their unbelief be founded on their dislike to the strictness of religion; because it would interfere with their vicious indulgencies and their worldly ambition? Nay, to come closer, would you not have less objection to religion, if I should now convince you that it is so lenient, as not to oppose to your sensual appetites a single prohibition? Believe it, my young friend, religion is of divine origin, it carries the evidences of truth with it, and its great opponents are ignorance and sensuality. If it should be true, as it certainly is, it condemns you while you live as you now do: and it will be a poor consolation to your soul when harrowed by remorse, that there are many in the same condemnation."

PERSONALITY FROM THE PULPIT.

In his preaching do not be hasty to infer that your pastor is personal.

In this respect there is too often an unwarranted sensitiveness. He cannot preach a close, practical sermon, without, perhaps, being accused, by some individual, of being personal. Now the peculiar structure of his mind may lead him frequently to deal in illustrations. He explains general principles by comparison, and scenes drawn from his own imagination; or being a close observer of human nature, he collects his materials from observation and his own experience. And thus, without any knowledge of your more private life, he may sketch a very correct likeness of your own moral character. He may go into your individual history with a minuteness that shall startle you. Now if this should be the case, do not go home and scold about your minister, and say, "He meant me." If the coat suits, the best policy for you under such circumstances is, to keep silence, and behave more as a Christian. Your minister has drawn the bow at a venture, and hit you. And why? Because you were on the line with the arrow; and who is to blame, he who drew the bow, or he who thrust himself before the arrow? [Chris. Watchman.

AN INCIDENT.

The following incident, recently related in one of the churches in Boston, by Mr. Henson, a fugitive from slavery, now connected with the Canada Mission, will be read with interest.

Mr. Henson, it seems has occasionally crossed the line for the purpose of assisting those who were making their escape from bondage. At one time he fell in company with a number. One of them was very sick with the pleurisy—so sick that he could not walk, and actually fell down among the bushes. Yet they must hasten on, so they took up the sick man, and alternately carried him on their shoulders. But he soon became so sick that he was unable to hold up his head in this position. They then procured two poles, and, by taking off their shirts, made a kind of cot, and he was thus carried by four. Soon, however, his strength so far failed, that he could not be carried even so. He then most earnestly begged that they would lay him down to die, and go on themselves before they were taken up and all carried back to slavery. He cried, and wept, and begged so hard, that they even consented to lay him down, covered him with leaves, and left him. But after they had proceeded about a mile and a half, they all began to weep and mourn most bitterly. They said if he were dead they could bear it; but the thought of leaving him alive, to die alone, was insupportable. Well, said Mr. H. "let us go back." So they retraced their steps, found him still alive in great agony of body, but peaceful in mind. He inquired why they came back—said he was prepared to die—in a short time his sufferings would end, and he should be at rest in heaven. But they could not be prevailed on to leave him again. Seeing a little opening, Mr. H. said he would go and see if he could procure some assistance. He went on, and as he approached the road he saw a man driving a cart. His heart almost failed him; but he looked to the Lord, and went forward. As he drew near, he said, "Good morning." "Good morning," was the reply, "Art thou traveling?" "Yes sir." "Didst thou come from D?" "No, I came from ——." From his saying thee and thou,—from his broad brimmed hat and strait jacket, Mr. Henson concluded the man was a Quaker, and soon ventured to open to him his soul—told him all about the sick man, etc. Well, said the Quaker, "bring him out and let me see him." So he speedily returned, and carried the news to his companions. But they were afraid to venture, said the man designed to deceive them. But Mr. H. said, "No, he is an honest Quaker." Finally he prevailed on them to go forward, and as they approached with the sick man, the Quaker said, "Poor fellow! poor fellow!" He looked up and down the road, and seeing that no one was coming, took them into his cart, and driving through a by-way, carried them all safely to his large farm house. As they entered the yard his wife and three daughters came out, kindly received and entertained them. Those that were well hastened on their way, leaving the sick man to be nursed by his good Samaritan. In a few weeks he recovered, came to them in vigor of body and mind, and is now a successful minister of the gospel to the refugees in Canada. [Friend of Virtue.

BE KIND.

None of us know the good a kind deed accomplishes. A word smoothly put in when the heart is sick, a little help bestowed when want presses near by, goes far—far beyond what those suppose who are able to speak this word, or give this help.

An instance, illustrating this, has just come to our knowledge. A young man, intelligent and well-educated, came to our city to find employment. He sought for it in vain. When his means were about gone, and he lay half sick with fever, brought on by anxiety, a friend bade him be of good cheer, and through their joint efforts obtained for him a servant's place at a boarding house. He worked there like a brave man, and won the confidence of his employer, though he received only his board, and a few dollars a month.

That friend watched him, and finding him faithful, mentioned the fact to a mercantile gentleman, who said at once "bring the young man to me." This was done, and soon he was more profitably employed. He was now head clerk. And did he forget his early friend? In the quietest way possible—without the slightest profession or pretension—he sought out, as soon as he was able, the choicest and most substantial present, and sent it to him as a token of remembered kindness!

When the present was received, our friend knew not from whom it came. He did not once dream of the poor homeless youth to whom he had shown only a little kindness, and, it was not until after repeated inquiries, that he discovered who had sent it. "I have learned a lesson," said he, when he found out the giver, "and that is, always to be more kind, if I can be, under similar circumstances hereafter." If it were thus with all of us—how much of human misery should we relieve, and what a sum could we add to the amount of positive individual happiness?

Learn to be kind! The habit of kindness will do, what no other habit can do—it will bring sweet peace to the mind, and increase, as it is virtuously practiced, the only permanent wealth Earth may crave, or Heaven admit—the wealth of heart. [Cincinnati Gazette.

THE TIMES ARE SO HARD.

This is a very common expression, none more so. How many lips pronounce it; with thousands it appears to have become habitual. Who that uses it, considers its import? Does it indicate a disposition to indulge the appetites of the flesh? Does it proceed from a murmuring, ungrateful heart, an undue love of earthly gain? How much worldly conformity in it! How little crucifixion to the world! It is remarkable, that with most persons, the times are always hard. Did one ever attempt to get anything done in behalf of a moral and religious enterprise, without hearing "The times are so hard." Says a worthy brother, "I have been trying to obtain some subscribers for your paper; persons complain of hard times, and they say they are not able to pay for a paper, and those same persons can take a political paper and spend more in attending political meetings than would pay for a dozen of your papers." Examples are numberless, but this is sufficient, to exemplify the principle, that unless there is a willing mind, the times are never otherwise than hard. It is a true saying that when there is a will there is a way. DENOMINATIONAL PAPERS.

"Each branch of the church has one or more papers, known as the organ of that particular branch, and recognized as such by its authorities. That paper is expected to set forth and defend the peculiar doctrines of the denomination to which it belongs; to build up its members in their faith, and to keep them advised of the state of their Zion, and of the church at large. That paper should command, and have, the benefit of the best talent in the church, and be sustained by the piety and prayers of its members, as it is a mighty engine of good or evil. It preaches to the preachers, and to the whole church. Religious papers are too lightly esteemed; they have not the hold even upon the church that they should have. An extended circulation would reduce their cost; and if the church did its duty, each member would be enabled to have the paper within his reach. A small effort in each congregation might supply every family in that congregation with the religious paper of their church—the rich providing a fund to pay for those who are not able to pay for the paper themselves. When shall this once be?"

An Illuminated Bible.—We were strolling down the Third Municipality about dusk, says the New Orleans Republican, when we were attracted by a bright light through the windows of a low hovel. On approaching, we found a poor Dutch woman reading a sixty-cent Bible by the light of a pine knot fire. Here, thought we, is a Bible more luminously shining on the track towards Heaven, than any other illuminated Bible ever seen—Harper's not excepted.

GAMBLERS.

The following paragraph is a translation from the German of Lichwehr. It is a bold picture and forcibly drawn:

"A man who had gone over a great part of the world returned at length home from his travels; his friends came and requested him to relate what he had seen. 'Listen,' said he. 'Eleven hundred miles beyond the country of the Hurons there are men whom I thought very strange; they frequently sit at table until late in the night; there is no cloth laid, they do not wet their mouths; lightnings might flash around them; two armies might be engaged in battle; even the sky might threaten to crush them in its fall, they would remain unmoved on their seats, for they are deaf and dumb. Yet now and then there escapes from their lips a half-broken, unconnected, and unmeaning sound, and they horribly roll their eyes at the same time. I often stood looking at them with astonishment, for when such sittings take place people frequently go to witness them. Believe me, brethren, I shall never forget the horrible contortions which I there saw. Despair, fury, malicious joy, and anguish, were by turns visible in their countenances. Their rage, I assure you, appeared to me that of the furies; their gravity that of the judges of hell; and their anguish that of malefactors.' 'But what was their object?' asked his friends. 'They attend perhaps to the welfare of the community?' 'Oh, no!' 'They are seeking the philosopher's stone?' 'You are mistaken.' 'They wish to discover the quadrature of the circle?' 'No.' 'They do penance for old sins?' 'Nothing of all this.' 'Then they are mad; if they neither hear, nor speak, nor feel, nor see; what can they be doing?' 'They are Gambling!'"

THE SHADOW OF AN ASS.

The Greeks had a proverb which ran thus, "To dispute on the shadow of an ass." This took rise from an anecdote which Demosthenes is said to have related to the Athenians, to excite their attention during his defence of a criminal, which was being but inattentively listened to. "A traveller," he said, "once went from Athens to Megara on a hired ass. It happened to be the time of the dog-days, and at noon. He was much exposed to the unmitigated heat of the sun; and not finding so much as a bush under which to take shelter, he bethought himself to descend from the ass, and seat himself under its shadow. The owner of the donkey, who accompanied him, objected to this, declaring to him that when he let the animal, the use of its shadow was not included in the bargain. This dispute, at last, grew so warm, that it got to blows; and, finally, gave rise to an action at law." After having said so much, Demosthenes continued the defence of his client; but the auditors, whose curiosity he had piqued, were extremely anxious to know how the judges decided on so singular a cause. Upon this, the orator commented severely on their childish injustice, in devouring with attention a paltry story about an ass's shadow, while they turned a deaf ear to a cause in which the life of a human being was involved. From that day, when a man showed a preference for discussing small and contemptible subjects to great and important ones, he was said "to dispute on the shadow of an ass."

TEMPERANCE FABLE.

The rats once assembled in a large cellar, to devise some method of safely getting the bait from a small steel trap, which lay near, having seen numbers of their friends and relations snatched from them by its merciless jaws. After many loud speeches, and the proposal of many elaborate but fruitless plans, a happy wit standing erect, said, "It is my opinion that if with one paw we keep down the spring, we can safely take the food from the trap with the other." All the rats present loudly squeaked assent, and snapped their tails in applause. The meeting adjourned, and the rats retired to their homes; but the devastation of the trap being by no means diminished, the rats were forced to call another "Convention." The elders had just asssembled, and had commenced their deliberations, when all were started by a faint voice, and a poor rat with only three legs, limping into the ring, stood up to speak. All were instantly silent. When stretching out the bleeding remains of his leg, he said, "My friends, I have tried the method you proposed, and see the result! Now let me suggest a plan to escape the trap—'Do not touch it!'"

PROVIDENTIAL.

"A few years since, as the Rev. Joseph Davis, an excellent Baptist minister in London, was walking along the crowded streets of that city, his attention was arrested by the circumstance that a carriage with several horses was about to pass over a little girl who was slowly crossing the road. He strongly felt the danger of the child, and forgetting his own, he ran, snatched her up in his arms, and hastened with her to the side-path, when the thought struck him—what would the parents of this dear child have felt had she been killed! At this moment he looked in the face of the little girl, which had been concealed from his view by her bonnet; and imagine if you can, what his feelings were when he discovered that it was his daughter. I saw him about half an hour after the occurrence, and shall never forget his agitation as he described to me her danger, or his expressions of thankfulness to an infinitely gracious Being who thus delivered his beloved child from death." [Dr. Beecher.

The congregation who compel their pastor to spend two-thirds of his time on the farm or in the school-house, ought to be satisfied if he gives to them the remaining one-third; but they are generally the ones who demand of him four-thirds.

Life is too short to be employed in selfish acts; and he whose highest ambition is to gratify self, makes life wretched and dies unlamented, with none to rise up and call him blessed.

CHURCH AUTHORITY.

There is an old maxim, that "fools, when they try to avoid one evil, fall into the contrary extreme." It is possible for wise and good men to be guilty of the same inconsistency. If we mistake not, there is something of this sort in the widely-different views which are entertained respecting Church authority. By one class of persons it is maintained, that the Church has authority, not only to administer discipline, but to make its own articles of faith, and enact its own rules of government. Another class deny that the Church possesses any power, and maintain that her rulers are merely the instructors of the people. The practical effect of one of these views is to confer upon the Church that authority which belongs alone to God; of the other, to put an end to all the systematic efforts, disciplinary and benevolent, which might be made by a well-organized and mutually-responsible body.

That the Church has no right to make and enforce religious dogmas, is evident from the fact that the Scriptures contain all the doctrines which are necessary to salvation. Their own testimony is, that they are able to make the man of God perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works; that they are a light to our feet and a lamp to our path; and that the law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul. They are committed to the Church, whose business it is to preserve them, explain them, and encourage obedience to them. She undoubtedly has power—which it may in certain cases be expedient to exercise—to draw up a summary of Christian doctrine, for the purpose of opposing hurtful errors, and exhibiting in a connected form her views of the Scriptures. But these summaries have no authority in themselves. They derive their authority alone from the Scriptures. If they agree with them, and exhibit the truth, they should be received and obeyed; if not, they should be rejected just as readily as we would reject any other human composition. The doctrine that the Church has no power to ordain any thing contrary to the Word of God, implies that when she speaks to us, we have a right to try what she says by that standard, and to receive or reject it according as it is in conformity or opposition thereto.

Neither has the Church power to enact laws or decree rites and ceremonies for her members. Moral Laws originate with God alone, the Creator and Ruler. He has given a code, sufficiently full to meet all the circumstances in which men can be placed, and at the same time sufficiently concise to be comprehended by men of all capacities. The Decalogue is a standard of duty for all nations and ages—a standard the perfection of which might be expected from the character of its author, and is proved by the happy effects which have followed obedience to it. Yet the Church, not content simply to enforce the precepts of the Decalogue, has from time to time enlarged upon them by new precepts of her own invention. Hence the institution of holy days which God has not appointed, the introduction of new objects and modes of worship, and the enjoining of confessions, fasts, and pilgrimages. Now, when any branch of the Church encourages these additions to the perfect standard of the Most High, and attempts to exact obedience to them, under whatever specious pretences it may be done, right there is a presumptuous and blasphemous arrogation of power which belongs only to the supreme Lawgiver.

There are many things in respect to which the Church has power to give direction. It belongs to her to regulate those circumstances connected with her proceedings, which are necessary to harmony and efficiency. For instance, it belongs to her to provide for the public ministrations of the Word; to make regulations for the introduction and dismission of members; to discipline, and if necessary exclude, such members as may dishonor their profession; in short, to take those steps which are necessary to self-preservation, and the accomplishment of the objects for which she was established. This will require faithfulness on the part of those who are called to be office-bearers in the Church, and may at times require self-denial on the part of others. The Church is designed to be the light of the world, and ought therefore to rebuke every thing which is wrong, and exhibit before the world that which is right and true. She is to be the medium of communicating the Gospel to the world that lieth in wickedness, and ought therefore to be actively and perseveringly engaged in this work. She is to be the salt of the earth, and ought therefore to be continually exerting a healthful and saving influence upon those who are without. In order to do this, a system of active measures must be adopted, and every member brought to fill his place and discharge his duty. We believe that the Church is invested with power to carry out these objects, and that only in doing so will she be secure against error and blessed with the presence of her Head.

The Question Answered.—Dr. Fuller, in his last letter to Dr. Wayland upon the subject of slavery, asks whether any man at the North will undertake to remove his slaves, and give him bond and security that their condition shall be improved? "If so," he says, "let him speak, and I will then make him a proposition which shall at once, and by a test more sure than all the writing in the world, determine who is the friend of the slave, and who is willing to make sacrifices for his good." To this, Dr. Brisbane, editor of the Christian Politician, a man who has expended about twenty thousand dollars in liberating some thirty of his own slaves, replies as follows: "I, for one, answer, that if Bro. Fuller will give his slaves their freedom, and insure me that no impediment shall be in the way of their removal, I am ready to comply with the above conditions, it being understood that the slaves are to be removed with their own consent." We shall look with some interest for Dr. Fuller's reply to this manly and full acceptance of his offer.

LEGISLATION IN FAVOR OF SUNDAY.

On a previous occasion, we stated at length some of our objections to the proposed legislation in favor of Sunday, by closing the canal locks on that day. Among those objections, we named—1st. The principle which such legislation allows, that the aid of civil law is necessary to give effect to divine law; 2d. The fact that legislation on this subject has heretofore proved worse than useless; 3d. The probability that such legislation now would do injustice to a respectable portion of the community.

In presenting these objections, however, and making them the ground of a remonstrance against the measure, we are met with the exclamation, "What! would you rob the thousands of boatmen of their Sabbath, and compel the poor orphan driver-boys to work seven days in the week?" This exclamation makes such a show of piety and kindness, that it has great weight with superficial observers, and is regarded by them as a sufficient answer to all our objections. But a candid mind will readily see, that its weight is wholly derived from assuming what is utterly false. In the first place, it assumes, that for the locks to be open on Sunday as they now are, makes it impossible for boatmen to rest on that day—an assumption which is disproved by the fact, that many boatmen do now rest from their labors on Sunday, that others rest on the seventh day, and that others still might rest upon any day of the week which they might choose. In the second place, it assumes, that for us to remonstrate against passing a law to close the locks on Sunday, is the same as to petition that the boys shall be compelled to work on that day—an assumption which indicates either willful misrepresentation or woful stupidity, and which needs no other answer than to be presented in its true light.

Now we are bold to say, in regard to this whole subject, that there are no people on earth more desirous to see a day of rest universally enjoyed and conscientiously observed, than are the Seventh-day Baptists. They believe that the Sabbath was given to man in mercy and love, and that its faithful observance has been fraught with the richest temporal and spiritual blessings. They believe, likewise, that it is only by preserving the Sabbath as originally given to man, that a general regard for it can be expected, and the full measure of its blessings ensured. Hence their many personal sacrifices in order to preserve it in its original purity; and hence their dissent from those who would change the design of the institution and the day of its observance.

In the case under consideration, the Seventh-day Baptists do not ask the Legislature to take action in favor of their views, by ordering that the locks shall be closed on the seventh day; since they deem it sufficient for them, that they are left free to observe that day according to the dictates of their consciences. Neither do they ask that a law may be passed which shall compel any one who believes in the sacredness of the first day of the week to desecrate that day. They simply ask, in the first place, that the Legislature will not sanction the dogma that the first day of the week is the Sabbath, by passing laws in its favor; and, in the second place, that the Legislature will not restrict the privileges of those who believe in the sacredness of the seventh day, by passing a law which will prevent them from pursuing their ordinary avocations on the first day.

LAST BEQUESTS.

It has become quite common of late for dying men to bequeath large sums of money to charitable institutions. We have now before us the name of a Mr. Houston, who has just given thirteen thousand dollars to various benevolent institutions in Philadelphia. Several similar cases have been noticed within a few weeks past. It is encouraging to know, that the number is increasing of those who in their death remember the claims which the living have upon them, and respond to those claims by the bestowment of their goods. They may thus endow institutions which will continue to scatter blessings around for years after their founders are gone. Or, they may give a permanent form to books, which will speak in defence of truth to coming generations. They may, in short, perpetuate their influence to almost any extent, and for an indefinite length of time. But, lasting and happy as is the influence thus exerted, we believe there is a "more excellent way," and that is for the living to make liberal investments of their possessions for the benefit of these objects. The changes of fortune which are daily occurring may rob them of the privilege; or, they may find it difficult to attend to the matter in their last hours. The surest and best way, therefore, is to attend to the subject now, while there is a heart to plan and ability to execute. Well do we remember the thankfulness expressed by a friend who had given liberally in his prosperity, but who is now in adversity. Equally well do we remember his expressions of sorrow, that his gifts had not been more numerous. He spoke of the property which he had invested for good objects, as affording him more satisfaction than he could derive from its present possession. Let those who have abundance and to spare, think of his experience.

"There remaineth a Rest."—We have been asked to give our opinion of the "rest" spoken of in the fourth chapter of Hebrews. A careful examination of the chapter has not enabled us to discover how it can with any show of reason be used against the seventh day and in favor of the first. We believe the reference of the Apostle is to a rest in the future, the heavenly state, which was typified by the earthly rest of Israel in the land of Canaan. To construe the passage as having reference to the change of the Sabbath, makes the reasoning incongruous and absurd. For a full exhibition of this incongruity and absurdity, see an article in the Recorder of August 29, 1844.

RESIGNATION.

At a meeting of the New Market Street Baptist Church, Philadelphia, held March 24, 1845, the following preamble and resolutions were adopted:

Whereas, our Pastor, Rev. Gideon B. Perry, D. D., has seen it to be his duty to resign the pastoral charge of this Church, it is with unanimous voice that we give the following resolutions, as the expression of our feelings on the occasion.

Resolved, That it would give us great satisfaction could the Rev. Dr. Perry see it to be consistent with his view of duty to continue with us in the sacred relation of pastor.

Resolved, That we accept the resignation of our esteemed Pastor with sincere regret, and as sincerely thank him for the solicitude he entertains for our continuance in peace and prosperity, and especially for his proffered kindness to aid us in obtaining a successor, which we cordially accept.

Resolved, That Dr. Perry's mode of preaching and discipline, during his pastoral relation with us, has been scriptural, instructvie, kind and successful; and by his judicious procedure, we have been much edified, built up, and comforted, as a church, and essentially enlarged as a congregation.

Resolved, That in his absence with the view to improve his sinking health, [we shall remember him affectionately and pray] for his safe return, and that he may be able, with renewed vigor, to proclaim the precious Gospel for many years to come.

SABBATH LIBRARY.

The New York City Sabbath Tract Society has commenced collecting a Sabbath Library, which it designs to enlarge until the collection shall include all the principal works upon the subject. For this purpose it asks, that those friends of the object who have in their possession rare or valuable books, will render what assistance they can, by the donation, sale, or loan of such books. In this way the works which are now scattered over the country so as to be of but little service, might be brought together and made accessible to any who may wish to study the subject thoroughly. The following list will show what works are already in the Library, and enable our friends to judge whether those which they possess would be desirable. It is designed to publish at some future time a more complete Catalogue, giving a description of each work.

Christian Courtesy.—The influence of the Christian religion is scarcely less manifest in purifying the heart, than in subduing the temper, improving the manners, and adorning the spirit with all that is attractive and lovely. In cases not a few, a morose and sullen disposition has been completely transformed by the influence of the Gospel, so that its possessor has become kind and courteous in all his intercourse with society. In this is seen the power of the Gospel, and its perfect adaptation to the wants of men. Nobody doubts that the cultivation of a spirit of Christian courtesy contributes greatly to happiness and usefulness. It removes many occasions of disquietude, and is a short way to peace with one's self and others. It secures the confidence and love of observers, and often wins them to an imitation of the example which they behold. Happy is he that can add to decision and faithfulness that amiability of manner and softness of temper which approves itself to every man's conscience. Calmness of spirit, self-respect, and the respect of others, will be his reward.

Pennsylvania Canal Collectors.—One of the Collectors on a Pennsylvania Canal, has written to Mr. James Clarke, President of the Pennsylvania Canal Board, asking if any thing can be done to relieve collectors from the necessity of doing business on Sunday. In reply, Mr. Clarke says that the Board have never given any orders for keeping open the offices on Sunday; that they have no legal power to close them; but that it would give him great pleasure to learn that offices were no longer kept open on the first day of the week.

Hon. Henry Clay, of Kentucky, has been made a life member of the American Home Missionary Society, by the contribution of fifty dollars from the ladies of the Durand Missionary Society of New Haven, Ct. He has acknowledged the favor in a letter, which speaks of his profound sense of the surpassing importance of the Christian Religion.

Sale of Human Beings for the Benefit of Theological Education.—The following notice of a public sale is taken from the Savannah Republican of March 3d, 1845. After describing the plantation which was to be sold, the notice adds:—

> "Also, at the same time and place, the following negro slaves, to wit: Charles, Peggy, Antonett, Davy, September, Maria, Jenney, and Isaac—levied on as the property of Henry Y. Hall, to satisfy a mortgage fi. fa. issued out of McIntosh Superior Court, in favor of the Board of Directors of the Theological Seminary of the Synod of South Carolina and Georgia, vs. said Henry Y. Hall. Conditions, cash. C. O'Neal, Deputy Sheriff."

Baltimore Methodist Conference.—The Baltimore Sun has been furnished "by authority" with the following brief statements, from the notes of the Secretaries, of some of the most important doings of the Conference:—

> All the cases in which any of the ministers were involved in connection with Slavery, were satisfactorily disposed of; so that now the Conference is more perfectly free from Slavery than for many years previous.
>
> The vote on the recommendation of the General Conference so to change the sixth restrictive rule, as to allow a division of the Church Funds, in case a division of the Church should take place, stood—for the recommendation, 41; against it, 150. So the Conference did not concur.
>
> Universal harmony and good feeling prevailed from the commencement to the close of the Conference, and all the discussions were conducted in a manner doing great credit to the character of the Christian ministry.
>
> The subject of the division of the Church was not directly entertained. The Conference is nearly unanimously opposed to it. No delegates were appointed to the Louisville Convention. There is not the least probability that the Conference will go South, in case a division should take place.

[Communicated.]

Distressing Accident.—It becomes our duty to announce the death, on the 14th ult., of one of our citizens, Matthew R. Maxson, of Sharon, Potter county, Pa., in the 35th year of his age. He went into the woods in the morning for the purpose of boiling sap. It being nearly a mile from home, he took his dinner with him, and was not expected back until evening. As he did not come at the expected time, the neighbors went in search of him, and found him about 9 o'clock in the evening. It appeared that he went to the place where he boiled his sap, kindled the fire, and then went a few steps above and cut a large log. It being on a steep side hill, he took a hand-spike and went below the log in order to steady it down to the side of his kettle, in doing which he probably fell, and the log rolled onto his head, and undoubtedly killed him instantly. One of his legs was entirely burnt off at the knee, and he was otherwise very badly burned. He has left a wife and six small children to mourn the loss of an affectionate husband and kind father. They have, however, good reason to believe that he has gone to a better home. He embraced religion in early life, and was a worthy member of the First Seventh Day-Baptist Church in Genesee.

"Render to all their Dues."—An article is going the rounds of the papers, headed "the London Post-Office," and credited to the "New York Evening Mirror." That article—together with a number of others in circulation about matters and things in London—was written by the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder, and published in his paper under the head of "Leaves from a Traveler's Note-Book." Of course we commend the good taste which leads to the publication of these articles, but not the morality which allows them to appear uncredited or miscredited.

Rev. Joy H. Fairchild.—Our readers will remember the case of this gentleman, who was deposed from the ministry nearly a year ago, on the charge of immoral and licentious conduct, and who, under the high excitement occasioned thereby, attempted to destroy himself. The grand jury found a bill of indictment against him, and his trial came on at Boston last week. The result was, that on Saturday last the jury returned a verdict of "NOT GUILTY." As soon as the commotion occasioned by the announcement of this result had subsided, Mr. Fairchild arose and addressed the Court in an impressive and feeling speech, of which the following is the conclusion:—

> "I have submitted myself to the laws, as a good citizen should do, and the result is before you. During the trial my mouth has been closed; but I now declare with all solemnity, and as in the presence of my Maker and Judge, that I am innocent of the crime charged upon me. My enemies and persecutors I forgive, and commend them to the forgiving mercy of Almighty God. The pains, the agonies, which they have caused me to endure, no tongue can tell. They have brought me and mine almost to poverty; but I will trust in the Lord and fear no evil. According to the decree of the late council at Exeter, I am now restored to that ministry in which I have endeavored to labor with all fidelity for thirty years; and being restored to my office, I greatly rejoice. I will only add that I thank your honor for your patience and impartiality in the discharge of your duty as judge. I thank the county attorney for his courtesy, and the jury for their just and righteous verdict."

"The Ladies' Garland, and Advocate of the Daughters of Temperance," is the title of a neatly-printed octavo paper, which Messrs. Piercy & Reed propose to issue weekly from No. 9 Spruce St. From the specimen number now before us, we judge that the work will merit a liberal patronage. Price—Four cents per number; country subscribers, $1 50 per year.

Trial of "Big Thunder."—The trial of Smith A. Boughton, which has been going on for a week past at Hudson, was brought to a close on Sunday evening last. The jury could not agree. The Judge called upon each juror separately, and every man expressed his conviction that if they were kept together for a year they would be unable to agree upon a verdict, and then they were discharged. Eight were for acquittal, and four for conviction. Two were willing to agree either to acquittal or conviction.

NEW YORK LEGISLATURE.

During the last week, bills were passed for the relief of the New York Eye and Ear Infirmary, and the American Seaman's Friend Society. A bill was passed appropriating $75,000 to complete the Northern State Prison. A bill was presented to abolish the office of Superintendent of Common Schools, and a report was presented upon the subject against abolishishing the office. The bill to punish seduction and adultery was several times under consideration. Many petitions and remonstrances were presented concerning the new License Law—some for it, some against it, and others for referring the whole subject to the people. On Wednesday, Mr. Varney reported the new law in the Senate with sundry amendments, one of which was to exempt the city of New York from the operation of the law. The bill was made the special order of the day for Monday, March 31st.

In the Senate, on Monday, Mr. Folsom presented a petition, signed by twenty thousand six hundred and six inhabitants of the city of New York, against excepting that city from the operation of the Excise Bill, all the names to which had been obtained in two days. Many other petitions were presented to the same effect. Mr. Varian presented a petition from 10,247 citizens of New York against the License Bill. The License Bill was under discussion until two o'clock, when a vote was passed making it the order of the day for Thursday.

FOREIGN MISSIONS.

Syria.—Mr. Smith, writing from Beirut, December 11, says, "The Protestants of Hasbeiya still continue steadfast. But a new governor has just been appointed who is of the opposite party. What he will do, does not yet appear."

Ceylon.—A letter from Messrs. Ward and Cope represents the prospect of the seminary at Batticotta, in a religious point of view, as improving. There is also a growing desire on the part of the students for a more thorough education. The severe discipline of 1843, which for a time produced only murmurs and complaints, appears rather to have increased than diminished the confidence of the community in the conductors of the institution.

China.—Mr. Williams writes from Macao, October 15: "Doct. Hepburn, who has just come down from Amoy, says that the only limit to the preaching of the Gospel at that place is the fewness of the preachers and their weakness and inability to talk longer. The same, I suppose, is true at Hongkong and Shangae. At Ningpo the missionaries stationed there are unable to preach much yet."

Sandwich Islands.—Mr. Gulick, in a letter written at Molokai in September, says, "Within the last two years, owing chiefly to the illness of my wife, I have visited all the islands except Hawaii. The change and improvement in the general appearance of the people, within five years past, is certainly great. I visited this station in 1838; and the change which has since taken place is truly surprising and delightful."

West Africa.—Mr. Walker writes from the Gagoon, August 11, that the prospects of the mission continue to be encouraging. Referring to the aggressive conduct of the French, he says, "The people here have certainly behaved nobly through the whole of this trying affair. I sometimes feel ashamed of myself when I see their meekness and forbearance. And it is not because they do not perceive and feel their wrongs; for they are very sensitive. Blood would have been shed long since, had they not been remarkably forbearing.

General Intelligence.

TEN DAYS LATER FROM CHINA.

By a vessel which arrived in New York direct from China, on Friday last, the Hong Kong Register of Dec. 17 was received, from which the following items are taken. The principal matter of interest is the frequent piracies in the China Seas, of which the Register says:—

Piracies appear to be nearly of as frequent occurrence this winter as robberies in Hong Kong were during the last. We hear from Macao that the Starling on her last passage lost three men in an engagement with the Ladrones, which lasted two hours. Fortunately she had a double crew of Manilla men on board, but for which she would have been taken. A Lorcha had been picked up off Nine Islands without any one on board and with marks of violence on the deck, and towed into Macao. An alarm had been occasioned by the appearance of a piratical boat in the Typa, but finding they were discovered they found it convenient to make off.

There was a furious tempest at Manilla on the night of November 11, in which several vessels were lost; the town of Nueva Caceres sustained much damage, most of the houses being destroyed, including that of the Governor, who had a narrow escape for his life. In the town of Tayobas more than 800 houses were destroyed, and the rice crops were ruined.

The following paragraphs from Bombay papers are given in the Register:

A fearful accident occurred at Indore on the 14th inst. Several thousands of Brahmins had been assembled at the Palace to receive gifts at the festival of Gunputtee. They were simultaneously descending a staircase in crowds, when the structure gave way, and in the rush and crash which ensued, one hundred and ninety-four lives were lost.

On the 2d ult. Tankeewall, a small town on the river Gambia, was stormed by a column of about 200 baboons, who assaulted the natives with great ferocity, biting and pelting with sticks and stones in their daring attempt to carry off what provisions they could find in the village. The inhabitants made a stout counter assault with cutlass and musket, more deadly weapons than the monkies could command. In a running contest, nearly 100 were captured, and since sold; several are here, and seem by their antics to have already forgotten the old cause of their captivity.

We are sorry to hear that there is a good deal of sickness at Koolungsoo at present. Lieut. Greene of H. M. S. Plover was buried on the morning of the 4th inst. and several officers were off duty.

Among the advertisements in the Register, is one a column long, about the New York Ladies' Companion, subscriptions for which are to be received at the Register office.

Another advertisement is about a lottery of sixty chances for a self-performing organ. "John Smith" of Macao is the advertiser.

Disaster on the River.—We briefly noticed yesterday, the running down of a small boat by the South America, containing two persons, who were drowned. From information which we have collected of passengers and other sources, it appears that a party of eleven persons, residents of East Camp or Germantown, Columbia County, consisting of George Rochfellow, his daughter, son-in-law, and others connected with the family, and Jeremiah Hover and Garrit Lasher, proceeded to Hudson in a skiff on Wednesday, for the purpose of making purchases.

On the same evening, nine of them (two remaining at Hudson,) engaged the steamboat Fairfield to tow them back to East Camp, and upon arriving at their destination the skiff was detached from the steamboat. They were scarcely disengaged when the skiff was struck by a schooner and capsized. The boat was soon righted again, and two of the men got into her, and were endeavoring to extricate the others from their perilous situation, when the South America came along, and before the pilot could be warned of the danger, she struck the skiff with her wheel, and probably instantly killed the two men, as they were not seen afterwards. Every exertion was made, which the darkness of the night would admit, to save the unfortunate sufferers, but without success. The whole of them, nine, were drowned.

General Jackson.—Isaac Hill of New Hampshire, who lately visited the Hermitage, says:

"I found Gen. Jackson better in health than I expected; yet so weak, if it were any other man, I could scarcely suppose he would live a week. For the last four months he has not attempted to take his customary meals with the family. He sits through the day in a well-constructed easy chair, with his writing materials, his miniature Bible and hymn book before him. To him are brought as soon as the mail arrives the newspapers; and during the four days I tarried at the Hermitage, his first inquiry was for the daily Washington newspapers and the letters bearing the postmark of the capital. His complaint is pulmonary; one lobe of the lungs he believes to be entirely consumed. This condition is shown by his shortness of breath, which almost entirely precludes the benefit of personal exercise. When he moves it is so quietly as to produce no disturbance. His feet and ankles are swollen from continued sitting, and he finds a substitute for salutary exercise only in the bathing of his limbs every evening in those emollients calculated to produce a healthy action of the skin. Weak as he is, he shaves with his own hand, and combs and adjusts the ample gray hair which continues to add to the dignity of his appearance."

Economical Government.—The House of Representatives of Missouri have agreed to reduce the salaries throughout the State, including their own pay. The following are the salaries established by the bill: Governer, $1500 per annum; Secretary of State, $800; auditor, $800; circuit judges, $800; supreme court judges $850; register, $800; circuit attorneys, $200; attorney general, $500 commissioner of the permanent seat of government, $150; members of the Senate and House, $2 per day, and $2 for every 25 miles traveled in coming to and going from the Legislature; Speaker of the House, $3 per day; chief clerks of the two houses, $4 per day; other clerks, $2 per day.

Much censure having been cast on the Rev. Theobald Mathew for incurring liabilities which he was not able to discharge, Mr. Joseph Sturge has written to the papers to explain that Mr. Mathew had been promised by a rich relation a large sum of money, but that relation suddenly died intestate, before the amount was paid.

Indian Difficulties.—Much excitement still prevails in the Creek Nation, arising out of another small skirmish between some Creeks and Pawnee Mahas. It appears, according to the Western Frontier Whig, that a few Creeks were out on the prairies hunting, when they were waylaid, and one of their number dangerously wounded by the Pawnee Mahas. The Creeks returned the fire with success, killing one of their enemies. They then cut off his arm at the elbow, and again at the wrist; eating the flesh off the arm, and sending the hand in to their chief, Gen. McIntosh, who has called a general council of all the Indians of the Prairies, and of the whole West and South-West, to be held in May next, at the Creek Council Ground.

The War Whoop.—The Arkansas Intelligencer states that the Creeks, on hearing the news of the late attack, immediately sounded the "war-whoop," which was carried to the distance of one hundred and twenty miles in the short space of eighteen hours; the runners who sounded the "whoop" traveling on foot the whole time; and in that short space of time one thousand Creek warriors were ready for the conflict. This shows that the Indians who in that time could raise such a force, could easily commit dreadful depredations upon any hostile army.

From Matamoras.—By the schooner Exit, Capt. Johnson, we learn that the Camanch Indians were daily committing depredations on the inhabitants. Two families had been murdered, and the people on the east side of the Rio del Norte were coming to Matamoras for protection. Santa Ana was still in prison at Perote. The Mexican Congress was still in session. [Tribune.

The Cherokee Nation.—The Commissioners of the United States have virtually taken possession of the government of this people. John Ross and the Chiefs of the dominant party are now at Washington or on their way thither, and the power of the leaders of the minority has never been recognized. A difficulty is said to have taken place between the Commandant of Fort Gibson and Col. Butler, the Agent of the tribe—possibly relative to the details of the action of the Commissioners.

Anti-Rent in Schoharie County.—We have he following information from correspondents and reliable verbal sources.

On Monday last, the Sheriff of Schoharie County and Under Sheriff Bouck, proceeded to the town of Blenheim and Jefferson, to serve warrants and collect rent. It is supposed that they succeeded in serving the warrants.

Towards evening they returned to Fink's tavern, at North Blenheim, and put up for the night. Between 8 and 9 o'clock, a party of about 25 persons, disguised as Indians, and fully armed, entered the house, instantly seized the Sheriff and Under Sheriff, and without allowing them to put on their hats pushed them out of the house. At the door they were joined by the entire party, consisting of 150 persons, disguised, and armed with pistols, muskets, tomahawks and knives; of the muskets, 75 were counted with bayonets.

Having supplied the Sheriff and Deputy with Indian caps, they were placed in the centre of the party, and marched some four miles up the West-kill, and thence to the summit of the mountain, in the woods—a remote and dreary place. There they held a pow-wow around them, after having searched them unsuccessfully for papers, and at about two o'clock at night they marched back to Fink's, where they left them, without further molestation. On the route, going and returning, the Sheriff was pricked some 15 times with the bayonet, either for walking too quick or too slow, and his foot and leg were much bruised.

Anti-Rent Troubles in Ulster County.—The Grand Jury of Ulster County, sitting at Kingston, have preferred bills of indictment against about twenty of the "Indians." Four of them have been arrested—the sum of one thousand dollars each fixed as the amount of bail. Two of them (Cooper and Avery) have given the necessary bail, and the other two (Corey and Staples) still remain in prison, but will probably be bailed out in a few days. Their trial will take place at the next term of the Circuit Court.

Manía a' Potu—Incident.—Two young gentle men, hunting in a swampy place, a few days since, were arrested by a low, faint moaning, or kind of grunting. They at first took it to be a wild animal of some kind, but on proceeding to the spot, found a man nearly naked, lying in the mud and water, stupid, senseless, and almost lifeless! They found upon examination from appearances, that he had been lying there for several days, and that he had eaten off the ends of his fore and middle fingers until they were raw!

Upon inquiring, they found his name to be Mays—that he was a laborer, and from excessive use of ardent spirits, had fallen into a state of maria 'a potu, and in this dreadful state of mind had left the city on Thursday—fallen in the swamp probably on the evening of that day, where he lay until found on the Saturday evening following.

"Honorable Women."—A large meeting of ladies, held in Springfield, Vt. (we learn from the Chronicle) appointed a committee of twelve of their number to wait on three individuals who had taken out licenses to retail spirits in the town, and request from them a pledge to give them up and abstain from the traffic. The tavern keeper politely answered in the negative. The two merchants cordially received them, and gave them a satisfactory reply—and accompanied them back to the house with licenses in hand. There, after some introductory remarks, one of the merchants said he would make a proposition to the ladies, viz: that as they were in the habit of trading with pedlars, who in great numbers infested the community, and who paid nothing towards the support of religious institutions, and took from the regular trader the best part of his business, they should refuse entirely to traffic with them. To this proposition the ladies promptly and unanimously responded. The licenses were then relinquished, a lamp lighted, and a flame applied to them. Verily, these were "honorable women;" may they no where be few nor irresolute, and the temperance reformation will advance irresistibly.

A Scene at the Police Office.—There are some things better as well as worse than 'petty larceny' happening at the Police Office; and we yesterday noticed a little incident which seemed to us both better and worse. A poor, emaciated, wretched looking woman, about forty, her shoulders covered with a dirty, whisky-colored shawl, came reluctantly edging her way up to the bar, urged on and encouraged by sundry good-natured winks and pushes from a fat, sleek, well-to-do colored woman, under whose protection the poor wretch had evidently placed herself. She had come to give herself up as a vagrant, and was kindly sent to the Penitentiary for four months by Justice Matsell—this probably being the only hope of prolonging her life. In this broad world she had no longer any friend but this poor, kind-hearted colored woman, who could only assist her in seeking the prison and its infamous associations as the last asylum this side the more peaceful one, the grave. [Tribune.

Pitching Cents.—John Chappell, a colored boy, and Christian Lightner, a white boy, were arrested on Sunday while pitching cents, in a lot near Green Mount Cemetery. The white boy was discharged, and the colored boy committed to jail. [Sun.

We felt exceedingly indignant towards the committing magistrate in the above case, until, on inquiry, we were informed that there is a law for committing black offenders of the kind, but none for white ones! Seeing that the white boy probably was, by reason of superior intelligence, the least excusable of the two, the shameful inequality of this emphatically "black law," is strikingly apparent. The legislator who framed it, was either a tyrant or a ninny. In what century and land do we live? Certainly not in "free America," and in the 19th century of the Christian era!

[Balt. Sat. Vis.

Operation of a Bad Law.—At Columbus, Ohio, some time since, a mother threw her infant child into the Scioto river. The only witnesses by whom the murder can be substantiated are a colored family with whom she lived, and the testimony of these against a white person being expressly excluded by the law of the State, it is probable that the guilty person will go unpunished. Could any thing be more absurd than such a law? To exclude a witness on account of his religious profession would be but comparatively honorable, for that may be changed; but to exclude a whole class, however respectable in point of character, merely on account of the complexion of their skin—a circumstance entirely independent of their control, and which in no way affects their credibility—is by no means creditable to a State which boasts of its regard for Justice and Equality.

Arrest upon Suspicion.—Captain Gray, of this city, was arrested on Friday last, upon the charge of being engaged in the slave trade on the coast of Africa, a few months since, while commander of the brig Agness, of this port. He gave the bail ($5,000,) required by Judge Hall, the District Judge, to appear in the Court at Newcastle and take his trial in June next.

The charges were preferred by the Hon. Henry A. Wise, having cause to suspect the brig when on the coast of Brazil,

Fire in Williams College.—A large fire took place at Williamstown, Mass., on Tuesday evening, by which the valuable observatory belonging to the college, was rendered a mass of ruins. The fire originated in the second story, about 9 o'clock in the evening, and no doubt was the work of an incendiary. The correspondent of the Albany Argus says:—

The college records, much valued for their antiquity, and much philosophical apparatus, were stored in the vaults of the building, and very little of this was saved. The college, which has never been a wealthy institution, scarcely two years ago was thrown into the greatest difficulties and embarrassments by the destruction of their largest and most costly building, and, although greatly aided by private munificence, were with difficulty able to meet the expenses consequent upon such a disaster. ~~The private library of William Pratt, Esq.,~~ was in part preserved, although many and probably a full half of the valuable books it contained were totally destroyed or much injuried. This library (through the liberality of its owner) had always been open to the public; and, consequently, the community (in addition to Mr. P.'s private loss) are themselves great losers by its destruction.

Making Maple Sugar.—My manner of making maple sugar is, to have the tubs and all connected with sugar-making, clean and sweet. My next object is, to boil as soon as possible after the sap has run from the trees. In clarifying, I use for 50 pounds of sugar, one pint of skimmed milk put into the syrup when cold, and put over a moderate fire until it rises, which should occupy thirty or forty minutes; then skim and boil until it will grain; after which I turn it into a tub, and after two or three weeks, bore a hole in the bottom of the tub, and turn on a little cold water, and in a few days the molasses will drain out, leaving the sugar light, dry and white. [A. Fitch.

War with Mexico.—Gen. Almonte has received advices from his government since the overthrow of his particular friend Santa Anna. The ambassador has been recognized by the new government, but will, nevertheless, return home on the first of April. He expresses the opinion, that as the resolutions for the annexation of Texas were passed by so very small a majority, the Mexican government will not think it necessary to disturb the friendly relations now existing between the two nations. [Jour. of Com.

Association of Blacksmiths.—An Association of Blacksmiths of St. Louis, have obtained from the Legislature an act of incorporation, for the purpose of enabling them to compete successfully with others in the manufacture of every description of iron work. There are about eighty stockholders, and their united capital, labor and enterprise, is to be directed to the end in view. Materials of every kind are to be purchased for the use of the stockholders, in such quantities as will ensure cheap and good articles, and they are to be sold at cost. When manufactured, and not immediately sold, all articles are to be placed in a store under the control of the Association, and full supplies are to be constantly kept for sale. In this way they hope to drive out different articles of foreign manufacture, and ultimately to secure the market for our own citizens.

Consulships.—The consulate at Liverpool, from fees alone, is said to be worth from 10,000 to $15,000 per annum; the one at Havana, about $1,000; the one Havre, probably, $8,000 or $10,000.—Now of a standing salary for consuls at each of these places $4,000 or $5,000 would be sufficient to secure the services of as competent men for either, as can be found in the United States. The surplus should go into the treasury of the United States, or be employed in paying American citizens to reside at ports of less magnitude, as consuls. [Jour. Com.

Several boys have been arrested in Cincinnati for setting fire to various buildings. They confessed the crime, and stated that the motive which induced them to commit the horrid crime was to get the fire engines out and get their favorite to the fire first.

A new lead mine is said to have been recently discovered in Green County, in this State, a short distance from Springfield. A rich mine in Wright County, Mo. is now in successful operation.

The sudden death of Mrs. Myra Willis, wife of N. P. Willis, on Tuesday night, at the age of 29, has sent a pang to many a heart. Mrs. W., it is well known, was an English lady until her marriage, and has rather shunned society since she came with her husband to share his fortunes in his native land; but she was deeply beloved by all who knew her. Her disease was typhus fever. She leaves a daughter some four or five years of age.

THE REFUGE.

Genesis 21: 14—21.

When from their master's presence cast,
O'er Beersheba's broad wild,
Forlorn and faint, at noontide, passed
A mother and her child;

When earthly friends were all estranged,
E'en Nature seemed unkind,
And Fortune, every feature changed,
Left scarce a hope behind;

They to the living God addressed
Their agonizing prayer;
He listened to the warm request,
And lent an angel's care.

So now, should wants and woes the breast
Beyond endurance fill,
Of finite claims though dispossessed,
We have a refuge still.

Should pride transgress, remark the case
Of Hagar and her son;
Like them appeal to sovereign grace,
Yet add, "Thy will be done."

JOSEPH'S TEMPTATION.

BY ELDER D. MILLARD.

Joseph, thou wast made to shine,
When thou spurned seductive pow'r;
Sure thy father's God was thine,
In temptation's fiery hour.

'Potiphar has raised my state—
'Can I basely wrong my lord?
'Act the treach'rous part I hate?
'Forfeit honor, name and word?

'No:—the God that reigns above,
'Gave me favor, led me here;
'He protects the path I love,
'While to sin I greatly fear.'

Grace is given—the tempting lure,
With threats that pow'r alone could join,
Could not bend that purpose pure,
Which, fair Hebrew youth, was thine.

Clouds 'tis true, spread darkness, gloom,
While the storm broke on thy head!
Sad thy fate—a felon's doom!
But that doom to glory led!

Ye who know the adverse hour,
Scorn and scandal may be yours;
Trust ye may the God of power,
Virtue's triumph he secures.

Darkness now may gird your path,
Adverse clouds your sky deform;
Unseen mercies mingle wrath,
Brightest skies succeed the storm.

Think of Joseph once disgraced,
Crush'd by falsehood, spurn'd to shame,
See him next in grandeur placed,
Clothed with pow'r and raised to fame.

FATHER TAYLOR.

Several years since, a large Temperance meeting was convened in the Bethel Church, North Square, at which many seamen related their experience in rum drinking. Mr. Taylor's voice, of course, whenever the bashfulness of the seamen prevented them from from taking part in the meeting, was raised to encourage them; and so easy and familiar was his tone on such occasions, that even the most diffident of the company soon found themselves entirely at home. By way of parenthesis, we may here remark, that one of the causes of Mr. Taylor's success is the faculty which he possesses of rendering those around him as much at home as himself. On the present occasion the meeting was quite interesting, and a large number of seamen signed the pledge. Among several incidents he related the following, which we noted at the time, was peculiarly affecting.

"Brethren," said Mr. Taylor, "about three years since I called to see a widow, one of our sisters, who had long been expecting her son, a noble young sailor, from sea. The ship in which he had sailed had been due over three months, and the poor widow began to think that her darling boy, her only support, had found a watery grave. Well, I talked the matter over with her, and endeavored to cheer her with the hope of seeing him soon—(you know, gentlemen my motto is, never say die)—and while I was yet speaking, she seized me by the arm, and exclaimed, hush! hush! hush! that's my William's voice—I know it is—his step, too, on the stairs—he comes! my own William comes! Open flew the door, and there stood the noble youth, with arms extended, and ready for a spring. He gazed for an instant, his eye caught his mother's, and they were locked in each other's embrace. They kissed and wept, and kissed again, and I wept too, and there all three stood weeping with joy. O! it was a glorious sight! it was truly a happy return! Well, Brethren, when we had recovered breath, the old lady, yet simpering inquired what had detained her William so long.

"Why mother," replied he, "you see we lost our mast in a gale off the cape, and have been hobbling along ever since, under jury masts; nobody got hurt, ship's a fine boat, captain a noble fellow; but—what, is this Father Taylor? (turning to me)—God bless you. I am glad to see you; how are all your folks? and he grasped me with both hands, and shook me as if I had been laboring under a Florida ague. But come, continued he, my traps (chest and pack) are below, and I must get them up, so you must excuse me." A few minutes after we separated.

The next Sunday, I stood where I now stand; the greater part of the seats were nearly full, and brother Foster was getting some settees ready, when my attention was arrested by the young sailor with his fond mother on his arm. O! he was a noble young fellow! straight as an ash, firm as a pillar, yet when he walked, seemed pliant as a willow. Shall I forget him? No never. That day, it was summer at the time, he wore a blue jacket, white trowsers, and on the turned down collar of his snowy shirt, dangled the glossy locks of raven hair. His face and neck were deeply bronzed by the sun, but the easy smile that played about his mouth, and the heart cheerfulness that gleamed in his hazel eyes threw over his whole countenance a halo of intellectual sunshine. As he walked up the aisle, the fond mother looked round with an air of admiration as much as to say, "see you not my noble boy? why do you not rejoice with me?" But there was no occasion for it, if such were her thoughts, for wherever he came in view, he was the observed of observers. Nor was his exterior the better part of him; his heart was nobler and his soul was large enough to take in all mankind. I had frequent opportunities of seeing him during the next week, and still he seemed unchanged. But my heart bleeds while I tell it—in the early part of the second week he was seen standing at the corners of the streets, smoking and talking with some of his shipmates. The day on which they received their wages, sailor like, they all assembled in a rumshop, to take a parting glass. That glass was fatal to William. Each treated in his turn, and ere they separated, they were nearly all intoxicated. William was one of those proud spirits who at times are possessed of considerable firmness, and believe that they can abstain from the use of liquor by the free action of their own will, rather than be tied down to a pledge. The first debauch had diseased his appetite, his self possession had left him, and more rum was required to quench his burning thirst. Need I tell you that before Saturday he was a confirmed drunkard reeling about the streets, and wallowing in the gutter. At last nature gave way, and he was carried to his mother's dwelling, drunk and insensible—that dwelling which but a fortnight before his presence had rendered the scene of so much happiness. I called to see him, and there he lay, extended on a matrass, his once glossy locks clotted with mud, and his manly face smeared with sun dried gore. And there, too, by his pillow, sat his disconsolate mother, bathing his fevered temple with vinegar, and weeping as if her heart would break. I endeavored to sooth her, but she was like Rachel, weeping for her children, refusing to be comforted. When he heard my voice, he raised his head, and in a rough savage voice, demanded of his mother, more rum. "Rum!" he exclaimed, "rum I want—curse you! give me some rum and stop your foolish prating." Here Mr. Taylor threw his arms upwards, and gazing in the same direction, as if his whole soul was in his eyes, raised his voice and continued—"curse his mother!—Holy God! shut the windows of Heaven down, and let not the sound go up—he curses his mother! Rum, brethren, rum did this for the noblest of God's creatures!"

Here Mr. T. paused, but such was the interest which the narrative excited, that several voices inquired, "what became of him? what did he do?"

"He did," resumed Mr. T., "what I want you all to do to night—when he recovered he signed the pledge, and now commands a vessel out of this port, and his mother is still with us singing glory to God."

He sat down, and when all was quiet, a gentlemanly man rose up, and after surveying the audience a moment and wiping the perspiration from his forehead, said, "I am the man!" and resumed his seat.—N. E. Wash.

FEMALE INFLUENCE.

"The influence of the female character is now felt and acknowledged in all the relations of life. I speak not of those distinguished women who instruct the age through the press; nor of those whose devout strains we take upon our lips when we worship; but of a much larger class, whose influence is felt in the relations of neighbor, friend, daughter, wife, mother.

Who waits at the couch of the sick to administer tender charities while life lingers, or to perform the last act of kindness when death comes? Where shall we look for those examples of friendship that most adorn our nature; those abiding friendships which trust even when betrayed, and survive all changes of fortune?

Where shall we find the brightest illustrations of filial piety? Have you ever seen a daughter, herself perhaps timid and helpless, watching the decline of an aged parent, and holding out with heroic fortitude to anticipate his wishes, to administer to his wants, and to sustain his tottering steps to the very borders of the grave?

But in no relation does woman exercise so deep an influence, both immediately and prospectively, as in that of mother. To her is committed the immortal treasure of the infant mind. Upon her devolves the care of the first stages of that course of discipline which is to form a being, perhaps the most frail and helpless in the world, the fearless ruler of animated creation, and the devout adorer of its great Creator.

Her smiles call into exercise the first affections that spring up in our hearts. She cherishes and expands the earliest germs of our intellect. She breathes over us her deepest devotions. She lifts our little hands, and teaches our little tongue to lisp in prayer.

She watches over us like a guardian angel, and protects us through all our helpless years, when we know not of her cares and anxieties on our account. She follows us into the world of men, and lives in us, and blesses us, when she lives not otherwise upon the earth.

What constitutes the centre of every home? Whither do our thoughts turn, when our feet are weary with wandering, and our hearts sicken with disappointments? Where shall the truant and forgetful husband go for sympathy unalloyed and without design, but to the bosom of her who is ever ready and waiting to share in his adversity or in his prosperity? And if there be a tribunal where the sins and follies of a froward child may hope for pardon and forgiveness on this side heaven, the tribunal is the heart of a fond and devoted mother.

Finally, her influence is felt deeply in religion. 'If Christianity should be compelled to flee from the mansions of the great, the academies of philosophers, the halls of legislators, or the throng of busy men, we should find her last and purest retreat with woman at the fireside; her last altar would be a female heart; her last audience would be the children gathered round the knees of the mother; her last sacrifice, the secret prayer escaping in silence from her lips, and heard perhaps only at the throne of God.'"

THE MOTHER'S LAST PRAYER.

It was a small room, scantily furnished, and presenting in its general aspect, the appearance of poverty and destitution, but to the eye of the Christian, that room was full of glory, for there on a pallet of straw, lay a dying believer, waiting for the summons which was to introduce her to a heavenly mansion and an unfading inheritance. She had been for some days "just on the verge of heaven," and now when the flame of life was quivering in its socket, it suddenly blazed out with a brilliancy which startled the kind friends who were lingering about her bed in momentary expectation of her departure. Her sunken eye beamed again with intelligence and love; her voice so long almost inarticulate was strong and clear, and raising herself on her elbow, she said to one standing by, "bring me my children, that I may give them my last blessing." They were brought accordingly, and with the happy unconsciousness of childhood those four little ones looked on their dying mother and then on the weeping friends around her, as if to ask the meaning of so strange a scene. "My son," she said to the eldest, a boy of seven years, "you are still young, but you are old enough to remember your mother, and to remember your God. Will you not be a good boy, and be kind to your sisters and little brother, and love Jesus, so that when you die, you may come to heaven, where your mother is going, and dwell with her forever?" The sobbing child promised all she desired, and then overcome by his emotions sank upon his knees, and buried his face in the bed clothes. Tenderly and solemnly the dying mother blessed each child, and pressing the youngest to her bosom, for a moment the tide of maternal feeling threatened to overwhelm her, but it was only for a moment. "Take him away," she said, "he is no longer mine. I have given them all to my blessed Savior, and I know he who has taken care of their poor mother so kindly and so constantly, will not forsake the helpless children. 'Leave thy fatherless children with me,' he has said, and from my very heart I do it, trusting his precious promise, 'I will preserve them alive.' One thing only," she added. "I have to ask with my dying breath, of him to whom I am so soon going." With a fervor of spirit, that exhausted all her remaining strength, she then prayed, that these dear children might not be permitted to have their lot with the children of this world, but whatever of poverty or suffering might be theirs, that they might be kept under religious influence and surrounded by those who loved the Lord. She entreated him to raise up for them in this land of strangers, friends who should lead them to Jesus, and with unshaken faith, laid hold of the covenant of grace in their behalf. Never will those who witnessed that scene, forget the dying prayer of this childlike believer. While the last words were yet on her lips, her voice died away, her clasped hands fell upon her breast, and ere the spectators were aware, her freed spirit was with him whose dear name was the last sound uttered on earth.

To the eye of sense, the situation of the helpless orphans thus bereaved, was melancholy indeed. Their departed mother had married in early youth, without the consent of her parents, and in consequence, was an exile from the paternal roof, and an alien from the friends of her childhood. The man for whom she had cheerfully given up all, proved a villain of the blackest dye. He took her from the place of her birth, (Nova Scotia,) and established himself in business in this city, where, for a time, he supported her in comfort. But his habits of profligacy and dishonesty soon became known, his business declined, his credit was gone; and with his dependent family, he went down in the scale of respectability, until the heart-broken wife gladly hid herself and her sorrows in a miserable cellar. By incessant and laborious toil, she barely succeeded in providing food for her children. when her cup of misery was filled to overflowing by the desertion of her brutal husband, from whom, during the last two years of her life, she had never heard a word. Thus forsaken, desolate, and destitute, she remembered the God of her fathers, and was enabled to seek him with her whole heart. At the foot of the cross, she found peace and consolation, which the world can neither give nor take away. But though the sorrows of the mind were thus healed by divine grace, the frail body was fast sinking beneath a load of care and fatigue to which she had never been accustomed. She was found by some benevolent visitors on a sick bed, surrounded with four helpless children, crying for bread, and on the verge of starvation. From that time, all that could be done to alleviate her sufferings and smooth her passage to the grave was done by the kind friends; thus raised up in her extremity, by her Heavenly Father's care. With unwavering faith, she committed her babes to him who watcheth the falling sparrow, and died with the calmness of assured hope and confidence.

The same benevolence which had smoothed the pillow of the dying mother, continued to watch over the interests of her orphan children. They were placed in an institution where the religious influence for which the mother prayed, was constantly around them, and where they experienced a care and tenderness truly maternal. They were uncommonly interesting intelligent children, and engaged the affections of all around them in an unusual degree.

Some five or six years after the death of the mother, the friends of the children were surprised by a visit from their maternal uncle, who had come from Nova Scotia, for the orphans, to take them back with him, to the grandfather whose face they had never seen. It seems they had but recently learned the death of the daughter and sister, and the consequent destitution of her children. All a father's feeling was in the breast of the aged man, as he heard the sad story, and his determination was at once formed, to take the desolate orphans of his lost Mary to his heart and home. The parting between the children and their kind protectors was an affecting one, and some who were unused to the melting mood, wept, as they saw the artless gratitude evinced by the former, towards those who had so long and tenderly protected them.

A letter received from the uncle, soon after their arrival, informed the friends they had left, of the health and happiness of the children, and of the joy diffused through a large circle of relatives by such an accession to their domestic treasures.

"I have been young and now am old, yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread."

[Adv. Moral Ref.

SPEECH OF MR. VAN VALKENBURG,

Of Steuben, in Committee of the Whole, (Mr. D. Lee in the chair,) on Thursday, on the bill to punish seduction and adultery as crimes.

[Reported for the Daily Albany Argus.]

Mr. Fenn had moved an amendment to the bill—to which Mr. Huntington objected as changing the whole structure of it—when

Mr. Van Valkenburgh took the floor, expressing the hope that gentlemen would reflect well before they made any interpolation in the bill.

As a member of the committee (said Mr. V.) which reported this bill under consideration, I desire to say a few words in its defence, and urge some reasons why it should pass. I am impelled to this course by a sense of duty to the public, and to the constituency I represent. I stand upon this floor, sir, the advocate of the fair daughters of Steuben and Yates—females who will lose nothing in comparison with the ladies of any other county in the State, or with those of any other State in the Union. And although they may not vie with some others in all those ornamental accomplishments which indeed add to the fascinations of the sex, they are well versed in those more solid mental endowments which commend them to the discerning and the good; and they are familiar too with those domestic accomplishments which render them so peculiarly a help-meet for man, and invest home, sweet home, with its greatest charms, rendering the domestic circle an Oasis, the greenest, fairest spot on earth's dear pilgrimage. The wise man has well described them in his category of the prudent wife:

"The heart of her husband doth safely trust in her, so that he hath no need of spoil; she will do him good and not evil all the days of her life. She seeketh wool and flax, and worketh willingly with her hands; she riseth also while it is yet night, and giveth meat to her household and a portion to her maidens. She layeth her hands to the spindle, and her hands hold the distaff. Strength and honor are her dwelling, and she shall rejoice in time to come. She stretcheth out her hands to the poor, yea, she reacheth forth her hands to the needy. She openeth her mouth with wisdom, and in her tongue is the law of kindness. She looketh well to the ways of her household, and eateth not the bread of idleness. Her children rise up and call her blessed; her husband also, and he praiseth her."

And truly, sir, there is no member of this committee who does not most heartily respond to the sentiment of the immortal bard, and exclaim,

"The world was sad, the garden was a wild,
And man the hermit sighed till woman smiled."

It were indeed a gloomy world. I do not envy the man who does not appreciate the sweet smile of lovely woman; who is unwilling to award her the important station God in his providence designed her to occupy in the intelligent universe—his companion, his counsellor, his bosom friend, his coequal, to aid him in his multifarious duties, to smooth the asperities of his sterner nature, to sympathise with him in the joys and sorrows which are sweetly mingled, like light and shadow, along the journey of life.

"Celestial happiness, whene'er she stoops
To visit earth, one shrine the goddess finds,
And only one, to make her sweet amends
For absent heaven—the bosom of a friend,
Where heart meets heart reciprocally soft,
Each others pillow to repose divine."

But, sir, I am not only the advocate of the females of Steuben and Yates. I stand here the advocate of the rights of woman, of abused, neglected woman, the advocate of all the thousands of my country-women who appear before us in the attitude of supplication, asking at our hands that meed of justice which has been so long and so cruelly denied them. Yes, sir, I am happy to identify myself with those friends of humanity who are willing to stand up in defence of this bill, and take my full share of all the obloquy and scorn the unprincipled libertine or a heartless world may pour upon us. The consciousness of having discharged our duty, used our humble efforts in defence of virtue and of justice, will cheer us on our pilgrimage, and support us under our trials. I have no fellow-feelings with the man, sir, who has experienced the ills of this life, who has borne any of the buffetings of fortune, and enjoyed those tender offices of affection, which can be dictated alone by the heart, and administered by the soft hand of female kindness, soothing the brow of care, and quelling the throbbings of an aching heart, and can still turn away from the prayer of this multitude with indifference. Did I say, sir, I have no fellow feeling with him!—Nay, sir, I loathe, I pity that man—he may have the form of a man, he may but he has none of the tender sympathies of our nature which entitle him to the name of man.—He may breathe, but does not live.

"Wear the human face divine,"

This voice of supplication first came up to the ear of the legislature with trembling modesty, a feeble voice, but it has through a succession of years been increasing in strength and confidence, until it falls upon our ears in thunder tones. And shall we fathers, and brothers and sons, shall we turn a deaf ear to the oft repeated prayers of those upon whom we acknowledge our happiness so much depends? Shall we turn away from their prayer with scorn or treat them with neglect? "Tell it not in Gath; publish it not in the streets of Askelon." Does any one on this floor hold that the evil is imaginary, the figment of a disordered brain; that the sad consequences of this vice are too highly wrought in the report submitted to this house by our venerable Chairman? Accompany me, for a moment, Mr. Speaker, to yon mansion, the abode of virtue and peace and happiness. Enter with me the family circle, and mark the affectionate daughter anticipating the wishes of her aged father, and smoothing his brow of care—see her sharing the labors and the toils of her kind mother—sympathizing in the joys and sorrows of a beloved brother—and tell me, Mr. Speaker—tell me, members of this committee, "is not domestic happiness all of Paradise that survives the fall." The glow of health is in her eye, and the rose-bud opening on her cheek; all. all participate in those joys which so tenderly bind together the domestic circle and render life desirable. Years have rolled on their rapid course and carried us on its resistless current and nearer and still nearer the verge of time.—Accompany me yet again to that hospitable mansion which once led us on in our contemplations to the consumation of all our sublunary hopes, to that day when all the virtuous and the good shall be congregated in one great family, bound together by indissoluble ties, where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest. And oh! how changed the scene—

"'Twould make e'en angels weep,
Could tears be shed in heaven."

Why the contracted brow and stern look of the venerable father? Why the bowed form and faltering steps of the kind mother? And why—ah! why the frantic gaze and convulsive sob of the maiden, once the ministering angel in this family circle. Oh! the destroyer has been there. Her eye is dimmed—she looks abroad with unmeaning gaze upon surrounding Nature—the rosebud has faded from her cheek—her joys are blasted and her hopes are riven and the future presents one unbroken scene of wretchedness and woe, for

"When lovely woman stoops to folly,"

she falls like Lucifer. Such is the iron edict of society:

"One false step forever blasts her fame."
"Man tarnishes his name, and brightens it again."

The seducer is received and caressed in society, while the poor victim of his lust is cast forth upon the sympathies of a heartless world.

Mr. Chairman: I love to recur to the days of other years—to the scenes of my youth—the days of my childhood—for they were days of innocence and of peace. I love to call up the reminiscences of the past—to meditate upon the incidents and the tales then impressed upon my memory. They often recur in all their freshness, and remind me that they are past, never to return.—Among the tales then impressed upon my recollection, one now occurs to me which used to start the big tears in my youthful eye, and caused my heart to beat more rapidly. It was the tale of the poor blind beggar, which is familiar to us all. The accumulated ills of life had gathered round and burst upon his head. Like the stern rock, he stood up amid them all with manly firmness, submissive to the will of Him who guides the destinies of nations and of men. But the acme of his misery was not yet reached. There was one sorrow that unmanned him quite, and sent him a wandering beggar through the earth. He had a daughter—a lovely daughter—who had shared with him his sorrows and his joys; the idol of his heart—the solace of his declining years. She had ministered to his necessities, and cheered him in the dark hour of adversity. But let me quote his language:

"A daughter, once the comfort of my years,
Lured by a villain from her native home,
Is cast abandoned on the world's wide stage,
And doomed in scanty poverty to roam."

And now his cup of affliction runs over, and he says, like one of old, "there is no sorrow like unto my sorrow." And what now has the poor blind man to bind him to earth? The last ligature is severed. Why does he desire to live? He has no desire. He begs his scanty morsel from door to door, wondering at the mysterious ways of Providence; anxiously waiting 'till his change come.

And now, I ask you, Mr. Chairman—I ask members of this committee—what penalty is too great—what punishment too severe—for the wretch who, under the garb of friendship and of love, gains the confidence of an artless affectionate female, but to betray and ruin? What punishment adequate to the crime? What punishment would you mete out to the villain who should pollute your connubial bed, and plant the rankling thorn in your pillow? or what penalty would you award to the miscreant who should seduce your daughter from the path of virtue, and abandon her to wretchedness and ruin. What penalty would be adequate to the crimes of such a monster? Who would not rather consign his daughter to the narrow house, and bury her and his affections in the silent tomb?

But there is another branch of this subject which presses itself upon our consideration, and demands our attention. This bill provides for the suppression of houses of ill fame, and for the punishment of all who pander to this lust. And who will oppose these provisions? Who will raise his voice and record his name against them? I ask, Who? Who upon this committee will stand forth the champion of those degraded females, and protect them in their abandoned course? My friend has well said in his report—

"Heaven hath no plague like love to hatred turned,
And hell no fury like a woman scorned."

The observation, the experience of the world, endorses this sentiment; nor is it strange, in the language of this report, if, like a fallen angel, she seeks the ruin of all our sex. Is there not lamentable evidence? Once lost to virtue, ruined and degraded herself, her wiles and flatteries and blandishments are but calculated to decoy her victim to his ruin. Once respectable and respected, now ruined and degraded, she desires to reduce all to her level.

"Of comely form she was, and fair of face,
And underneath her eyelids, sat a kind
Of witching sorcery, that nearer drew
Whoever with unguarded look beheld.
Her song enchanting,
And her words, which sweetly dropp'd
Like honey from the comb, most large of promise,
Still prophesying days of new delight,
And rapturous nights of undecaying joy.
Many her haunts; thou mightst have seen her now,
With indolence lolling on the mid-day couch,
And whispering drowsy words; and now at dawn,
Loudly and rough joining the sylvan horn,
Or sauntering in the park, and to the tale
Of slander giving vent,
The fool pursued enamored, and the wise,
Experienced man, who reasoned much and thought
Was sometimes seen laying his wisdom down,
And vieing with the simple in her wake.
But chief she loved the scenes of deep debauch,
Where revelry, and dance and frantic song,
Disturbed the sleep of honest men, and where
The drunkard sat, she entered in well pleased.
With eyes brim-full of wanton mirthfulness,
And urged him still to fill another cup;
And at the shadowy twilight, in the dark
And gloomy night, I looked and saw her come
Abroad, arrayed in harlot's soft attire,
And walk about in every street, and lie
In wait at every corner, full of guile;
And as the unwary youth, of simple heart,
And void of understanding passed, she caught
And kissed him, and with lips lying said,
'I have peace offerings with me—I have paid
My vows this day, and therefore came I forth
To meet thee, diligently to seek thy face,
And I have found thee here.
My bed is deck'd with robes of tapestry,
With carved work and sheets of linen fine,
Perfumed with aloes, myrrh, and cinnamon.
Sweet are stolen waters; pleasant is the bread
In secret eaten; the good man is not at home;
Come, let us take our fill of love 'till morn
Awake; let us delight ourselves with love.'
With much fair speech she caused the youth to yield,
And forced him with the flattering of her tongue.
I looked and saw him follow to her house
As goes the ox to the slaughter—as the fool
To the correction of the stocks—or bird
That hastes into the subtle fowler's snare,
And knows not—simple thing—'tis for its life.
I saw him enter in, and heard the door
Behind them shut, and in the dark, still night,
When God's unsleeping eye alone can see,
He went to her adulterous bed. At morn
I looked. and saw him not among the youths.
I heard his father mourn, his mother weep;
For none did e'er return that with her went;
The dead are in her house—her guests in depths of hell;
She wove the winding-sheet of souls, and laid
Them in the urn of everlasting death.
Nor wonder thou, for she was really fair,
Decked to the very taste of flesh and blood,
And many thought her sound within, and gay
And healthy at the heart: but thought amiss,
For she was full of all disease; her bones
Were rotten; Consumption licked her blood,
And drank her marrow up; her breath smell'd mortally,
And in her bowels, plague and fever lurked,
And in her very heart, and reins and life.
Corruption's worm gnawed greedily within."

It is the testimony of the Holy Writ: "She hath cast down many wounded; yea, many strong men have been slain by her." The Omniscient mind alone can know how many of her guests are in the depth of hell, who but for her wiles and flattery, had now been singing songs of redeeming love. Once the hapless victim of her seductions, and he hastens on, with accelerated speed, the road to ruin and to death.

How many innocent and artless young men has she caused to yield? How many has she forced with the flattery of her lips, until their characters have been blasted and their ruin consummated? How many have declined to her way, until they have found that her house was indeed the way to hell—going down to the chambers of death? Well did the bard remark, for the bard had experience, 'it hardens all within, it petrifies the feeling.' There is perhaps in the whole catalogue of human crime no vice that so effectually uproots all the tender sympathies of our nature, so completely obliterates the moral man as this vice. And shall we not throw around society, so far as we may, the Ægis of our protection, and close up these dens of lust and infamy? Shall we allow these breathing holes of hell to vomit forth their corruption through the length and breadth of our land, without using our efforts to stay the pestilence and redeem society from its scorching, blighting influence?

I appeal to you, fathers and brothers and sons, by your regard for the domestic circle—as you value the peace and welfare of society,—I adjure you by all that is fair and lovely and of good report, turn not your backs upon us; let it not be said we lack moral courage in the legislature of the Empire State to face the contumely of a licentious world and throw the shield of our law around the dearest interests of society.

I beg you—you who have enjoyed the social comforts of domestic life—you who pride yourselves upon those who are to bear your names to future generations—you who have experienced the kind offices of tender and affectionate females—I pray you let my friend from Putnam enjoy undisputed and alone all the honors of the "glorious minority." Contend not for his laurels, but act fearlessly and faithfully in this matter. Think not that by rejecting this bill you make a final disposition of the subject. This multitude of petitioners will continue to increase; their prayer will be repeated, reiterated, until you grant their request:

"Truth crushed to earth will rise again."

Public sentiment demands that something should be done—should be done speedily—that it should be done now. Let me once more exhort you my friends, by the patriotism which swells in your bosoms—by your love of country and its institutions—by your devotion to humanity and its interests—as you cherish home and all its endearments, as you hope upon your return to your peaceful domicils to meet the approving smile of the wife of your bosom and the daughter of your affection. let me beseech you to act considerately, to act wisely, and generations yet unborn will rise up and call you blessed.

An excellent rule for living happy in society is never to concern one's self with the affairs of others, unless they desire it. Under the pretence of being useful, people often show more curiosity than kindness.

LEAVES FROM A TAVELER'S NOTE-BOOK—NO. 15.

VISIT TO LITTLE WILD STREET MEETING.

It was to the Baptist Church in Little Wild Street, Lincoln's-Inn Fields, that Dr. Joseph Stennett, "a Sabbatarian Baptist," ministered from 1737 until his death in 1758. Here it was that Dr. Samuel Stennett preached from 1747 until he died in 1795. Here it was, also, that John Howard, the Philanthropist, who was an intimate friend of Dr. Samuel Stennett, was accustomed to attend worship when in London. These facts, with many others very like them, had given to Little Wild Street Meeting an uncommon interest and attraction. When, therefore, I was invited to attend a "tea-meeting" in the old meeting-house, the invitation was most cheerfully accepted. It is quite common, in English churches, to have a meeting of this kind annually or oftener, at which refreshments are served in the place of worship, and an opportunity afforded for cheerful and fraternal intercourse. In the present case, the meeting was called for the double purpose of encouraging such social intercourse, and celebrating the anniversary of a benevolent organization of the church, called "The Sick-Man's-Friend Society." It is hardly possible to conceive of a more cheerful scene than that house presented during the hour appropriated to refreshment and conversation. Here and there were little companies engaged in discussing subjects of interest to the society, the church, or themselves, and all contributing to the general enjoyment. At length the time came for the business part of the meeting. A statement was first read of the labors of the Society, its condition, and prospects. This was followed by a series of resolutions relating to the object for which the Society was organized, and upon which short and familiar addresses were made by some half a dozen persons present. The whole was concluded by giving an opportunity for those who were disposed to do so, to contribute of their liberality for the encouragement of the Society. After the interesting services of the evening were concluded, we were treated to a view of all the places and things connected with the house which are associated with the history and character of the Stennetts—men who exerted a commanding influence in their day, contributed very greatly to give standing to this church, and whose memory is now cherished with deep affection and veneration. The place and the occasion combined to make that visit one long and pleasantly to be remembered.

THE PRESS IN LONDON.

Within twenty years past, literature has probably made greater progress in London, if not among the body of the people all over England, than it has during twice that time in any previous period. Men of all religious and political opinions have combined to encourage institutions for the diffusion of useful information in a cheap form; and their efforts have created a gratifying interest in the acquirement of knowledge among the mechanical and laboring classes. Literary institutions have been established in every part of the Metropolis; and there is scarcely a town throughout the country which has not its library or reading-room, where the perusal of a variety of publications may be secured for a trifling expense. General literature is greatly indebted to the periodical press for the facilities afforded by reviews, magazines, and journals, which have increased as rapidly as the mechanical expense of them has diminished. London is the centre from which these publications issue. It is questionable, whether there is any place on earth where so much importance is attached to the periodical press, especially in the department of commerce. The first talent of the conutry is engaged for its support, and it receives the contributions of the leading men of all parties. There are not, however, so many papers in proportion to the number of readers as there are in the cities of this country. This may be accounted for, perhaps, by the greater expense of printing them, and the greater amount of talent and labor devoted to each. The expense (to readers) of the daily and weekly papers, varies from four to twenty cents per number. They may be found at the reading-rooms, and at the principal hotels and coffee-houses. In addition to this, there is in nearly every neighborhood a news-vender, who will lend papers to be read and returned at the rate of from one to four cents per hour, according to the length of time which has elapsed since their publication.

The expense of issuing a daily paper in London is enormous. In some cases, the mere salaries of the editor, sub-editors, translators, reporters, correspondents, clerks, and workmen, will amount to two thousand dollars a week. Add to this the other expenses for paper, stamp duty, etc., and the sum would be very greatly increased. The number of copies circulated must of course be large in order to meet this outlay, and yield the princely income which is derived from some establishments. It is only a few years ago, that the circulation of the fifteen Sunday papers was estimated at 110,000. Yet on any extraordinary occasion, this aggregate is much greater. On the death of George the Fourth, for instance, which occurred on Saturday, a single Sunday paper made oath to the sale of 110,000 copies of the one number of the following day. All papers, if stamped, are sent post free to any part of the kingdom.

A visit to the printing room of the London Times is a rich treat. The neatness, regularity, and magical speed, with which large piles of white sheets are transformed into well-printed papers, surprises one who has been accustomed to see printing done in the ordinary manner.

BAZAARS.

There are several meritorious establishments in London, designed to afford persons of taste and limited means, particularly single females, an opportunity to trade upon a small capital. One called the Soho Square Bazaar, was planned by Mr. Trotter, and consists of an extensive ground floor and upper rooms, neatly arranged, and provided with mahogany counters. One yard of a counter is considered a shop, for which a small rent is charged. Here may be found nearly every article pertaining to dress or ornament, toys, jewelry, perfumery, cutlery, literature, and the arts. The establishment is open six or seven hours a day, during which time 400 persons are engaged in serving two or three times that number of visitors. Of a pleasant afternoon the place is literally crowded, and a hundred carriages are often in attendance. A view of the busy scene from the upper part of the building will richly repay a visit. There are several other establishments, similar to this in design and construction, which cannot fail to be admired, and deserve to be commended.

For the Sabbath Recorder.

TIME OF COMMENCING THE SABBATH.

Mr. Editor,—The "Thoughts" of your correspondent S. D. respecting the Sabbath time required in the fourth commandment, answer to my views of the matter very well. Yet it appears to me, that he has not thought of all that belongs to that subject. In my judgment, he has overlooked one or two very important points; and as I presume he will not be displeased at their being pointed out, you will do me a favor by inserting this communication.

In the "Thoughts" of S. D., no allusion is made to the giving of the Manna; yet that daily and weekly miracle was perpetuated forty years, to fix and define the Sabbath time, and to try the Israelites, whether they would keep it according to God's law or not. In Ex. 16: 4, 5, it is written, "Then said the Lord unto Moses, behold, I will rain bread from heaven for you; and the people shall go out and gather a certain rate every day, that I may prove them, whether they will walk in MY LAW or no. And it shall come to pass, that on the sixth day they shall prepare that which they bring in; and it shall be twice as much as they gather daily." . . . . . Verse 26—"Six days ye shall gather it; but on the seventh day, which is the Sabbath, on it there shall be none. See, for that the Lord hath given you the Sabbath, therefore he giveth you on the sixth day the bread of two days." By reading verses 14, 15, and 21, it may be seen, that the manna fell with the dew, during the night, and that the people had to gather it in the morning, before the heat of the day, for when the sun waxed hot it melted. Notwithstanding this express declaration of Jehovah, that it was to prove them whether they would keep his LAW or no, and that on the sixth day there should be twice as much gathered as on any other day, "there went out some of the people on the seventh day for to gather, and they found none." But on the first day, in the morning, they found it; for six days they gathered it. On the seventh night, then, the night between the sixth and the seventh days, no manna fell; but on the night following the Sabbath, before the first day morning, the manna did fall. Now since God said, that this was to prove them whether they would keep the Sabbath law, and was perpetuated for forty years, I think an honest man must confess, that the night between the sixth and seventh days was the night which Jehovah honored and annexed to the Sabbath day.

Further, by the same facts it is apparent, that the law of the weekly Sabbath was first in the order of time. When, therefore, the Lord said of the day of Atonement, "It shall be a Sabbath of rest unto you," (Lev. 16: 31;) and when in other places the festivals are called Sabbaths, it is because they were to be kept according to the law that regulated the weekly Sabbath, so far as rest thereon was concerned. In reference thereto, it is positively enjoined, that they should be kept "from even to even." Lev. 23: 32.

S. D. has intimated, that some objectors to the observance of the night following the sixth day suppose that when Nehemiah closed the gates of Jerusalem as it began to be dark before the Sabbath, and thus kept out the Tyrian traders, this was not because the law required that night to be kept, but as a prudential matter; to prevent their selling to the Jews on the next day. In addition to what S. D. has said on this matter, the fallacy of this objection will appear, if we read the commencement of the complaint against this Sabbath-breaking, (Neh. 13: 16,)—"There dwelt men of Tyre also therein; (i. e. in Jerusalem,) who brought, . . . on the Sabbath." This shows plainly, that it was because they violated the law by bringing in on the Sabbath time—as plainly as that they violated the law by selling on Sabbath time. P.

THE SONS OF THE OCEAN.

[The following article, which we take from a copy of the Ch. Reflector, handed us by Mr. Gonsalves, will be read with pleasure by every friend of the sailor. No class of men need or deserve Christian sympathy and effort more than seamen. Thanks that there are those who think of them, and whose efforts on their behalf are abundantly blessed. May their number be increased. Of course we believe that the blessing here connected with the keeping of the "Lord's Day," would have been equally great—perhaps greater—if they had kept the Sabbath with which God has seen fit to join the most precious promises.]

New Bedford, March 8th, 1845.

Messrs. Editors,—The friends of Zion cannot but rejoice to hear that the Spirit of God, in answer to many prayers, is moving upon the hearts of the sons of the ocean. Many of our seafaring brethren have been converted in the South Seas. Nearly all, on board of several ships, have found the Saviour precious. Prayers go up from the cabin and forecastle, night and morn. The Holy Scriptures are expounded. 'Testimony meetings' are held, from time to time, for the encouragement of young converts. The Sabbath is kept holy. One of our Portuguese countrymen, who has been converted, said that he thought the captain and mates mad, when they declared their determination not to catch any more whales on the Lord's day. The majority of the officers and crew being on the Lord's side, the pious captain, at first, found it comparatively easy to obtain the consent of all his sailor family, to this regulation. But the trial of faith came afterwards. Says our Portuguese brother, 'The very first Lord's day after these good resolutions, we found ourselves surrounded by sperm whales, some of them the largest we had ever seen. These valuable monsters of the deep were playing about us, inviting us to come to them. The men were exhorted by our faithful captain to read their Bibles and tracts, and to keep their eyes from beholding vanity—pointing us to a heavenly inheritance, to treasures above, to mansions in glory, to the importance of obeying the sacred laws of the great Captain of our salvation. The truth of God came to us in power and demonstration of the Spirit. We wept, we rejoiced together, we felt calm and serene as heaven. But occasionally a gloom or temptation came over our minds. We remembered that we had taken very little sperm oil, and that these monsters within our reach were worth from two to four thousand dollars each; that we, at least some of us, had families to provide for, and that a storm might come up in the night, and take the bread from our children's mouths. And again the interesting question would come up, did not God send these providentially to-day, for our benefit? The good Spirit of our God was with us, and we were enabled by grace to keep our solemn pledge. No unnecessary work was done on the Lord's day after this; and in twenty two months we came home to the United States, with the grace of God in our hearts, and a full cargo of whale and sperm oil, and some thousand pounds of bone. Our wives wept and rejoiced; our children smiled; our friends were made glad, and the people of God praised the Lord for his goodness, and received us with open arms. All were glad, except rumsellers, gamblers, and land-sharks, the Devil's trio.'

We have excellent meetings at the Bethel. A few of my dear countrymen have been converted. Others are anxious about their souls. Six individuals rose for prayers last evening in our prayer-meeting. Brother Jackson's people, also, enjoy excellent meetings. He is a father to me, and very kind to the Portuguese in this place.

I have distributed many Portuguese Testaments and tracts, and visited from house to house, and with the exception of a few unfortunate, bigoted Roman Catholics, all have kindly treated me. Last Sabbath evening we enjoyed a blessed meeting with brother Jackson's people. Nearly forty of us Portuguese went arm in arm to attend the monthly missionary concert. It was the first they had ever attended, and nearly all contributed to the good cause, and were highly gratified. Brother Jackson addressed them very affectionately, welcoming them to the house of prayer, and to the household of faith, not as strangers and foreigners, but as at home in their Father's house. There were present converts of five different nations; one converted Jew, born in the royal city of Jerusalem; one Italian from Sicily; one lady from Switzerland; a few from the Pacific Isles, besides Portuguese; I addressed the latter in our own language. All glory to God!

Yours truly,
Manuel J. Gonsalves.

FOUR IMPOSSIBLE THINGS.

1. To escape trouble by running away from duty. Jonah once made the experiment; but he soon found himself where all his imitators will in the end find themselves. Therefore, manfully meet and overcome the difficulties and trials to which the post assigned to you by God's providence exposes you. Go at God's bidding, as did Moses, and do the work laid upon you. His grace will be sufficient for you as it was for him, and the end will be peace, honor, and eternal glory.

2. To become a Christian of strength and maturity without undergoing severe trials. What fire is to gold, that is affliction to the believer. It burns up the dross and makes the gold shine forth with unalloyed lustre. Therefore, do not shrink from the troubles which God lays upon you, but count it all joy to overcome them, "knowing this, that the trying of your faith worketh patience."

3. To form an independent character except when thrown upon your own resources.—The oak, in the middle of the forest, surrounded on every side by trees that shelter and shade it, runs up tall and sickly. Cut away its protectors, and the first blast will overturn it. But the same tree growing in the open field, where it is continually beat upon by the tempest, becomes its own protector. "As high and as wide as it sends its boughs aloft, so deep and so wide does it strike its roots below." So the man who is compelled to rely on his own resources forms an independence of character to which he could not have otherwise attained. Therefore, never purpose to be zealous and devoted Christians only when others are so, but let your faith and love and zeal shine clear and steady in the dark days of general declension.

4. To be a growing man, when you look to your post for influence, instead of bringing influence to your post. Therefore, prefer rather to climb up hill with difficulty, than to roll down hill with inglorious ease. [Ohio Observer.

SCENE IN A PASTOR'S STUDY.

I am thinking now of that gentle tap from a timid hand. It was just at this hushed twilight hour. And as I opened the door there stood a daughter, a dear young disciple of Jesus, holding her grey-haired father by the hand. Poor old man, for more than sixty years he had grievously sinned against his Maker, and feared no coming judgment. Scarcely once in all that time had his shadow darkened the house of God. But in his old age sovereign grace had found him out. An arrow from the quiver of God had pierced his heart. For weeks he hid the wound from his praying wife and children, and although he would toss night after night upon a bed that brought no sleep to his eyelids, and sit down and rise up again and again from his untouched food, the stubborn man would not confess, that the arrow of the Almighty it was, that was drinking up his spirit. Yet the grace of a Saviour was mightier than he. The quick eye of his daughter was upon him; her tears and her pleadings followed him. God gave to her pleading voice a power to open the long-pent heart. It was poured out in broken confessions of guilt and pleas for mercy. And then, with what sweet persuasion she drew him to the house of her pastor!

'It is my father,' said the affectionate girl, as she entered my study that evening; 'he's come to ask you if he can find a Saviour. Speak, father, do, and tell him all about it.' 'O, sir,' exclaimed the sobbing old man, 'I am the most miserable sinner—I am just ready to perish—I would give all the world for a Saviour—but I don't deserve one.' 'He is nigh,' I replied, 'unto all them that call upon him; he will hear their cry.' 'But I don't know how to go to him.' 'Go tell him just what you have told me. That you are a most miserable sinner, just ready to perish, and that you deserve to perish. Tell him that his atoning blood is all your hope and all your trust. Acknowledge that if ever you are saved, the glory of your salvation must be all his; but if you perish, the blame will be all your own.' 'But will he save me after I have lived so long in sin against him, and when I have nothing to give him but powers and faculties worn out in the service of the world?' 'Hear him saying, "Him that cometh unto me, I will in no wise cast out. Ask and it shall be given you; seek and you shall find." O, go to him. Cast yourself upon the love which brought him down to die for you, and though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow.' 'Do, do, father,' interrupted the daughter, grasping his hand, and turning to him an eye floating with tenderness.

The old man was overcome, his head sank upon his daughter's bosom, his grey hairs were on her cheek; he wept aloud—we all wept. 'Sir,' he cried, 'will you pray for me?' 'Yes, but it is you who are to repent; it is you who are to cast yourself upon sovereign mercy for help.' It was there, yonder, we knelt side by side, while I commended the trembling sinner to the mercy of him, 'who forgiveth sins only.' At my request he followed me in prayer. He was bowed to the very floor in the earnestness and lowliness of his plea—while his daughter bent over him, her hands folded and her fast trickling tears falling on him. For nearly ten minutes he breathed for mercy with an agony of supplication that I never heard surpassed; then, as if in despair of all further effort, exclaimed, 'there, I can do no more—if Jesus will save me, I will praise him for it forever; if he will not, I will never blame him. He must do as he pleases.' After a moment's pause he added—'He may do as he pleases.'

The struggle was over, the storm of feeling was hushed, and when the old man arose and took his seat again, the serenity of heaven was spreading itself over his countenance. 'I do not know what it means,' said he, 'my anxiety is gone, and I feel so peaceful.' The daughter looked up inquiringly, caught the smile of her father's face, and the next moment was in his bosom, sobbing as if her heart would break in the excess of her joy. Wonderfully did her sobs and broken thanks chime in the with the angel's song of gladness over the sinner that repenteth. The birth-place of that soul will never be forgotten.

Nor will she forget it, who from the triumphs of her dying hour, and when her eye was filled with visions of eternal bliss, turned back to speak of the time, when she knelt down weeping there and arose singing. ''Twas there I found hope in Christ, that is my anchor now. Tell my dear pastor that when I was dying I thanked him for leading me to the Saviour, and I will thank him again when I meet him in glory. Bid him be faithful, and there will be many more to welcome him there when his work is done.' She smiled farewell, stepped into the cold river, and was soon lost to sight among the glories which 'eye hath not seen, ear hath not heard, nor hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive.'

A Hint.—The Richmond Star says; "Folks who don't like the way papers are edited, ought to ask leave to put up a specimen of the right sort. Any editor will be glad to give such individuals a chance at any time. We would, just for the fun of seeing them cut up and slashed by the critics afterwards. Every man who thinks it easy to edit a paper exactly right, and to universal acceptance, ought to try it. May be he would succeed; and if so, would be better entitled to a reward than the discoverer of a perpetual motion."

INDIA.

"The natives of India are perfectly astonished when we offer them our scriptures; they are astonished that our writings are accessible to all classes of society, that we offer them 'without money and without price.' They are astonished that we press them upon the attention of the people, that we call the reasoning power of man to bear on them; and whilst reflecting on this, they not unfrequently come to the conclusion, that there is some presumption that these writings may have come from God. When they take them into their hands and read in their own tongue the wonderful works of God, they are surprised to find that our scriptures are so intelligible; they become interested in the narrative and in the devotional parts; they are interested even in the epistolary writings, addressed to Christians and Christian churches. Frequently have I heard the natives of India discourse on the excellency of these writings. And then again, they are greatly surprised that we should think of changing their religion through the influence of the scriptures. They take this to be a wonderful sign and token of our liberality; and they are accustomed to say, 'When the Mussulmans came into our country, and when the Portuguese came, they took the sledge-hammer into their hands and the axe, and destroyed and disfigured our gods; but the English bring nothing but the Bible and the school. There is surely something marvelous in all this.' I am able to say, from my own personal experience, that a great work is being carried on in India by means of the circulation of the scriptures. A light is spreading over its mountains, a light that will grow brighter and brighter unto the perfect day." [Rev. Dr. Wilson.

A BUILDING OF GOD.

The soul of man is a building of God; he hath laid out the treasures of his wisdom, power, and goodness in this noble structure; he built it for a habitation for himself to dwell in, and indeed such noble rooms as the understanding, will, and affections, are too good for any other to inhabit. But sin hath set open the gates of this hallowed temple, and let in the abomination which maketh man desolate. All the doors of the soul are barred and chained up against Christ, by ignorance and infidelity; he seeks admission into the soul which he made, but findeth none. A forcible entrance he will not make, but he expects, when the will shall bring him the keys of the soul, to enter as the rightful owner. [Flavel.

Genuineness of the Christian Scriptures.—A writer in the North American Review, evidently a man of extensive learning, in an article on the genuineness of ancient writings, says, "We should be unfaithful equally to our convictions, principles, and feelings, not distinctly to state that, in point of fact, the genuineness and integrity of the Christian Scriptures, estimated on the broad principles here laid down, is substantiated by evidence in a tenfold proportion more various, copious and conclusive, than that which can be advanced in support of any other ancient writings whatsoever. In simple justice, then, the genuineness of these records of our faith cannot so much as be questioned, until the whole body of classical literature has been proved to be spurious."

Home a Sacred Place.—O, how sacred a place is home, where every word is kindness, and every look affection! Where the ills and sorrows of life are borne by mutual effort, and its pleasures are equally divided, and where each esteems the other the more worthy. Where a holy emulation abounds to excel in offices of kindness and affectionate regard. Where the live-long day, the year, is a scene of cheerful and unwearied effort to swell the tide of domestic comfort, and overflow the heart with home-born enjoyments. That home may be the humblest hovel on earth; there heart meets heart, in all the fondness of a full affection. And wherever that spot is found, there is an exemplification of all that is lovely and of good report among men. It is a heaven begun below.

Natural Affection.—The world we live in is full of beautiful sights and sweet sounds; it is a treasure house of loveliness and melody. Whether the eye ranges over the face of nature at large, and marks all the varied, the magnificient, the sweet, the bright, the gentle—in wood, and mountain, and valley, and stream; or rests, wondering, on the bright, delicate fabric of a flower, the rich hues of a butterfly, or the lustrous plumage of the birds, beauty and brightness are everywhere. The air we breathe, too, is full of sweet sounds; whether in the singing of the birds, the murmuring music of the stream, or the hum of all the insect world upon the wing, every thing is replete with harmony. But of all the lovely sights, of all the touching sounds whereof nature is full, there is nothing so beautiful, there is nothing so sweet, as the sight and the words of natural affection. [G. P. R. James.

Liberality of Converted Pagans.—A recent letter from Mrs. Devan, written at Hong Kong, in China, contains the following paragraph:—

"Our monthly concert, in which we united with the missionaries of other societies, at the house of brother Dean, last Monday evening, was an excellent meeting, but what much surprised me was the appearance of the plate brought in, at the close of our meeting, from the lecture room, where the native brethren had been holding their services. The amount it contained was $6 60, which, I learn, is their regular contribution. Number of contributors, fifteen."

Charity.—'I fear,' said a country pastor to his flock, 'when I told you in my last sermon that philanthropy was the love of our species, you must have understood me to say specie, which may account for the smallness of your contributions. You will prove, I hope, in your contribution to-day, that you are no longer laboring under the same mistake.'

THE TRUE DESIGN OF MINISTERIAL EDUCATION.

Many persons are opposed to ministerial education from a misapprehension of its true design. They think, perhaps, that it is a certain process resorted to for the purpose of transforming men into ministers, without respect to a divine call, or the possession of a pious heart; that its design is to teach them to use beautiful and poetic language, or to amuse their hearers with polished essays and brilliant classical allusions; and that its effect is to fill their minds with pride, and make them look with contempt upon those who have not enjoyed their own literary advantages. Now if this were a true description of the design and effect of ministerial education, we should be most heartily opposed to it, and should regard the encouragement of it as a flagrant sin. But we do not believe that such is a true description of its design and effect, or that any person who has been truly called to the work of the ministry, and is fit for it, will ever furnish a model for such a conception.

The true design of ministerial education is, to prepare the student, in the first place, to understand the Word of God for himself; and, in the second place, to make known its truths to others. It is acknowledged by all Protestants, that the Bible is the standard of doctrine and practice, and that there is no church whose interpretations of it are to be received as infallible. Of course, then, it becomes the duty of the minister of the Gospel to qualify himself in the best possible manner to understand and interpret the Bible. He ought to possess the rarest intellectual and spiritual endowments, and to be able to use all those helps which can be obtained. Let us mention some of them which it is the design of ministerial education to improve or impart.

Ministerial education aims to improve the moral feelings and perceptions. It is not its business to impart piety, since that must come from a higher source, and is requisite to the commencement of preparation; but it may encourage, enlighten, and direct piety, and help to develop the whole man. It opens a wide and varied field of thought, by making one acquainted with the obligations which rest upon men in all the relations of life. It awakens a new interest in the study of the Bible, by making one familiar with the various circumstances in which its principles are applicable. In short, it strengthens and improves all the moral feelings and perceptions, by exhibiting the relations and responsibilities which constantly press upon men.

Another aim of ministerial education is to develop and strengthen the intellectual faculties. Such education involves the necessity of close and long-continued study upon a variety of subjects. It is not possible for any one to engage in such study, and persevere in it until it becomes a habit, without finding his intellectual power increased. This is true whatever be the subject of study, whether mathematics, metaphysics, or languages. The necessity of such disciplinary influence is allowed in every other department—why not in this? For the study of revelation, as well as for the study of nature, the mind must be prepared; and rich are the lessons which such study unfolds to a cultivated mind under the control of a pious heart.

Ministerial education also aims to qualify the student to interpret the Scriptures. It has pleased God to reveal his will to man in what have now become dead languages. The wisdom and goodness of this is seen in the fact, that such languages are less liable to fluctuations and changes than are the living languages. A precious trust is this committed to us in a permanent form and with a fixed value. Now it is a part of the appropriate work of God's chosen teachers, to see that the inspired Word is never perverted or misinterpreted, but that it speaks the same language to every tribe and nation upon the earth. This they can never do with entire success, without becoming familiar with the science of interpretation. Ministerial education is designed to make them adepts in this science, not for the purpose of displaying their skill or acquirements, but for the purpose of instructing and edifying both the learned and the ignorant. In whatever department of study the candidate for the ministry engages, he will learn something of the laws by which the human mind is governed, and of the symbols through which it transmits its conceptions. Of course he will thus become fitted to interpret and explain the record from which his instructions are to be derived, and according to which his influence is to be exerted.

But ministerial education does not end here. It aims to develop the whole man, and to make him capable of laboring usefully in every department of society. As a man, it aims to make him a model worthy of imitation. As a scholar, it aims to make him capable of commanding respect and wielding an influence. As a divine, it aims to qualify him to classify and arrange the doctrines of the Bible into a consistent scheme, so as to exhibit their harmony and relations, and produce their natural effects upon the hearts of men. If, in doing this, it drills him in the laws of language and the rules of rhetoric, it is not that he may amuse his hearers, but that he may effect their hearts by giving the greater weight to the doctrines of the Bible. If it makes him acquainted with a great variety of knowledge, it is not that he may preach something else than the simple Gospel, but that he may have the more abundant resources from which to illustrate and defend it. What reasonable or pious man can be opposed to a system of ministerial education which has such a design?

Sunday Travel in Scotland.—Sir Andrew Agnew is still engaged in his efforts to prevent railway travel on Sunday. But with how little success his efforts are attended, may be inferred from the fact, that at a meeting of the Glasgow and Edinburgh Railway he brought forward a motion against Sunday trains, which was lost by two thousand four hundred and sixty-four votes against one hundred and fifty-nine. The whole number of shares represented was five thousand nine hundred and seventy-four, of which two hundred and forty-nine were in favor of the measure, and five thousand seven hundred and thirty-five against it.

REFORM IN GERMANY.

The schism in the Roman Catholic Church of Germany, which we mentioned some weeks ago, seems to have taken a strong hold on the hearts of the people. John Ronge, the priest who published a letter denouncing the superstitions about the seamless coat, has been excommunicated from the Catholic Church, and burnt in effigy. This, however, has only served to increase the interest in his opinions, and the anxiety to give them a wide circulation. He has lately addressed a letter to the Catholics of Germany, in which Mother Church is pretty roughly handled. The dissenting Romanists have established a new ecclesiastical organization, to be called the German Catholic Church. The following is an extract from their confession of faith:—

> "1. We throw off allegiance to the Bishop of Rome and his whole establishment.
>
> 2. We maintain full liberty of conscience, and contemn every compulsion, falsehood, and hypocrisy.
>
> 3. The basis and the contents of the Christian belief are the Bible.
>
> 4. The free investigation and interpretation is not to be restrained by external authority.
>
> * * * * * *
>
> 10. We believe and confess that Christ is the only mediator between God and man; we reject, therefore, the invocation of saints, the adoration of relics and images, the remission of sins by the priest, and all pilgrimages."

WHO ARE THE REFORMERS?

In the time of Luther's Reformation, one Matheo Langie, a cardinal and a bishop, having, it was said, the greatest revenue of any in all Germany, ingenuously confessed that the Mass was not void of its faults, that the Court of Rome was corrupted, and that a general reformation of the lives of the priests and friars was necessary. But that a poor rascal monk—(for so he called Luther)—should begin all, that he deemed intolerable, and a thing not to be endured.

How often, in these times, are reformations discouraged by those of great power and influence in the world and in the church. Thus, perhaps, it has ever been. The refined and zealous Pharisees and Scribes of old deemed the public morals the object of their especial care. If reformation was needed, it was their prerogative to sound the first anathema against the proscribed sinners. It was their privilege to take the lead in all meritorious public acts, as well as to decide questions of law and duty. Men in authority and in exalted popular stations of either moral or intellectual influence, often esteem their popularity too highly, and are not apt to risk their reputation in an effort against the popular sentiment, though known to be erroneous. A fear of making matters worse may be the honest sensation of some; but being contented with their lot, and well provided for, the majority see their own advantage in maintaining among the people a respect for ancient usages or the traditions of the Fathers. They will not descend from their high seats to reform or exalt the characters of the people. Reformation! what is it to them but revolution?—a revolution quite as likely to level their influence and power, as it is to promote their ambitious designs.

From whence, then, are we to look for reformers of erroneous popular sentiment? Will it be said, from a popular ministry? The wise and prudent of our day are as careful as those of the past, to improve the appearance of things. All their religious duties must have the show of obedience; and whether precisely as required by the Lawgiver is not considered important, provided it appear something like it. Though God requires them to rest from labor on the seventh-day Sabbath, they consider any other day to be as good, if it only appears like the Sabbath, and the forms of worship be duly administered. That the substituted day may appear more sacred, its profanation must not be seen in the land. All appearance of labor must be restrained, that the stillness and decorum of public worship may not be marred! Have not these made void the law of God by their traditions? Do they not impose upon God by such a contradiction of his words? Will God hold them guiltless who employ his Sabbath in doing their labor—that time of which he has said, "In it thou shalt not do any work?" Yet who will consider this a subject for reformation? Ah! say the wise and prudent, this would be a revolution in the affairs of the world not to be encouraged. Yet those who have no regard for popularity may enter upon it. Having entered upon the task, however, these men immediately cry out, like the bishop of old, It is not to be endured that such illiterate men should begin all, though a reformation be ever so much needed; it is the prerogative of the learned—the bishops and doctors of the law—to expound the ways of God to man! Thus God's holy day is still profaned, and a day which he hath not blessed is called the Sabbath!

New Name for the United States.—At a recent meeting of the Historical Society, a report was read upon the expediency of uniting upon a specific geographical name for the United States. The name of "Allegania" was recommended as the best, considering that it is derived from the grandest and most natural feature common to the whole country; that it is associated with the most interesting portions of our history; and that adopting it would restore to the land one of the primordial titles of the aborigines. Resolutions were passed requesting the co-operation of other Historical Societies, and recommending the publishers of elementary works to designate the country hereafter as the "Republic of Allegania."

Baltimore Sabbath Association.—Hon. Daniel Webster was recently elected a member of the "Baltimore Sabbath Association." In reply to a letter informing him of his election, Mr. Webster expresses his conviction that the observance of the Sabbath is essential to the public worship of the Deity and the preaching of the Gospel. Hon. Henry Clay also has been made a life member of the same Association, by a contribution from two ladies in Baltimore. He likewise has written a letter, stating that although he does not know the ladies who have thus honored him, yet he shares "with them in sentiments of profound reverence for the Sabbath." Who can doubt that these testimonials are most expressive of the real sentiments of their writers, and that their publication will be immensely useful?

For the Recorder.

CONCERNING THE "REPLY TO AN INQUIRER."

Mr. Editor,—Passing by the first three paragraphs of Mr. Magruder's "Reply to an Inquirer," as relating to general principles about which I see no occasion now to dispute, permit me to express the substance of that part of Mr. M's communication which distinctly contains his 'Reply,' in as clear a manner as I can, together with the Scriptures presented in support thereof, and offer a few words thereupon.

Reply—The Gospel is the law that convinces a man of sin. The Gospel is one and the same thing as the law of the Spirit. Proof—1. The Holy Spirit "will reprove the world of sin," John 16: 7—12. 2d. Peter's discourse in the 2d chapter of the Acts. 3d. 1 Cor. 15: 1—9.

I understand the above to embrace the substance of Mr. M's reply, to which I wish to remark—

1st. As to the words "law of the Spirit" being used as meaning Gospel, and thus making law of the Gospel, I doubt the soundness of such a course. For, in the only instance which occurs to me where the expression, "law of the Spirit," is used in the Scripture, it is so used, and has such a contexture, as to show that it alludes to something attaching itself to, or existing in, Christ personally. "For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus," says the Apostle, "hath made me free from the law of sin and death." Romans 8: 2. I understand this passage to constitute a most sublime allusion to the power of the ministry and atonement of Christ in the abstract, or to what is meant by the Son's having "life in himself," and not to the Gospel as a revelation of that fact. Much less does the author by this declaration distinguish the Gospel as a law to convince of sin; for to whatever he does refer, it is something that has power to set free from the law [or power] of sin—not to convince of sin.

2d. Touching the reproofs of the Spirit, they are not the same as the convincings of the law. Reproof of sin supposes that the subject of the reproof is already convinced that he has sinned. Reproof is rather designed to excite a sense of guilt, than to prove the fact of sin. Reproof is a kind of amplification upon the offence and the law both at once, so that sin becomes exceeding sinful, while the law becomes exceeding holy. How does this reasoning apply to Peter's discourses? We find him pointing his audience to the notorious fact that they had murdered an innocent man, who was approved even of God among them. It was not requisite for him to repeat to them the law. They knew the law. They knew the sixth commandment said, "Thou shalt not kill." They knew they had broken that law. They knew they had sinned. They knew they were exposed to the penalty of the violated law. Then came the Gospel—the offer of pardon through Christ. Oh! what a matchless blending of Justice and Mercy, of Law and Gospel! So they embraced the Gospel, that they might be saved from the sin of which the law had convinced them that they were guilty.

3d. In what Mr. M. calls an "impressive definition of the Gospel," (1 Cor. 15: 1—9,) if any will take the pains to read it, they will find that the author contemplates his theme only as a means of salvation from sin—not as an instrument constructed to convince of sin. The existence of sin, is by the Apostle taken for granted, as though God had previously "concluded them all in unbelief, that he might have mercy upon all." Or, as he says in another place, "But the Scripture hath concluded all under sin, that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe." To make this yet more manifest, notice what the Apostles says at the third verse of the above quotation, viz. 1 Cor. 15: 1—9; "For I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures." Is not the fact of sin, and conviction of or for sin, here taken as already established, and that in view thereof the Scriptures had unfolded the death of Christ as the remedy for that evil? Is not this what is meant by such expresssions as "By the law is the knowledge of sin?" Can it be, when he says, "I had not known lust, except the law had said thou shalt not covet," that he means the "law of the Spirit," rather than the law of the Decalogue? But I forbear. May the Lord correct our faults. Lucius Crandall.

Mr. Torrey.—A Methodist clegyman has written to the editor of Zion's Herald an account of a recent visit to Mr. Torrey in the Maryland Penitentiary. He represents him as kindly treated, comfortable in bodily circumstances, and very happy in mind. His labor is light and easily got through by 3 o'clock P. M., after which he employs himself in reading the Bible. He told his visitor that he was about applying for books and writing materials, and expected to get them. His friends may visit him on making proper application; and to clergymen the doors are freely opened.

Return of Missionaries.—Rev. William Dean, Missionary of the American Baptist Board at Hong Kong, China, arrived at New York on the 28th ult., in the Swedish ship Zenobia, after a passage of ninety days. Rev. Mr. Abeel, missionary at Amoz, reached New York from China, on the 3d inst., in the ship Natchez, having come from Macao in seventy-eight days, being the shortest passage ever made between the two ports.

BAPTIST ANNIVERSARIES.

The Anniversaries of the different national societies connected with the Baptist Church, are to be held in the Roger Williams Meeting-House in Providence, R. I., during the last week of the present month. Monday evening, April 28, is appropriated to the American and Foreign Bible Society; Tuesday afternoon, to the American Baptist Home Mission Society; Wednesday, to the Baptist Board of Foreign Missions, and the American Baptist Publication Society.

These anniversaries are looked forward to with much interest and solicitude, on account of the recent disorganizing movements among some of the Southern Baptists. It is not impossible—nay, it is quite probable—that this will be the last meeting in which the northern and southern portions of that church will unite to promote the cause of Foreign Missions. Whether it proves to be the last or not, it is evident that the most important interests will hang upon its deliberations.

EDITORIAL TROUBLES.

Prof. Miles P. Jewett, who has edited the Alabama Baptist for two years past, lately resigned that post. His closing address to his readers indicates that he has had rather rich experience of the pleasures of editing. Read the following extract from it:—

> "It was with unfeigned reluctance that we originally assumed the responsibility devolving on the conductor of a public journal; and we can now truly assert, that had we foreseen the difficulties that beset the enterprize; had we imagined a tithe of the unceasing toil and sleepless anxiety; the innumerable petty annoyances; the tormenting, consuming cares; the crushing, murderous vexations, that encompass the path of the editor even of a religious paper; we should have effectually resisted the solicitations of friends, and left the undertaking to bolder hearts, and abler hands. But, utterly inexperienced, we could form no conception of the "pains and penalties" to which we were exposing ourselves, and too late we found that with an infant's strength we had pledged ourselves to more than the labors of a Hercules."

Here is another extract upon a kindred subject, which we take from the Philadelphia Christian Observer. The editor is urging pastors and others to help increase his subscription list, and to see that every family is supplied with a good religious paper. He discourseth as follows, wherein will be found facts, and the reason for them, deserving of attention:—

> "Since our connection with the press, we have witnessed the failure of four or five papers of a denominational character in New England, three in the state of New York, four or five in the Southern States, and as many more at the West, all from one and the same cause. They were all conducted by Presbyterians, or members of corresponding churches. The lack of co-operation in the churches to whose interests they were devoted, was the cause of the failure of the best of them, which were ably conducted, and entitled by their merits to a long and useful life."

An Englishman's Opinion of American Slavery.—In a recent discussion in the British House of Commons, respecting the new tariff project, Hon. Mr. Macauley spoke of Slavery in the United States in terms of the severest censure. The following extract will show the spirit of his remarks:—

> "He denounced the Republic of the United States as a society which is more accountable before God and man than any other, for the present misery of the African race. There exists, he said, in those States, a slave-trade more odious and more demoralizing than that which is carried on between the coast of Africa and Brazil. North Carolina and Virginia, he said, are to Louisiana and Alabama, what Congo is to Rio Janeiro. He then referred to the slave-breeding States, and gave statistical returns of the whole number of births and deaths annually, amongst the slaves. He next alluded to the traders in slaves, who buy gangs of from 300 to 400 in one State, and sell hem in another—driving them on like a herd of oxen to Smithfield market. In Louisiana, the labor of the sugar mill sends, in a short time, the stoutest African to his grave; but in Virginia, negroes are growing up to supply the horrid trade, which, he said, could be viewed in its most horrible and odious aspect in the United States. He felt that it was bad enough to take the "wretched barbarians" from Africa—but that civilized men, calling themselves Christians—freemen—should breed the slave—and, if he must speak out the horrible truth—even beget the slaves they breed—that such men should sell them and consign them to a life which is a lingering death—this, said Mr. Macaulay, is infinitely more painful to contemplate than the slave-trade of Africa!"

New York Legislature.—During the last week the Constitutional Amendments were several times under discussion in the Assembly. A bill was reported authorizing a Convention of the people in 1846 to revise the State Constitution. The bill to punish seduction and adultery as crimes passed the Assembly. Numerous petitions were presented in the Senate in favor of the excise bill, and against excepting N. Y. city from its provisions. One of these petitions was from the City Prison, and was signed by two persons under sentence of death—Babe the pirate and James Eager—both of whom attribute their crimes and present condition to intemperance. The excise bill was made the special order for Wednesday, April 9. A vote was passed appropriating the interest on the sum of $84,000 to the Normal School. Notice was given in the Assembly of a bill to prevent the running of cars on the railroads of the State on Sunday.

Death of a Musical Artist.—Mr. P. M. Coleman, the inventor of the improvement in the Piano Forte, who has lately received some $700,000 for his invention, died at his residence at Saratoga Springs, on the 5th instant. He had been ill but a few days of the mumps and measles together, and was not considered dangerous until a short time before his death.

Settling a Difficulty.—Gov. Seward was recently called to be the arbiter of serious personal difficulties between Rev. Mr. Evans and Dr. Baker of Owasco. He would only consent to do so on condition that they would lay themselves under heavy pecuniary bonds to abide his decision, which they did. At the time appointed, the parties appeared, with eminent lawyers on both sides, and some hundred witnesses. Each party stated his grievance, and then the testimony and pleas were expected. But all were disappointed when the Governor rose and remarked as follows:—

> "Gentlemen—In drawing the bonds by which the parties are bound, I confess I used some guile; by that bond they are bound not only to pay whatever amount of pecuniary damage I shall name, but they are to do, with respect to each other, whatever I shall require. Convinced that we are as well prepared to close the arbitration at this point, as we shall be if we pursue it farther, I here pronounce my decision; it is this: that the parties drop their contention now and forever, and in token thereof, that they rise before this assembly and shake hands."

The words were no sooner spoken than they were both upon their feet and grasped each other's hand like cordial friends. The Governor then appealed to the multitude of excited spectators, for the equity of his decision, when it was approved unanimously and with occlamation. [N. Ch. Adv.

SABBATH LIBRARY.

The New York City Sabbath Tract Society has commenced collecting a Sabbath Library, which it designs to enlarge until the collection shall include all the principal works upon the subject. For this purpose it asks, that those friends of the object who have in their possession rare or valuable books, will render what assistance they can, by the donation, sale, or loan of such books. In this way the works which are now scattered over the country so as to be of but little service, might be brought together and made accessible to any who may wish to study the subject thoroughly. The following list will show what works are already in the Library, and enable our friends to judge whether those which they possess would be desirable. It is designed to publish at some future time a more complete Catalogue, giving a description of each work.

General Intelligence.

DREADFUL CASUALTY—WRECK AND LOSS OF LIFE.

The citizens of New York were thrown into consternation on Tuesday morning, by the startling intelligence of the loss of the steamboat SWALLOW, and the lives of several passengers, which occurred on Monday evening about eight o'clock, near Athens and Hudson. The following description of it is given by Rev. Mr. Harrington of Albany, who was an eye-witness :—

"At about eight o'clock, when going at a rapid rate, the boat struck on a small rock island abreast the town of Athens and the city of Hudson. I was sitting in the upper saloon in conversation. At the first severe shock the passengers rushed below, but fears were calmed for a moment by the outcry that we had only come in contact with a raft. But our ears were speedily assailed by the appalling sound of the rending of the timbers, and the evident destruction of the boat; while the stern settled with frightful rapidity. Those who had "turned in," in the after cabin, had barely time to leap from their berths, before the water was upon them. You can imagine the horrors of the scene at this moment—when more than three hundred souls were thus exposed in the midst of falling snow and almost utter darkness. As the water reached the boiler fires a sheet of mingled steam, smoke and flame poured into the boat, illuminating the ghastly countenances with a sudden glare of vivid light, and completing the consternation. The conviction that the curse of fire was to be added to our other imminent perils, curbed the resolution of the stoutest hearts. But the rapid sinking of the boat extinguished the fires, and all was darkness again.

In less than five minutes, by the blessing of God, the stern rested on the bottom, the water being above the windows of the aft saloon state rooms. Several females were drawn out of the state rooms by dashing in the windows; two almost exhausted—one very aged, and now lying on board this boat in a precarious situation—were taken from the Ladies' Cabin by cutting through the floor. They had sustained themselves on settees, with only a few inches of breathing room for their faces. The boat had been forced high and dry upon the rock, and the bow, split open amidships, was left rising almost perpendicularly upward, covered with anxious beings clinging to the bulwarks. The remainder of the passengers were sadly grouped on the forward upper deck, many bewailing the absence of their dear companions, and actuated by the most dreadful apprehensions for their fate.

By this time the alarm had been thoroughly communicated to the shore on either side. The bells of the churches began to ring, and the river was soon covered with torches, waving in the fleet of boats that put off to our assistance; while the Rochester, which had found it difficult to get to us and the Express which had now come up, were gradually approaching along side. The sound of bells pealing on the air, the shouts of those in the boats, the light of the waving torches and the wailing grief of many on the wreck, constituted features of a most impressive scene.

It can scarcely be but that several are lost. Many leaped immediately overboard in that frenzy of mind which precluded the power of self-preservation in the water. The doors of the most of the State-rooms were so sprung at once, as to be immovable, and examination will probably discover the dead within some of them. I can scarcely hope otherwise. The boat is a complete wreck.

ADDITIONAL PARTICULARS.—By the passengers who reached New York on Wednesday morning we learn that up to 7 o'clock of Tuesday evening, seven bodies had been recovered, six being females. One was a Mrs. Colton of Troy, whose husband came down on hearing the news of the disaster, and was present when the body of his wife was discovered. Mr. Gilson, who was on board with his wife, and P. H. Firman, Esq., who was on board with his sister, having searched for them in vain yesterday, came down this morning in the hope that they had been taken up by some of the boats which came to their assistance. Many persons came down from Albany on Tuesday in search of their friends, and many went up from New York by the boats on Tuesday evening for the same purpose.

There were on board the Swallow about 300 souls. Ninety-four were rescued by the Rochester, and about forty by the Express. A number of others went back to Albany by the Robert L. Stevens and the Utica. It is impossible yet to determine the number of lives lost, but the general opinion is that it will not fall short of thirty—perhaps it may be as high as fifty.

The extremely thick fog is assigned as the cause of the accident—the pilot having been misled, and losing the right channel.

RHODE ISLAND ELECTION.—The Tribune gives the following statement of the result of the election in Rhode Island which took place last week :—

CHARLES JACKSON, Whig and Law and Order, but in favor of the unconditional liberation of Dorr, is chosen Governor by about 150 majority over James Fenner, the Democratic Law and Order incumbent, who is opposed to the liberation of Dorr.

Lieut. Gov. DIMAN, and all the rest of the regular Law and Order State ticket, are re-elected over the candidates supported by those in favor of liberating Dorr by about 400 majority.

Hon. HENRY Y. CRANSTON, Whig and Law and Order, has been re-elected to Congress from the Eastern District without opposition.

Ex-Gov. LEMUEL H. ARNOLD, independent Whig, has run out Hon. E. R. Potter, original Democrat and regular Law and Order candidate, by more than 300 majority.

The Legislature is strongly Law and Order and Whig. To the Senate 21 Law and Order, 10 Dorr ment are returned elected. To the House, 43 Law and Order, 24 Dorrites, are returned.

The election in Connecticut took place on Monday last, and is said to have resulted in a victory for the whig party.

The Charter election in New York City on Tuesday resulted in the choice of Havemeyer, the loco-foco candidate for Mayor, and most of that ticket throughout the wards.

LATE FROM TEXAS.—A New Orleans Correspondent of the New York Tribune, under date of March 28th, says :—

"The steamboat New-York is just in from Galveston, which port she left on Tuesday last. The intelligence that Annexation had been accomplished, so far as the action of the United States Senate was concerned, had been received in Texas, and so far as heard from was hailed with universal joy and enthusiasm. At Galveston public salutes were fired, and other demonstrations of delight indulged in. The newspapers assert that even were President Jones opposed to Annexation, so unanimous is public sentiment in favor of the measure, it is certain to be carried through by Texas under the House resolutions, without resort to negotiation. But they go farther, and assert that Dr. Jones is not opposed to it, but if not altogether indifferent, rather in favor of it. He has just nominated David S. Kaufman, Esq., as Charge to the United States, and Mr. Kaufman is an avowed and zealous friend of Annexation."

FROM MEXICO.—Vera Cruz papers have been received to Feb. 23, from which it appears that Santa Anna had received the charges against him, and would answer to them on the 24th. The papers contain a long list of murders and robberies committed by the Indians.

FROM THE SOCIETY ISLANDS.—We have a letter from our Boston correspondent, containing advices from Otaheite to the 23d of November. Five French vessels of war were at Otaheite, together with several guard vessels, and the strictest martial law prevailed. The natives generally remained in arms in the mountains. The French were erecting numerous fortifications. The dwelling houses of the natives and foreigners, without distinction, had been seized by the French, and appropriated as hospitals for the sick and wounded. It was reported that a battle had been fought, in which the French sustained a loss of 60 killed, and the natives about 100. All munitions of war and other supplies were strictly prohibited from being landed, and the coast was strictly guarded to prevent any infraction of this order.
[New-Bedford Mercury.

THE SLAVE TRADE.—The British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society have petitioned Parliament against the use of an armed force for the extinction of the slave trade. The main points urged in the petition are, that the experience of the last twenty-five years renders it obvious that some deeply-afflicting evils have resulted from the application of coercive means for the extinction of the slave trade; among which may be enumerated a dreadful aggravation of the sufferings and horrors of the middle passage, a fearful increase in the rate of mortality on the number of unhappy victims shipped for the slave markets, and on the part of Great Britain, a lamentable sacrifice of life, and the expenditure of an enormous amount of treasure in vain.

GAMBLERS.—The St. Louis New Era says: Two or three professed blacklegs, traveling as gentlemen on the steamer Lancet, on her recent trip from Cincinnati, managed to draw a green countryman within their net and to filch from him $100 at card playing. The fact coming to the knowledge of the officers of the boat, a meeting of the passengers was called, and the dice-throwing, faro-dealing scamps called to an account. It was resolved by the meeting that the blacklegs should return the money or take a lynching: they preferred the former, and, with some little hesitation returned to the countryman his hundred dollars and saved their backs.

CONSCIENTIOUS SCRUPLES.—We understand that a respectable gentleman of New Bedford, Tuesday, in a case before the Police Court, being summoned as a witness, although he declared his willingness to testify without being sworn, absolutely refused to swear or affirm in the case. He was committed by the Justice to jail for ten days, or until he would comply with the requisition of the laws.

DEATH OF DR. BRANTLEY.—The Charleston Patriot, of 31st ult., says: Rev. William T. Brantley, D. D., recently Pastor of the First Baptist Church, of this city, and late President of the College of Charleston, died in Augusta on Friday last. Dr. Brantley was an eminently pious and learned Divine, and one of the Lights of the Church. He was educated at the South Carolina College, and exhibited in his Pulpit Discourses diversified acquirements and intellectual accomplishments, while in all his social relations he presented an example for imitation.

STATIONERY FOR CONGRESS.—The Clerk of the House of Representatives has advertised for proposals for supplying the annual quantum of stationery for the members at the next session of Congress. There are wanted 600 reams of letter paper, 130 of note paper, 1,000 of foolscap, 400 of cartridge paper, 500 4-bladed, and 150 2 bladed English penknives, and ever so many steel pens, ivory folders, lead pencils, letter stamps, morocco portfolios, memorandum books, pen-holders, &c. &c., all to be of the very, very best—the paper extra superfine, satin finish, gilt edged, &c., and the knives of best pearl handles and highest finish. How such luxuries would excite an editor, who nibs his pen with a single-bladed American knife, and writes his lucubrations upon the back of old letters or upon outside quires of six-and-nine-penny pot paper. [Boston Traveler.

A NORTH CAROLINA BABY.—We have just seen one of the greatest natural curiosities of the day, viz: a child, who will not be eight years of age until July next, and who weighs 177 lbs!—more than the celebrated DANIEL LAMBERT weighed at the same age. He measures round the waist 45 inches—round the hips 47—the thighs 26—the knees 18—neck 17 1-2—and his height is 4 feet 8 1-2 inches! In the development of his mind and in his manners, he has all the childish simplicity of ordinary lads of his age, and is pleased exactly with what usually delights children. It looks odd to see such a lump of flesh, chuckling over a new toy, or a colored marble, but a moment's examination will satisfy any one, that he is the mere child he seems to be. His name is JASPER JACKSON; he is a native of Orange County, and is the son of poor, but very respectable parents. [Raleigh Register.

WOODEN ARM.—A report has lately been read by Messrs. Valpeau, Majendie, and others, who were appointed a committee to examine into the merits of a wooden arm lately invented. The results stated by them, produced by mechanism, are most surprising. With this arm and hand, one can open a watch, use a knife, scratch the head, and pick up a pin from the floor, without any assistance from the other hand. This is said to be applicable in all cases when any portion of the arm remains. [Paris Paper.

TEMPERANCE IN EUROPE.—Dr. Grindrod, the author of the prize treatise which has been republished in this country, entitled "Bacchus," is now engaged in lecturing on temperance in various parts of England. In one county, Lincolnshire, the doctor delivered lectures at twelve places, and obtained more than 2000 signatures to the pledge of total abstinence, many of whom were persons of rank and influence.

Chambers' Edinburgh Journal states that temperance societies are now established in from forty to fifty towns in Holland, by approval of government. In Rotterdam, there are five hundred adherents of total abstinence. The merit of such self-denial is augmented by the consideration, that throughout Holland gin and brandy are to be had at eighteen pence a bottle. [N. Y. Evan.

CATHOLIC INCREASE IN ENGLAND AND WALES.—In 1835 there were 4 bishops, 441 priests, 411 chapels, 6 colleges, 18 convents. Since which time there has been an increase of 4 bishops, 222 priests, 91 churches and chapels, 6 colleges, 3 monasteries, 14 convents.

RAILROAD IN SOUTH AMERICA.—A company has been formed in British Guiana to build a railroad from the port of Georgetown to the river Mahaica. All the most respectable men in the colony have engaged in this project, and it will probably be carried out. The cost is estimeted at £100,000.

GOOD EXAMPLE.—Bangor has a new feature in her public school operations. For the accommodation of apprentices and young men, who labor during the day, and who, of course, cannot attend school during the usual hours of labor, an evening school has been opened, at the public expense, where they may receive instruction in the branches of learning most important for them in the discharge of active duties.

THE PRINTERS.—Mr. Severance, now a member of Congress, says of Gen. Cameron, just elected U. S. senator from Pennsylvania, that something more than twenty years ago, he worked by his side, as a journeyman, in Gales & Seaton's printing office, at Washington, and boarded at the same house with him.

THE RUM TRADE IN MICHIGAN.—The Legislature passed an act at its last session, by which the voters of each town, at their annual meeting, are to vote 'yea,' or 'nay,' on the question of granting licences to sell ardeut spirits within such town during the succeeding year. By a supplementary act, this law is to take immediate effect; and the question will accordingly be submitted to the voters at the approaching town meetings on the first Monday of April.

ERIE CANAL.—At a meeting of boatmen recently held at Syracuse, for the purpose of establishing the prices of freight and passage for the coming season, it was resolved, that the price of passage, including board, be 1 1-2 cents per mile, or 1 cent per mile without board, and that the price of freight be 19 cents per 100 lbs. for 100 miles.

LAKE CURIOSITY.—The Cincinnati Atlas, in an article upon the Lakes, says: There is a great curiosity connected with these Lakes, about thirty miles from Kingston, near the outlet on the Bay of Quinte, in Canada. The writer of this visited it a few years ago, in company with Prof. Lyell, of London, who pronounced it one of the greatest curiosities of the kind he ever saw. It is what is called in Scotland "a Tarn" or Mountain Lake. It is situated upon a conical hill about 350 feet high. It is circular, about half a mile in diameter, and occupies nearly the whole surface of the hill. The Lake is consequently entirely without inlet; yet a small stream constantly escapes from one edge of it down the side of the hill, turning the wheels of a flouring mill, which has been erected near the summit. The level of the Lake is supposed to be about 350 feet above that of the bay below. As there are no high lands within fifty or sixty miles, or perhaps a greater distance, the curious question arises whence comes the supply of water. Prof. Lyell supposes it to occupy the crater of an extinct volcano, and receives its waters through hidden syphons, from a great distance; but did not coincide with the popular belief in the neighborhood, that the fountain-head was Lake Erie, although it is supposed that they occupy the same level.

SUMMARY.

The ship Cincinnati, which arrived in New York on Friday, brings the remains of Mrs. Sarah Tiers, wife of Cornelius H. Tiers, Esq., of this city. Mrs. T. died in China, on the 20th of November last The body was placed in a leaden coffin, which was hermetically sealed, and in that way brought such an immense distance for burial among the kindred of the diseased. [U. S. Gaz.

'Capt. John,' an Indian well known in that neighborhood, was found, on the 24 ult. in a marsh some four miles from Jefferson, Wisconsin, frozen in the ice, where he must have lain about three months, having been missing that length of time. An inquest was held on the body, and it was found that he had been shot with a rifle. His own gun was found by him, with a cap on and in shooting order.

Recent intelligence has been received, which renders it highly probable that the inventor of the Cherokee Alphabet, has not, as is generally supposed, been gathered to his fathers, but is still among the living. If the intelligence be correct, he is now with some of his countrymen, who are located near Matamores, Mexico. Some Cherokees are expected to leave this country in the course of a short time, for Matamores, for the purpose of restoring him to his country if still alive.
[Cher. Adv. March 6.

Among the passengers in the steamship Cambria, from Boston for Liverpool, were three distinguished clergymen of different denominations, viz: Rev. John Codman, D. D. (Congregationalist) Dorchester, Mass.; Rev. Francis Parkman, D. D. (Unitarian) Boston; Rev. Daniel Sharp, D. D. (Baptist) Boston.

A company of emigrants, from Illinois and Iowa, propose taking the line of march from Bloomington on the 7th instant for Oregon. The marching distance from Missouri to the Oregon shore on the Pacific, through an inhospitable country, is not less than 2000 miles, and an army could not well accomplish it in less than four months.

The London Peace Society, on learning the civil commotions in Hayti, sent a strong, but judicious and conciliatory address to the Government and people, signed by some of the best names in England. It was received with signal favor. The papers on the island copied it; and the Government caused twelve thousand copies to be printed, and sent into every part of the Republic. "Blessed are the peace-makers."

It is stated that the Canadian Parliament have chartered two companies for the construction of a Railroad from the Niagara frontier to Sandwich, opposite Detroit.

We regret to learn that on the night of the 19th or 20th ult. the house of M'Garty, of Beauharnois, took fire, and before the inmates were aware of the danger which they were in, four children were burnt to death; and the father and mother had a narrow escape from the same dreadful fate.

The Detroit Herald, in noticing the destruction of the furnace of that place by fire, says that fifty men were thrown out of employment, but as "they were all temperate, and had comfortable homes, they would not suffer." What a lesson is here! How expressive is the compliment!

The Canal Board have decided not to make any alteration in the rates of toll on our Canals, till July next, when the Board will meet.

A letter in the Cherokee Advocate contradicts the prevailing report that war had broken out between the Creek Indians and the Osages and the Pawnee Mahaws.

The New York True Sun says, that Mr. Astor's present wealth is computed at $25,000,000, and it is yearly increasing at the rate of about 4 per cent nett. Last year, the city tax upon his real estate alone, (including near 1,600 building lots, nearly all covered with houses) was over $34,000.

A gang of horse thieves, who have infested the State of Ohio for some years, has been broken up through the exertions of Martial Saffin, of Cincinnati. It is thought that from 50 to 75 horses have been stolen during the last three months in that vicinity. A chief mode of operation was to station a boat at some favorable point on the canal, on board which the horses were driven and placed under concealment. The boat was then moved to some other point, to avoid all traces of the horses, which were speedily driven to distant parts of the State and sold.

OBITUARY.

Died, at their residence near New Salem, Harrison Co., Va., on the 6th of January, 1845, WILLIAM DAVIS, aged 87 years, and his wife ELIZABETH DAVIS, aged 83 years.

Mr. and Mrs. Davis passed their early life in East New Jersey. About the year 1789, they emigrated westward in company with the brethren who had previously formed a church at Shrosbury, and settled in the vicinity of New Salem, Va., where they spent a long life universally respected and esteemed. They had lived together for sixty-fours years, and were released from the troubles of this world within four hours of each other. The old gentleman had become very feeble from age and infirmity, and had required much assistance for some years past. This his wife had constantly given him; and she had often been heard to express a wish to be able to wait on him while he should live, but no desire to remain when he was gone. On the 3d of January, Mr. Davis began to fail rapidly, and his wife continued to attend upon him as usual until the evening of the 4th, when she was taken suddenly ill. She died at 8 o'clock on the morning of the 6th of January and he at 12 o'clock of the same day.

The descendants of this aged couple are somewhat numerous, and are mostly living in Virginia. There are eleven children, one hundred and nineteen grandchildren, 150 great-grandchildren, and four of the fifth generation, making in all 284. Eld. Peter Davis, the present pastor of the Salem Church, is their second child. John Davis and Lewis A. Davis, now ministers in the Church at Port Jefferson, Ohio, are also their sons. They were not present to witness the death of their father. His dying charge to them was, "If you love Christ, feed his sheep." As death approached, his mind was stayed upon the Redeemer, and his last words expressed a desire to go where he could sing the song of Moses and the Lamb.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

THIS Institution has a pleasant and quiet location thirteen miles south-east of Angelica, and six miles south of Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y., under the care of W. C. KENYON, as Principal, and Miss CAROLINE B. MAXSON, as Preceptress, aided by able and experienced assistants.

Teachers' Classes will be exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining every facility of a Normal School, without its usual disadvantages. Within the past year, more than one hundred and fifty students of the institution have been employed as teachers in this and the adjacent counties—a number much larger than from any other institution in the State.

Students are prepared for entering any class in College. Ample advantages are also secured to those pursuing Modern Languages and the Fine Arts. The institution is liberally endowed and supplied with a choice and valuable library, and apparatus sufficiently extensive to illustrate every department of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. It has also well selected cabinets of Geological, Mineralogical and Conchological specimens.

The plan of instruction aims at the development of the moral, intellectual and physical powers of students, so as to render them thorough, accurate, and practical scholars.

Lectures on Chemistry, accompanied by a full course of experiments, will commence with the second week of the fall term, and continue daily to its close. During the fall and winter terms, daily lectures will be given on School Teaching. Lectures on Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Physiology, illustrated by experiments, will be given each term of the year.

TUITION, per term of fifteen weeks, from $3,50 to $5. Board per week, in private families, $1. The entire expense of the academic year, including tuition, board, washing, light, and fuel, need not exceed $60. No extra charges incurred.

THE RUMSELLER AND HIS VICTIM.

BY C. W. DENISON.

The judgment throne was set. On either hand,
All living mortals stood before the Judge.
There stood the drunkard—there, his murderer!
For once they met in close society.
And equal footing bore them as they stood.
From the old earth, now burnt, their flight was done,
As from the tomb to judgment they had flown.
'Twas horrid work that made them separate,
And now 'twas horrid still to see them meet.

"Ha!" cried the drunkard, "art thou here at last!
I have been looking long to see thee here!
The pirate hordes have come! The cheats, the bawds,
The liars and adulterers have come!
The sinners are all besomed from the earth;
Hell is all emptied to receive its doom;
The heavens are winged to wait as witnesses;
And now, to seal the Judgment thou hast come!"

The man of blood shrank back, and shook, and sought
To speak in tones of vengeance; but his spirit cowered
Beneath the glances of the drunkard's eye,
As when he stood beside his dying bed.
"My neighbor," low he moaned, "why look so fierce?
Why shriek so dread? Did I not call for pay?"
"Ay, that thou didst!" yelled back the victim soul,
"And lo! the hour of settlement has come!
It were a pity thou shouldst toil and sweat,
To make of me an idler—pity 'twere
That thou shouldst lie, and steal, and kill,
To make of me a beggar in both worlds—
Ay, 'twere a thousand pities thou shouldst do
All this, so many years, and lose thy pay!
Come to this bar, and we will close accounts,
By the strict book your Judge and mine has kept!
The farm you robbed me of; how much for that?
My wife and children killed; how much for them?
My body crushed—my hopes; for them how much?
And how much for my soul now doomed to hell?

Nay! start not back! Come to the settlement!
He is most just with whom we have to do!
Take—for thy stripes, the wo on me and mine;
Take—for thy garb, the beggar's nakedness;
Take—for thy blood drops, breaking orphan hearts;
Take—for thy drink, the widow's scalding tears!
Take—for thy breath, the sighs thy victims heave;
Take—for thy home, the deepest, darkest pit;
Take—for thy work, what once it was on earth—
Kindling up fires for Satan and his friends;

This is one settlement! And here we part!
But mark me, neighbor! yet again we meet,
For 'tis my special care to see thee paid!"

THE FAMILY OF BETHANY.

To those who are at all conversant with society at large, there is no one thing more painful and surprising, than the fact that so much misery and discord are found connected with the family constitution, and around the domestic fire-side; a spot, which from the very nature of things, should be forever sacred to harmony and love. The very relations instituted by God, for the wisest and kindest purposes, too often become, through the selfishness and depravity of man, a source of keen and lasting unhappiness. Ever since the first sad fratricide recorded in the Bible, it has been true, that family contentions produce more crime and misery than any other form of strife, and that "a brother offended, is harder to be won than the bars of a castle." And even in cases where from motives of selfishness, a thin veil of family pride is spread over these feuds, concealing them from the public gaze; those who are admitted behind the scenes, know full well, that the rancor and animosity often existing among relatives who are bound to each other by the closest ties is not the less bitter because studiously kept out of sight.

A case in point, recurs to memory, which was well known to the writer. It is that of a family distinguised for wealth, education, refinement and polished hospitality. Throughout the wide sphere in which they moved,

"None knew" them "but to love" them,
"Or named" them "but to praise."

In that delightful domestic circle, all the sweet charities, and the endearing courtesies of life seemed to flourish as in their native soil, and all that could gratify the taste or interest the heart seemed there united, as if to show how blessed refinement and religion could render that sacred spot home. The few intimate friends who were domesticated in the family for weeks or months, saw nothing to shadow the brightness of the scene, and the remark was frequently made by such guests, that the ravages of the fall, seemed never to have reached that privileged abode. But a time came when the veil was torn asunder, and the revelations then made were no less humiliating than astonishing. The fact stood out with perfect distinctness, that for years there had been distrust, ill-will, jealousy and hatred festering in the heart, while the "outward seeming" was all love and kindness, and bland courtesy. Indomitable pride, and regard to appearances had hitherto kept these swelling passions within the bounds of secresy, but at length they bid defiance to control, and the ties which had bound these children of one family together so long, were riven, never more to be united on earth. It was a lesson on the falsehood of appearances, and the necessity of a stronger, holier principle than family pride to bind relatives together, which will not soon be forgotten by those acquainted with the progress and denouement of their sad history.

But the family of Bethany; what have they to do with scenes such as these? Nothing, except by the way of contrast, for in everything that marks character or conduct they were as far removed from the households of which I have spoken, as it is possible for one specimen of fallen humanity to differ from another. From the sacred page, where we find the brief but instructive record of this interesting family, we learn nothing of their possessions or rank in life. That they were not rich, seems probable from the fact that so few of our Lord's personal friends were found among that class; but that they were highly prized and respected is evident from the sympathy expressed on the occasion of the death of Lazarus. But the point of most intense interest in their history—that which gives them a moral elevation far above earthly potentates, is the fact so simply, yet so forcibly expressed by the sacred historian. "Now Jesus loved Martha, and her sister, and Lazarus." Here is a distinction which kings might envy, a eulogism which never has been and never can be exceeded. If Jesus loved the members of this little household, then we may be sure their moral character was deserving the esteem and admiration of the good in every clime and every age. Imagination delights to picture the domestic circle that dwelt at Bethany, and to linger on lineaments so rare and yet so lovely. We see there mutual love binding heart to heart by a silken tie, esteeming no sacrifice costly, no service wearisome, when the happiness of others is in view; mutual forbearance, leading to the exercise of patience, long suffering and gentleness towards each other and all mankind—and mutual sympathy by which every care is lessened and every joy increased.

Such was the family of Bethany—the privileged abode of order, harmony and devotion—the spot to which the Redeemer of the world loved to retire when wearied with public duties, and oppressed with a sense of the ingratitude and wickedness which every where surrounded him. Here, in the midst of a small circle who knew something of the dignity and worth of their heavenly guest, and who listened eagerly to the gracious words that proceeded out of his mouth, the Savior of mankind spent most of the few bright hours of his earthly pilgrimage, and tasted the sweets of a friendship which elsewhere he sought almost in vain.

On one occasion, when our Lord was a guest at Bethany, an incident occurred, which as narrated by the evangelist, gives us a view of the peculiar characteristics of the two sisters, while it presents in a striking light, the endearing tenderness and heavenly wisdom of the divine Redeemer. Some of the disciples, if not all of them, were undoubtedly with their Lord, and Martha, who seems to have been a careful, prudent housewife, was cumbered with the cares thus suddenly thrown upon her. Anxious to discharge the duties of hospitality aright, and to treat with becoming attention her illustrious visitant, she lost command of her spirit, and was betrayed into undue anxiety and perhaps fretfulness. Certain it is, that she ventured to bring her complaints to Jesus, not in the way of humble prayer, but in a tone of petulant fault-finding, not only with her sister, but with the Savior himself, at whose feet Mary was sitting while listening to his words of love: "Dost thou not care that my sister hath left me to serve alone?" Poor Martha! she must indeed have been "troubled," when she could so far forget that reverence due to that glorious Friend, whose presence under her roof, was an honor for which she might well be eternally grateful. How gentle and touching was the reproof administered by him to whom these hasty words were spoken! "Martha, Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many things; but one thing is needful, and Mary hath chosen that good part which shall not be taken away from her." Here was no harshness, no impatience to irritate still more the excited feelings of Martha, but a kind rebuke and an impressive lesson, given under circumstances, which could not fail to render their effect salutary and permanent.

How many are there at the present day, who like Martha are so "cumbered with much serving" that they have no leisure to sit at the feet, or listen to the words of the blessed Saviour! How many, who suffer their family cares to distract their spirits and destroy their peace, while they look almost with impatience on the quiet Mary, who in stillness and composure of soul, casts her burden on the Lord, and waits before him for the communications of his grace. Let such remember that the words of our Lord are just as applicable to them, as to Martha of Bethany, while the very fact that in common with her sister and brother she shared the love of Christ, proves that the wrong feeling manifested on this occasion, was not in keeping with her general character. Indeed we have no other intimation that she was at all behind Mary or Lazarus in those Christian graces, which constitute the real excellence of human character in the eyes of him who seeth not as man seeth.

Once more we are admitted to the privacy of the domestic circle at Bethany, and on a very different occasion. Lazarus, the faithful friend, the beloved brother is sick, nigh unto death, and the affectionate sisters naturally look to Jesus in the hour of sorrow, for sympathy and relief. But to add to their affliction, this kind friend is at a distance and they can only send a message, which may not reach him until it is too late. Who does not admire the modesty and humility of the message thus sent? "Lord, he whom thou loveth is sick." They say nothing of their love to him, or of the hospitality he had so often shared—they do not even ask him to exert his power in behalf of their suffering brother, but simply state the case and leave the event with him. The wonderful scene which followed, is familiar to all the readers of the sacred Scriptures. Comment would but mar the beauty of the inspired record, and I envy not the feelings of the man or woman who can follow the Son of God to the tomb of Lazarus; and witness the tears he shed there unmoved—or whose heart does not thrill with sympathetic delight at the change from sorrow to rapture which followed that wondrous resurrection. Christian mourner, wherever thou art, who art now weeping over the grave of the loved and lost; remember that thy Redeemer is still the resurrection and the life, and if he does not in thy case, as in that of Mary and Martha, bid the dead "come forth," it is not that he loves thee less, but because he sees this transient separation to be better for thee. When a few more years have passed away, the trumpet shall sound, and those who sleep in Jesus shall come forth, not to enter again on a perishing existence, but to inherit a glorious immortality in the immediate presence of God and the Lamb.

The last night of rest, known by our blessed Saviour on earth was spent at Bethany. Here in the society of the few on whom he could rely, the closing hours of his eventful life passed rapidly away, in holy conversation and fervent prayer, while the bond of perfectness bound faster and closer each heart, and the fire of love in each believer, gathered strength, and brightness, and warmth, from mingling so closely around the fountain head of life and light. This was probably the last interview enjoyed by those friends on earth, around that domestic fireside, but the family of Bethany have long since been gathered together before the throne, where in the immediate presence of him whom in the days of his flesh, they knew and loved, their joy is forever full, and their felicity forever perfect.

EARLY POTATOES.

The growing of early potatoes is carried to a very high degree of perfection in Lancashire, in England. The following method is pursued there in preparing the seed, and we doubt not but the information will be very acceptable to those about this city and elsewhere engaged in the business. The grand enemy that potatoes have to encounter at this season is the spring frosts, which are easily guarded against in the following manner while the growth of the potato is progressing in perfect security.

When they have procured the seed they select for their earliest kinds, the cultivators, aware that the root and top end of the tubes germinate at different periods, assort their sets in the following manner: the sets near the top or waxy end are found to come to maturity a fortnight earlier than those at the root end, and these, therefore, form two classes of sets for an earlier and a later crop. The sets from the top are put separate from the sets into which the bottom or root end is divided; and all, after being sprinkled with lime, are put on a room floor where a strong current of air can be introduced at pleasure, the sets laid thin, about two layers in depth, and covered with chaff or dry sawdust about two inches thick. This screens them from frosts and keeps them moderately warm, causing them to vegetate; but, at the same time, admits air to strengthen them and harden their shoots, which the cultivator improves by opening the doors and windows on every opportunity afforded by mild weather. They must be frequently examined, and when the shoots are sprung an inch and a half or two inches, one-half of their covering must be carefully removed with either a wooden rake or by hand, taking care not to disturb or break the shoots. Light as well as air is requisite to strengthen and establish the roots. In this manner they suffer them to remain until it is safe to plant them, giving them all the air possible. By this method the shoots at the top become green, leaves are sprung, and the plants are moderately hardy. They are planted in rows in the usual method with the setting-stick, but not so wide apart as for a later crop. The top sets are put out from ten days to two weeks before the other ones. Although the sets under this management are enabled to bear a little frost without injury, yet the first crop would be the better and safer of a little covering in frosty nights. [Louisville Jour.

AN EXAMPLE FOR YOUNG MEN.—The New York Sun says that Mr. Delevan, the Temperance Reformer of Albany, was, in youth, a member of a club numbering fifty members, who used to meet at a public house to enjoy a social glass. One evening, while on his way to the club, he suddenly stopped and exclaimed aloud, Right about face! And he did right about face; and said to a gentleman to whom he related the circumstance, the first block of buildings I ever erected in Albany was erected on the corner directly in front of where I formed that resolution.

Forty-three of his companions became drunkards and most or all of them found a drunkard's grave.

MUSTARD SEED.—Twenty-seven acres of land in Ohio, yielded 382 bushels of brown mustard seed, weighing 52 1-2 pounds to the bushel, which were sold at eight cents, making $1,688. In addition there are 100 bushels of tailings, which will give 75 bushels at 50 lbs. per bushel, worth $300—altogether $1,988, or $73 per acre. A more profitable crop could not be desired.

There is something very touching in the story of Ishmael, the youth who was sent into the wilderness of life with his bow and arrow, "his hand against every man, and every man's hand against him." Even in our crowded busy and social world, on how many is this doom pronounced! What love makes allowance like household love? —what takes an interest in small sorrows and small successes like household love? God forgive those (and I would not even say forgive, were not Divine mercy illimitable) who turn the household altar to a place of strife! Domestic dissension is the sacrilege of the heart.

A TRUE SKETCH.

BY J. C. PARCELL.

All loved him, many wept his downfall;
As a summer flower he bloomed a while
And perished.

I knew a youth—a noble generous youth—from out whose heart there flowed a living fount of pure and holy feelings, which spread around and fertilized the soil of friendship, and warm and generous hearts crowded around him and enclosed him in a circle of godlike happiness. The eye of woman brightened at his approach, and wealth and honor smiled to woo him to their circle.

His days sped onward—and as the summer brook sparkles on its gladsome way, so sped he on, blithesome amid the light of woman's love, and manhood's eulogy. The earth, the sea, the air, and every bright and bubbling stream, and fount, sent forth their murmuring melody; and his pure heart unstained by worldly guile, drunk in their glowing happiness.

He wooed and won a maid of peerless charms—a being fair and delicate, and pure, who bestowed the harvest of her heart's young love on him, and earth became a heaven.

The car of time rolled on, and clouds arose to dim the horizon of worldly bliss. The serpent of inebriation entered within the Eden of his heart. The pure and holy feelings the God of nature had implanted in his soul, became polluted by the influence of the miscalled social cup. The warm and generous aspirations of his soul became frozen and callous within him. The tears of the wretched, the agony of the afflicted, found no response in his bosom.

The pure and holy fount of universal love within his heart which once gushed forth at the mourning of misery, and prompted the hand to administer to the requirements of the wretched, sent forth no more of its pure and benevolent offering.

Its waters had become intermingled with the poisoned ingredients of the cup, and the rank weeds of intemperance had sprung up and choked the source from whence the fountain flowed.

The dark spirit of poverty had flapped its wings over his habitation, and the burning hand of disease had seared the brightness of his eye, and palsied the elasticity of his frame.

The friends who basked in the sunshine of his prosperity, fled when the wintry winds of adversity blew harshly round his dwelling.

Pause, gentle reader.

Go to yon lowly burial place, and ask of the rank grass that spreads from its polluted soil, who rests beneath its lowly surface, and the sighing winds will answer—"The mouldering remains of one who possessed a heart overflowing with the milk of human kindness; the days of whose boyhood were hallowed by high and holy aspiration—the hours of whose early manhood were unstained by care and crime—the setting orb of whose destiny was enshrouded in a mist of misery and degradation. He saw the smile of joy sparkling in the brim of the wine cup."

He noted not the demon lurking in the bottom of the goblet. With eager hand he raised the poisoned chalice to his lips—and he was not!

SECOND ADVENT.

We make the following extract from a letter lately published in the "Morning Watch," and written by Rev. Geo. Storrs.

As the 2300 days, of Dan. 8th, is the strongest point relied upon in proof, that the definite time for the advent is known, I will examine that.

1st. What is the event to take place at the end of that period? "Unto 2300 days, then shall the" Lord Jesus come in the clouds of heaven? Is that the event specified? Nay, verily. What, then, is it? "The sanctuary shall be cleansed." But, it is said, the two events occur at the same period, or time. And how is that made out? First, by inferring that the whole earth is the sanctuary; for, that cannot be made to appear, except by inference. Hence, inferentially, it is said that the advent occurs at the exact termination of the 2300 days; and that, in the face of our Lord's declaration, that no man, nor angel, neither the Son, maketh known the day. If it was made known to Daniel, or in the book of Daniel, an angel, or the Son, did make it known. Let us beware how we tread on such ground as this any more, lest we be found refusing 'to hear that prophet.'

2d. Where is the commencement of the 2300 days? If it could be established, which I now deny, that the cleansing of the sanctuary, and the coming of Christ, were events to take place at the same exact time, still, we should have to make it evident, that the year is certainly known when the 2300 days began. Is that known? Clearly, it is not. The repeated failures in the time fixed upon for the termination of those days, demonstrates this point. But, moreover, if the 7th year of Artaxerxes is the true year to commence those days, we are dependent upon human chronology to fix that point, for the Bible does not give it; and the different chronologers vary from B. C. 467, to 417, a space of fifty years! [See article headed 'Chronology,' in the 'Watch' of March 6.] Which of them shall our faith rest upon? And if it rest upon either, does it not stand in the wisdom of men, and not in the Word of God?

But this is not all. It is a matter of inference, that these 2300 days begin in the seventh year of Artaxerxes; that depends upon whether it be a fact, that these days commence with the 70 weeks of Dan. 9th. This, of course, can only be established by inference; which inference may be seriously doubted, without being justly charged to a want of faith in God's word. There are other periods, which honest men, and Christian men, have fixed upon for the commencement of them, besides the 70 weeks. If they do not begin with the 70 weeks, then, the death of Christ cannot help us to determine when those days began, even though we were not met with the difficulty, which does exist, in settling the year of our Lord's crucifixion. If all these difficulties were overcome, we still have the positive affirmation of our Lord, 'Ye know not when the time is.'

It seems almost useless to examine the other prophetic numbers, with the expectation that they will conduct us, with certainty, to the definite day, or year, of the advent, if the 2300 days do not. If it be said that the 1260, in the 12th of Daniel, do, I answer, Let it be shown where those days began; and then let it further be shown, that the expression following the announcement of that period—'and when he shall have accomplished to scatter the power of the holy people, all these things shall be finished'—does not include an additional period, the length of which is not given. If all this could be done, still, 'all these things' to be 'finished,' appear to extend somewhat beyond the advent; so, that we should still lack the definite day, or year, of that event.

If the 1335 days are appealed to, it still may be asked, who has been able to show the definite year when those days began? If that cannot be done, who can say of any year, this is the year that they terminate? But, if that could be done, it must next be proved, that Daniel standing in his 'lot,' means his resurrection, rather than a period beyond, when he, and all the saints, shall take possession of the inheritance. When all these doubtful points are settled, it still thunders in our ears, 'Ye know not when the time is' for the Son of Man to come 'in the clouds, in power and great glory,' to 'gather together his elect from the four winds of heaven.' Ah, but, 'That is nothing but a stereotyped objection, in everybody's mouth.' True, brother, it is stereotyped, and done by our Lord himself, and 'proceeded out of his mouth.' And let us remember, that 'Moses truly said unto the fathers, A Prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethren, like unto me: him shall ye hear in all things whatsoever he shall say unto you. And it shall come to pass, that every soul which will not hear that Prophet, shall be destroyed from among the people.' Let us beware how we trifle with that Prophet's words, and call them 'stereotyped' any more.

* * * * * * *

This is addressed to all who love our Lord Jesus Christ, and his appearing, with love, and, I trust, with no other desire, than that God may be glorified, and his dear people be saved from the snares which so thickly beset us on every side. Whether it is approved or condemned, by men, is nothing to me; I have the consciousness of having, in this respect, discharged a duty, which I owed to God and men, for the part I have taken, and the positive manner in which I have, in time past, proclaimed the coming of the Lord on a definite day, or year.

Philadelphia, March 11, 1845.

A FORTUNATE RECOVERY.—A young lady of Philadelphia, a few days since, picked up a pocket book in Fourth street, near Market, which she had reason to suppose to have been just dropped by a gentleman passing by. She inquired of the gentleman, who proved to be a merchant from Tennessee, if he had lost any thing, to which he, with some surprise at the inquiry, replied in the negative. The young lady repeated her inquiry, and suggested that he should satisfy himself by examining. On doing this he suddenly started and declared himself a ruined man, for he had lost his pocket book. The book was then handed to him by the lady, on recovering which the gratitude of the stranger was unbounded, and on the young lady's positively refusing to accept a portion of the lost money, he insisted upon presenting her with a gold watch, which was declined. The merchant, however, forced upon the lady two notes of twenty dollars each, being all the loose money in his pocket. The pocket book contained $10,000.

GRAVITY.—As gravity acts upon all bodies in proportion to their quantity of matter, it is this attractive power that constitutes their weight. Gravity and weight are in particular circumstances synonymous terms. We say such a piece of lead weighs a pound, but if by any means it could be carried 4000 miles above the surface of the earth, it would weigh four ounces; and provided it could be removed 8000 miles above the surface of the earth, which is three times the distance from the centre that the surface is, it would only weigh one ninth of a pound.

DANGERS OF THE SEA.—Two hundred and eight vessels were wrecked in the last twelve months on our coast alone, in which one hundred and five lives were lost. Twenty vessels are yet missing, and a number of wrecks have been passed at sea, whose melancholy story, we fear, will never be told. Of late years seven hundred lives yearly have been lost at sea from this country alone, where are one hundred and forty thousand seamen; two thousand from England, where are two hundred and ninety thousand. In the county of Barnstable, Massachusetts, there were living, a short time since, nine hundred and thirty-four widows of seafaring men.

MARRIED LIFE.—The affection that links together man and wife, is a far holier and more enduring passion than the enthusiasm of young love. It may want its gorgeousness, it may want its imaginative character, but it is far richer in holy and trusting attributes. Talk not to us of the absence of love in wedlock. What! because a man has ceased to "sigh like a furnace," are we to believe that the fire is extinct?

No! it burns with a steady and brilliant flame; shedding a benign influence upon existence, a million times more precious and delightful than the dreams of cold philosophy.

A LEWD young fellow saw an aged hermit pass by him bare-foot.

"Father," said he, "you are in a miserable condition if there is not another world."

"True son," returned the hermit, but what is thy condition if there is?"

A. B. MAGRUDER IN REPLY TO L. CRANDALL.

MR. EDITOR,—In the 36th No. of your paper, Mr. Lucius Crandall has offered some comments on my letter to Mr. Titsworth, which was published in a preceding number of the Recorder. To this I propose to submit a reply.

It is well to observe, that my letter was not written with a view to publication; otherwise, some pains would have been taken to fortify more strongly the positions assumed. Mr. T., however, having requested leave to offer it to you for publication, I did not feel at liberty to decline it. This explanation will account for any want of explicitness which the letter may seem to exhibit.

Mr. Crandall supposes that my position, that the ancient seventh day or Sabbath is not now obligatory on Christians, is "impracticable," and seems to imagine that I concede this myself when I declare that "I believe heartily in the consecration of Sunday or the Lord's day;" and because "abstinence from labor" is requsite that we may the better perform the duties of the first day of the week, he infers that I concede that it is to be kept as a, if not the, Sabbath. Now this is a non sequitur. Because A. suspends all labor that he may observe Christmas-day, and B. does the same that he may commemorate the fourth of July, does it therefore follow, that these days are the same in their origin, nature, relations, and design? Certainly not. It is true they are marked by one circumstance in common—rest from labor—and only one. So of the Sabbath and the Lord's day. The Jew rested on the Sabbath day that he might commemorate the rest of the Almighty after creation; the Christian now rests from secular labor on Sunday, that he may the better commemorate the achievement of the work of redemption. The old day—the Sabbath, the last day of the week—fitly belongs to the old dispensation. The new day—the first day of the week—as properly becomes the new dispensation. God completed the work of creation and instituted a monumental record of his power by consecrating the last day. He, through His Son, now completes the work of redemption, and institutes a monumental evidence of his power by consecrating the first day—that day on which our Lord arose from the dead—most appropriately, therefore, denominated the Lord's day. The contrast may be pursusd to an almost endless extent. Time and place forbid me to proceed with it here.

Again—Your correspondent spreads a net for me, and gets entangled himself in its meshes. He says, in reply to my citation of Paul's authority in Col. 2: 16, that Paul's language in Gal. 4: 10, 11, "forbids keeping Sunday or any other day." Now this view convicts him of inconsistency in observing Saturday, as effectually as it applies to my consecration of Sunday. In proving too much, he has lost the force of the whole argument. Now I think I can show, that Paul's prohibition to the Galatians to "observe days," &c., when properly understood confirms my position, and directly overturns his. In using the language employed, Paul is addressing himself to those of the churches in Galatia who had been Jews before their conversion. It is well known, that all the primitive congregations were composed of Jews and Gentiles, "the middle wall of partition being broken down," and "of twain one new man" being made. It is manifest from the context, that he is speaking in the 4th chapter of Gal. 10, 11, to the Jewish converts. In the preceding verses he speaks of them as having been the children of Abraham—of their being "under the law," &c.—epithets which he could never apply to Gentiles; and speaking to these Jewish Christians who were great sticklers, even at that early day, for the Sabbath, new moons, feast-days, the passover, &c., he says reproachfully, "ye observe days, and months, and times, and years, (Jubilees);" and adds, "I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed upon you labor in vain." Does not the same reproach attach to those Christians who, in this day, as Paul says, "turn back to the weak and beggarly elements" of a previous and far less glorious institution? Looking to the context, then, we see that the great Apostle to the Gentiles was combatting and resisting the very Judaizing forms, ceremonies, days, &c., which obtain among some professors in the present age.

Your correspondent asks for authority for saying, that the primitive disciples commemorated the first day of the week "in honor of the resurrection" of the Lord. I answer, it is no where thus written in so many words, but the facts and incidents recorded justify the conclusion abundantly. It must be conceded, that our Saviour arose on that day—that in every instance (I believe) in which he appeared to them prior to his ascension it was on that day—that they were in the habit, before his ascension, themselves of assembling on that day (John 20: 19, 26, and elsewhere)—that, after his ascension they assembled together regularly on that day, (Acts 2: 1; the day of Pentecost was Sunday)—that on that day they held religious worship and broke bread, (Acts 2: 42, and 20: 7—see also 1 Cor. 16: 2, also Rev. 1: 10.) From all these, it is manifest, that that day was particularly honored both by the Lord and his apostles and disciples. And as it was the resurrection day, are we not fully authorized to conclude that it was in "honor of the resurrection of Christ" that the day was set apart, and that to commemorate his death the bread was broken? On the day of his resurrection they remembered his death, and thus was emphatically impressed on their minds, in these expressive ordinances, the blissful facts, that "he died for our sins and was raised for our justification." How different such a day as this was from the cheerless gloom, the legal rigor, and the joyless solitude of a Jewish Sabbath, I need not stop to inquire. One is a day of joyful congratulation, and deep and heartfelt gratitude, of melting tenderness and love, to the obedient disciple of the Prince of Peace and the Lord of Life; whilst the other brought with it the painful consciousness of guilt in the presence of the august Judge of all the earth. One, springs from the stern ministration of law—the other, from the gracious dispensation of the spirit. One kills—the other makes alive.

Again—Mr. C. remarks, "It seems to me almost unaccountable, that Mr. M. should contend, that the law of Moses, no part of it, is now in force.' It would require more time and space than the occasion warrants to cite the multitude of passages from the New Testament which fully justify me in assuming this position. One good argument is enough. I will, therefore, offer the solemn declaration of the college of apostles at Jerusalem, contained in the 21st chapter of Acts, 23--26. Here "James and the elders" give Paul this advice—'Do therefore this that we say to thee: We have four men which have a vow on them. Them take, and purify thyself with them, &c., &c., that they (the Jews) may know that thou thyself walkest orderly and keepest the law. As touching the Gentiles which believe, we have written and concluded, (Acts 15,) that they OBSERVE NO SUCH THING, save only that they keep themselves from things offered to idols.'

Now, with this testimony before us, can any thing be clearer than that the "Gentiles which believe," should not observe the law? More conclusive proof could not be desired. But "the Sabbath was made for man," is quoted as the last resort. Strange that such an expression should be held as proof of the universal obligation of the Sabbath! Was not the whole code of Jewish law made "for man" as well as the Sabbath? And yet the law of sacrifice, the passover, &c., are confessedly no longer in force.

The passage from Colossians (2: 16) is indeed conclusive of this whole controversy. Here, the observance of Sabbaths is equally condemned with that of "new moons, feast-days," &c. On this passage, Doctor McKnight, the learned Presbyterian commentator, has the following judicious note:—

"The whole of the law of Moses being abrogated by Christ, (Col. 2: 14,) Christians are under no obligation to observe any of the Jewish holy days, not even the seventh-day Sabbath. Wherefore, if any teacher made the observance of the seventh day a necessary duty, the Colossians were to resist him. But though the brethren, in the first ages, paid no regard to the Jewish Sabbath, they set apart the first day of the week for public worship, and for commemorating the death and resurrection of their Master, by eating his supper on that day; also for the private exercises of devotion. This they did, either by the precept or example of the apostles, and not by virtue of any injunction in the law of Moses. Besides, they did not sanctify the first day of the week in the Jewish manner, by a total abstinence from bodily labor of every kind. That practice was condemned by the council of Laodicea as Judaizing."

In this view of the subject, I fully concur; and I am sure it is the ground which every unprejudiced enquirer after truth will finally come to occupy. ALLAN B. MAGRUDER.

HINDOO WORSHIP—SWINGING.

By far the most common mode of serving Siva among the Hindoos, is by the Churruckpoojah, or Swinging. This usually takes place at a festival in honor of Siva, which continues several days, and during which the streets are crowded by natives nearly naked, jumping, dancing, and singing, to the sound of drums, gongs, and other instruments, the principal actors being some of the candidates for the tortures with which the festival closes. Dr. Magowan gives the following description of a ceremony to which he was a spectator:—

"The machine consisted of a shaft about thirty feet high, which supported a horizontal lever. From one end of the lever was a rope extending to the ground, by which it was made to revolve. From the other extremity the devotee was suspended by hooks. When one presented himself for a swing, he was laid with his face on the ground while the hooks were inserted. After his back had been well rubbed by the feet of the operators, a flap of the integument was raised by their fingers, and the hook passed through on one side of the spine, just below the scapulary shoulder blade, and another in like manner on the corresponding side. The hooks were pieces of rough iron, about the size of a pitchfork prong: a few drops of blood flowed after the operation. A strong bandage retained the hooks in their places. The devotee was almost stupified by opium and tobacco, winced somewhat at first, but on being elevated amidst the deafening plaudits of the crowd, he partook of the joyous enthusiasm, and played his part bravely. While whirling round in mid air, he smiled, folded his arms, crossed his legs, and performed a variety of antics for the amusement of the spectators below. At times he seized the rope connecting the hooks with the lever, and raised himself to relieve his back. About seven revolutions are made, and they generally swing from twenty to twenty-five minutes, before signifying a wish to be released. When the bandage was removed, and the hooks withdrawn, his wounds were rubbed, and he himself was borne away in triumph to receive his reward from a rich native, before whose window the swinging took place, and who, with a large number of invited guests, witnessed the spectacle. The wealthy natives often in this way worship by proxy. Each man who swings, receives a half dollar and some rice. Often it is compulsory, the poor tenants being forced to undergo the torture. Others swing on their own hook, looking for no compensation from the lukewarm lovers of ease. In spite of the hurtful applications made to the wounds, they heal in a few days without supuration. When the bandage is not properly affixed, the weight comes upon the skin and tears it; the poor creature then falls: many deaths have occurred in this manner."

LORD ELDON'S VIEW OF THE TRINITY.

An eminent solicitor once sent to Lord Eldon a tract on the doctrine of the Trinity, edited by Dr. Swire, whereupon the Lord Chancellor wrote the Doctor a letter, from which the following is an extract:—

SUNDAY, AUGUST 7, 1808.

"I have not ceased to delight in the studies to which my life was originally intended to be dedicated. I confess I am not quite so anxious as others, better informed, perhaps, may be, to find the doctrines of natural and revealed religion altogether intelligible. In the former, there are many which are above my reason, and yet they must be true. That a divine Being does exist, the Author and Preserver of all created beings, himself uncreated and existing from eternity, is a truth of which I have no doubt, and I never could bring myself to think that any reasonable being had a doubt of it; and yet how much of how this should be, (undoubted as it is that it must be so,) is above the comprehension of him who 'seeth through a glass darkly.' So, as to this doctrine of the Trinity, I don't object to it, if it be represented as a perfect mystery. Compelled to believe in the doctrines of natural religion, though many of them are above my reason, why I should withhold my assent to such of the doctrines of revealed religion as are so, I know not. Upon this I say, 'If ye believe in God, believe in me also.' I go a short way to work in this great matter. If the matters communicated in the sacred books are communicated by the God of truth, they must be true. I have asked myself, therefore, 1st. Has this communication been made by the God of truth? If it has, 2. What doth the communication contain? I have not been so far led astray from the great purpose of human life, of this state of trial and probation, as not to have often and often endeavored to enable myself 'to give a reason to him that asketh, of the hope that is in me.' I have looked, therefore, into the evidence of these things, and I have no doubt of the divine origin of the sacred volumes. If so, what is therein contained? If the doctrine of the Trinity in Unity is not therein contained, I can only ask him, who can prevail upon himself so to say, 'How readest thou?' Assuredly not as I read, for unless (coming to the consideration of this important matter, a believer in natural religion with all its difficulties about it,) I am to twist every thing I find in revelation till I can represent it to myself not as it is, but as I think it should be, in the foolish purpose to bring it down to the level of my reason, I must read and understand as it is written. If this doctrine is not there revealed, I know none respecting the being of God that is there revealed. Indeed, the whole scheme of man's redemption, the whole Bible scheme of this world, and that which is to come, appears to me very mainly to depend upon it; and when the man of reason tells me he understands the Godhead better, if he believes as an Unitarian, than I do, who believe the doctrine of the Trinity in Unity, I am content that he should think as meanly as he pleases of my understanding; but, on the other hand, I humbly pray to God to forgive his presumption. When the question was asked, 'Can these dry bones live?' I think the answer was, 'O Lord God, thou knowest.' When the question is asked, 'Can these Three be One?' my answer is, 'The Lord God knoweth.' He has said it if there be truth in Scripture."

[Christian Witness.

TEPHILLIM, TALITH, AND MEZUZAH.

In the evening we went to the shop of a Jew, and bought Tephillim, or phylacteries, the broadest which he had. These consisted of little scrolls of parchment, in which are written certain sentences of the law, enclosed in two black leather boxes, which are bound by leather thongs on the forehead and left hand, during the time of prayer. It was to these that our Lord alluded when reproving the Pharisees; "All their works they do to be seen of men; they make broad their phylacteries." We also got the Mezuzah, a small scroll of parchment, on which a portion of the law is written, and the name of God on the back in transposed letters, which is folded up and nailed obliquely on the door-post of every Jewish house. Both of these superstitions are derived from a misinterpretation of the command in Deuteronomy, "And thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thine hand, and they shall be as frontlets between thine eyes, and thou shalt write them upon the posts of thy house, and on thy gates." The natural heart, in all ages and in all nations, is well pleased to substitute mere external observances instead of spiritual heart-religion. We aftrwards purchased a Talith, the white woollen shawl, striped with blue at the edge, and having white fringes, called Tsitzits, at the four corners. The Jews wear this over their head during prayer, while they hold the fringes in their hands, and frequently kiss them, in obedience to the commandment, "Speak unto the children of Israel, and bid them that they make them fringes in the borders of their garments." The Saviour also alludes to them, "They enlarge the borders of their garments." Upon the part which comes over the forehead, the Jews often wear a band of silver embroidery. A Jewess, who had been employed to prepare the Talith for us, refused to sew the embroidered band upon the robe, unless we procured for her a silk ribband to put between them, alleging, that otherwise she would be breaking the law, which forbids them to mingle "woollen and linen" together.

[Narr. of Scot. Deputation.

BIGOTRY AND SECTARIANISM.

Bigotry is "an obstinate and blind attachment to any particular opinions." It is a state of mind, which may exist in relation to any subject of thought, or object of belief. To those who have not carefully examined human nature, the strong repugnance, which most men feel to severe thinking and laborious, patient investigation, is almost incredible. They are ashamed, however, not to have an opinion on subjects of general interest, and common conversation. They therefore believe as somebody else believes; and simply because he believes so. Opposition to opinions thus formed, occasions displeasure for two reasons—First, because it presupposes that one is in error; and this implies weakness. Secondly, because it implies at least the expediency of re-examination, and the adoption of new opinions. But this most men greatly dislike. They therefore determine to maintain their old ground. This determination strengthens opinion. And thus the process goes on, till the obstinate and blind attachment mentioned in the definition, is formed.

It deserves to be remarked, too, that on all commanding subjects, such as politics, religion, &c., opinions are always connected with feelings. Disputes produce warmth. And when the mind has gone through the process just briefly indicated, the words, which have frequently been brought into controversy, become not signs of ideas, but representatives of prejudices. Thus the terms Federalism, Democracy, Popery, Prelacy, Calvinism, Arminianism, &c., mean something, which one cordially hates, or loves, as the case may be, but why, it is impossible to say.

> I do not like you, doctor Fell!
> The reason why, I cannot tell,
> But, I don't like you, doctor Fell.

So, then, bigotry implies not only a blind attachment to opinions, but easiness of irritation, when these opinions are called in question. It is wrathful, and unforgiving. No language can exaggerate the injuries which it has done to the interests of humanity. [Dr. Rice.

POWER OF CONSCIENCE.

The following is taken from the close of a lecture on conscience, by Dr. Beecher, as reported in the Cincinnati Chronicle.

It is also the power of conscience in despair, which bursts out in this life in the most terrific action, and prostrates the strongest minds. This takes place in revivals, under convictions of sin. Athletic men weep and sweat, like showers of rain. It is this that extorts confessions from murderers. They would rather be executed than suffer the torments of conscience! It unsettles the reason. Some years since, I visited the Philadelphia Asylum. In returning from the apartments I saw a man standing fixed—immoveable—like a pillar. I asked who that was? It was the son of Dr. Rush, who killed a man in a duel. There he stood like a pillar. Sometimes he would apparently wake up to recollection; he would pace off the distance and give the word to fire! Then cry out, he is dead!—he is dead! This was the power of Conscience. It had unsettled the reason!

In my early ministry, I was called to attend a neighbor, at East-Hampton, L. Island. He was sceptical and intemperate. 'Pray for me!' he exclaimed, 'pray for me!—pray for me!' 'You must pray for yourself,' I replied. Pray!—I cannot pray!—I am going straight to hell.

He lived three days, almost without any food; and then he died,—so far as we know, without any disease. It was the power of Conscience. The same thing took place in Sir Francis Newport—whose history is well known.

THE SABBATH.

Remember to keep the Sabbath holy! Have the stamp of holiness on all your conversation, reading and pursuits, on that day. It should be your heartfelt wish, and earnest endeavor, that each successive Sabbath may find you and all who are dearest to you, rapidly preparing for the heavenly Sabbath; prepared, with deepened humility and self-renunciation, with hearts more overflowing with grateful love to God, and spirits more attuned to high and holy pleasures and pursuits, to join in the worship of the celestial sanctuary, and to take part in the chorus of thanksgiving which shall be lifted up before the throne of God and of the Lamb, by angels and archangels and all the company of the redeemed, throughout the endless ages of heaven's blissful Sabbath of everlasting praise.

RESIDENCE OF HENRY MARTYN.—"A few moments' walk from Serampore," says a writer in the Baptist Missionary Magazine, "leads you to a pagoda, the former residence of Henry Martyn. Its vaulted roof was then so changed from its original destination, as often to re-echo the voice of prayer and the songs of praise; and Martyn triumphed and rejoiced that the place where once devils were worshiped, was now become a Christian oratory. The devil has again obtained possession of the pagoda—it is now a distillery, flooding the country with vice, disease, and death. The splendid Banian tree, the circumference of which I found to be 234 paces, where Martyn was wont to spend hours in prayer and meditation, is transformed into a cooper's shop for the manufacture of gin barrels! Intemperance is an exotic vice in Bengal, and only recently introduced, but spreading with fearful rapidity."

THE MOTHER AND HER FAMILY.

BY MISS SEDGWICK.

Philosophy is rarely found. The most perfect sample I ever met was an old woman, who was apparently the poorest and the most forlorn of the human species—so true is the maxim which all profess to believe, and none act upon invariably, viz: "that happiness does not depend on outward circumstances." The wise woman, to whom I have alluded, walks to Boston, a distance of twenty or thirty miles, to sell a bag of brown thread and stockings, and then patiently walks back with her little gain. Her dress, though tidy, is a grotesque collection of "shreds and patches,"—coarse in the extreme.

"Why don't you come down in a wagon?" said I, when I observed she was wearied with her long journey.

"We havn't got any horse," she replied; "the neighbors are very kind to me, but they can't spare theirs, and it would cost as much to hire one as my thread would come to."

"You have a husband—don't he do any thing for you?"

"He is a good man—he does all he can, but he's a cripple and invalid. He reels my yarn and mends the children's shoes. He's as kind a husband as a woman need to have."

"But his being a cripple is a heavy misfortune to you," said I.

"Why, ma'am, I don't look upon it in that light," replied the thread woman. "I consider that I've a great reason to be thankful that he never took to any bad habits."

"How many children have you?"

"Six sons and five daughters, ma'am."

"Six sons and five daughters! What a family for a poor woman to support!"

"It's a family, ma'am; but there ain't one of 'em I'd be willing to lose. They are all healthy children as need to be—all willing to work, and all clever to me. Even the smallest boy, when he gets a cent, for doing an errand, will be sure to bring it to me."

"Do your daughters spin your thread?"

"No, ma'am; as soon as they are big enough, they go out to service, as I don't want to keep them always delving for me; they are always willing to give me what they can; but it's fair that they should do a little for themselves; I do all my spinning after the folks are abed."

"Don't you think you should be better off if you had no one but yourself to provide for?"

"Why no, ma'am, I don't. If I hadn't been married, I should have had to work as hard as I could, and now I can't do more than that. My children are a great comfort to me, and I look forward to the time when they'll do as much for me as I've done for them."

Here was true philosophy! I learned a lesson from that poor woman which I shall not forget.

JERUSALEM—THE POTTER'S FIELD.

This field, the Aceldama, which I never had before visited, attracted my attention very much.—On that spot Dr. Wild discovered, in 1838, a cave containing a great number of skulls, which, according to his statement, were not those of Jews, but of foreigners; by which circumstance the fact was established beyond a doubt, that this is the very field which was bought for the thirty pieces of silver, paid to Judas as the reward of his treachery. Since then many others have visited the cave, and new chambers have been discovered, where the bones of thousands lie mouldering. In fact, the vicinity of Jerusalem abounds in caves and subterraneous passages, where the bones of the millions who once worshiped on Mount Moriah are whitening. * * It has often been a matter of surprise to travelers, that so many skulls should be heaped together in one cave. It is explained in the Talmud, which informs us that it was the custom of the Jews to bury their dead in a particular place, and, after the flesh was destroyed, to gather the bones together, and place them in some vault. Many families had their own vaults. On entering the church of the holy sepulchre on the 24th instant, (February,) I found the front of the sepulchre most gorgeously adorned. There were one hundred and three lamps burning, all with one exception, of silver. One, which was of larger size than the others, was of massive gold, and of great value. The Greeks, the Armenians, and the Papists, had all united to adorn the sepulchre thus: the right side of the front was allotted to the Greeks; the left to the Armenians; and the top to the Papists; the middle was occupied by all three to display their riches and the wealth of their convents.

To-day is the first day of Lent (29th of February,) and with it the grand ceremony of anointing the stone of the sepulchre, upon which tradition says our Saviour was laid when anointed. The Papists are the first to perform the ceremony, next the Greeks, and then the Armenians. All these parties had armed soldiers round them during the performance of the service, that they might be free from molestation. The poor Syrians and Copts are excluded from the privilege of joining in these services; in fact, the Greeks, the Latins, and the Armenians, are the tenants of the holy sepulchre—they have all the holy places in their hands. The Copts have a small chapel on the left side of the sepulchre; and the Syrians a small room within the Church, which was given to them by the Armenians, and they occasionally perform service there." The Sabbath Recorder.

NEW YORK, APRIL 17, 1845.

THE APPROPRIATE WORK OF THE MINISTRY.

A mistaken notion often prevails among ministers and laymen as to the appropriate work of the Gospel Ministry. They think and speak of it as designed mainly to interest the people for a few hours on the Sabbath day, and then to leave them uninfluenced during the intervening week. Wherever this notion prevails, it is certain that the importance of the ministry will not be appreciated, nor its real design secured. Now we venture to say, that there is no class of men in the community whose field of labor is more extensive, whose responsibility is greater, and whose influence will be more generally felt, than that of the minister of the Gospel. A glance at some part of his appropriate work will show this clearly enough.

The preaching of the Gospel is of course foremost among his duties. This is the instrumentality which God has appointed for communicating to men a knowledge of his character and government, of the relations and duties of men to each other, and of the way of salvation from sin. It is in this department of his work, that a minister, with like passions as other men, is brought into contact with them, and speaks to them of the claims of the Gospel with a warm heart, a beaming eye, and an eloquent tongue. Here mind touches mind, feeling awakens feeling, and truth is applied to the conscience so as to produce an imperishable impression. This is the instrumentality which worked such wonders in apostolic times, and has kept the flame of devotion burning to the present time. It is to the efforts of a living ministry, under God, that we are indebted for the principal reformations which have been produced, and to them we must look for renovating and saving influences in time to come. Yet it should not be supposed, that this part of the minister's work can be done effectually by one who is satisfied merely to interest or amuse a people for a few hours upon the Sabbath. There must be that whole-hearted consecration to it, and that irrepressible enthusiasm in it, which will make the minister a preacher in all times and places—a preacher from love of the work, as well as from a sense of obligation.

Closely connected with the work of preaching the Gospel, is that of maintaining the various religious institutions. An interest in the cause of missions, of tract distribution, of temperance, of Sabbath schools, and kindred objects, ought to be excited and promoted in every neighborhood. Yet facts have shown, with every passing year, that in order to give direction, concentration, and efficiency, to these auxiliary methods of doing good, a faithful ministry is indispensable. Go into any community where such a ministry is wanting, and you will generally find that the sanctuary is permitted to fall into decay, the prayer-meeting is lamentably neglected, the Bible is but little studied, and the interests of benevolence and humanity are treated with levity, if not with ridicule and contempt. The crowd of evils necessarily attendant upon such a state of things, cannot be contemplated without pain—the jealousies and contentions, the vices and crimes, the total absence of whatsoever is lovely and of good report. In view of such considerations, we see not how a thoughtful man can fail to regard the maintenance of religious and benevolent institutions as a most important part of the ministerial work.

The cause of general education, likewise, ought to find a faithful ally in the minister of the Gospel. The connection of ignorance with error and immorality, is too often overlooked by those who would promote piety and religion. They seem to forget that intelligence is the natural fruit of true religion, and that they generally go hand in hand. The doctrine that "ignorance is the mother of devotion," belongs to a past age or a corrupt church. It finds no countenance in the Word of God, which more than all other books inculcates and promotes growth in knowledge and every social virtue. It is a fact worthy of notice, that nearly all the academies and colleges which adorn and bless our country, owe their existence to Christian benevolence, and especially to the efforts of self-denying and godly ministers, who have laid their foundations with prayers and tears. Indeed, an instance can hardly be found on the pages of history, in which a high state of piety has existed without producing a good degree of general intelligence.

We believe, in short, that the work of the ministry ought not to be restricted to any one field. Its influence should be felt in every department of human interest. Even the pecuniary or secular interests of community should be most deeply affected by it. Who can estimate the amount of suffering from intemperance, pauperism, and crime, which may be prevented by an evangelical and devoted ministry? Or who can estimate the actual enjoyment and thrift which may result from its influence? Of course these are not to be the main reasons for encouraging the ministry; nor are they to be the primary objects of pursuit with the ministry. They are included, however, among the fruits which it yields, and they are fruits well deserving of cultivation. There is reason to fear, that the work of the ministry has been confined within too narrow limits, and that subjects of general interest have been too little discussed in the pulpit. It would add greatly to its influence and means of blessing mankind, if the field could be enlarged, so that while the ministry should aim to promote directly the spiritual and eternal interests of men, it should at the same time aim to promote their progress in intellectual cultivation and social happiness. Until this is the case, there is little reason to expect that its appropriate work will be effectually done.

CIVIL DISABILITIES OF THE JEWS.

Frederick of Prussia once said concerning the Jews, "I have learned by the experience of ages, that no man ever touched that people, but he smarted for it." This impression is becoming general, and is leading to a more mild and Christian legislation towards them. We are glad to see that in England Sir Robert Peel has announced that Government will soon bring forward a measure to remove entirely the civil disabilities of the Jews. At Hamburg, also, in consideration of the active and generous conduct of the Jews of that city, and of the banker Solomon Heine in particular, on the occasion of the great fire in 1842, the government of the city and province has felt it to be its duty to ameliorate the laws which weighed so heavily on this class of its population. Hitherto, the Jews of Hamburg have been restricted to commerce and to the exercise of the medical profession, but the council of ancients has proposed the opening to them of all professions and trades.

In Russia, a new Imperial Ukase has been issued, under date of Nov. 13, 1844, which contemplates incorporating the Jews in the empire, and provides schools for that end. By former ordinances, Jewish youth have been required to attend at the general schools. But this decree provides schools at the expense of government for their especial use. There are to be elementary schools sufficient for all practical purposes, and seminaries for the training of rabbis and teachers. The Emperor protests that this ukase is published in good faith, simply for the advantage of the Jews themselves. He therefore claims their hearty cooperation to carry it into effect. To the ukase of June 26th, forbidding the erection of any synagogue within a prescribed distance of an orthodox Greek Church, the Emperor has added a clause with his own hand, which prevents its application to any synagogue now existing. Another imperial ukase has been published, requiring that in every asylum of which Jewish children are inmates, a Jewish teacher of that faith, as well as a Jewish cook, shall be provided.

JEWISH SOLDIERS AND THE SABBATH.

A correspondent of one of the European papers, writing from St. Petersburgh, gives an interesting account of the religious constancy of the Jewish soldiers in Russia, and especially of their attachment to the Sabbath. There are in the Russian army and navy about 20,000 men of this faith, who are spoken of as adhering to the requirements of their ritual in the midst of the greatest difficulties and trials. In spite of their manifold hindrances, "the Sabbath, with its peaceful joys and family ties, conjugal fidelity, paternal and filial love, nay, even the passion for biblical study, and the absorbing devotion to ceremonial observances," continue to be upheld with a pride and decision which is truly ennobling. There are three congregations of Jewish soldiers in St. Petersburgh, at one of which from 400 to 500 men assemble on sacred days. On the Sabbath the usual services are performed by an assemblage dressed in the various uniforms of the soldiery, the regimental bands, and the hospital service. It frequently happens that the ukase obliges some of them to work as armourers on the Sabbath day, in the same house where worship is attended. In such cases, it is common for them, during some parts of the service, to run in and join with their brethren, even with their black hands and aprons—presenting a spectacle which could hardly fail to move the deepest feelings of a truly pious heart.

Such facts show the attachment of the Jews to the Sabbath. They have seen how God himself hath honored it; how many blessings have been connected with its observance, and how many curses have followed its neglect; hence it is not surprising that they love and magnify it. But it is surprising, and a thing which we cannot explain, that those who profess so much interest in the welfare of the Jews, and are laboring so zealously for their benefit, will yet dare to neglect the Sabbath themselves, and to encourage Jews to forsake it. We would as soon ask a Jew to break the third commandment or the ninth as the fourth. And he, if consistent, would as soon rebuke us in the one case as in the other. Multiplied are the instances in which he has done so, and has put to silence those who would win him to the Gospel, by referring them to the change of the Sabbath, which they attribute to the Founder of the Gospel. This species of argument will continue to be used, and the only way to escape its force is to remove all occasion for it. When will men learn, that the best preparation to pull the mote out of a brother's eye, is to remove the beam from one's own eye?

PERSECUTION IN CONSTANTINOPLE.

The Patriarch of Constantinople has hit upon several new expedients to arrest the progress of truth, and induce the members of the Armenian communion to withdraw from the instructions of the missionaries. The first is, to direct all the leading Armenians to withdraw their patronage from those who are piously disposed and inquiring. In that country nearly every young man is dependant upon some influential friend to advance him in the world. The concerted and simultaneous execution of the command is attended with most pernicious consequences. A second expedient is, to order the priests to require every person in their parishes—and particularly those suspected of being evangelical—to come to confession, receive absolution, and partake of the communion in the Armenian church. The names of those who refuse to do so, are to be handed to the Patriarch. It is thought that many of the more pious and enlightened Armenians can not, in good conscience, yield to the requisition. Heretofore they have not been required to make confession before God, the virgin, and the holy father the priest. If required to do so in future, many will be led to inquire whether they shall yield to the word of God or the commandments of men. It is the prerogative of the Patriarch to give or withdraw his protection from any individual of the church, and to occasion them great inconvenience thereby. The consequences of this step, therefore, will be very serious.

POSTAGE REFORM—SUGGESTIONS.

Our readers will remember, that the new Post Office Law goes into operation on the first day of July, and that after that date, Postmasters will have no right to frank orders or money for newspapers. We believe in making hay while the sun shines, and therefore take the liberty of suggesting a few things for the consideration of our friends.

1st. Now is the time for delinquent subscribers to remit their money. Much praise is due to our patrons for their promptness in forwarding their subscriptions. There are some, however, who have not yet found it convenient to do so; but who, we trust, will only need to have the subject suggested in order to secure for it immediate attention. We commenced the present volume with the expectation, that our list of subscribers would not be sufficient to afford any pecuniary profit, but that those who did subscribe would be prompt paymasters. We have not been disappointed in the first part of our expectation; we hope we shall not be in the last.

2d. Now is the time to forward the money for the second volume. The present year closes nine weeks from this date, or about the middle of June. We hope our friends will be looking forward to the time, and that they will show their approval of the "cash-in-advance" system by forwarding the pay for the next year before the new Post Office Law comes into operation. Those subscribers who are behind for the first volume, by forwarding $4, will secure a receipt in full to the end of the second volume.

3d. Now is the time to send on new subscribers. We want a considerable addition to our list before the commencement of the next volume. This can be had if our friends will take hold of the work in earnest. Past experience leads us to expect that they will do it. If each real friend of the enterprise would look about him and find one additional supporter for us, a most important object would be secured. Let us see what can be done by a voluntary and united effort.

Postmasters will cheerfully forward, free of expense, the names of new subscribers, and the money to pay their subscriptions, if respectfully asked to do so. It is well, in most cases, to write a letter stating what is wished, and then to hand it, with the money, to the Postmaster, for his signature and free stamp.

SABBATH EFFORTS.

We publish the following for the double purpose of informing our readers what others are doing and inciting them to go and do likewise. Are our friends—are you, reader—doing all that can be done to supply every family with permanent and truthful Sabbath Documents? If not, now is the time to begin. The documents are ready, and it is only necessary to furnish the money, do the work of distributing, and enjoy the reward. It is not sufficient to say, that your neighbors know your opinions; they ought to be supplied with the means of examining them thoroughly at their leisure. Until they are supplied, you will not be free from responsibility. Read the following from a correspondent of the Methodist Protestant:—

Dr. Edwards says, "Our efforts last year will, I suppose, put a copy of our 'Permanent Sabbath Document' into about 30,000 families. Might not your Association, (Baltimore Sabbath Association,) print an edition of it, and get a copy (at cost) into each family of every Protestant congregation, through the instrumentality of the friends of the Sabbath in that congregation? If so, it would do immense good. Or they might purchase them at $40 per 1000.

The friends in Rhode Island are making arrangements to put a copy into each family in that State. Wherever that is done, it is thought to be productive of great good."

With regard to the above suggestion I would say, that my excellent pastor, the Rev. James G. Hamner, has, at his own cost, distributed 100 copies through his congregation, and I have placed over 100 copies in families and in various library associations in our city and State, and I am fully satisfied that good has been done.

Now I would appeal to the benevolence of my fellow citizens, and ask them to aid us in this good work, and I will assure them that, if they will furnish the money, the Baltimore Sabbath Association will do the work of scattering these excellent documents throughout our city and State.

A Dilemma.—Among the evils resulting from the suspension of Bishop Onderdonk, one Episcopal paper mentions the fact, that "several editions of the Prayer-Book in the hands of New York publishers are entirely at a stand for want of the 'sanction of the bishop of the diocese, in which such editions are published.'" Important men those bishops are, truly; no church without them—no prayer-book without them! What shall be done?

Rev. James Milnor, D.D., Rector of St. George's church in this city, died on Tuesday evening, the 8th instant, having just attained the 71st year of his age. Dr. Milnor was for many years the Foreign Secretary of the American Bible Society, and during the twenty years of the American Tract Society's existence had officiated as the Chairman of its Executive and Publishing Committees. On the day, and almost up to the hour, of his death, he was employed in his pastoral labors, and in promoting the objects of Christian benevolence. He complained of illness only for a few minutes before he passed from his labor to his reward.

A TRACT, Showing that the Seventh Day should be observed as the Sabbath, instead of the First Day, "according to the commandment." By T. M. Preble.—Nashua, N. H., March, 1845.

Such is the title of a pamphlet of twelve pages lying upon our table. The writer is one of those who are looking for the speedy second appearance of the Lord, and he directs his tract "to the saints scattered abroad." His views were first published in "The Hope of Israel," and are republished in the present form for the sake of giving them as wide a circulation as possible. We think their circulation will do good. The following is from the address to the reader:—

"What authority have you in the Old or New Testament, to keep any day as a Sabbath, or day of rest?

Do you find any command in the New Testament? If not, why do you not observe the day that is appointed in the fourth commandment?

Has the day ever been changed? If so, when and where? Please point to the chapter and verse.

When you was a child, did not your parents and others who taught you to keep Sunday holy, direct you to the fourth commandment as authority for your keeping it thus? Did you ever think of the inconsistency?—The commandment says the seventh day, and you were taught to keep the first.

How could you reprove a person for working or doing any thing else on Sunday, or first day of the week, as the same law which makes it wrong to work, &c. on "God's holy day," commands the observance of the seventh day, instead of the first?"

TROUBLE ABOUT A JEWISH SYNAGOGUE.

The congregation of Israelites worshiping in Elm street, New York, has been somewhat divided for a time past in regard to the trusteeship of the synagogue. It seems that in August last, an attempt was made to exclude from voting for trustees all those persons who had not been admitted as members of the congregation by a vote of two-thirds. Although this was in accordance with a rule of the synagogue, there were some who contended that it contravened the law of the State, which provides for the election of trustees by all the members of the congregation. Hence arose dissatisfaction, and a protest against the whole proceeding. It so happened, that the six trustees were equally divided in opinion. The consequence was, that at a recent meeting, one party of them gave public notice to the pew-holders not to pay any money to the other party. An Israelite, who refused under this notice to pay his arrears, had a child taken sick, for whom he requested the reader of the synagogue to offer up prayers; but his request was not granted, on the ground that he was on the "black list," as it is termed. Another Israelite wanted the marriage ceremony performed, but was refused upon the same ground. Another, whose son was of suitable age to be confirmed, was refused the privilege to which the child was entitled. Two of the liberal trustees took this matter in hand at the morning service on Sabbath, March 15, granted the rights of the child, and all things went off quietly. In the afternoon of the same day; however, the other trustees caused the synagogue to be nailed up, and the silver service removed. This led to a strife about the possession of the synagogue, in the course of which each party held it for several days successively by force of numbers or stratagem. After the place had been besieged and defended for some time, the Mayor was called on to interfere, and the whole subject was taken in hand for a legal investigation.

SABBATH LEGISLATION—WHAT OTHERS THINK.

The following article is from the Democratic Freeman, published at Syracuse, N. Y. It shows that Seventh-day Baptists are not alone in their doubts about the wisdom of legislating in favor of Sunday:—

"Sabbath Keeping on the Canal.—The subject of closing the locks on the Canal on the first day of the week, has engaged the attention of the Legislature this winter, and a report has been made in favor of it by Mr. Howard. That there is expediency in resting from labor one day in the week is obvious, both as it regards health, happiness, and moral improvement. But when any one denomination undertakes to legislate, or to cause legislation in favor of the first day of the week, calling it the Sabbath, compelling men to cease laboring on that day, they infringe upon the rights of those who believe the seventh day only, is the Sabbath. And those who regard the seventh day, are thereby required to keep two days, if they would be true to their own consciences and the law. And here is the difficulty of legislating. It is not palpable to every body that there is any more sacredness in the first day of the week than the second or third. There are those who regard the change in the day as unauthorized—as the work of man without authority for so doing. If the matter can be settled somehow, by a general agreement, it would be better than to compel men to treat as sacred time, the day that has no authority therefor, in the Bible, save an inference of doubtful force. An appeal to the generous feelings of man and to his interest, would be better than the force of law."

DR. NEANDER ON BAPTISM.

The celebrated Dr. Neander, who stands at the head of the ecclesiastical historians of Germany, if not of all Europe, once wrote as follows to a correspondent at Andover, Mass:—

Berlin, August 23, 1833.

"Dear Sir—As to your question on the original rite of baptism, there can be no doubt whatever, that in the primitive times, the ceremony was performed by immersion, to signify a complete immersion into the new principles of life divine. When St. Paul says, that through baptism we are buried with Christ, and rise again with him, he unquestionably alludes to the symbol of dipping into, and raising out of the water. The practice of immersion, in the first centuries, was beyond doubt prevalent in the whole church."

Foreign Missions.—The Annual Meeting of the Foreign Missionary Society of New York and Brooklyn was held on Monday evening, 14th inst. The receipts for the year amounted to $11,974 88, most of which was paid into the Treasury of the American Board. Rev. Mr. Spaulding, Missionary from Ceylon, was present, and spoke encouragingly of the aspects of the missionary cause in Southern India. He urged the great importance of sending more laborers into that extensive field. Rev. Mr. Coe spoke of the great danger to the cause growing out of its very successes; there being too much reason to fear, that the church will rest satisfied with what has been done, and neglect the necessary means for doing more.

A Millerite Meeting was broken up a few nights ago in Bucksport, Me., by a company of some forty men disguised as negroes. It is stated that several men of intelligence and property, and some who are or have been magistrates, were engaged in this effort to "drive Millerism out of Bucksport." They think that in this case the end justifies the means—the Millerites are so wrong that the sooner they are put down the better, and no matter as to the means!

Another Watchman Fallen.—We announced only a few weeks ago, the death of Rev. Daniel H. Gillett, at Mobile, Ala. The Baptist Record informs us that his eldest brother, Rev. Philander D. Gillett, died at his residence in Fairport, N. Y., on the 29th of March, in the 50th year of his age.

☞ We find in the last number of Mr. Garrison's "Liberator," the entire Essay of Archbishop Whately on the subject of the Sabbath. The Essay is likewise to be put up in a cheap form for general circulation. Our readers have already had sufficient extracts from it to make them acquainted with its spirit and design. The Liberator also publishes the letters of Daniel Webster and Henry Clay, acknowledging their election as honorary members of the Baltimore Sabbath Association. The editor remarks simply, that "the whole correspondence is a satire upon Christianity."

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

From the N. Y. Telegraph.

Constantinople.—The new Patriarch of the Armenians, who formerly appeared friendly to the American Missionaries, has, since his preferment, issued an order, requiring the bankers to withhold their patronage from such artisans and others as are evangelical, and another order requiring each priest to see to it that every member of his parish comes to the confession and to the Lord's Supper, at least once a year.

$500 Donation from Baptist Ladies.—The ladies of the First Baptist Church, in Providence, Rhode Island, recently made the munificent donation of $500 to the American Tract Society, in aid of its colporteur operations. How beautiful is the Catholic feature of this noble enterprise, which is thus eliciting the cheerful co-operation of all the evangelical branches of the Christian church.

Religion in Missouri.—According to the State Census taken in 1844, there are in Missouri 511,937 persons, of whom only 168,246 can read and write. Eastern benevolence has done less for this than for other Western States; but a gradual change is going on. The American Home Missionary Society alone had there, last year, 21 Missionaries; and the emigration recently is said to be more generally than heretofore from the Eastern States.

New Mission to South America.—The converted Spanish monk, Signor Ramon Monsalvatge, is about to proceed as a missionary to South America under the auspices of the Foreign Evangelical Society of this city. This beginning of the good work for South America is worthy of congratulation; and the excellent character and spirit of the missionary, as well as his adaptedness to the work, inspire the hope that it will be eminently successful.

New Mission in Africa.—The English Church Missionary Society have lately begun a new mission in benighted Africa. The mission is quite large, and appears to have been begun with spirit. One of the missionaries is of the Yoruba tribe, who, when a boy, was stolen and sold into slavery. While on his passage, the slaver was captured by an English cruiser, and he carried to Sierra Leone, sent to England, educated, called to the ministry, and ordained by the Bishop of London.

Another New Mission.—The Christian Herald says, a Missionary Society has been organized among the emancipated negroes of Jamaica, (West Indies,) and they have already sent a Mr. Waddle, a colored preacher of Montego Bay, to the shores of Western Africa, to preach the word of God at their expense, in their father-land.

Father Mathew says, in a recent letter, "Our sacred cause is steadily progressing, notwithstanding the troublesome times upon which we have fallen. There are over five millions of teetotalers, and the proportion of backsliders is not one in five hundred. The whole of the rising generation are being educated in the strictest habits of temperance; and, in a few years, drunkenness will be as a thing passed away, never to return."

Dr. Abeel.—We regret to learn that Dr. Abeel, who has just returned from China, in the hope of recovering his health, is disappointed in that hope, and lies now dangerously sick at the house of a friend in New York city. His case is supposed to be a deep consumption.

A. B. C. F. M.—At the monthly concert of prayer on Monday, Dr. Anderson remarked, as an encouraging fact, that the contributions to the Board are nearly twenty thousand dollars in advance of what they were last year at this time. The receipts to the treasury of the Board from Aug. 1st to Feb. 28th, are $139,650,86.

General Intelligence.

Passengers of the Swallow.—A list has been published of the passengers on board the ill-fated Swallow at the time of her wreck. It appears that the whole number of passengers known to have been on board was 254. Of these 14 are known to have been lost, and all of their bodies, with a single exception, have been recovered. It is positively ascertained that 194 were saved, which leaves 46 of the number known to have been on board still unaccounted for by name, although it is hoped that nearly all of them were saved, either in the Rochester, the Express, or some of the small boats that went out from the shore.

It has been extensively reported through the papers, that Mrs. Thomas B. Stillman, of New York, was among the missing. It was Mrs. Stillman's intention to have come down the river on the night of the wreck, in which case she would probably have been on board the Swallow. This circumstance, together with the fact that an acquaintance in whose company she had proposed to come was known to have been on board and lost, excited the fears of her friends, and drew several of them to the scene of the disaster. We are happy to state, however, that she was providentially detained at Schenectady beyond her expectations, and was thus saved from all danger.

New York Legislature.—There was but little done, though much was talked of, during the last week. In the Assembly, the vote was taken upon the Constitutional amendments which had been under discussion; they were all lost for want of a two-thirds vote, except that dispensing with the property qualification for the office of Governor and Senator, and that in relation to the removal of judicial officers by the Governor and Senate. In the Senate a Committee was appointed to inquire into the particulars of the late disaster to the Steamboat Swallow, with power to send for persons and papers. Many petitions were presented for and against the excise law; also against closing the locks of the Canals on Sunday.

Fire at Pittsburg—1200 Houses Burnt.—A fire broke out in Pittsburgh on Wednesday night, April 9th, which continued to rage until Thursday evening. The ground burnt over included about 20 squares, with from 1000 to 1200 houses—many of the warehouses containing goods of immense value, the spring stock having just been laid in.

The progress of the flames was so fearfully rapid that many persons had not time to remove their goods—others, again, had got their property into the street, when the flames seized it there, before it could be removed to a place of safety. Others, still, would not believe the devouring element could reach their dwellings, and did not think of removing until it was too late to save their furniture; and many people escaped with nothing but the apparel they had upon their persons. At dark might be seen, in every direction, families sitting without shelter, guarding such portions of their household furniture as they were able to save from the flames, and not knowing where they would lay their heads, or procure a morsel of food.

There is abundant reason for thankfulness that so few lives were lost. There are many rumors of men being killed, and burnt and wounded, but they are not authenticated. One woman is certainly burned, and we saw a poor old man tottering along with the help of two friends, his face badly burned.

It will be many years before the city can recover from the effects of this dreadful calamity; it has cast a blight over the commercial and manufacturing enterprise of hundreds of our most worthy citizens, and in an hour has swept from them all the profits of years.

It is impossible to give an idea on paper, of the distress which prevails, thousands who were but yesterday wealthy, being now bankrupt. It has been estimated that the burnt district contains sixty acres; and that the loss of property will amount to nearly ten millions of dollars. The insurance offices will not be able to pay two per cent.

Good Example.—The Northampton Courier contains the following notice, conveying a hint, and creating an example which ought to be followed by the young men in every village. Look at old Deerfield. Nearly all those fine elms and maples of middling size, were set out, thirty or forty years ago, by the young men of the place, led on by their then newly settled pastor, now the justly venerated Dr. Willard. It was a good frolic for them in youth, but what beautiful results will they witness when old, from this sport of their manly youth. Plant trees, young men—plant trees in every street!

"Turn Out!—The members of the Horticultural Club turn out to-morrow for the purpose of setting out shade trees around our village. This is a worthy object, certainly. We hope many others will volunteer their services. Let not the cemetery be forgotten."

Cheap Postage on the Continent.—A letter from the Hague mentions a report that the government of the Netherlands is making preparations for a fundamental reform in its postal administration, by fixing the general postage throughout the kingdom at a tenth of a florin, or about two-pence English, and the petty postage within the towns at half that rate.

Luxuries in Paris.—The number of thieves carrying on their operations in Paris amounts, according to Gisquet, to 10,000. Of these, 6,000, he says, would take a purse from a room or the box of a theatre; 3,000 would take it from a man's pocket; 2,000 would slip into your house quietly; from 1,000 to 1,200 would break in violently; and 600 would not only commit robbery, but murder.

Interesting Experiments.—The most beautiful array of flowers may be produced by taking an elder stalk, punching out the pith, placing within the stalk a variety of seeds, whose flowers blossom about the same time, and burying the stalk, and when blossoming, it has various kinds of flowers, according to the seed planted in the stalk. This is a beautiful discovery, and well worth the experiment.

Mexican Nobles.—Although many changes have taken place during the revolution, it is not to be questioned that the nobility of Mexico during the Vice-Royalty were as rich as any European Grandees. The Count of Valenciana was possessed of landed property of about $20,000,000, besides which, he drew from a single mine an annual revenue of nearly $1,200,000. Their extravagance was as great as their wealth. The Count de Regia, according to Madame de la Barca, was so wealthy, that when his son, the present Count, was christened, the whole party walked from the house to the church upon ingots of silver. The Countess having quarreled with the Vice Queen, sent her, in token of reconciliation, a white satin slipper entirely covered with diamonds. The Count invited the King of Spain to visit his Mexican territories, assuring him that the hoofs of his Majesty's horse should touch nothing but solid silver fron Vera Cruz to the capital.

Great inequality prevails at the present time. Bustamente, whose name occurs so often in accounts from that country, is possessed of 396,000 acres of land, and Santa Anna is reputed to be very rich. What is called aggrarianism, has no supporters in Mexico.

Whaling Statistics.—The Polynesian of Oct. 19th, published at the Sandwich Islands, contains some interesting whaling statistics collected by the American Consul. The total amount of whaling property belonging to all nations touching at the Hawaian Islands, from Jan. 1, to Oct. 10, 1844, was $18,225,910, 373 ships, 10,800 men; a great proportion of which is American.

250 bbls. from one whale is a large amount. The Hope with 3600 bbls. had 125 to each whale, and only one whale is secured out of three killed. When struck by the harpoons they go down, and taking from 3 to 400 fathoms of line with them, considerable danger to men and boats is to be encountered in attempts to kill and secure the whales. The most successful ships this season were the South America, 3600 barrels, whale; 100 sperm; 36,000 lbs. bone; value, $49,600. Hamilton, 3300 whale; 70 sperm; 42,000 bone; worth $46,960. Ship Lowell, 4000 bbls. whale; 300 sperm; 40,000 bone; worth $60,400.

A Horrible Discovery has been made in England, at a Government investigation, relative to the burning of dead bodies by grave yard proprietors, to make room for fresh interments. It was in evidence, that men were seen by moonlight in a London grave yard, dragging bodies from the graves by the hair of their heads to an underground furnace, where they burnt them. Baskets of moving flesh were carried to the same furnace. It is also intimated that candles have been made from the fat, obtained by boiling the bodies; the teeth pulled out and sold to dentists, and the hair disposed of to wig-makers, it being more highly prized than the hair of living persons.

Curious Fulfillmemt of a Promise.—An English gentleman, on a Sunday evening of last summer, drove out to Greenwood Cemetery, and on arriving at the gate was refused admission, not having a proprietor's ticket. "I am a stranger," he said, "and don't like to go back without seeing the place. And you may as well admit me, for my health is going, and if I fancy a spot, I'll come and lay my bones here!" The quiet seriousness with which this quaint argument was urged, pleased the gate-keeper, and he drew the bolt and let the pleader in. He drove about till the twilight, and, on passing out, thanked the keeper very feelingly, and said he should keep his promise. A few days ago, a gentleman called with a description of a particular spot in the Cemetery, identified and purchased it, mentioning that the remains of an English gentleman were on their way from Palermo for burial there. He was the subject of the incident just related. Before his death he had recorded his promise to the gate-keeper, and given orders for his removal to the place he had chosen, requesting that the fulfillment of his promise might be mentioned as he should pass through the gate. His remains are expected daily. [Evening Mirror.

New Jersey.—The New Election Law, which has just passed the Legislature of New Jersey, entirely does away with all the October Elections in that State, and requires all the Fall Elections to be held on "the Tuesday after the first Monday in November," which is the same day fixed by Congress at its late session for the Presidential Elections to be held in each State in the Union (not even excepting the chivalrous Palmetto State of South Carolina) and for ONE day only, and not two as formerly. (The Elections of New York and New Jersey will hereafter be held on the same day.)

The Nantucket Inquirer states that Rev. L. R. Sunderland lately put a woman in that place into the mesmeric state, and that, while in that state, Dr. Dillingham extracted a tooth which two physicians had examined and pronounced to be firmly set in her head.

Narrow Escape.—A few days since, Mr. Gardner Brewer, of this city, fell into one of the vats of his distillery, (we are unacquainted with the technicalities of the business,) the gas of which is instantly fatal to animal life. Most fortunately, he caught by his arms on the sides, and was rescued before descending far enough to inhale the poison. Mr. B. was somewhat bruised, but is again abroad. [Boston Post.

Very few distillers escape destruction, sooner or later, from the "fatal gas" which comes from their vats. To die by suffocation in the vats were far the least terrible of all the deaths occurring by their horrid "poison." May Mr. Brewer's gratitude to a kind Providence for his remarkable deliverance, touch his conscience, and awaken his sensibilities in regard to the hundreds and thousands of his fellow men, whom he has poisoned and plunged into a drunkard's grave—for the sake of a few cents! [Chronicle.

The colored Man.—The editor of the Canton Repository, very well says: "Alexander Dumas, a colored man, of Paris, and one of the best writers of the age, is editor of La Presse, a prominent French paper, at a salary of 80,000 francs a year."

Dumas would not be permitted to testify in a court of justice, in Cincinnati, and would have to give bonds and security not to become a charge upon the township, and if he refused, the prosecuting attorney of Hamilton county would grow very fierce. [Cin. Her.

A great foot-race came off at New Orleans a few Sundays ago, at which there was an immense turn-out.

Law Making.—Many years ago the inhabitants of our good town undertook to frame a code of by-laws for the protection of the town from danger by fire. One of the articles provided that "No person should carry fire from place to place except in an old broken vessel with a cover to the same." Any person, therefore, who should carry fire in a new or a whole vessel, if it was ever so safe, would be liable to the penalty.

This reminds us of a municipal law of the town of Boston, previous to the revolution, which obliged all negroes who appeared in the streets in the evening, to carry a lantern. This was faithfully complied with, but the negroes put no candles in their lanterns. Another law was then made that they should carry a lantern with a candle in it. This was also obeyed, but Sambo put in his candle without lighting it. These wise legislators then provided that the lantern should have a lighted candle in it, and by this third enactment expressed more plainly their first intention. [Danvers Courier.

Patent Medicines.—Among the various means of attaining sudden wealth in this country, the discovery of a popular "patent" medicine has often proved singularly successful. A letter from New York, published in the Charleston Courier, cites various examples in point:

"Brandreth, with his pills, has risen from a poor man, to be a man of extensive fortune. He has now at Sing Sing a three-story factory for grinding his medicines. Aloes are carted into it by the ton, and whole cargoes of the pills are despatched to every part of the Union, and down every body's throat. He has expended thirty-five thousand dollars in a single year for advertising. Comstock began with nothing, but by crowding his patent medicines, has been able to purchase one of the first houses in Union Place, and gives magnificent soirees, suppers, &c. Moffat, adding bitters to pills, has run up a handsome fortune of nearly $300,000. Sherman, taking the lozenge line, has emerged from his little shop in Nassau street, into a buyer of lots and houses by the wholesale. I need not mention Swaim, of Philadelphia, who, by pouring his panacea into people's stomachs, can afford to buy a single pearl headband for his daughter worth $20,000, to prove that we are a pill-eating and bitters-drinking people. Your literary man will starve in his garret, while your pill-maker will emerge from his garret into a palace."

A Challenge.—Horne Tooke having challenged Wilkes, sheriff of London, the latter wrote the following laconic reply:—

Sir—I do not think it my business to cut the throat of every desperado that may be tired of his life; but as I am at present high sheriff of London, it may happen that I shall shortly have an opportunity of attending you in my official capacity, in which case I will answer for it, that you shall have no ground to complain of my endeavors to serve you.

A Petrified Apple.—The Indiana (Pa) Register says: We were shown last week by Dr. Stewart of this borough, a petrified apple, which was found some time since in Armstrong township, in this county, immediately beneath where stood a large tree which bore fruit precisely similar in shape and appearance to this apple. It has changed into a sandstone of whitish cast, and is truly a beautiful and perfect specimen of petrifaction. Upon one side of the apple there is a small spot which seemed to have commenced to decay, and its color has changed to that which is usual upon rotten fruit, which appearance it still retains, and is as hard and full at that particular place, as upon any other portion of the apple. From this it would appear that the quality of petrifaction has the same effect upon decayed that it has upon undecayed matter.

Counterfeit fives have made their appearance on the Hudson River Bank, Hudson, N. Y.

Married while Crazy.—The Vermont Supreme Court is engaged in considering what degree of mental capacity is required to make the marriage contract. A case has been tried in which a man seeks a divorce, on the ground of partial insanity. An old bachelor, just at our elbow, who, although making the strongest attestations of hatred for the sex, nevertheless, when he can get the chance, is a most accomplished and amiable gallant, says that if the plea of "partial insanity" would be allowed in the courts, it would separate nine-tenths of the whole wedlock fraternity. [Cin. Enq.

Condescension.—The queen, so says the London Times, held the young prince for the space of five minutes, in her own arms, and then transmitted the babe to Prince Albert, who, with princely condescension, rapidly passed the royal infant to the nurse. Such an example is enough to soften a nation's heart.

SUMMARY.

A remarkable decision has recently been made by Vice President Dallas, which authorizes Senators to receive mileage (both ways) for their attendance at the Executive Session held after the fourth of March, although not one of the whole number had traveled a single mile. The two Senators from Louisiana received $1,840 each; the two from Arkansas $1,680 each; others according to the distances they would have had to travel if they had gone home and returned. The whole amount will be about $30,000.

Dr. Thomas Sewall, one of the oldest Physicians of Washington, and well known in Europe as well as throughout the United States, died of pneumonia on Wednesday, 9th inst.

The Illinois papers contain frequent accounts of robberies and outrages committed by the Mormons.

We regret to see it stated in the Richmond Enquirer, that the peach crop in Virginia has been destroyed by the early blossom and subsequent frosts.

A summary mode of settling the license question has been adopted by the corporation of Huntsville, Ala., who have fixed the license for retailing spirituous liquors within one mile of the court house, at $2,500.

A monument to Christopher Columbus is to be erected at Turin, Italy. The king has given 50,000 livres for the purpose, and a commission has been appointed to raise further subscriptions.

Some idea may be formed of the intercourse of our country with the Sandwich Islands, from the fact that 214 American vessels, with 6,434 seamen, and cargoes valued at $11,002,832, touched at the several islands between the 1st of January, 1844, and the 10th of October of the same year.

A correspondent of the True Sun urges the formation of a Society in our City and the raising of $25,000 by subscription to provide free tickets hence to Chicago, Milwaukie, &c., for such young women of our City as may choose to migrate Westward in search of employment, husbands and happiness.

The Legislature of Pennsylvania has agreed to adjourn on the 15th of this month. It will be the shortest session held for several years. On the 16th the per diem allowance to Members, according to an enactment of the last Legislature, would have been reduced to $1 50. This probably operated on the minds of the Members, and as a natural consequence shortened the session.

The half-pay alone of the military and naval establishment of Great Britain, amounts annually to $24,000,000. This amount would nearly cover the original cost of the army and navy of the United States. No wonder the poor of England "cry for bread."

A bill has passed the Legislature authorizing the Governor of Missouri to agree with the Governor of Iowa to refer the disputed boundary line between this State and the Territory to the arbitration of the Supreme Court of the United States, and $2,000 have been appropriated, as a fee for the employment of counsel.

The body of a full-blooded Cherokee was recently found about six miles west of Evansville, Ark. When discovered he had a knife firmly grasped in his hand, with which he appeared to have fought desperately. Two fingers were found near him, which he had cut off the hand of his murderer in his struggle for life.

At present there are about 13,000 tons of Iron made per annum in Northern New-York. So rich is that section of the State in Iron Ore that this amount could easily be trebled and quadrupled. The want of capital we presume is the chief obstacle to the extension of the manufacture.

The Boston day line over the Long Island Railroad will be run until further notice, only on Monday, Wednesday and Friday, via Norwich and Worcester, and return from Boston on the alternate days.

The Morris Canal Co. have now twelve hundred men at work on the enlargement, and have the utmost confidence that it will be ready for operation, for boats of sixty tons, on the 1st June.

A Mr. Charles J. Cone, a journeyman hatter in Danbury, Ct., killed himself with opium a few days since. He was an intemperate man.

The Far West Seminary was burned on the 27th ult. The building was nearly complete at the time of the accident. The fire originated among some shavings. The loss is estimated at $1,300. This is an unfortunate accident, as this is the first chartered college in Arkansas, and we regret to say, the only one.

Mr. Ritchie, who is about to assume the duties of official editor at Washington, is said to be seventy years old. He has edited the Richmond Enquirer for forty-one years—and, the common fate of editors, leaves the scene of all his struggles and his many triumphs, poor.

The Mormons are now most assiduously building a wall around their unfinished Temple. It is to be of solid masonry, 6 feet thick and 14 high, and to enclose 6 acres.

A late number of the Polynesian says that the lip of a "right whale," taken on the North West Coast the last season, furnished eighteen barrels of oil; and the bone of his mouth measured seventeen feet in length.

The largest canal boat ever built has been launched at Buffalo, and is to be employed in the lumber trade between Philadelphia and Albany. It will carry 160 tons on the river.

Last Tuesday, there was a black frost at Raleigh, N. C., which turned every thing "black in orchard and garden." It is supposed the fruit has been destroyed.

The Presse states that the number of dogs destroyed in Paris by the police, since the beginning of the year, amounts to not less than 10,000.

We learn from the Buffalo Commercial Advertiser that the number of buildings erected in that city within the last year is upward of four hundred, the estimated cost of which is about $450,000.

FOREIGN NEWS.

The steamship Great Western reached New York yesterday (Wednesday) forenoon, bringing dates to March 29. The news is not important. English papers are full of annexation articles, in which some very hard things are said about the United States. Yet annexation is spoken of as more painful than surprising. President Tyler's Message to Congress in relation to the slave trade was under discussion in the House of Commons. A terrible explosion is mentioned in Algiers, by which nearly 100 lives were lost. Nothing else of special importance.

MARRIED.

In Scott, Cortland Co., N. Y., by Rev. R. G. Burdick, Mr. James M. Saunders, of Hamilton, Madison Co., to Miss Ellen A. Babcock, daughter of Luke P. Babcock, of the former place.

DIED,

In Persia, Cattaraugus Co., N. Y., on the 2d inst., Mrs. Cornelia Whitford, wife of Stephen Whitford, in the 41st year of her age. Mrs. Whitford embraced religion in early life, and united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Brookfield, N. Y., of which she continued a worthy member until she removed to Persia in the fall of 1830. In 1832 she became a member of the church in Persia, with which she remained connected until removed from the church below to join the church triumphant. She has left a companion and an only daughter, who will long remember the affectionate wife and mother. They will mourn, however, as for one in whose case there is hope, and will look forward joyfully to a re-union beyond the grave.

Dearest sister, thou hast left us,
Here thy loss we deeply feel;
But 'tis God that hath bereft us,
He can all our sorrows heal.

Yet again we hope to meet thee,
When the day of life has fled,
Then in heaven with joy to greet thee,
Where no farewell tear is shed.

In Persia, N. Y., on the 19th of March, Ira, son of Allen and Eliza Prentice, aged two years and eight months.

So fades the lovely blooming flower,
Frail smiling solace of an hour;
So soon our transient comforts fly,
And pleasures only bloom to die.

EASTERN ASSOCIATION.

The Eastern Seventh-day Baptist Association will hold its Ninth Anniversary with the Church at Waterford, Ct., on the fourth day of the week before the fourth Sabbath, in May, (21st day of the month,) at 11 o'clock A. M. It is hoped that the churches associated will take measures to have a full representation; also that the several committees will be prepared to report upon the subjects referred to them.

W. B. Gillett,
Paul Stillman, } Rec. Sec's.

ANNIVERSARIES OF OUR SOCIETIES.

The Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association will hold its Third Anniversary in Plainfield, N. J., on the ourth day of the week before the third Sabbath in May next, being the 14th day of the month, at 11 o'clock A. M. It is desirable that all missionary reports should be made to the Secretary previous to that time.

W. B. Gillett, Rec. Sec., New Market, N. J.

The American Sabbath Tract Society will hold its Second Anniversary in Plainfield, N. J., on the fifth day of the week before the third Sabbath in May, being the 15th day of the month, at 10 o'clock A. M. Auxiliary Societies or Churches that have taken action to aid the Society, and Agents who have not already reported, are requested to make their reports with the least possible delay, that the Board of Directors may be able to present a full statement of their labors since the last Anniversary.

F. W. Stillman, Rec. Sec., New York.

NOTICE.

The Missionaries who have been laboring under appointments from the Board of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association, are requested to make a full report of their labors since the last meeting of Conference, that it may be incorporated into the Annual Report of the Society. Please to send through the post-office, so that your letters may reach the Cor. Sec. about the first of May.

All local societies, and churches of Seventh-day Baptists, who have engaged in missionary labors during the past year, are requested to forward us an account of their labors through the same medium, and at or about the same time.

Brethren having important facts to csmmunicate respecting opening fields for missionary labor will do well to forward the same to the address of Samuel Davison,
Cor. Sec. S. D. B. M. Ass'n.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

This Institution has a pleasant and quiet location thirteen miles south-east of Angelica, and six miles south of Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y., under the care of W. C. Kenyon, as Principal, and Miss Caroline B. Maxson, as Preceptress, aided by able and experienced assistants.

Teachers' Classes will be exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining every facility of a Normal School, without its usual disadvantages. Within the past year, more than one hundred and fifty students of the institution have been employed as teachers in this and the adjacent counties—a number much larger than from any other institution in the State.

Students are prepared for entering any class in College. Ample advantages are also secured to those pursuing Modern Languages and the Fine Arts. The institution is liberally endowed and supplied with a choice and valuable library, and apparatus sufficiently extensive to illustrate every department of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. It has also well selected cabinets of Geological, Mineralogical and Conchological specimens.

The plan of instruction aims at the development of the moral, intellectual and physical powers of students, so as to render them thorough, accurate, and practical scholars.

Lectures on Chemistry, accompanied by a full course of experiments, will commence with the second week of the fall term, and continue daily to its close. During the fall and winter terms, daily lectures will be given on School Teaching. Lectures on Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Physiology, illustrated by experiments, will be given each term of the year.

Tuition, per term of fifteen weeks, from $3,50 to $5. Board per week, in private families, $1. The entire expense of the academic year, including tuition, board, washing, light, and fuel, need not exceed $60. No extra charges incurred.

SAMUEL RUSSEL,
President of the Board of Trustees.

The Sabbath Recorder,

☞ Communications, orders, and remittances, should be directed (post paid) to Geo. B. Utter, No. 9 Spruce Street, New York.

Miscellaneous.

THE RAINBOW.

BY MRS. AMELIA B. WELBY.

I sometimes have thought in my loneliest hours,
That lie on my heart like the dew on the flowers,
Of a ramble I took one bright afternoon,
When my heart was as light as a blossom in June;
The green earth was moist with the late fallen showers,
The breeze fluttered down and blew open the flowers,
While a single bright cloud to its haven of rest,
On the white wing of peace floated off in the west.

As I threw back my tresses to catch the cool breeze,
That scattered the rain-drops and dimpled the seas,
Far up the blue sky a fair rainbow unrolled
Its soft-tinted pinions of purple and gold!
'Twas born in a moment, yet, quick as its birth,
It has stretched to the uttermost ends of the earth,
And, fair as an angel, it floated all free,
With a wing on the earth, and a wing on the sea.

How calm was the ocean! how gentle its swell!
Like a woman's soft bosom, it rose and it fell;
While its light sparkling waves, stealing laughingly o'er,
When they saw the fair rainbow, knelt down to the shore,
No sweet hymn ascending, no murmur of prayer,
Yet I felt that the spirit of worship was there,
And bent my young head in devotion and love,
'Neath the form of the angel that floated above.

How wide was the sweep of its beautiful wings,
How boundless its circle, how radiant its wings!
If I looked on the sky, 'twas suspended in air,
If I looked on the ocean the rainbow was there;
Thus forming a girdle as brilliant and whole
As the thoughts of the rainbow that circle my soul!
Like the wing of the Deity calmly unfurl'd,
It bent from the cloud and encircled the world.

There are moments, I think, when the spirit receives
Whole volumes of thought on its unwritten leaves,
When the folds of the heart in a moment unclose,
Like the innermost leaves from the heart of a rose;
And thus, when the rainbow had passed from the sky,
And thoughts it awoke were too deep to pass by,
It left my full soul like the wing of a dove,
All fluttered with pleasure, all fluttering with love.

I know that each moment of rapture or pain,
But shortens the links in life's mystical chain;
I know that my form, like that bow from the wave,
May pass from the earth, and lie cold in the grave;
Yet, oh! when death's shadows my bosom encloud,
When I shrink from the thought of the coffin and shroud,
May hope, like the rainbow, my spirit unfold,
In her beautiful pinions of purple and gold.

The Slave-Holder and his Slave Ben.

Lucy was a colored woman, who had been a slave, but was now free, residing in Cincinnati, whose husband was still a slave in a slave State, from whence she had removed on being emancipated by her dying Mistress. All her efforts were directed to the liberation of Ben, her husband, which she hoped some day to effect by purchase. For this purpose she worked hard and lived poor, that she might lay up what money she could get to purchase her husband, and the father of her children.

She had three children, Harry, a stout, healthy boy of eleven years; Susan, a slender, sickly child of nine; and little Ned, about five. The two elder children remembered their father, and the little one scarcely understood that he did not, so constantly was he hearing and talking of him. At all events, he was fully imbued with the animating spirit which pervaded this happy family,—happy in having constantly in view the attainment of a blessing which called forth all the energies of their nature. 'Daddy's freedom' was the goal toward which every thought and every movement tended. Day and night Lucy was at her washing and ironing. Harry brought and carried the clothes, and gave all other assistance in his power to his mother, in fetching water, preparing fires, &c. Susan prepared the meals, but they scarcely allowed themselves any other food than the broken victuals they were permitted to get from a neighboring boarding-house. Little Ned, if he could do no more, could clap his hands at the sight of every new bundle of clothes brought for his mother to wash.

Harry had one day been gone rather longer than usual to the boarding-house for the fragments of their dinner. Little Ned, who was watching, at last espied him laboring under the additional burden of a well known and welcome sight, a large bundle of clothes. 'He's coming, mother, and he's got a nice great big bundle of clothes for you to wash.' Harry ran in, overflowing with important information.

'Oh! mother, there's ever so many strangers at Mrs. Gibson's, and I know you'll have the washing of them all, for the gentleman I brought these clothes for, says he'll ask them, and he's a nice kind gentleman, and I told him all about how hard you worked, and all of us, for father's freedom; and I told him all about your great box full of money, and about how our little mug was almost full, and he gave me a whole quarter of a dollar to put in, and I am going to show him that it's the biggest piece we ever got yet.'

Lucy, who was accustomed to his loquacity, did not till this moment turn round, when she beheld a gentleman standing in a very thoughtful mood. It was a countenance well known to her, though hers was entirely unknown to him. Children, unless you have some portion of romance in your composition, you will not conjecture who this was. Know, then, it was her husband's master, the master of Ben, a slaveholder.

Lucy was greatly agitated, and sunk down on the floor, covering her face with both her hands. She had not heard from her husband for two years, and she knew that the cholera had been very destructive among the colored people in that part of the country she had left. Now that information was at hand, she dreaded to hear, but suspense was intolerable. 'What is the matter, good woman?' said the slaveholder; 'what are you frightened at?' With a great mental effort, and raising her heart to heaven for support, she sobbed out, 'Oh! master, my poor husband! is Ben alive?'

'Ben, what Ben? I don't know who your husband is.'

'Oh master! Ben Wilson, your carpenter, that's got a great scar on his right cheek.'

It was now the slaveholder's turn to be agitated, but repressing his emotion he hastened to relieve Lucy.

'My carpenter, Ben, your husband! Yes, he's alive and well, and as honest, faithful a fellow, as ever.'

'Thank God! thank God!' said Lucy. 'Oh! if he's alive, I know he's good.'

The slaveholder now threw himself into the only chair Lucy's room afforded. He had been much interested by the simple relation of Harry, as he had walked along with him, and been attracted by it to enter the dwelling. He saw its reality; every thing bespoke the greatest indigence. Susan had placed on the table, or rather wash bench, their only table, the heterogenous fragments of the dinner from which he had dined the day before. There was no superfluity of table apparatus; there was but one dish out of which all were to eat, and but one knife and fork. Yet they had hundreds of dollars hoarded up.

Harry by this time had placed the little mug of silver before him; 'but I can't lift mother's box,' said he. 'Do, mother, help me; you can tell how much there is in it.' The box too was soon at his feet, and they all now surrounded the slaveholder, who appeared to have lost the power of speech.

'Feel how heavy the box is,' said Harry.

'Feel how heavy little mug is,' said Ned, and in attempting to hand it to him, he scattered all the little shining six, ten, and twelve cent pieces, around the slaveholder. Each little piece, as it fell, seemed to sound a reproach to his heart. Lucy named the sum she had.

'Oh, master!' said she, falling at his feet, the children all following her example; 'Oh, master! won't you be willing to sell Ben his freedom. I know there is not enough yet,' said she, with a desponding look, which suddenly changed to one of proud satisfaction, as she added, 'for Ben is worth a good price, I know.'

'Is there not almost enough for father's freedom?' said little Sue.

'Do, please do, let daddy be free, said little Ned.

The slaveholder was still speechless.—Think you he was touched by the scene before him?

'Is master sick?' said Lucy.

'Yes, good woman,' he replied; 'yes, sick, sick of myself, sick of slavery, sick of every thing.' Poor Lucy, not understanding him, looked bewildered. The slaveholder, with great effort, calmly added, 'Lucy, your husband has been worth more to me than all the money you have in that box. I have no right to any of it. Keep it for yourselves. Your husband is free from this moment. May you all be as happy as you deserve to be.' He then darted out of the house.

Lucy continued on her knees, and in silence poured out the gratitude of her heart to that Being to whom she had learned to look 'in trouble and in joy.' The children of course could not understand all their mother's feelings, but they understood that the long-desired blessing had arrived; they understood that their father was now free, and they had been taught whom to thank for all blessings.

'Mother is thanking God,' said Ned, in a low voice, 'because father is free.'

'Let us thank him too,' said Susan.

'How shall we say it?' said Harry.

'Our teacher says no matter what words we say; I'll say it,' said Susan, and folding her little hands, said, 'thank you, good Father in Heaven, for being so good to father, and mother, and Harry, and me, and Ned.'

'Thank you, good Father in Heaven,' responded both the other children.

Their mother turned to them with overflowing eyes, and kissing them all, said, 'How happy your father will be to find he has got such good children.'

'How soon will father get here?' said Harry.

'I cannot tell. I hope soon.'

'Shan't we have some dinner to day?' said little Ned.

'Oh, no matter for dinner,' said Harry, dancing about and kicking over the wash bench, with all the dinner, which safely lodged itself in a tub of suds. 'No matter for dinner,' said he, a little more seriously as he saw the dinner's fate, but soon began singing and capering about—'Daddy's free, daddy's free; daddy, daddy, we shall see, Oh how happy we shall be,' &c.

Little Ned, and even poor little Sue, were soon animated to join in the frolic.

After they had danced and sung till they were tired, the want of dinner began to be felt. 'What shall we have for dinner?' was the general inquiry, with a look at the unlucky tub of suds.

'You may go and buy something for dinner,' said their mother.

'Buy dinner!' said little Ned, with astonishment.

'To be sure,' said Harry, 'we may buy dinner now. What shall I get, mother?'

'You may get what you please,' said their mother. 'You shall choose your dinner the day of your father's freedom.'

'I'll have some gingerbread,' said Harry.

'I'll have gingerbread too,' said Ned.

'Mother,' said Susan, 'May Harry buy me an orange, it would taste so good?'

'Yes. Harry, get a couple of nice oranges for her;' and she looked anxiously at Susan, as she observed her pallid countenance and parched lips. 'Susan, my dear, I am afraid I have not attended to you as I ought. You look sick and feverish; you have not had proper food.'

'Oh yes, mother, I have; I should not have liked to have you spend money for me.'

'What will you have for your dinner, mother?' said Harry.

'Oh, anything. You may get me some chocolate.'

Let not our carpenter, Ben, be forgotten. He was among the happiest of the happy, at the news of his freedom, which his master himself communicated to him, relating also a great part of the scene which passed at Lucy's hovel. He was impatient to set out and join his family, and take a look at the great world. Gladly would we convey to the children some idea of the joy of their meeting, but find ourself inadequate to the task, and therefore leave it to their own imagination.

Let each of our young readers fancy that it had been his or her father, and you will understand the joy better than we can describe.

EXTREMITIES OF COLD.

A History of the most remarkable extremities of cold within a space of more than a thousand years.

In A. D. 401, the Black Sea was entirely frozen over.

In 462, the Danube was frozen so that Theadmare marched on the ice to Swaibia to avenge his brother's death.

In 761, the cold was so intense that the straits of Dardanelles and the Black Sea were entirely frozen over. The snow in some places drifted to the depth of 50 feet, and the ice was heaped in such quantities in the cities, as to cause the walls to fall down.

In 890, the Aidratic was entirely frozen over.

In 891, and also in 893, the vines were killed by frost, and the cattle died in their stalls.

In 991 the winter lasted very long, and was extremely severe. Every thing was frozen; and famine and pestilence closed the year.

In 1067, the cold was so intense that most of the travelers in Germany were frozen to death on the roads.

In 1133, it was excessively cold in Italy, the Po was frozen from Cremona to the sea; the heaps of snow rendered the roads impassable; the wine casks burst, and trees split by the frost with an immense noise.

In 1216, the river Po froze to the depth of 15 ells, and wine also burst the casks.

In 1234, a pine forest was killed by the frost at Ravenna.

In 1235, the frost was most intense in Scotland, and the Categat was frozen between Norway and Jutland.

In 1282, the houses in Austria were buried with snow.

In 1292, the Rhine was frozen, and in Germany, 600 peasants were employed to clear the way for the Austrian army,

In 1344, all the rivers in Italy were frozen over.

In 1468, the winter was so severe in Flanders, that the wine was cut with hatchets to be distributed to the soldiery.

In 1584, the winter was so severe that the Rhine and Scheldt were frozen, and even the sea at Venice.

In 1670, the frost was very intense in England and Denmark; both the Little and the Great Belt were frozen over.

In 1684, many forest trees, and even the oaks in England, were split with the frost.

In 1692, the cold was so excessive, that the starved wolves entered Vienna, and attacked both men and cattle.

The cold of 1740 was scarcely inferior to that of 1692, and the Zuyder Zee was entirely frozen over.

In 1776, much snow fell, and the Danube bore ice five feet thick below Venna.

THE PAST.

My thoughts are of the Past! I live again
Through all the scenes of Youth's impassioned hours:
I only know how happy I have been,
And breathe an air that comes o'er fields of flowers.
The Present doth not once intrude, to blast
My joyous revels with its baleful breath,
And o'er the Future some kind Power hath cast
A vail like that which shrouds the realms of Death.
The friends I loved are 'round me, and I hear
Familiar voices sounding in my ear:
Again we roam through forest, field, and glen,
And talk of themes that filled our musings then.
The kiss of love is on my cheek—I feel
Through all my veins its burning influence steal.
I dream again the same half-waking dreams
That solaced then the weary hours of night,
And every pulse with some fond memory teems
Of heaven-born hope, that could not bear the light.
The Past! In its illimitable sea
The wrecks of all my argosies are strewn;
And close beside me, plainly, now I see
The fiend that laughs at all my hopes o'erthrown!

There is a time of freshness, when the heart
Breaks from the bondage of its youthful fear,
And, trampling on its fetters, takes a part
In those wild wars that claim its service here:
When, like an eagle bursting from its shell,
It seeks a doom no prescience can foretell.
There is an hour, when passions strong and deep
Wake from the torpor of their dreamless sleep,
And rushing wildly from their dark domain,
Bid Peace farewell, and know her not again.
That time—that fatal hour—with me hath passed,
And years have swept me with their withering blast.
Yes, I have known the pangs that rend the heart,
When the short summer of its joy is o'er—
When one by one it feels its hopes depart,
And drives a wreck upon a barren shore.
I am not what I was! Care doth destroy
The gladsome aspect of the gallant boy.
Passion doth trace upon his lineless brow
Deep furrows, and his head is taught to bow
Beneath accumulating weights, that press
The life-blood from his soul. The sweet caress
Is mine no longer as in other days;
No fairy arms are twined for me; no gaze
Of guileless love rests on me, unsubdued
By those hot passions that on bliss intrude;
No more for me doth Beauty rear her crest,
Or fond Affection nestle in my breast.
Misfortune made me from my very birth
The helpless target for her poisoned spears:
I never yet have known an hour of mirth
That was not followed by an hour of tears.
I am not what I seem! There is a light
Within my eye which never was so gay;
And yet my soul, in moonless, starless night,
Is wasting like a wave-washed rock away!

Oh happy hour! When from each traitorous woe
My soul, exulting, shall escape its chains,
And fly to regions where it ne'er shall know
Its earthly passions or its earthly pains.
In that bright world my soul shall reap that bliss
It ever sought, but never found in this.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

My Mother.

"Let me the tender office long engage,
To rock the cradle of reposing age;
With lenient arts extend a mother's breath,
Make languor smile, and smooth the bed of death:
Explore the thought, explain the asking eye,
And keep awhile, one parent from the sky.
POPE.

From the Youth's Companion.

Robbing God.

"Only see mother, what nice sweetmeats I have got, and now I am going to eat them. How good they will taste."

"I am sorry you spent your money in this manner, my daughter. It is wrong. Such articles are injurious to health; and in using them you are guilty of robbing God."

"Mother, how can you say that? I did not take them without paying for them, and my money is my own, I am sure."

"It is your own as it regards any one else. But as it regards God, it is not your own. It is his, and his alone. Whatever we have is given us of God to use for his glory. You know I hire Amelia to do house-work and sew and take care of the children. I entrust to her care articles of clothing, provisions, furniture, and sometimes I leave her to take care of you and Georgianna. How should she regard all these, as mine or as her own?"

"As yours, mother; you pay her for her work, and she ought to use all these things for you and not for herself."

"Very well. But suppose she should regard them as her own, and dispose of them for her own personal benefit. What should you think of that?"

"I know very well it would be robbing you, mother."

"Yes, and whatever God gives us, it is to use for his glory, and if we waste or squander it, or use it for any thing which is not in accordance with his will, we are guilty of robbing him. If you waste, or unnecessarily expend your money, your time or your influence, you take what belongs to God, and are thus guilty of robbery.

"Well, mother, I will try to do right, for I am not willing to be guilty of the sin of robbing God."

"Very well; try to do right, but remember you cannot do anything in your own strength, but must look to God to work in you, my daughter: and remember that none can be accepted of God, none can enter heaven, can be fit to live or to die, but those who make an entire surrender of all to him. R. E.

An Honest Boy.

That "honesty is the best policy" was illustrated some years since under the following circumstances, detailed by the Rochester Democrat. A lad was proceeding to an uncle's to petition him for a sick sister and her children, when he found a wallet containing fifty dollars. The aid was refused, and the distressed family were pinched for want. The boy revealed the fortune to his mother, but expressed a doubt about using any portion of the money. His mother confirmed his good resolution—the pocket book was advertised, and the owner found. Being a man of wealth, upon learning the history of the family, he presented the fifty dollars to the sick mother, and took the boy into his service, and he is now one of the most successful merchants in Ohio. Honesty always brings its reward—to the mind if not to the pocket.

Dew-drops.

There was once a little boy very much beloved by his parents on account of his readiness to learn and the excellence of his disposition. He was generally cheerful and happy; but one morning he complained to his father because the dew-drops were not permitted to live longer on the flowers, he wanted to see them glitter and sparkle all through the day, just as they did in the morning. "The sun," said the child, has chased them away with his heat, and swallowed them up in his wrath.

Soon afterwards there came rain, and a rainbow, upon which the father pointed upward, "See!" said he, there stand the dew-drops gloriously reset, a glittering jewelry in the heavens. Thus learn my child, that that which withers on earth, often lives and shines more brightly on high." So spake the father, and in so speaking he uttered prophetic language. For in a few days after this, his little boy, with all his loveliness and intelligence, was summoned away from earth, exhaled like bright dew-drops from beneath the eye of the fond father, only, however, to shine with increased lustre in a clear sky.

The Boy who told a Lie.

There was once a boy whose father sent him to ride a few miles upon an errand, and told him not to stay.

After he had done his errand, he started to come home. As he was riding by a house where two of his playmates lived, he thought he would stop a few moments to see them. The boy stayed longer, and longer, till two hours had been spent in play.

With a heavy heart he now mounted his horse again. He rode slowly along, thinking what excuse he should make to his father for not coming home sooner.

The boy trembled and turned pale, as he saw his father. When his kind father came up to him, he said, "Father, I lost the road, and it took me some time to get back again, and that is the reason why I have been gone so long."

His father had never known him to be guilty of such an act before, and believed what his son told him. But oh, how guilty and ashamed did that boy feel, as he walked along by his father. His look of innocence was gone, and he was ashamed to look his father, or his mother in the face. He tried to appear easy and happy, but he was uneasy and miserable.

When the little boy, whom you last read about, went to bed that night, he was afraid. He knew that he had done wrong, and it was long before he could quiet his troubled spirit with sleep.

Thus things went on for two or three weeks. One day a man called to see the father of this boy on business; and as soon as the boy saw him come into the house, his heart beat quick, and he turned pale. He feared that something would be said that would bring the whole to light.

After talking a few moments with his father, the man turned to the little boy, and said, "Well, how did you get home the other day? My boys had a very pleasant visit from you."

Can you think how this boy felt? You could have almost heard his heart beat. The blood rushed into his face, and he could not speak, and he dared not raise his eyes from the floor.

The man then turned to his father and said: "You must let your son come up again, and see my boys. When he was there about two weeks ago, he only stayed about two hours, and they hoped he had come to spend the whole day with them."

Now the whole truth was out. The boy stood before his parents covered with shame. How bitterly had he suffered. The guilty boy burst into tears, and implored his parents' forgiveness.

But he was told by his parents that he had sinned, not only against them, but against God. The humble child went to God in penitence and in prayer. He made a full confession of all to his parents, and obtained their forgiveness; and it was not till then that peace of mind was restored.

From the True Wesleyan.

There are seventeen millions beggars out of the 198,000,000 of individuals who inhabit Europe.

The School for Idiots at Paris promises well. The young idiots learn to write, read and cipher, to a degree of perfection truly astonishing.

Mohammedism requires the tenth part of a man's annual income, whatever that may be, as the property of the poor and the afflicted! A neglect here is perilous!

Charity.—When you call on a professed Christian for charity, and receive the excuse "We must provide for our children," how do you interpret it?

Ans.—"We must indulge our avarice." The man is provident for his family; but, covetous for himself.

Babylon.—Under the Old Testament dispensation, Babylon was the principal power that oppressed the people of God. Hence the term is employed in the New Testament, symbolically, to denote the principal agents that oppresses the poor, and makes merchandise of men.

Pure Religion.—An old writer has suggested a method of discovering who are possessed of true or pure religion. He says: "Pure religion, and undefiled before God and the Father, is this: to visit the fatherless and the widow in their affliction."

The Elders, School Teachers.—One of the early councils of the Christian Church decreed that every church should have, within its own walls, a school-room, and if the congregation was unable to maintain a teacher, the elders were required to discharge that office in his place.

A YANKEE TRICK.—A man in Pittsburgh, who had been underbid by a party of Germans whilst he was trying to make a bargain to unload a steamboat, determined at the time to soon have his revenge.—Hearing one morning that a boat was expected to arrive in a few hours, he dressed himself in his Sunday clothes, disguising his appearance as much as he well could, went to the Germans, whom he found at the wharves, and engaged them to do a job for him up town. He accordingly led them off to a vacant lot, some distance away, and set them to work moving a large quantity of pig metal which was there, from one side to the other of the lot, charging them not to desist for any one, and left the poor fellows hard at work. Meanwhile, he immediately ran and changed his dress, presented himself at the river side, just as the expected steamboat arrived, drove at a first rate bargain, there being no competition, and he had the field to himself.

My own Dearest Jane.

In youth, through the green mountain wilds, we have rambled,
And childishly promised, we ne'er would be twain;
On the banks of the bright sparkling brooks we have gambol'd,
The while I would call thee, my own dearest Jane.

In years more mature, I did almost adore thee,
By thy fondling and care, knew I loved not in vain;
And felt, while in sickness, as thy sweet form bent o'er me,
That truly, thou wast then, my own dearest Jane.

But now thou art gone, from the scenes of thy childhood,
Yet I know that thou canst not but leave them with pain—
Thou wilt find thee a home, in the far western wildwood,
O when shall I see thee, my own dearest Jane.

Yet though far away, my heart still is near thee,
And I trust that once more I shall see thee again;
Tho' long years shall pass, yet again thou wilt hear me,
In tones of love call thee, my own dearest Jane.
RURAL SWAIN.

A Thought.

I've seen at early morning's hour
The dew-drop sparkling on the flower,
And mark'd the sun beam o'er it play,
Then snatch it to the skies away.

And thus I've thought is Pity's tear,
Shed by us erring mortals here,
Then borne to heaven and treasured there,
With Faith, and Hope, and Love, and Prayer.

THE ENVIRONS OF LONDON.

There is not among the environs of London a more beautiful spot than GREENWICH. It is situated on the Thames about five miles below the metropolis, and is famed all over the world as the meridian from which English astronomers make their calculations. The Royal Observatory stands on an eminence in the Park, and is supplied with the best instruments in Europe. From one of its cupolas rises a high pole, to the top of which a large ball is elevated daily, and dropped at precisely twelve o'clock, to inform the observers for miles around of the exact time when the sun passes the meridian. The Park has long been a favorite resort during the Fairs, and is much frequented at other times by parties wishing to enjoy a day in the open air and under the spreading boughs. A richer treat can hardly be desired.

But the HOSPITAL here is probably the greatest attraction for strangers. It consists of a large pile of buildings, or rather five distinct piles, which are allowed to be the most beautiful in Europe devoted to charitable purposes. They stand on the site of an ancient palace, the birth-place and residence of several of the kings and queens of England. In 1694, they were appropriated to the reception of seamen disabled by age, wounds, or infirmities, together with the widows and children of those who had been slain in battle. To this purpose they have been devoted ever since. They now accommodate about 2,700 pensioners, 100 nurses, and 800 boys. The whole number of persons resident in the Institution, including the families of officers, amounts to about four thousand—sufficient to make up a small city. The residents, or "in-pensioners" as they are called, are provided with every necessary of clothing and diet, besides which they receive one or two shillings per week for pocket money, according to the rank they have held. There are also connected with the institution some 30,000 "out-pensioners," who receive from $20 to $120 per year, according to their service or the nature of their wounds. A look at the dining-halls and cooking-rooms where meals are regularly prepared and served for four thousand persons, will richly repay a visit. Or, if this does not, the "yarns" of the obliging attendants, who have spent long lives in naval adventures, will certainly afford sufficient compensation for all a visitor's trouble.

An institution in some respects similar to that at Greenwich, is located in CHELSEA, on the Thames, about two miles from London. It was founded by Charles the Second, to afford an asylum for sick and superannuated soldiers, and consists of a handsome brick structure 790 feet in length, surrounded by forty acres of ground beautifully laid out. About 400 pensioners are here provided with clothes, diet, washing, lodging, etc. The institution has also a large number of out-pensioners, who receive a yearly allowance upon proving that they have been maimed or disabled in the service of the crown, or that they have served their country as soldiers for twenty years. A visit to this institution, like a visit to many others for kindred purposes, will excite admiration for the liberality with which the English government provides for its faithful or unfortunate servants. But it will at the same time painfully remind one of the true source of England's apparent wealth and real poverty. Her army and navy have in times past, with a great parade of strength, carried desolation to many once peaceful homes and happy hearts; her populace now groans under the heavy burden imposed to support warlike arrangements and the tens of thousands of disabled military servants.

WINDSOR CASTLE is the great temple of English royalty, and of course a frequent resort for all admirers thereof. It is situated about twenty miles south-west of London, on an eminence commanding an extensive view of a charming country. The structure is one of great antiquity, having been originally built by William the First. It has been enlarged, however, and partly rebuilt from time to time by several of his successors. At present it is the favorite residence of the royal family, and a scene of great display. The Castle, with its towers, batteries, and chapels, covers an area of twelve acres. There are in the vicinity two immense parks, which together cover 2,300 acres of ground. One of them is fourteen miles in circumference, is intersected by a grand avenue, and contains a favorite summer residence. Near by is a lake on which George the Fourth was accustomed to take his aquatic excursions. It is crossed by a curious bridge of a single arch, making a span of 168 feet. St. George's Chapel, founded by Edward the Third, is justly admired for the chaste and beautiful style of its architecture. The Royal Cemetery, also, is deserving of the admiration which has been bestowed upon it. It was made under the direction of George the Third as a place of sepulture for the kings of England, and consists of a vault excavated in the chalk rock about fifteen feet under the surface, seventy feet long, twenty-eight wide, and fourteen high. Places to receive the bodies are formed by octagonal Gothic columns supporting ranges of shelves.

EXPOSURE OF MISSIONARIES.

The following extract of a letter, which we copy from the Dayspring, shows that some of our missionary brethren are obliged to "endure hardness" in the prosecution of their work. The writer is a teacher in one of the Indian missions.

"On Thursday of last week, being fifty-five miles from home, I started to return, with a load of lumber, in a heavy rain, at two o'clock in the afternoon. Between sundown and dark, I was obliged to back my load, through mud and water, up the bank of a creek; and then, in midnight darkness, the rain pouring all the while, I made the best arrangements I could for spending the night in the woods. About ten o'clock in the evening, the weather became cold, and the rain changed to snow. In the morning I arose and shook off the snow, just as I have seen sheep do at the north. Having breakfasted on frozen bread, and commended myself to God, I set out on my journey, with damp clothes and wet feet, through snow, water and mud; an eastern snow storm howling about me with all the severity of the north. During the day I traveled thirty miles, across a prairie, without seeing fire. Such incidents are not uncommon in my history."

SUFFERING FOR CHRIST'S SAKE.

Rev. Joseph Smedley, a missionary of the Baptist Church who is laboring among the Choctaw and Creek Indians, writes under date of Feb. 22, that more than twenty have applied for baptism, and that the prospects for missionary labor are encouraging. It is painful to learn, however, that the spirit of persecution prevails there, several of the converts having been severely whipped, and others being in constant expectation of the lash. The following is Mr. Smedley's account of a visit to a venerable brother Jesse, who had lately received fifty strokes:—

"I called with brother Walker to see him, and in compliance with our wish he let us see his lacerated body. I could not but sit silently gazing alternately upon his lion and lamb-like countenance, and clustering wounds! My love and veneration were not a little heightened while listening to the following recital, which I give as nearly verbatim as possible. Said he, 'My brothers, I was coming from the bottom, where I had been to kill a hog, when I saw one hundred or more of them about the store, (about twenty yards off,) and they seemed to be watching. I then thought it will not do to run away any more; but I must stand true this time; and then I came to the house, and set down by the door; and when they saw me, they all came on a full gallop right up to the house, and surrounded me. And I said, Why, what have I done? and what is the reason that all of you come to take one poor old man? what have I done, my friends? And they said, 'We will tell you by and by!' I then held out my hand and shook hands with them all, and then they all went and sat down for quite an hour. Then one seemed to come by the end of the house, and came to me and said, 'I want to tie you.' I then put out my hands and crossed them, and he seemed to wonder, and said he never saw the like that I should so willingly put out my hands to be tied. And then, when he had tied my hands, they all again went back and sat down nearly one hour more. After that one man came and tied a rope around my wrists, and tried to throw the other end over the fork of a tree, and he could not do it, and another man got up and put the rope over, and then they drew me up till my feet did not quite touch the ground; and they tied my feet together, and then put a rail through my legs, and then they went and sat down again. Then one man came and asked me where I did get this new religion from? I said in the old nation and brought it here, (meaning that he was converted before the removal of the nation from the east of the Mississippi.) 'Yes,' the man said, 'and you have set half the nation to praying, and this is what we are going to whip you for;' and when I saw the thick stick my heart fainted a little, and I said, My friends, do take a gun and shoot me, and dont whip me so. The man said, 'we dont want to kill you. We will now give you fifty for the first time; the next we will give you one hundred, and the third time we will kill you.' Then one man said, you tell us that Christ was hung up, and we are going to do the same to you.' My dear brethren, I felt as if I wanted to preach to them more than ever I did in all my life. I did not feel the least bit angry, and I did not feel at all afraid. Then five men had to give me ten strokes apiece, and they laid on with both their hands. When they had done, I felt so weak that two or three more licks, I think, would have killed me. They then took me down and left me; and they all the time seemed as if they did not like to do it. They hung down their heads, and seemed as if they did not like to look up. I bless the Lord that I had no bad feeling against them, but did freely forgive them from the bottom of my heart.'"

"THOUGH BURIED LONG."

The Bible Society of Washington held its annual meeting last week, when Rev. Mr. Daily, chaplain of the House, urged the duty of increased exertions in circulating the Bible, and told some interesting anecdotes of the beneficial effect of the distribution of the Bible. "There lived," said he, "some years ago, a pious man on the banks of the Ohio. Several young men came to his store, from their flat-boat, and one of them immediately inquired for a pack of cards, observing that they were on their way to New-Orleans, and would need something to amuse them during their protracted voyage. Struck by the aspect and manner of this youth, the good man spoke to him of his mother, of the dangers to which he would be exposed, and presented him with a Bible, urging upon him the duty of studying its doctrine and obeying its precepts. Fifteen years after, a gallant steamer, on its way up the river, suddenly came to the wharf, when a gentleman, lady, and two or three children, stepped ashore, and came immediately to the store. 'Do you recollect,' said the gentleman to the Christian merchant, 'giving a Bible many years ago to a youth, on his way down the river? I am the person on whom you bestowed that precious gift, and as I am indebted to it for all my success in this life, and all my hopes for the next, I could not pass by this spot without stopping, and expressing my gratitude to one to whom I must ever feel myself under such unspeakable obligations.'"

MISSIONS AND WAR!

Every intelligent reader knows, that within about twenty-five years, by means of missionary labor, the great mass of the people of the Sandwich Islands have been raised from savage degradation, relieved from constant, cruel warfare, and brought under the renovating influence of the Gospel of Peace. And what has this twenty-five years labor of benevolence, with all its glorious results, cost? Not so much as a single year's cruise of one ship of war! Yet there are about two thousand such ships now in Christendom. How enormous the cost of their support! The debt of Great Britain, at the close of her wars with Napoleon, was about four thousand million dollars, and for the bare interest and management of this debt, she now pays annually about $140,000,000; six or seven times as much as the whole expense of our national government, with its army, navy and all! What a millstone on the neck of the English people! How must it cripple their industry, rob many of their bread, and grind them to the dust! All this, however, is but a moiety of the cost of England's past wars! Well might one of her finest writers say,—

> "My thoughts I must confess, are turned on peace.
> Already have our quarrels filled the world
> With widows and with orphans!"

"I SHALL DIE SILENT."

The hour and the circumstances of our exit from this world are hid from our view by the inscrutable curtain of futurity. That hour of departure approaches with every rising and every setting sun. How near or how far off we may be from the iron gate through which we must pass into the next world, we cannot know. How we shall feel, what will be our views then, whether we shall be sensible or insensible as we lie on the last verge of mortal life, whether our spirits shall triumph in the jaws of mortality, eager to stretch their wings for the final flight, or fearing to launch away shall cling to life with fervent tenacity, we can not know. The revelations of that hour are visible only to the eye of God. And it is well that it is so. It matters little whether we 'die silent,' or with songs of triumphant testimony on our lips, looking the pale messenger full in the face, and bidding him welcome, provided our work on earth is done and well done.

"I shall die silent," said Whitefield to Rev. Dr. Finley, President of Princeton College, at whose house he was dining. At dinner, the Dr. said, "Mr. Whitefield, I hope it will be very long before you will be called home, but when that event shall arrive, I shall be glad to hear of the noble testimony you will bear for God." "You will be disappointed, Doctor," said Whitefield, "I shall die silent. It has pleased God to enable me to bear so many testimonies for him during my life, that he will require none from me when I die. No, no; it is your dumb Christians, that have walked in fears and darkness, and thereby been unable to bear a testimony for God during their lives, that he compels to speak out for him on their death beds."

This prophetic presentiment of Whitefield was verified. He died silent. A suffocating asthma prevented all utterance of his feelings and views as he passed the threshhold of eternity. But his work was done, and the numerous and living testimonies which he had borne for God during his life of devoted piety and eminent usefulness, were worth a thousand death-bed testimonies. And so it is in every case. So it should be in the life of every Christian. If the whole of Christian life does not bear consistent and daily testimony to the transforming power of religion, the death-bed testimony will have little weight. As every Christian has but one short life to live on earth, how needful, how important, that he should record his testimony to the worth and living influence of religion in his every day history.

Christian professor! thou art bearing a daily testimony for or against the religion of Christ, according as thy life accords with the spirit and power of the gospel, or against it. This daily testimony is recorded in deep and indelible lines on the minds and hearts of thy children, friends and neighbors, in thy daily intercourse. Those records will meet thee in living, breathing characters in the coming world. [N. Y. Evangelist.

NO EFFORTS TO DO GOOD ARE LOST.

I have heard of some seeds which will sleep in the earth for ages, and I have heard of the young of certain insects which lie in a state like death for eighty years together, and yet when the hand that scattered the seed had been long mingled with the dust, and when the insect that had deposited its young had ended its flight for generations, the seed would come forth and form a forest of mighty trees, and the slumbering insect would awake to life, and become the mother of an endless multitude. And so it may be with us. We are scattering seeds of knowledge, and piety, and immortality, but we see not the seed spring forth. Our instructions seem to be forgotten; the fruits of our liberality seem to have perished; and our labors appear to have been in vain. But be of good courage; the seed is still in the earth undecayed, and the time will come when it shall spring forth and yield a plenteous harvest. It is watched over by the God of heaven, and not a seed shall perish. The hand that scattered the seed may be withered, but the seed itself shall swell and send forth its germ, and become a mighty tree. The voice that uttered the sermon may be silent, but others that received the truth shall come forth and declare it afresh to the generations that are yet unborn. [J. Barker.

CALL TO THE MINISTRY.

We pass to notice the manner in which the ministers of Christ are to be introduced into their sacred work. In the first place, the candidate must have a strong persuasion in his own bosom, that he is called of God to preach the Gospel; in the next place, the church to which he belongs must obtain good evidence of the same. No church has a right to urge a man into the ministry, contrary to his own convictions. On the other hand, no man has a right to urge himself into the ministry, contrary to the convictions of his brethren. However strong his own desires for the sacred work, he should hold himself in doubt of his divine call, unless he is sustained by the concurrent convictions of his brethren. We have frequently heard young men complain that they were anxious to commence a preparatory course of study for the ministry, but that they could not obtain the recommendation of their church. They have not scrupled to ascribe this to some unjust prejudice, and have seriously inquired whether they ought not to ask a letter of dismission, and unite with some church more likely to favor their wishes. In such cases, a young man has reason to distrust his own feelings. He ought to wait, and pray that the same God who, he trusts, has led him to desire the ministry, would dispose his brethren to encourage him to enter the sacred work. He has no authority for leaving the church for such a reason; and we question whether any other church has a right to receive him for such a reason. A young man carries with him but a poor recommendation, when he represents himself as standing much higher in the confidence of God, than he does in the esteem of his brethren.

But where an individual is himself convinced that God has called him to the work of the ministry, and the church receives the same conviction, it is as much the duty of his church to encourage him, as it is his to enter upon the work; for this is one main design for which churches are organized—that they should search out, and send into the ministry, and sustain, those who give evidence of being divinely called for this purpose. It is of little importance how such conviction first came to take possession of the candidate's mind; it may have originated in his own meditations, or in some season of prayer; or some brethren in the church may have first communicated to him their own convictions as to his duty; or the attention of the pastor may have been directed to him, as one whom the Lord seemed to be preparing for this work, and he may have pressed the young man to a serious consideration of the subject; this would be perfectly proper; it is one of the important duties of the pastor to seek out and bring into exercise all the gifts with which God is blessing the church. All that is necessary is, that the candidate himself, and especially the church to which he belongs, should have good reason to believe that he is called of God. Then, after he has been properly instructed, there is a divinely sanctioned mode by which he may be appointed to his work, and officially invested with authority to discharge all the duties of the sacred office. This is usually denominated ordination.

A GOOD EXAMPLE.

A Methodist clergyman, fatigued with the labors of the Sabbath, entered the stage-coach on Monday morning, to proceed to an adjoining town. He had two fellow passengers—one, quite an ordinary looking young man, the other, a young lady. Aware of his unfitness, owing to great prostration of strength, to be an interesting companion, the clergyman drew himself up close to the side of the coach, and inwardly hoped that no opportunity to introduce conversation might offer. The young man, however, seemed resolved to get his ear, and bending forward, said, with an engaging smile, "Sir, I want to ask you if you love the Lord?" The minister, who had averted his face, could no longer resist. Admiring the unaffected sincerity of his young companion, and mortified in view of his own conduct, he turned and replied, "O yes, my good brother, and I am ashamed of myself for causing you so much difficulty in the discharge of your duty." He then encouraged the young man to persevere in the cause of Christian fidelity, assuring him that the blessing of God would certainly attend him. "Why," said he, in return, "I have lately found the Lord, and as I am about to pay a visit to my friends, down East, I thought I would take my religion with me!" After this he engaged in earnest conversation with the young lady, pressing her to an immediate attention to the welfare of her soul. Do all professed Christians, when they journey, take their religion with them? Reader, do you? [Christ. Watchman.

SUPERSTITIONS OF ETHIOPIA.

The nation is overrun with superstitions. We can describe only a few of them. A paper armor is regarded as a preservative against the weapon of the enemy. The presence of a cross, or any portion of the Bible, is supposed to interfere with the labors of the blacksmith. No metal can be welded, or casting taken from the mould, within sight of the cross. The worker in iron is supposed to be endowed with supernatural powers, and to be able to transform himself at pleasure into the likeness of a wolf or a hyena. Sickness and misfortune are ascribed to the evil eye of the blacksmith. Dwarfs are treated with much respect, and regarded with the utmost fear. No Amhara will venture to destroy a serpent; except on Saturday or Sunday, when the sight of one is deemed highly auspicious. Sacrifices are offered annually in the month of June, to the evil spirit. One of their specifics in disease is to turn an egg twice towards the head of the patient, and then break it beside him. The sight of a hare is sufficient to shake the firmest nerves. A fox, breaking on the left hand, destroys all hope of success in any undertaking; but, on the right is highly favorable. An antelope bounding across the path augurs success. The appearance of a white buzzard is auspicious or inauspicious, according to the position of the tail. On the banks of the river Airara, stands 'the only piece of machinery in the kingdom,—a rude water-mill, constructed by an Albanian visitor. But the intolerant and ignorant priesthood, pronouncing the revolution of the wheel to be the work of devils and genii, its use was interdicted after three days, and it has since remained silent.' [Chris. Review.

POPULAR LITERATURE.

The whole subject of popular literature requires the deepest consideration. The press is pouring out every day a tide of books which distract the attention, weaken the judgment, corrupt the taste, and defy the criticism of the public by their very multitude. Every one, young or old, man or woman, fool or wise, thinks himself able to say something which may catch the public eye, to raise himself either money or notoriety. The whole world is become a great school, where all the pupils have turned themselves into teachers; and the ravenous appetite of an idle people, always craving for some new excitement or amusement, and ready to swallow the most unwholesome food, is daily stimulating the market. What should we say if a man had the power of so volatilizing a grain of arsenic, that its effluvium should spread over a whole country, entering into every house, and penetrating to the most vital parts of the body? And yet until it is shown that the human mind is good itself, and the source of good,—that it is not what we know it to be, save only when purified by religion, corrupt itself, and a corrupter of others; this power, which every man possesses, and which so many exercise, of diffusing their thoughts over the world, and insinuating them into the heart of a nation, is, in reality, the power of spreading a pestilential miasma. [Edinburgh Review.

WILL IT WORK WELL?

A good man, who was liberal in life, and who had not withheld more than was meet, when dying, called his nephew to his bedside, and said, "David, I have little to give you. I hope, however, that what I have left is my own. I have not taken improperly from any one. I have not kept back from others. I do not leave you much, but the little you will receive will work well." The principle of the dying man was right; when a testator gives to relatives or friends that which he ought to have devoted to God, there is reason to fear that the Almighty will frown upon the gold which should have been placed on his altar. He will not bless the sacrilegious gift. It will not work well. God can give the command, and riches shall take to themselves wings and fly away. There can be no doubt that when the secrets of all hearts are revealed at the judgment day, the great cause of many failures and misfortunes will be ascertained. Large fortunes were given to friends, to the exclusion of Christ's holy cause, and the money, therefore, did not work well.

A MOTHER'S LOVE.—There is something in sickness (says a writer) that breaks down the pride of manhood; that softens the heart and brings it back to the feelings of infancy. Who that has languished even in advanced life, in sickness and despondency—who that has pined on a weary bed in the neglect and loneliness of a foreign land—but has thought of the mother that looked on his childhood; that smothed his pillow and administered to his helplessness? Oh, there is an endearing tenderness in the love of a mother to a son that transcends all other affections of the heart! It is neither chilled by selfishness, or daunted by danger, or weakened by worthlessness, or stifled by ingratitude. She will sacrifice every comfort to his convenience. She will surrender every pleasure to his enjoyment; she will glory in his fame; exult in his prosperity; and, if adversity overtake him, he will be dearer to her by misfortune; and if disgrace settles on his name, she will still love and cherish him; and if all the world beside casts him off, she will be all the world to him.

LAST THOUGHT OF A MISSIONARY.—It is always interesting to know how the missionary regards the work in which he is engaged, when he comes to the close of life. A few months ago the Rev. John Waterhouse, the General Superintendent of the missions of the English Wesleyans in Australia and Polynesia, was called away from his labors. He had become intimately acquainted with the condition of the heathen, particularly in that part of the world, and was well qualified to judge, therefore, of their wants. "As death drew nigh he lay some time, apparently in deep thought, and then suddenly raised himself in his bed, and exclaimed, 'Missionaries! Missionaries! Missionaries!' Having given his dying testimony in favor of the imperative claims of the heathen, his triumphant spirit passed into the presence of God."

It is a singular fact, that four different languages are spoken in England. There are something like 2,000,000 in Ireland who speak Irish, and cannot speak English—some 100,000 in Wales who do not speak English—many in Scotland also, who do not speak English. In the Isle of Mann there is a population which speaks a branch of the Teutonic tongue. In Russia thirty different languages are spoken. [Dr. Baird.

The Sabbath Recorder.

NEW YORK, APRIL 24, 1845.

"THE LORD'S DAY"—WILL-WORSHIP.

In presenting the claims of the original Sabbath, it is not uncommon to meet with those who will frankly confess that they see no good reason for neglecting the seventh day, but who notwithstanding express their surprise that Sabbath-keepers can neglect the first day of the week—"the Lord's Day"—"the Resurrection Day"—"the day which commemorates the completion of the work of redemption." There is a show of piety about this, which is likely to deceive, and which may therefore entitle it to some consideration. Now we do not believe that it is settled, either that the first day of the week is peculiarly the "Lord's day," or that it is the "resurrection day," or that it is any more appropriate for celebrating the completion of the work of redemption, than is the seventh day of the week. But without stopping to discuss these questions, we will give in few words some of our reasons of a positive character for refusing to observe the first day of the week, called "the Lord's day."

1. Our first reason is, that such observance is superstition and will-worship—things which we hate. There is not a single text of Scripture in which the observance of the first day of the week is commanded, or a single blessing promised to those who observe it, or a single curse pronounced against those who neglect it. The truth of this assertion is frankly acknowledged by many candid writers in favor of the first day. According to their own confession, therefore, the observance of the first day is not obedience to God's will; hence it follows that it must be of their own wills. Now when men will do that professedly in God's service which he has no where commanded, what is this but needless religion and will-worship? Protestants are very free to denounce Papists for their superstitious regard for tradition; and they do not hesitate to pronounce such regard to be useless and hurtful. Papists, in reply, charge their opponents with being guilty of the same thing when they observe the "Lord's day," which rests upon tradition from the Fathers and the Church. They say well to them, in the language of St. Paul, "Thou art inexcusable, O man, whosoever thou art that condemnest; for in that thou condemnest another thou condemnest thyself; for thou that condemnest doest the same things." It is in this way that many ministers, who in the pulpit cry out most loudly against Popish superstition and will-worship, are the greatest patrons and sustainers thereof. We believe such will-worship is hateful in the sight of God, and therefore we dare not encourage it by observing a day which he has not commanded.

2. Our second reason is, that God has in many ways shown His dislike of additions to His Word. All that can be said in favor of observing the "Lord's day" by the class of persons to whom we are now referring, is that it seems appropriate and useful. But such persons would do well to think of this passage of Scripture, "Whatsoever I command you, take heed you do it; thou shalt put nothing thereto, nor take aught therefrom." Now we say fearlessly, that those who put the "Lord's day" in the place of the Sabbath, do both add to and take from the fourth commandment, which is alike presumptuous and dangerous. Again, in the New Testament we read that "If any man shall add unto these things, God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book; and if any man shall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part out of the book of life." What language could be found to condemn more pointedly the custom of adding to the Word of God that which seems to us appropriate and useful, but which is not plainly commanded? Right-minded and pious men should be slow to countenance such additions.

3. Our third reason is, that the observance of the first day of the week leads to many perversions of the Word of God. Nothing is more common than for ministers, upon the first day of the week, to urge their hearers to observe that day by repeating to them the fourth commandment. Yet it needs but half an eye to see that the commandment has no application at all in the case. The commandment requires the observance of the seventh day; they use it to support the first day. The commandment requires the observance of a day to celebrate the completion of the work of creation; they use it in favor of a day to celebrate the completion of the work of redemption. In short, they change both the time and the design of the Sabbath, and then undertake to support their new day by the fourth commandment. What else is this than perversion? Again—many passages of Scripture are wrested from their true meaning, and made to speak in favor of that which never came into the minds of the sacred writers. Such is the case with those texts, Ps. 118: 24, 1 Cor. 16: 2, and Rev. 1: 10, not to mention others. They are perverted from their real purpose for the sake of upholding a comparatively new institution, which originated from a love of display, and has been advanced in many cases from no better motives.

4. Our fourth reason is, that the observance of the first day will be labor lost. By this we would not be understood to mean that it is labor lost to promote the observance of some day of rest, since we believe it were better to keep the fifth day of each week, or one day in ten, than no day at all. But we mean simply, that so far as obeying the fourth commandment is concerned, the observance of the first day of the week is vain. We should think that servant beside himself, who, when commanded to do a certain work, should straightway betake himself to doing something which was not commanded instead of that which was commanded; and we should expect that his master would reprove rather than commend him for his zeal in doing the wrong thing. So in the divine government; to do what is not commanded is no apology for neglecting to do what is commanded. The Scriptures have spoken very distinctly upon this subject. When the Jews of old, for instance, multiplied their sacrifices to God instead of giving ear unto his law, they met this withering rebuke, "Who hath required this at your hands?" Again, in the time of our Saviour, when he was charged by the Scribes and Pharisees with not walking "according to the tradition of the elders," he replied, "In vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrine the commandments of men." It is difficult to conceive how any man, with such facts before him, can expect to derive advantage from doing what is not commanded to the neglect of what is commanded.

We might greatly multiply similar reasons for our refusal to observe the first day of the week—the day which is so studiously denominated the "Lord's Day" and the "Resurrection Day." But these are sufficient to show, that it is not because we hold in low esteem the Lord or His Redemption. It is because we reverence the Lord's authority, and prize his gracious provision for us, that we desire to maintain inviolable His law, at the same time that we celebrate with joy His work in redeeming us from the power of sin and disobedience.

LEGAL CLAIMS OF THE SABBATH.

It is often remarked by persons in conversation, that the Scriptures are much more plainly in favor of the seventh day as the Sabbath, than they are of the first day. So general is this sentiment, that it seems wonderful that so much restraint can be imposed upon the community in regard to the observance of the first day of the week. It is not unfrequently the case, that members of churches observing the first day, will express their belief that if there be a Sabbath enjoined in the Scriptures, it must be the seventh day. Even ministers, who in the pulpit denounce Sunday profanation as a grievous sin, will often when in private allow that the fourth commandment relates exclusively to the seventh day. And from repeated opportunities with men of the first rank in religious society, I am fully impressed with the opinion that Sunday can never among the well-informed obtain that high and honorable consideration which is due to the seventh day, and which the seventh day would receive, were the claims of that sacred day permitted to prevail in practice among the churches of Christendom. Zealous men have labored to reform the practice of society in what they call Sabbath profanation; and though God's will is, that they should rest from their labors on the seventh day, yet this day they continue to profane, and out of regard or respect for popular practice urge a wider departure from God's law, by attempting to prohibit, through legal enactments or otherwise, those who would obey God rather than men, by laboring on the six working days on which God labored as their example, commanding them to labor, and by resting on the day which he appointed and observed as an example for all to rest. When will the rulers of the people act in this matter as those who must give an account of their stewardship, instead of first consulting the convenience of men, and then perverting God's law to the accommodation of the guilty? Would that ministers might seek more earnestly the words of the Lord, and that they might stand on the high ground of HIS AUTHORITY for what they do, and not make void the law through their faith, but with the Apostle establish it, that men might see their sin, and that grace might the more abound for their salvation.

How beneath the dignity of the ministry of the King of Kings to appeal to the groveling passions and interests of men as the motives for conformity to an institution which at most is but a substitute for the Sabbath of Jehovah, that can never attain to the rank which by the mandate of the Almighty is claimed for the seventh day. How sordid the motive which adduces as the basis of Sabbath observance, sentiments so God-dishonoring as the following, which are too often put forth as the only law requiring our notice: "The constant exertion of the physical powers, and the sacrifice of domestic and social comforts, show the necessity of rest one day in seven." As if ashamed to acknowledge the claims of the fourth commandment upon them, they seek by this device to evade the full force of that law which evidently requires the observance of another day than the one intended by them to be appropriated to rest and relaxation.

How much more conducive to sound morality and consistent religious practice, would have been the influence of the two great statesmen lately quoted by the papers as having expressed a favorable regard for the "Lord's day," if as lawyers they had put that construction upon God's law which none would have hesitated to do in regard to all other penal laws. Can it be supposed that Daniel Webster or Henry Clay are so obtuse in their legal perceptions as not to see the dilemma in which they would have been placed by an acknowledgment of the claims of the fourth commandment upon them, if they had not at the same time acknowledged their obligation to the seventh day as the specific day enjoined by that commandment? When will men observe the institutions of God's appointment, and that from a motive of obedience to the authority which enjoins them? How much more are they inclined to make void God's law through their traditions—"teaching for doctrine the commandments of men."

LUTHER.

A HARD CASE.—We mentioned some weeks ago the existence of a law in Maryland, prohibiting free blacks from coming into the State for any purpose whatever. The penalty for the first offence is $20, in default of the payment of which the negro may be committed to jail and sold as a slave for life. If he should pay his fine, and then remain five days in the State after his conviction, he is liable to pay a fine of $500, (one half to the informer,) and in case of inability may be sold for life. A few days since an old negro whose race was almost run was brought before the Orphan's Court in Frederick, Md., under this law. It seems that he was removing his family, who had lately been set free for that purpose, from Virginia into Pennsylvania, and that he was passing through the State of Maryland with no thought or knowledge of the law which hung over him. He was taken up, however, and sentenced to pay the fine. The informer generously consented to remit one half of his claim, and the Magistrate undertook to raise the remainder of the fine by a collection among the citizens of the town, so as to allow the poor gray-headed man to pursue his journey. Shame on a State which will allow such a law to disgrace her statute books.

RESTORATION OF THE JEWS.

The discourse of Judge Noah on the Restoration of the Jews—an abstract of which we published some months ago—seems to have awakened considerable interest and opposition among that people. In a number of the "Voice of Jacob," published in London, it is unceremoniously pronounced anti-judaic. The editor of the "Occident and American Jewish Advocate," published in Philadelphia, likewise dissents from some of its views and has spoken out against them. This has drawn forth a letter from Mr. Noah, in explanation and defence of his position. He maintains that the opinions he has expressed, though more favorable to the motives and feelings of Christians than the Jews have commonly entertained, are yet the opinions most favorable to Judaism. Christians, on the one hand, have not comprehended the position in which they stand towards the Jews, nor the obligation imposed upon them by their own laws to treat the chosen people with kindness and consideration, and to extend towards them the hand of succor and brotherly love. The Jews, on the other hand, have been equally unjust towards Christians, in classing them with idolaters, and placing them on a footing with the Cananitic nations. Mr. Noah says that his lecture was designed to correct this error, to produce a more candid union between Jews and Christians, and to bind them together by the ties of charity and good-will. He thinks that the discussion to which it has given rise will be useful, since it has done much to arouse his brethren from their mournful lethargy upon the subject. The following extract from his letter in the Occident for April is deserving of consideration:—

"The massacre of Damascus was considered a terrible affliction—terrible it was no doubt to the sufferers—but I have always deemed it a most providential dispensation: and we are too apt in these things to overlook the agency of divine Providence. It sent a thrill throughout the civilized world, and the governments of the earth loudly denounced the cruelties practiced towards the Jews, and declared that they should not again happen. From that moment the Israelites assumed a rank and a character among the nations of the earth; they found friends and protectors in Christians; and would you now counsel us to fall back upon our ancient prejudices and revive the animosities of centuries? or rather, keeping pace with the enlightened spirit of the age, forgive and forget, and seize the hand stretched forth in kindness to succor? But then again succeeds your 'argue fit'—'they want to convert us'—'their kindness is assumed'—'they press us to surrender our faith.' Take courage—have more confidence, my friend, in the firmness and stability of our religion—it is not to be shaken. But there is danger I admit—danger, not from Christians, but from ourselves. Danger from apathy, from indifference—danger from a want of nationality. The Jew who keeps his store open on the Sabbath is still a Jew: he commits a great sin, but pleads necessity. It is his indifference—he has no desire to embrace another religion or to surrender his own faith; but he cares too little for his own religion to induce him to make a sacrifice for it. There are many reasons for this which I have not time at present to notice. The Jews want nationality; you cannot rally them on any given point; you cannot inspire them either with faith or enthusiasm. We pray fervently and constantly to be restored to Zion; we believe in the coming of the Redeemer, and pray earnestly for his coming; and yet talk to the mass of our people on the Restoration—on their return to Jerusalem—and they express no confidence in it; few would be willing to go; and the coming of our Redeemer—the advent of our Messiah—seems to give them no trouble, no solicitude at all. They pray for him from habit, and have no faith in what they pray for. What is the cause of all this discrepancy between assertion and belief? The want of nationality, I again repeat: we are a sect, not a nation. The Greeks remained two thousand years in slavery, and yet they arose and redeemed their country. Why should not the Jews do the same? Christians would honor us even if we failed. Nothing therefore in my opinion will save the nation from sinking into oblivion but agitating the subject of the Restoration. We should pass the word around the world—'Restoration of the Jews'—'Justice to Israel'—'The Rights and Independence of the Hebrews'—'Restore them to their country'—'Redeem them from captivity.' Christians and Mussulmen should be invoked to aid them in the good cause."

THE ANNIVERSARIES of the Tract and Missionary Societies, it will be borne in mind, are to be held with the Church in Plainfield, N. J., on the 14th and 15th days of May—three weeks from this date. It is very desirable that the attendance should be as general as possible, and that the friends of the Societies should come together prepared to act efficiently.

OATHS AND AFFIRMATIONS.

William C. Coffin, of New Bedford, Mass., was recently committed to prison by a police justice of that town, for refusing to take an oath or affirmation preparatory to giving his testimony in a criminal action. This circumstance has served to bring under discussion the whole subject of taking oaths, and of the rights of those who have conscientious scruples in respect thereto. The editor of the Liberator, we perceive, is out against all oaths and affirmations, and expresses his determination to memorialize the next Legislature of Massachusetts for their abolition, especially in cases where there are conscientious scruples about taking them. The following are his principal reasons for thinking that the custom ought to be wholly abandoned. They certainly deserve a candid consideration.

1. Those who profess to have put on Christ, and to be governed by the Christian law, are prohibited from taking oaths. 2. It is an irreverent act for a court, or any other body of men, to summon God as a witness to their dealings. 3. Good men—the honest and truthful—do not need to be put under oath. 4. To take an oath implies that it would not be so wicked, were it not administered, to testify falsely—an implication which strikes at the basis of moral rectitude. 5. It is wrong to make a man swear that he will "tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth," while on the stand, because he will be at a loss to know how much is implied in that promise, because his memory may be seriously defective, and because his position as witness may be so embarrassing as to render it impossible for him to speak freely in regard to what he does know.

THE PENALTY FOR SABBATH-BREAKING.

From a book by Edward Stennett, printed in 1664.

Question—What is the penalty for Sabbath-breakers, and who are the persons that are to inflict thie penalty, and the true reason why it is not inflicted at this day by such as keep the Sabbath?

Answer—The penalty is death, but it is to be inflicted on none but willful offenders; for no law of God inflicts the penalty of death for any sin of ignorance. The persons that are to inflict this penalty, are such magistrates as rule by the law which gives forth the penalty. And the true reason why those who keep the Sabbath do not inflict the penalty on those who profane it, is, first, because they are no magistrates, whose work alone it is; and, secondly, the truth of the Sabbath is but newly sprung up, so that many people are ignorant of it, and so the penalty of death doth not reach them, any more than the penalty of death doth reach a man that kills another ignorantly or unawares; so that those who keep the Sabbath are in no more capacity to inflict the penalty of death upon the profaners of it than others are to inflict the penalties upon the transgressors of other laws. For suppose that a member of the church should commit the sin of murder, or curse his father or mother; the penalty due to such is death, and yet the church is in no capacity to inflict the penalty; all that they can do, is to endeavor in the Lord's way to bring the offender to repentance; but it is the proper work of the magistrate to inflict the penalty. And so we say of those who profane the Sabbath; we can but reprove, withdraw from, and reject those who willfully profane the Sabbath, but the penalty we leave to the enlightened magistrates, at which time there will be very few if any Sabbath-breakers, for if men that hold every day alike can constantly keep the first day that hath no penalty upon it but the forfeiture of a little money, what will they do when their lives are at stake?

And behold what a strong delusion those men are in, who take courage to break the fourth commandment, because of the penalty; for (say they) if the law be in force, then the penalty is in force, and will lead men to stone one another; which is connected with these absurdities:—

1. It makes every man a magistrate to inflict the penalties of the law.

2. It inflicts the penalty of death upon ignorant offenders, though there is no such penalty due to them.

3. It leads into sin and death to prevent death; as if it were the safest way for a child to refuse to honor his father and mother, because those that rebel against their parents were to be put to death; or, refuse to abstain from murder, because murderers are to be put to death; which is as if a man should run into the fire to keep from burning, or into the water to preserve himself from drowning. Even so do men's reasonings lead them who count it best to break the Sabbath because of the penalty! By the same way of reasoning, they may break all the other nine commandments at once, because of the penalties. Therefore, let none be affrighted at the Sabbath because of the penalty, no more than they are affrighted at the other nine because of the penalties; the best way to avoid the penalties of God's law, is to keep God's law, and not to break it.

THE PASSOVER.—The great Jewish festival of the Passover, or Feast of Unleavened Bread, commenced on Tuesday, the 22d inst., corresponding with the fourteenth day of the month Nisan. The event which it commemorates is regarded by the Jews as the most important which the world has ever witnessed; hence they celebrate this festival with much interest and strictness. We have collected an account of the ceremonies, which shall appear in our next.

AMERICAN AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY.—The final vote upon the bill to incorporate the American and Foreign Bible Society was taken in the Assembly on Friday last, and lost for want of a two-third vote.

REPORTS OF MISSIONARIES.

The patrons of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association will doubtless be gratified to read the following extracts from the reports of Missionaries in its employ, furnishing, as they do, encouraging evidence that their prayers, their labors, and their alms for this cause, are not in vain in the Lord.

S. DAVISON, Cor. Sec.

Brother R. C. BOND, of Lost Creek, Va., writes follows:—

"The year for which I engaged having ended, it is with some encouragement that I contemplate the partial success of my labors. I have spent some time with the George's Creek Church, Pa., and with the Church at South Fork Hugh's River, Va., but my principal labors have been within the bounds of the Lost Creek, New Salem, North Fork Hugh's River, and Middle Island Churches, Va. Through the principal part of the year no flattering prospects attended my labors, especially in the vicinity of New Salem and Middle Island Churches; but feeling an ardent zeal for the prosperity of our denomination, believing, as I do, that we are distinguished for adherence to 'the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus;' I looked to the strong arm of the Lord for help, and continued to labor, hoping against hope, still flattering myself that if my labors were not attended with success within the time of my present engagement, they might be the means of collecting the scattered children of God together, and preparing the way for future usefulness. But thanks be unto God whose mercy endureth forever, I can now say, my fondest expectations are more than realized. In the latter part of the year I began to discover evident indications of an increasing interest in religion; the hearts of the friends of Jesus evidently began to burn within them for the upbuilding of Zion; our meeting at New Salem in November was one of unusual interest; the hearts of old professors were warmed; sinners were found inquiring, 'What shall we do?' The first Sabbath in December, I again visited New Salem, and commenced a two days' meeting, but such was the state of feeling in the congregation, that we found it necessary to protract our meeting two days longer. The Lord had evidently made bare his Almighty arm for the conversion of sinners, and the upbuilding of his long-depressed Zion. On second-day evening, after prayer and preaching, we attempted to spend a few minutes in conference; but such was the burst of emotion throughout the congregation, that we were obliged to desist. Nor did we attempt to prepare anxious seats; sinners were begging for mercy throughout the congregation as if their minds were entirely absorbed in the all-important interests of their souls. I have reason to believe that there were souls converted to God who in eternity, as well as in time, will rejoice that they attended the protracted meeting in New Salem. On my last visit there, the work was still progressing, and had extended throughout the vicinity of New Salem and Middle Island. 'Upwards of thirty have been baptized. May we not regard these things as the smiles of our heavenly Father upon our feeble efforts to promote his cause by missionary operations?"

BRO. LUCIUS CRANDALL writes from Newport, R. I., under date of March 28:—"I desire to be thankful to God that I am permitted to inform you of an addition of four to our number about a month since; three by baptism, and one from a first day church." Bro. Crandall likewise speaks of a revival of religion in Jamestown, and at New Sharon, in connection with the labors of Bro. ALFRED B. BURDICK, who baptized three persons. He adds that in all he has baptized six persons.

POSTAGE REFORM—SUGGESTIONS.

Our readers will remember, that the new Post Office Law goes into operation on the first day of July, and that after that date, Postmasters will have no right to frank orders or money for newspapers. We believe in making hay while the sun shines, and therefore take the liberty of suggesting a few things for the consideration of our friends.

1st. Now is the time for delinquent subscribers to remit their money. Much praise is due to our patrons for their promptness in forwarding their subscriptions. There are some, however, who have not yet found it convenient to do so; but who, we trust, will only need to have the subject suggested in order to secure for it immediate attention. We commenced the present volume with the expectation, that our list of subscribers would not be sufficient to afford any pecuniary profit, but that those who did subscribe would be prompt paymasters. We have not been disappointed in the first part of our expectation; we hope we shall not be in the last.

2d. Now is the time to forward the money for the second volume. The present year closes nine weeks from this date, or about the middle of June. We hope our friends will be looking forward to the time, and that they will show their approval of the "cash-in-advance" system by forwarding the pay for the next year before the new Post Office Law comes into operation. Those subscribers who are behind for the first volume, by forwarding $4, will secure a receipt in full to the end of the second volume.

3d. Now is the time to send on new subscribers. We want a considerable addition to our list before the commencement of the next volume. This can be had if our friends will take hold of the work in earnest. Past experience leads us to expect that they will do it. If each real friend of the enterprise would look about him and find one additional supporter for us, a most important object would be secured. Let us see what can be done by a voluntary and united effort.

Postmasters will cheerfully forward, free of expense, the names of new subscribers, and the money to pay their subscriptions, if respectfully asked to do so. It is well, in most cases, to write a letter stating what is wished, and then to hand it, with the money, to the Postmaster, for his signature and free stamp.

General Intelligence.

LATE FROM MEXICO.—News from Mexico has been received to the 25th of March. Intelligence of the passage of the Annexation measure had reached that country, and was spoken of coldly by most of the inhabitants, although some of them talked blusteringly about war. It is now thought that Mexico will acknowledge the independence of Texas on condition that Texas will not consent to annexation. In such case, of course annexationists will be sadly disappointed.

Still later intelligence informs us that on the 29th ult., our Minister was officially informed that all diplomatic relations between the two governments were at an end.

The Mexican papers seem to regard war as an inevitable consequence of annexation, should Texas concur in the measure and our Government consummate it. President Jones of Texas has not taken the first step towards annexation.

THE PITTSBURGH FIRE.—Later and more perfect accounts from Pittsburgh indicate that the loss of property is not quite as great as at first stated. The burnt district covers about fifty-six acres. The property destroyed is estimated at five millions of dollars. The whole amount insured was about $800,000, upon which it is thought a large per centage will be paid. It is gratifying to see that measures have been adopted in many of the principal cities to render pecuniary assistance to the sufferers, and that large sums have been contributed. The loss of life is greater than at first supposed. Seven deaths by the fire are known, and it is feared that many others will come to light.

FOREIGN ITEMS.

We gave a brief summary of the news by the Great Western last week. We add now the following items:—

IRELAND.—The Repeal Association still continue their meetings. On St. Patrick's Day the meeting was more than usually well attended. All sported shamrocks in their hats in honor of the day, and Mr. O'Connell was decorated with a monster bunch, twined round a branch of palm, the preceding day having been Palm Sunday. The Mayor of Limerick took the chair. The increase of the grant to the Roman Catholic College of Maynooth is stirring up some agitation, which threatens to extend. A meeting to petition against the grant has been held at Exeter Hall; another in Liverpool is fixed for Monday week; and several other parts of the country promise to catch the infection.

It is now positively stated that the Queen has resolved upon visiting Ireland next summer, and preparations for her reception have been already commenced.

PORTUGAL.—A Lisbon letter of the 11th instant gives an account of a serious commotion in the district of Figueras, attended with the loss of many lives and the incendiarism of several houses. The tumult was occasioned by an attempt to levy and collect a new impost on wine. The details are calculated to leave a bad impression of the administration of affairs in Portugal, and of the condition of the people under the government of Senhor Cabral.

The Universal Prussian Gazette announces the likelihood of some modifications for the better in the Austrian censorship. At present it not unfrequently happens that MSS. are detained from five to eighteen months in the hands of the censors before the imprimatur is granted or refused.

The Frankfurter Journal of this day contains the following communication from its correspondent at Mulheim, on the Rhine:—"March 18. The whole number of this neighborhood is in a state of excitement in consequence of a reported appearance here of the Wandering Jew! A day or two ago, a singular dressed man, of mysterious manners, arrived here, whom the ignorant classes—already excited by the religious movement of the day—imagined to be the above traditionary personage. It was discovered, however, at last, that he was originally a peasant from this vicinity, who had been to Rome and the Holy Land, and who had entered into an Eastern monastic order, which he was attempting to extend here. He has not met with any success in his new mission."

DEATHS.—The London papers announce the decease of Sir John Gurney, late one of the Barons of the Exchequer, and of Miss M. H. Andre, only remaining sister of Major Andre, aged 93. General Sir Thomas Saumarez died at his residence at the Petite Marche, in the island of Guernsey, in the 85th year of his age. Sir Thomas served in the first American war, and was present at the several landings on Staten, Long, and York Islands; the battle on the 27th of August, 1776, on Long Island; the capture of Fort Lee and Washington; and the battles of Brandywine and Germantown, at which last he received two balls in the head. The death of Regina Maria Roche, authoress of the "Children of the Abby," at the age of 81 years, is also mentioned.

A sale of autographs of distinguished persons took place in London, some dating as far back as the time of Queen Elizabeth. The autographs of Nelson, the Duke of Wellington, and General Washington, commanded better prices than many of the crowned heads. There were 184 lots sold, and they realized £300.

Dr. Wolff arrived at Constantinople on the 22d, and was to leave for London by the Oriental Steam Company's packet.

SEVEN DAYS LATER.—The steamship Caledonia has reached Boston, with English papers to the 5th inst. The only news of importance relates to a debate in Parliament on the Oregon question, to bring which the Caledonia was detained one day by Government orders. It is ow thought to be certain, that the rival claims of he United States and Great Britain respecting Oregon must be settled either by arbitration or war.

MUTUAL GAIN BY MARRIAGE.—On the 20th ult., Mr. Charles W. Moore and Miss Martha Ann Moreland, were married in Macon county, Ala. By this marriage it will be seen that the gentleman has gained More-land, and the lady, while she loses her land, has actually gained more, (Moore.) [Phil. Gaz.

APPROPRIATIONS OF THE LAST CONGRESS.—The Washington Globe publishes the following official statement of the appropriations of the last Congress, from which it will be seen where the money goes:—

Civil and Diplomatic expenses,	$4,270,954 51

Total,	$24,225,088 90

THE PROGRESS OF ANNEXATION.—No observer of the course of things since the beginning of the annexation movement needs to be told that the acquisition of Texas is intended as the initiative of other acquisitions of Mexican territory. The following paragraph from the Nashville Union has its own significance:

"The last advices from California inform us that the province is in a state of revolution—the natives wishing to expel the Mexicans, and having every prospect of success. The struggle will be short, if it has not already terminated. We learn also that many of our citizens who emigrated to Oregon have fallen down and settled in North California, and that they have found the most delightful climate and a rich soil. They affirm that Oregon is but a bleak, barren waste, compared with California. We refer to these facts to show that it is not at all unreasonable to suppose that California may be in a condition, at a very early day, to be ANNEXED to our Union."

A more convenient mode of conquest was never devised than the one which has given us Texas, and which promises to secure California. Our settlers go into a Mexican province and take up their abode; others follow them; they take occasion to rise against the local authorities, sure of assistance from their countrymen in the United States; the struggle is for liberty. They prevail, and then they and the country are in a condition to be annexed. This is more convenient than a warlike invasion. [Baltimore American.

MAIL CONTRACTS.—Washington city is filled with bidders for mail contracts, from the Northern States—as the contracts for carrying the mail the ensuing four years, are now being closed. A correspondent of the Evening Post says:—

"The proviso in the new post-office law, which relieves the contractor from the necessity of carrying the mails in four-horse post coaches, of purchasing the stage property of the contractor on the same rout, whoever he may have underbid, and leaving him to do the transportation simply in the most economical, expeditious, and secure manner, will relieve the post-office department of an enormous burden, and will prove a powerful auxiliary of the cheap postage system. The department, however, will not derive the full benefit of the change, until the second or the third "Lettings" of the same routes; when I have no doubt it will be found to have effected a retrenchment in the expenses of mail transportation, of full one-third over the old system."

"THE BABES IN THE WOODS."—A touching incident lately occurred among the mountains in the upper end of Dauphin County, while the fire was raging in that vicinity. A Mrs. Lupold had been somewhat deranged occasionally, for some time past, but was not considered much out of the way; until, one day last week, in the absence of her husband, she left her infant in the cradle, and taking with her two other children, one about five years of age, the other only three, fled to the mountains, and nothing could be discovered of them until Saturday last, when she was found, almost famished and nearly naked; but the children were missing. The neighborhood soon turned out to scour the mountains in search of them, but in vain until Monday last, when some men providentally happened to come upon them in one of the wildest regions of that wild country, where no one would have dreamed of looking for them. They had been out four days and four nights—cold nights, too—barefooted and half naked otherwise, their clothes being torn nearly off them by the underbrush, and their little legs blackened by the ashes of the conflagration through which they had wandered, and their flesh a good deal lacerated. They had cried themselves sick, and one of them had taken off its dress to make a bed of; and there they lay, at the root of a tree, locked in each other's arm, unable to speak, having eaten nothing, it is supposed, since they left home. The poor little sufferers were taken to the nearest house and comfortably provided for, and are said to be doing well. They were found ten miles distant from the place at which their mother was first discovered, and that they did not perish is altogether providential, and almost miraculous. [Philadelphia Chronicle.

AN INGENIOUS MACHINE.—Among the ingenious machines for which patents were issued during the last year, is one for working Tuscan braid, the operations of which are thus described in Commissioner Ellsworth's annual report: "After the pieces of straw have been deposited in a box, the whole operation of taking each separate piece, introducing, bending it over, trimming off the surplus, and transferring or re-transferring the pincers or nippers by which the pieces are held, and the completed braid delivered, is carried on with the most beautiful regularity without the hand of an attendant."

VERMONT.—Vermont is a great agricultural State. Her sons are a hardy, industrious, energetic race, are not afraid of labor, or averse to enterprise, and among them are found some of the best farmers in New England. We find by referring to a table, prepared in 1841, under the direction of the Secretary of State, that the annual amount of agricultural productions in Massachusetts averaged at the rate of about $38 for each of the inhabitants, being less than in any other State in the Union. While the agricultural productions of Vermont averaged $148 per head, being greater than in any other State in the Union. The amount of the agricultural productions of Massachusetts, with a population of 737,689, was $28,809,400, while those of Vermont, with a population of only 292,948, was equal to $43,227,000. There is too great a disparity here, to be accounted for by the difference in population, for on looking further we find that the whole number of persons engaged in agricultural occupations in Massachusetts, is 87,837 while the whole number in Vermont is only 73,150!

OUR NAME.—A correspondent of the Boston Courier objects to the New York Historical Society changing the name of the United States to Allegania, or even the modification which they propose, of Algania. He thinks All-gainia would be a more appropriate name for the country of perpetual "annexation," to say nothing of the jokes about the people with whom gain is thought to be all in all.

SERVED RIGHT.—Cyrus Killborn, a Quaker, having incurred the displeasure of Francis J. Troubat, in consequence of requesting him to leave his store, where he had got into a fierce contest with a man by the name of Benjamin Tevis, was challenged by Troubat to mortal combat! Very naturally, Mr. Killborn, who is a most exemplary member of the Society of Friends, a body who entertain a just and holy horror against dueling, was not a little astonished. He informed the bearer that time must be given him to reflect as to the course which he should pursue, and desired the note, or challenge, left with him. This, of course, was done, and to the credit of Mr. Killborne, he repaired to the office of Alderman Mitchell, entered his complaint, had the guilty person arrested and held to bail to keep the peace!

HIGH-HANDED OUTRAGE—WRIT OF HABEAS CORPUS SUSPENDED.—The Legislature of South Carolina, at their late session, passed a law enacting:

"That no negro or free person of color who shall enter this State on board of any vessel, as cook, steward, or mariner, or in any other employment on board such vessel, and who shall be apprehended or confined by any sheriff, in pursuance of the provisions of said act, shall be entitled to the writ of HABEAS CORPUS."

The Constitution of the United States, sec. 9, declares:—

"The writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it."

South Carolina thus, in another instance, sets at defiance the Constitution of the United States, and abolishes the great leading feature of American liberty. The writ of habeas corpus has been allowed in that State, ever since the reign of Charles the Second. [N. Y. Express.

THE DISMAL SWAMP.—A friend informs us that the recent fire in the Swamp has driven from their hiding places a large number of runaway slaves, who have, in many cases, been secreted for years. An old black woman, being burnt out of her capacious home, sought out and claimed her master; and, in addition to this return of property, she brought with her eleven children, all her own, serving as an indemnity or remuneration for her long absence. Any quantity of bears, foxes, and other animals, already roasted, is to be found; and all that a hungry man has to do is to hie to the smoking meats and satiate his appetite.

NAUVOO FORTIFICATION.—We learn by a gentleman direct from Nauvoo, says the Warsaw Signal of the 2d of April, that a new Revelation has been received in relation to the Temple. The work on that structure is to be almost entirely suspended for the present, and the whole energy of the Saints is to be devoted to the building of a wall or rampart around the edifice. This wall is to enclose six acres, the Temple being in the center. It is to be fourteen feet high, six feet thick, and composed of solid stone masonry. The work has been already commenced, and hundreds of hands are employed in carrying it forward.

~~NEW ROBINSON CRUSOES.—The Sandwich Island~~ newspaper gives the particulars of the loss of whale ship Holder, Borden, of Fall River, which struck a reef in the Pacific, and was lost. The crew landed on a desolate island of a triangular form, only three miles in circumference, and elevated about 40 feet above the surface of the water. No trees or shrubbery, or traces of human footsteps were seen, but water was found on digging about 5 feet. The crew, amounting to 36 souls, found themselves on this desolate spot, their ship bilged on the rocks, and had to commence the life and adventures of a second Robinson Crusoe. Fortunately the island was inhabited by multitudes of sea-fowl, hair-seals and green turtle, so that famine did not stare them in the face. In a week after landing, with the usual enterprise of Americans, they commenced building a schooner from the materials of the wreck, and in four months and 22 days the Hope, for so she was called, was launched, and fitted for sea, and with 25 of the crew, 11 remaining on the island, Captain Pell sailed for the Sandwich Islands, where he arrived in 23 days, bringing a cable and 40 barrels of oil saved from the ship. The schooner which was well built, and copper-fastened, sold for $1400, and her cargo for $1500. The successful manner in which this enterprising captain rescued his crew, and saved part of the property, merits the highest praise.

SPINDLES IN THE WORLD.—It is estimated that there are now fourteen millions in use of the United Kingdom of Great Britain, with a weekly production of yarn of 10 3-4 oz. per spindle. The consumption of cotton since 1832 has gone up from 276,000,000 lbs. to 544,000,000 lbs. in 1844. The number of spindles, from 9,955,000 to 14,000,000, the improvements in the process of spining making the increase of spindles smaller in ratio than the consumption of the raw material. The production of spindles is about 1,800,000 per annum, of which 600,000 are required to replace the old ones. Should the improvement in the condition of the lower classes in England continue, it is supposed that the production of yarns could scarcely keep pace with the demand. And the scarcity of machine makers, and the time necessary to get a spinning mill in operation, will materially check the increase of production. The number of spindles at work in other countries, is computed as follows: Austria, 150,000; Austrian League, 315,000; France, 3,500,000; Belgium, 420,000; Russia, 700,000; Great Britain, 14,000,000; United States, 2,290,000. Total, 23,875,000.

SINGULAR DISCOVERY.—The Hong Kong Gazette of Jan. 8, says:—"The Captain of a Spanish vessel when fishing to the eastward of East London Shoal, discovered a chain leading from the reef, or shoal, to the water; upon following which, the remains of a vessel were discovered, in about three fathoms at high water; part of the frame, with the stem and stern post, was all that held together, the water rushing through her. Further search was made, and money in dollars and sycee was picked up to the amount of $15,000: also, sticking between the timbers, a chronometer and sextant. The captain judging the money as English property, brought it here and handed it over to a mercantile house, until it can be proved which of the Insurance Companies are entitled to it. It is supposed that the wreck is that of the Christiana, lost on the East London shoals in 1842."

SUMMARY.

Willis says in his Mirror—Some women dress for men's eyes, and this style is both striking and economical. Other women (most women, indeed) dress for ladies' approval only, and this style is studiously expensive, sacrifices becomingness to novelty, and is altogether beyond male appreciation.

The Tallahassee Floridian says:—"It is remarkable that Washington county, in this Territory, with a population of 1200 souls, equal in industry and integrity to that of any other, has neither a physician, lawyer, judge, court-house, a single store where ardent spirits are sold, no jail, and consequently has no taxes to pay, except perhaps a small pittance for territorial purposes."

A few days ago, a person, with a paper stating that he was an object of charity, called upon one of our citizens and received 25 cents. He got helplessly drunk on the money, was arrested by the police, and committed to jail. Constable's fees, 75 cents—jailer's fees, 75 cents—board, 38 cents—total, $1 88. This was certainly a profitable investment for the county. [Roch. Dem.

The printing presses in Boston alone give employment to about three thousand persons.

Hooks and eyes, such as thirty years ago sold for $1 50 the gross, may now be purchased for 15 or 20 cents.

The consumption of paper rags amounts to six millions of dollars annually, in the United States, besides the paper imported.

A friend of ours says, he has what is equal to $7,000 in his right arm, in the use of the hammer on the anvil.

Over 12,000 tons of coal came to Philadelphia last week over the Reading Railway.

Dr. Barker, Baptist missionary to China, is to be our Secretary of Legation there, having been nominated by Mr. Polk.

N. P. Willis of the New York Mirror, says that "Editors are pump-handles of charity, always helping people to water, and never thought to be thirsty themselves."

A gentleman requests us to state the fact that pennyroyal, woven into the nests, will perfectly and certainly protect hens from the annoyance of vermin. He generally makes the nest entirely of this strong-scented herb.

It is a curious fact that there are fifteen towns, as put down in the Register, exactly thirty miles from Concord—the distance which papers go free after the first of July.

During the year 1844, there arrived at Albany, by way of the New York canals, 26,674,500 pounds of cheese, valued at more than one million and a half of dollars.

Joseph Reed, one of the ferrymen between Hudson and Athens, was rowing in his yawl at the time the Swallow struck the rock. As soon as he appreciated the nature of the disaster, he used all his efforts to reach the place, and succeeded in saving the lives of FIVE persons who were floating about on boards and fragments of the wreck. By several of them he was offered a reward for his intrepidity; which he refused, and said—"Although I am a poor man, I did not exert myself to save your lives for the sake of money!" Joseph Reed, humble as he is, belongs to the Grace Darling school of Philanthropists.

DIED,

In Waterford, Ct., on the 12th inst., of consumption, Miss SUSAN A. ROGERS, aged 32 years.

At the age of fifteen years, sister Rogers united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Waterford, of which she remained a worthy member until her death. Her health had been declining for two or three years, and she visited Rhode Island in September last with hopes of benefiting it. But in this she was disappointed. After her return she was able to meet with the church but once, when she spoke feelingly of her interest in the cause of Christ, her view of the shortness of time, and the necessity of having her lamp trimmed and burning preparatory to the coming of the bridegroom. She was soon afterwards confined to her room, where she endured her affliction without a murmur or complaint until called away to her rest. About three weeks before her death, she was asked, in respect to her health, if she felt discouraged. Her reply was, that every thing looked encouraging, for she expected soon to be in heaven—"O how pleasant the thought!" A few hours before her death, she expressed an earnest desire to depart and be with Christ; and after bidding her friends farewell, she said she was ready, closed her eyes, and fell asleep in Jesus.

Her funeral was attended by a large and deeply affected audience at the meeting-house in Waterford, when Eld. Blain preached from Psalms 23: 42—"Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil; for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me." P. L. B.

At John Laver's, near Plainfield, N. J., on the 14th inst., Deacon PHINEAS DUNN, aged 78 years. He professed religion when young, and united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Piscataway, N. J. Many years since he was called by the church to officiate as Deacon, which station he filled until far advanced in life, when he requested that the responsibility might be borne by those who were younger. He has gone peacefully to his rest.

In West Genesee, N. Y., March 23d, SALLY, daughter of Gardner and Damaris Coon, aged six years and six months.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION.

The CENTRAL ASSOCIATION will hold its Tenth Anniversary with the Seventh-day Baptist Church at Adams, Jefferson county, N. Y., commencing on the 11th of June, being the fourth day of the week before the second Sabbath in the month. Introductory discourse by Rev. Eli S. Bailey; substitute, Rev. S. B. Crandall.

It is hoped there will be a full attendance from all the churches of the Association, as there is business of vital importance to be transacted, especially our missionary business, and the publication of a Tract on Baptism. I hope, also, that our brethren will come prepared to discuss and dispose of the practice of laying on of hands on newly baptized believers, as there is now a division among us on that subject. G. M. LANGWORTHY, Rec. Sec.

Adams, April 20, 1845.

EASTERN ASSOCIATION.

THE EASTERN SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST ASSOCIATION will hold its Ninth Anniversary with the Church at Waterford, Ct., on the fourth day of the week before the fourth Sabbath, in May, (21st day of the month,) at 11 o'clock A. M. It is hoped that the churches associated will take measures to have a full representation; also that the several committees will be prepared to report upon the subjects referred to them.

In consequence of the variety of forms in which the churches are in the habit of making their statistical returns to the Association—some churches naming some things which others omit and vice versa—the revisers of the Minutes last year, took the liberty to suggest a form of statistics, expressing the desire that the returns might be so made at the next Anniversary. As it would much facilitate the labors of the clerks, and add much to the interest of statistics, they would again beg to call attention to the subject.

W. B. GILLETT,
PAUL STILLMAN, } Rec. Sec's.

ANNIVERSARIES OF OUR SOCIETIES.

THE SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION will hold its Third Anniversary in Plainfield, N. J., on the ourth day of the week before the third Sabbath in May next, being the 14th day of the month, at 11 o'clock A. M. It is desirable that all missionary reports should be made to the Secretary previous to that time.

W. B. GILLETT, Rec. Sec., New Market, N. J.

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY will hold its Second Anniversary in Plainfield, N. J., on the fifth day of the week before the third Sabbath in May, being the 15th day of the month, at 10 o'clock A. M. Auxiliary Societies or Churches that have taken action to aid the Society, and Agents who have not already reported, are requested to make their reports with the least possible delay, that the Board of Directors may be able to present a full statement of their labors since the last Anniversary.

F. W. STILLMAN, Rec Sec., New York.

SABBATH TRACTS—NOTICE.

The Board of Directors of the American Sabbath Tract Society would state, for the information of those who have ordered or are expecting Tracts, that in consequence of the late arrangement with the New York Sabbath Tract Society, by which this Society is hereafter to publish its series of Sabbath publications, and also from the few returns that have been made to the Treasury since the last anniversary, they have not been able as yet to reprint several of the series, the editions of which are exhausted. They hope, however, to have a good assortment ready at the Anniversary in May.

NOTICE.

The Missionaries who have been laboring under appointments from the Board of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association, are requested to make a full report of their labors since the last meeting of Conference, that it may be incorporated into the Annual Report of the Society. Please to send through the post-office, so that your letters may reach the Cor. Sec. about the first of May.

All local societies, and churches of Seventh-day Baptists, who have engaged in missionary labors during the past year, are requested to forward us an account of their labors through the same medium, and at or about the same time.

Brethren having important facts to communicate respecting opening fields for missionary labor will do well to forward the same to the address of SAMUEL DAVISON,
Cor. Sec. S. D. B. M. Ass'n.

TRACTS RELATING TO THE SABBATH.

LOVE UNCHANGING.

And is it just or kind, my mother,
To break my heart to soothe your own?
And would you give me to another
Than him I love and love alone?
Shall I be false to every feeling,
To every plighted word untrue—
And with poor smiles my thoughts concealing,
Bestow this wedded heart anew?

I never loved but once—no, never!
And when a heart like mine is given—
It fondly loves and loves forever,
Unchanging as the truth of Heaven.
Before the sacred marriage-altar,
With him alone, hand linked in hand,
Sustained by trust that cannot falter,
Dear mother, will your daughter stand!

Then deem not that such love will perish,
By any change, or time, or chance,
Or I can ever cease to cherish
The thoughts you vainly call "romance."
Undimmed will glow my true devotion,
Now rendered to his dearest name;—
Unfaded bloom each sweet emotion,
Through life, through life—the same, the same!

From the True Wesleyan.

Ireland and the Irish.

ON ONE SIDE IRELAND AND VIRTUE.
ON THE OTHER ENGLAND AND GUILT.

From 1172 to 1612: 440 years.

The English dominion in Ireland commenced in 1172. It became generally diffused during the last years of Queen Elizabeth, and universally so, shortly after the accession of James the First. Queen Elizabeth succeeded in subjugating Ireland by means of treachery, murder and deliberately created famine. The growing crops were year after year destroyed. Morrison, a Protestant Historian of England says that it was a common thing to see the Irish dead with their mouths all colored green by eating nettles, docks, and all things they could rend above ground. This contest, which thus ended, continued 400 years.

The Irish were not recognised as subjects until 1612, only 223 years ago. From 1172 to 1612, the Irish people were known only as "Irish enemies." Their legal and technical description, in all Proclamations, Charters and Acts, was that of "Irish enemies."

During this period the English were prohibited from intermarrying with the Irish, from having their children nursed by the wives of the Irish, and from selling to the Irish.

Any person of English descent might murder, with impunity, a mere Irish man or woman. It was no crime in the eye of the law. However, Irishmen who had made legal submission, and had been received into English allegiance, could not be murdered with impunity, for his murder was punished by a small pecuniary fine: a punishment not for the moral crime of murder, but for the social injury of depriving the state of a servant.

1612—1625: 13 years.

At this period the Irish rejected Protestantism. It came to them false in every feature. Under the pretext of Protestantism James the First committed enormous crimes on the Irish people. Entire provinces were confiscated, the natives were executed on the scaffold or slaughtered with the sword; a miserable remnant were driven to the fastnesses of remote mountains, or the wilds of almost inaccessible bogs Their places were filled with Scotch adventurers. King James created in one day forty close boroughs, giving the right to elect two members of Parliament in each of these boroughs to the Protestants, and thus excluding the Catholics from any share in the representntion of their own interest.

These the missionaries and this the ministry to convert the Catholics from the error of their ways! It is certainly surprising that they did not immediately fall in love with such a charmingly benevolent and just religion! Oh, the hardness of their hearts!

1625—1660: 35 years.

During this period the agents and method change; but the oppression is not varied. The King claimed the estates of the Irish in three entire provinces, and the case was brought before a commission, instituted by the Government "to inquire into defective titles." An attempt was made to bribe juries to find for the crown—this failed. Then the jurors who hesitated to give verdicts against the people were fined, imprisoned, ruined. The judges were bribed with four shillings the pound of the value of all lands recovered by the crown.

By such means did Charles the First despoil the Irish Catholics of upwards of one million of Arabic acres, besides great tracts of lands taken from Catholics and bestowed upon Protestants.

The Irish were massacred in a shocking manner during this period, at their feasts, in their cathedrals, and by the bodies of their dead friends.

When the massacre had ceased, Cromwell collected eighty thousand Irish in the Southern parts of Ireland, to transplant them to the West Indies. As many as survived the collection were embarked in transports. Of the eighty thousand, in six years, the survivors did not amount to twenty individuals. What sacrifice the English moloch of a false, wicked hatred of Catholics!

1660—1692: 32 years.

This is the period of the Restoration! This event consigned to the soldiers of Ireton and Cromwell, the property of the Irish Catholics.

The Duke of York, subsequently James the Second, took for his share of the plunder, eighty thousand acres of land belonging to Catholics.

The treaty of Limerick was made in 1691, which secured to the Irish on the pledge of "faith and honor" equal protection and religious toleration.

1692—1778: 86 years.

The Irish were faithful in every respect to the stipulations of the treaty: the English violated it at the first opportunity. By acts of Parliament every Catholic was deprived of the power of settling a jointure on any Catholic wife—or charging his lands with any provision for his daughters—or disposing of his property by will.

If the wife of a Catholic became a Protestant, the law required a separate maintenance to be given her, and the children transferred to her custody.

If the eldest son of a Catholic father, at at any age, however young, declared himself a Protestant, he thereby made his father strict tenant for life, and became entitled to the ownership of the estate.

If any other child became a Protestant he was entitled to separate maintenance.

If any Catholic purchase for money any estate in land, any Protestant was empowered to take it away from the Catholic. Thus the Catholic lost both money and estate. If any Catholic got an estate in land by marriage, by gift or by will, any Protestant could seize it.

If any Catholic took a lease of a farm for a longer term than 31 years, any Protestant could take, by law, the farm, and enjoy the lease.

If any Catholic had a horse, worth more than five pounds, any Protestant tendering £5 to the Catholie owner, was by law entitled to the horse, though worth £50 or £100.

Such was the instrumentality of a corrupt and short-sighted Protestantism to convert the erring Catholic! But disabilities were not restricted to "Property." They extended to Education, their Persons and Religion.

Education.—If a Catholic kept school, or taught any person, Protestant or Catholic any species of science, such teacher suffered banishment: if he returned, he was hanged as a felon.

If a Catholic attended, in Ireland, a school kept by a Catholic, such Catholic, although an infant, forfeited all its property, present or future.

If a Catholic child was sent abroad to be educated, such child, also, forfeited his property, present or prospective.

If any person in Ireland made a remittance of money or goods to maintain a child abroad, such persons forfeited their property.

Personal Disabilities.—No Catholic, unless he solemnly abjured his religion, could even be a private soldier.

No Catholic could hold any office of honor or emolument in the State.

A Catholic had no legal protection for life or liberty. He could not be a judge, juror, nor even a game-keeper of a private gentleman.

Catholics were excluded from many corporate towns, and could be members of none.

Religion.—To teach the Catholic religion was a transportable felony; to convert a Protestant to Catholicism was a capital offence.

To be a Catholic regular, that is a monk or friar, was punishable by "banishment, and to return from banishment an act of high"-treason.

To be in any respect an officer in the Catholic church in Ireland was punishable by transportation; to return from such transportation was an act of high-treason, punishable by being hanged, embowelled alive and afterwards quartered.

All these enactments were in direct violation of the treaty. Burke, speaking of this machine of elaborate contrivance, says that it was well fitted for the oppression, impoverishment and degradation of the people, and the debasement in them of human nature itself.

This code prevented the accumulation of property, and then its originators reproached its subjects with poverty. This code enforced ignorance by statute law, and then its framers censured the Irish people with their Ignorance. Oppression everywhere creates ignorance and poverty, and then uses these as arguments against the unfitness of the oppressed to enjoy their rights.

1778—1800: 22 years.

Persecution is useless in every country for conversion. It fails every where; it failed in Ireland. The Catholics went into the persecution two millions in number; the Protestants were one million. The Catholics have increased to seven millions: the Protestants are the original million. In the first they were two to one: in the second they are seven to one.

"Captive Israel multiplies in chains."

The "Penal Code"—technical name for the persecuting code—was relaxed in 1778. This was occasioned by the affairs of America. This year was too late to conciliate America: it succeeded in Ireland. It restored to the Catholics the same power over property as was enjoyed by Protestants. But still they could not acquire by purchase or as tenant, any freehold interests.

In 1782 the "Penal Code" was again relaxed. This was occasioned by the combined naval forces of England's enemies triumphing over the "meteor flag" and riding triumphant even in the British Channel. This relaxation enabled the Catholics to acquire freehold property for lives, or of inheritance. It enabled the Catholics to open schools, and to educate their youth.

Ten years of great and increasing prosperity in Ireland—and of peace and power in England ensued.

In 1792 the Catholics petitioned for their political rights. A motion to lay the petition on the table was lost. A motion to reject unanimously prevailed. Before the close of this year the French armies defeated their enemies at every point. The cannon of Gemappie were heard at St. James. The same government, which, at the commencement of the year, had rejected the petitions, now, without a petition, through fear, still farther relaxed the "penal code;" and early the next year relaxed still farther. By these relaxations, the bar, the lay corporations, the juries, and the elective franchise were opened to the Catholics.

1800.

This is the year that destroyed the Irish Legislature—that consummated the crimes of the English government against Ireland. To enact the Union its contrivers kept alive the embers of lingering rebellion. They excited Catholic against Protestant and Protestant against Catholic.

During the progress of the Union the Habeas Corpus Act was suspended and MARTIAL LAW was proclaimed. All meetings of Irish Catholics was suppressed, and their voice could not be heard.

This was not all. The pecuniary corruption amounted to thirteen millions of dollars.

The Union was carried by force, fraud, terror, torture, and corruption. Ireland, at the time of the Union, owed twenty millions of funded debt: England, eight hundred and forty millions of pounds sterling! By the Union, Ireland was made to owe eight hundred and forty millions. Again, Ireland was entitled to 170 representatives: the Union gave her but 100.

1800—1829: 29 years.

This period is memorable for a superior species of political manœvre on the part of the Irish. They extorted a bill of emancipation from the House of Commons, which was three times defeated in the House of Lords. A fourth trial was successful. The Lords yielded to the fourth assault. This struggle was for freedom of conscience. One of the blackest histories in the page of time is that of the persecutions of Protestant England upon Irish Catholics. The Irish Catholics were restored to power three times since the Reformation, but never persecuted a single person.

1829—1840: 11 years.

This period gave birth to the general Reform Bill, in which, as usual, Ireland does not receive justice.

Scotland increased her representatives by one in five—Wales by one in six—Ireland one in ten.

England has ten different franchises to suit her different circumstances: Ireland, the poorer country, has but two franchises, and these enormously high. Thus Ireland, by the Reform Bill, was again cheated out of her proper portion of representation.

Another odious feature of the Reform Bill was the 'Coercion Act,' which annihilated jury trials, and exposed the people of Ireland, in life, liberty, and property, to the mercy of military caprice or violence.

Another feature, by permitting only such to vote as had paid eleven different taxes, decreased by one-third more the representation of Ireland. In England one tax paid by a person on the Burgess roll entitled to a vote.

By the Tithe Rent Charge, the Catholics of Ireland support four Archbishops, twenty-five Bishops, many Deans, Vicars-general, and more than three thousand parish priests and curates, to administer to the wants of seven millions. These teachers are also of another religion—one for which they have no communion.

Miscellaneous Facts on Irish Oppression.

In the county of Kent there are thirteen parishes without a single church or resident pastor.

☞ In West Somerset there are sixteen parishes in which there has not been a resident parson within the memory of any living man, and yet in both these counties the tithes are fully collected. Since the year 1800, the enormous sum of twelve millions of dollars has been voted in support of the church system out of the public money, over and above the revenue from the church lands and tithes.

Of 1472 benefices or livings in Ireland, 583 have not a resident clergyman. In 210 parishes there is no church, in 158 no divine service, and in 41 parishes, not one resident member in connection with the established church!

Ireland pays to support a naval armament, the civil and military establishment, upwards of thirteen millions of dollars—all designed to keep Ireland in subjection.

The total amount of 'secret service money' paid for spies, informants, &c. by Great Britain, from 1797 to 1804 was two millions of dollars.

Between 1798 and 1800 there were sixty nine Roman Catholic Chapels destroyed in Ireland by British Protestantism. The celebrated Dr. Leiber tells us that under Cromwell's lieutenancy in Ireland, 20,000 Irish were sold as slaves in America, and 40,000 entered into foreign service. Great numbers of the Irish entered into the French army, and it has been computed that 450,000 fell in the French service from 1691 to 1745.

Several persons under James I. were arrested on a charge of treason. The charge was unfounded; the object of it was to confiscate their property. To force witnesses to become perjured, their obstinacy was punished with the most horrible tortures.—They were burned in the fleshy parts of the body with hot irons; placed on a gridiron over a charcoal fire, and finally flogged until nature could support them no longer, and they promised to swear any thing that the commissioners pleased. Bills of indictment were presented to Grand Juries and at once ignored. For this opposition to the will of government, the jurors were summoned to the Star Chamber and heavily fined. Several witnesses who could not be subdued, were given up to the vengeance of the law. This is but a specimen of the numerous class of occurrences under the reign of James. Six entire counties were at once forfeited to the crown. A mere anonymous letter on any subject in which the crown was involved, was amply sufficient evidence to procure conviction.

Under Charles I., the same system of fraud and oppression was continued. The entire counties of Roscommon, Mayo, and Sligo were pronounced forfeited, but not until many jurors had suffered from heavy fines, had been pilloried with loss of ears, had been bored through the tongue, and sometimes marked in the forehead with a hot iron.

To obtain the rich county of Galway, the sheriff was fined one thousand pounds, the jurors were fined four thousand pounds each —and sentenced to remain in prison until they would become obedient subjects. The Barrister for the landholders' Irish of the county was undoubtedly bribed. This man afterwards for eighteen years enjoyed a private pension of £300 per annum from the crown.

Twenty-seven thousand Irishmen at one time, and forty thousand at another, were expatriated. At other different times, a hundred thousand more were exiled. Six thousand boys and women were also sent away, and Petty says that these were sold for slaves. These unhappy exiles perished in hundreds and thousands.

Finally, the lands of the Irish which still remained, were by Parliament ordered to be divided between the soldiers, and they were so divided, all, except 605,670 acres of a refuse quality.

Notices of Persecutions of the Irish as Catholics—for their religion.

The startling record which we have thus far presented is all associated with religious persecution. Indeed the most vital fact in Irish history is English hatred of Catholics. It was ever made the instrument and pretext of tyranny and oppression upon the native Irish. When Irish history can fairly and candidly be written and ingenuously received, when the hatred against Catholics shall have assumed a proper spirit, the history of few people will transcend in interest. Next to Negro oppression, we reckon Irish oppression. It may be supposed by some, that we are presenting the worst features of the matter. By no means. We dare no more write the half we know on Irish oppression than on Southern slavery.

Protestantism owed its introduction into Ireland to the foul passions of Henry the Eighth. Its principal patron in Ireland was Archbishop Browne, who was not any farther advanced in morality than Henry his master. The church establishment of Great Britain was commenced in a gross and glaring fraud. The Act of Supremacy is the name of that act which vested in the King spiritual power, and gave existence to the present overgrown and oppressive state-and-church establishment. The Act of Supremacy could not have been passed except through the grossest fraud. The proctors of the clergy had, from the commencement of the parliaments held in Ireland, been received as members of that body. It would have been impossible to pass the Act of Supremacy if they had remaimed in the house. Henry the Eighth made short work of the matter—he expelled them. Thus Protestantism became the law of the land. It is very necessary for Protestants to make a distinction between the Reformation and Protestantism. The first we can always approve: the second we can frequently condemn.

We next notice the Act of Uniformity. This was passed in Ireland by a gross trick. The Speaker of the Irish Government, who was a Protestant, got together a few members whom he knew would favor his project, on a day on which it was not customary to hold a session. At this secret meeting the Act of Uniformity was passed. The absent members having learned this, in full and regular meeting of Parliament protested against it. Upon which the Lord Lieutenant assured many of them, privately, that the penalties of that statute should never be inflicted; they, believing him, permitted it to remain as it was.

The first means of conversion which the protector, (Somerset,) under Edward the Sixth, with reference to the Irish Catholics, was to attack their churches, destroy the ornaments, and pollute the altars. The first impression produced by the advocates of the reformed religion was that the new system sanctioned sacrilege and robbery.

But in the reign of Elizabeth the persecution raged with excessive fury. Catholic priests were murdered by multitudes. The friars were slain in their monasteries, and monks in their convents. Active laymen were brought to the torture, and, if incorrigible in their religious tenets, were murdered and quartered.

A common torture in 1579 and '80 was to immerse the legs in jack-boots filled with quick lime, water, &c., until they were burnt to the bone, in order to force the subject to take the oath of supremacy, and then, with other circumstances of barbarity, executed on the gallows.

It was a usual thing to beat, with stones, the shorn heads of the clergy, till their brains gushed out. Others had needles thrown under their nails, or the nails themselves were torn off. Others had their bowels torn open, which they were obliged to support with their hands, or their flesh torn with curry-combs.

Dr. Johnson, speaking of this period, says that there is ne instance even in the "ten persecutions," equal to the severity which the Protestants exercised against the Catholics of Ireland.

Dr. Milner collected the history of 204 persons executed during this period, on the sole account of being Catholic. Of this number, 142 were priests, three were ladies of rank, and the remainder gentlemen of intelligence and worth. Amongst them, 15 were condemned for denying the SPIRITUAL supremacy of the sovereign, 126 for the exercise of priestly functions, and the rest for being reconciled to the Catholic faith. He records the history of ninety priests who died in prison, and of 105 others sent into perpetual banishment. He enumerates a host that were stripped, whipped, fined, and their property destroyed. In one night, 50 Catholic gentlemen of one parish were suddenly seized and committed to prison for non-attendance at church. These were every week, during a whole year, dragged by main force to hear the established service. In 1588, 1200 Roman Catholics were in some sort or other, victims of such persecution.

Another writer says, "After being hanged up, they were cut down alive, dismembered, ripped up, and their bowels literally burned before their faces, after which they were beheaded and quartered. The time employed in their butchery was considerable, and, in one instance, lasted above half an hour.

The following tortures were in use against Catholics in the tower. 1. The common rack, in which the limbs were stretched by levers. 2. The Scavenger's Daughter, so called, being like a hoop, in which the body was bent until the head and feet met together. 3. The chamber, called Little Ease, being a hole so small that a person could neither stand, sit, nor lie straight in it. 4. The Iron Gauntlets. 5. Needles were thrust under the nails. 6. If the offenders were young ladies, that is, would not go to church, they were merely scourged—cruelly sometimes.

* * * *

In 1643 it was resolved by the English Parliament that a cessation of measures against Ireland would be destructive to the Protestant religion, grievful to all true Protestants, and provoking to the wrath of a jealous God. Oh! Protestantism, what horrors have been done in thy name! From this sad recital we may learn why Protestantism has done nothing for Ireland, and whence the prejudices of the Irish against the Reformed religion. They are not based on the idle tales of priests, but on the heart-felt woes and sufferings of ages!

ROBERT MCMURDY.

Pigua, January 1st, 1845.

A Bad Habit.

"Oh, mother! I am tired to death!" said Jane Mills as she threw herself into a chair on her return from school.

"Tired to death?" repeated her mother, slowly.

"Yes, mother, I am—almost, I mean," she added.

"No, my daughter, not even almost," said Mrs. Mills.

"Well, at any rate," continued Jane, "I would not walk from here to school again to-day, for any thing in the world."

"Oh yes you would, my dear," said her mother, gently.

"No, mother, I am sure I would not. I am certain nothing would tempt me."

"But I am nearly certain you could be induced to go without any urging," answered her mother.

"Well, mother, try me, and see if any thing could make me willing to go."

"Suppose," said Mrs. Mills, "I should offer to take you with me to the new panorama this afternoon? I expect to visit it."

"Do you, mother," said Jane, with great animation. "May I go? You promised to take me when you went."

"I intended to have done so," replied her mother, "but the place where it is exhibited is a long way beyond your school."

"But I am quite rested now, dear mother," said Jane. "I would not fail of going for all the world. Why do you smile, mother?"

"To think what an inconsistent little daughter I have."

"What do mean by inconsistent, mother?"

"Why, when a little girl says one minute that she would not walk a particular distance for any thing in the world; and the next minute says she would not fail of walking still further for all the world, she not only talks inconsistently and extravagantly, but foolishly. It is a very bad habit to use such expressions. Yesterday, when you came home from school, you said you were almost frightened out of your life, and when I inquired as to the cause of your alarm, you replied that you had met as many as a thousand cross dogs on your way home from school.

"Now, my daughter, I wish you to break yourself of this bad habit. When you are tired or hungry, or frightened, use the simple words that express your meaning. For instance, you may be tired—very tired—or excessively tired. Or you may be alarmed, or frightened, or terrified.

"From this time let your lips speak the thing you mean. The Bible says, 'Let your yea be yea and your nay nay;' and adds, that 'Whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil.'

"Will you try to remember what I have been saying, and strive to correct this fault, my dear child," said Mrs. Mills.

"Yes, dear mother," replied Jane; "for I know it is wrong, and I feel ashamed and sorry for it."

"Well, my dear," added her mother,—"IMPROVE. And now you may get ready to go with me to see the panorama."

USE OF FISHES IN WELLS AND CISTERNS.—In a letter from Mr. Levi Burnell, of Lorain county, Ohio, to the editor of the Ohio Cultivator, we find the following:—Louisville Journal.

Those who are troubled with angle worms in their wells, as some are in sandy or gravelly districts in this State, may be profited by a suggestion which will perhaps save them the trouble of pumping out the water.

Catch a small fish, [a brook trout is preferable,] and put it into the well. He will devour all the angle worms, and fatten on them, [without at all injuring the sweetness or the purity of the water,] and if any are afraid he will die, they can, after a while, bait a hook and take him out for the frying pan, and supply his place with another.

Again. I have had a cistern of perfectly clear rainwater all summer, free from all wigglers or embryo mosquitoes, by merely dropping in a few little rain brook fishes one to three inches long. The little fellows seem to have prospered finely, and are quite sprightly this winter. If they live through, I presume they will perform the same useful service for me again next summer; if not, the children can easily scoop up enough more in almost any of the little streams in the pastures or elsewhere. So much for my experience—if these hints prove serviceable to others, it will give me pleasure.

The Sabbath Recorder.

The Recorder.

THE SABBATH IN SCOTLAND.

LETTER FROM JAMES A. BEGG.

Some of our readers are already acquainted with JAMES A. BEGG, of Glasgow, Scotland, as the author of several valuable works on the subject of Prophecy. More than a dozen years ago, and soon after issuing the first edition of the work which established his reputation as a student of prophecy, his "Connected View," Mr. Begg's attention was called to the claims of the original Sabbath, and he was led to commence observing the seventh day. Since that time he has continued the practice, with not a little self-denial on his own part, but with great advantage to the cause of the Sabbath. It was our privilege to spend a few days with him some months ago, which we shall remember long and pleasantly. The following extracts from a private letter are so appropriate to the present time, and so instructive withal, that we are sure he will pardon us for making them public. [ED. SAB. REC.

35 ARGYLL ARCADE, GLASGOW,
April 1st, 1845.

* * * "I have received the numbers of the Sabbath Recorder as so many letters from your hand. I have been much interested with this record of the Sabbath cause, and evidence of its growing consideration in the United States, and wish much that some such organ could exist in my native land.

"Here, however, there is no room left for even the idea of a possible error regarding the day of rest, or at least, there is no feeling of importance attached to returning to the divine appointment. Much is said, especially in Scotland, about the importance indeed of Sabbath observance, but the phrase is used in error regarding the first day of the week. Half year by half year we have in Glasgow the Railway battle, at every meeting of the Shareholders of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway. For in their zeal for Sabbath sanctity, in their meaning of the word, some ministers as well as laymen, have purchased shares, for the express purpose of declaring that they and their brother shareholders are weekly sinning against the commandment of the Lord. They urge that commandment with great freedom, as if it really embodied some principle of sanctity for the day of their adoption. But, however, as their logic is, I do not wonder at the fear they manifest and express; for it is my full conviction, that it is to be one of the instruments by which the fence hitherto maintained around the Sunday is to be destroyed, and the way made more open for the observance of the Sabbath of the Lord by those who love and reverence His authority. You will not, I am sure, suppose me to approve of the motive under which Railway Companies are acting in this matter. Covetousness and love of pleasure are, I believe, banishing from their minds the thought of Sabbath and Sunday alike. But the God of the Sabbath, perceiving upon the part of the Church, an utter indifference to His appointment, and an unwarranted attachment to their own, may for purposes of correction and reformation, permit the unbelievers to level Sunday to its proper place, that hindrances of law being removed, those who desire may both be able to "work six days," and to sanctify the seventh. This will indeed prove, I fear beyond doubt, that human law alone is that which keeps many in outward reverence for the first day of the week; but it will also, I feel assured, be the means of removing bonds from others who would desire to keep the Sabbath, if they saw how they could.

I am not seeking to vindicate any who, under that "fear of man which bringeth a snare," are prevented from doing what they know to be right; but I do know there are those in this country who in their hearts prefer the seventh to the first day, who yet from want of that measure of faith which can trust the Lord for His blessing on their obedience, allow themselves to continue Sabbath-breakers in the hope that God of His mercy, looking upon their difficulties, will forgive their acknowledged sin. And truly, my dear brother, when spoken to by such of their difficulties, as I have often been, I have felt it no easy matter to present any thing on which the eye of sense could rest. A workman sees no prospect of an opening in the department to which he belongs, if he should refuse to serve his master on the busiest day of the week. And a master, with many workmen in his employ, can perceive no means of carrying on his business if his factory is to be shut when others are open; while perhaps he thinks farther of injury done to his workmen, if he had those who would submit, in compelling them to be idle when he goes to worship. I know that the same argument might be adduced, and that it has been adduced, by and for those who want no day of rest, hallowed or unhallowed. But it is less felt in reference to the day which human law has made universally an idle day if not a sanctified one; and probably as the law which binds men to the first is relaxed, the bonds of divine love may be felt more powerfully. Lamenting as I do the present sad state of matters in this country, I look forward at least with hope to the change which is certainly being effected through Railway opportunities and inducements, in the Sunday habits of our land. As respects the Church, I expect that change to be for good, and as the Church occupies the place of "light of the world," through her a stumbling-block will be removed out of the way of the world.

I am sorry to say, dear brother, that I have done nothing worth naming since I saw you, in regard to the Sabbath. Having the opportunity of addressing a meeting on the first day regularly, I have once or twice brought in the question of the Sabbath incidentally—and on the evening of Sunday next, I propose concluding a course of Lectures on Prophecy by exhibiting the Scripture promises of return to the Sabbath. But I have not made it with the people a subject of frequent discussion; they have never, however, been allowed to suppose that I either regard it as a doubtful matter, or Sabbath observance a small duty. My conscience never would allow me to do so; and the love I bear to them leads me to desire earnestly that they should share with me God's great blessing."

THE PASSOVER.

This great festival of the Jews commenced the present year on the 22d day of April. The following account of the ceremonies with which it is celebrated in modern times, will be read with interest by Christians as well as Jews.

"The feast of the Passover commences on the evening of the fourteenth day of the first month, Nisan, and ends, as at present observed, on the evening of the twenty-second day of the same month. Being commanded to eat no other bread than that which is unleavened, during the whole of the seven days of the Passover, the Jews commence some time before the feast preparing the flour and baking the cakes. Great pains are taken to cleanse the mill where the wheat is to be ground, and all the baking utensils. In this city, and probably in other places, it is the practice of the Jews to engage the entire and exclusive use of a bakery, for a number of days, during which no other work is permitted to be done in it. The cakes are made of pure flour and water. As soon as the dough is kneaded they are rolled out very thin, and pierced full of small holes, to prevent their rising. They are then, with all the haste possible, to prevent them from fermenting, put into a hot oven. During this time the Jews drink no spirituous liquor made of grain. Great pains are taken to remove all leaven out of the house, except what is necessary for food, until the fourteenth day at noon.

"With the beginning of the fourteenth day, which commences with twilight after sunset, they search for leavened bread, to remove it. This is called chametz badel, (to remove the leaven,) and is done in the following manner. At the corner of a table in the parlor, and in one or two other rooms, a few crumbs of bread are deposited. The master of the family, having pronounced a blessing, goes from room to room, accompanied by others, carrying lights, and sweeps the crumbs with a pen into a wooden spoon or basin, ties it up carefully that nothing may fall out, and hangs it up in a place where no mouse can come to it. The prayer he uses reads thus: 'Blessed be thou, O Lord our God, the King everlasting, who hast sanctified us by thy commandments, and hast enjoined us the putting away of leaven. All the leaven that is in my possession, which I have seen or which I have not seen, be it null, be it as the dust of the earth." The next morning, between the hours of ten and twelve, these crumbs of leavened bread are publicly burned, as a proclamation that henceforth no more leavened bread is to be eaten till after the feast. From this time all vessels and kitchen utensils, knives, &c. that have been used with leaven must be removed, and their places supplied with new ones, or by some that are kept from one Passover to another, and never used but on that occasion.

"At the close of the fourteenth day, about six o'clock, the men assemble in the synagogue to usher in the festival by appropriate prayers. During this time most of the women are occupied at home in laying and decorating the table, which is covered with a clean linen cloth, on which are placed several plates or dishes. On one of them is laid the shank bone of a shoulder of lamb, or kid, and an egg; on another three Passover cakes, distinguished from each other by notches or holes, carefully wrapped up in two napkins; on a third is laid some lettuce, parsley, and horse-radish. These are the bitter herbs. There is also a small dish containing a paste or sauce, called charoseth, composed of apples, almonds, nuts and figs, mixed with wine and seasoned with cinnamon, having the appearance of red clay, to remind them of the bricks which were made by their forefathers in Egypt.

"The family being seated, the master pronounces a blessing over the table in general, and the wine in particular, and another blessing for the return of this festival. Then, instead of appearing in the posture of a traveler, as was anciently enjoined, (Ex. xii. 11,) he leans his left arm on a couch or bed made up for the occasion, as an indication of the liberty and rest which the Israelites regained when they departed from Egypt, and drinks of the first cup, in which he is followed by all the company. They then dip some of the herbs in vinegar, whilst the master pronounces a blessing. The design of this dipping is to excite the curiosity of the children, that they may wonder at this strange beginning of a meal, and be led to inquire about the matter. The master next unfolds the napkins, and taking the middle cake, breaks it in two, replaces the one half, and conceals the other half under the couch on which he leans, in allusion to the circumstance that the people took their dough before it was leavened, "their kneading troughs being bound up in their clothes." (Ex. xii. 34.) The concealed part of the cake is called Aphicomen, or last meal; for the rule was to conclude with eating a small piece of the paschal lamb, and after the destruction of the temple, of unleavened bread.

"The lamb and egg being removed from the table, they lift up the plate containing the cake, and say, "This is the bread of poverty and affliction which our fathers did eat in Egypt. Whosoever hungers let him come and eat; whosoever needs let him come and eat of the paschal lamb: this year we are here, the next we shall be in the land of Canaan: this year we are servants, the next we shall go out free." The lamb and egg are again placed on the table, and the cup filled the second time.

"The children now propose several questions as to the reason of these observances. The master then replies, "This is the passover which we eat, because the Lord passed over the houses of our fathers in Egypt; and holding up the bitter herbs in his hand he says, "These are the bitter herbs that we eat, in remembrance that the Egyptians made the lives of our fathers bitter." And holding up the unleavened bread, he continues, "This is the unleavened bread which we eat, because our fathers had not time to leaven their dough before the Lord redeemed them, and therefore must we say before him, 'Hallelujah! praise ye the Lord.'" Then they repeat the 113th and 114th Psalms, called the lesser hallel, and conclude with a prayer and drink of the second cup.

"They now prepare for supper by washing their hands, the person officiating breaks one of the cakes, and gives a piece to each of the company, to which they join bitter herbs dipped in the charoseth or sauce, and eat it instead of the paschal lamb. After supper they eat a piece of the cake that was broken first, the master then washes his hands, repeats the blessing usual after meal, and drinks of the third cup, which is called the cup of blessing. The fourth cup being filled, they repeat or sing the great hallel, i. e. Psalms cxv.—cxviii. inclusive, and conclude with a prayer.

OLD AGE.

Bending he leaned, and from his weary eye
A single tear drop'd:
None followed; for the fount was dry."

The gray haired pilgrim, as he traces the tablets of his memory, looks back upon his youth as a thing of yesterday, the occurrences of early life are all too fondly remembered, while the affairs of to-day are unheeded. The glittering scythe of death, the cankered rust of destruction and disappointment, have destroyed full many a link of the bright chain that once bound him to earth, and many another link has been lost in the dark gulf of adversity. One by one the gilded hopes of childhood, the pleasures of youth, and pursuits and connections of manhood, with all their bright associations, have been obliterated from the page of existence. Like an old oak of the forest, the sport of the elements for ages, whose riven trunk and gnarled branches, bear the impress of lightnings and tempest, so is old age, as shattered by the temptations and afflictions of life, it stands amidst the fallen leaves of retrospective pleasure. Weak tottering age, whose prototype is infancy reversed, the last chapter in the earthly career of life. Now and then brilliant gleams of the dormant intellect flash in momentary sublimity over the miserable wreck of that which was once a fit tenement for this immortal mind. But to the effort succeeds a chaos like that following the last convulsive effort of a huge volcano, which with one mighty throe, casts up the lurid stream of lava and fire, illuminating with its gigantic flame, height, plain and glen, then leaving the scene enveloped in a cloud of murky darkness. The "silver chord" is severed, strand by strand, and fibre by fibre, and all its hold on mortality is gently loosened, and the ripened head is gathered into the garner of eternity.

Then the volume of life is transferred from the shelf of earth to the studio of its author, or is cast aside as worthless, or rebound, according to its tested worth, in an envelope of spotless purity —of fadeless immortality.

ANECDOTE OF HUME.

It seems that Hume received a religious education from his mother, and early in life was the subject of strong and hopeful religious impressions; but as he approached to manhood, they were effaced, and confirmed infidelity succeeded. Maternal partiality, however alarmed at first, came to look with less and less pain upon this declaration, and filial love and reverence seem to have been absorbed in the pride of philosophical skepticism; for Hume now applied himself with unwearied, and unhappily, with successful efforts, to sap the foundation of his mother's faith. Having succeeded in this dreadful work, he went abroad into foreign countries; and as he was returning, an express met him in London, with a letter from his mother, informing him that she was in a deep decline, and could not long survive; she said she found herself without any support in her distress; that he had taken away that source of comfort upon which in all cases of affliction she used to rely, and that now she found her mind sinking into despair: she did not doubt that her son would afford her some substitute for her religion; and she conjured him to hasten home, or at least to send her a letter, containing such consolation as philosophy can afford to a dying mortal. Hume was overwhelmed with anguish on receiving this letter, and hastened to Scotland, traveling day and night; but before he arrived his mother expired.

No permanent impressions seem, however, to have been made on his mind by this most trying event; and whatever remorse he might have felt at the moment, he soon relapsed into his wonted obduracy of heart. [Quarterly Review.

VOLTAIRE.—Hon. J. Q. Adams thus speaks of Voltaire:

"The truth is, that Voltaire was a lively, sarcastical, disingenuous, prejudiced, fanatical disbeliever in christianity, ready to assume the mask of religion or cast it away, just as suited his interest or his humor; intent above all things upon making himself a name, and flattering himself that his easiest way to do it was by demolishing the Christian religion. I never thought his Philosophical Dictionary worth reading, and I read his Bible only to despise it.

I have, also, read his maid of Orleans, and despised him also for that, infamous for its perversion of moral principle and all decency. Its injustice to one of the brightest characters in human history is its most crying sin. A Frenchman who can think of Joan of Arc without reverence, must have a heart colder than the everlasting ice of the poles."

A MINISTER'S QUALIFICATIONS FOR HIS OFFICE.

BY THE REV. R. CECIL, M. A.

When a young minister sets out, he should sit down and ask himself how he may best qualify himself for his office.

How does a physician qualify himself? It is not enough that he offers to feel the pulse. He must read, and inquire, and observe, and make experiments, and correct himself again and again. He must lay in a stock of medical knowledge before he begins to feel the pulse.

The minister is a physician of a far higher order. He has a vast field before him. He has to study an infinite variety of constitutions. He is to furnish himself with the knowledge of the whole system of remedies. He is to be a man of skill and experience. If one thing fail, he must know how to apply another. Many intricate and perplexed cases will come before him: it will be disgraceful to him not to be prepared to answer them. He is a merchant embarking in extensive concerns. A little ready money in the pocket will not answer the demands that will be made upon him. Some of us seem to think it will, but are grossly deceived. There must be a well-furnished account at the banker's.

But it is not all gold that glitters. A young minister must learn to separate and select his materials. A man who talks to himself will find out what suits the heart of man: some things respond; they ring again. Nothing of this nature is lost on mankind; it is worth its weight in gold, for the service of a minister. He must remark, too, what it is that puzzles and distracts the mind: all this is to be avoided; it may wear the garb of deep research, and great acumen, and extensive learning; but it is nothing to the mass of mankind.

One of the most important considerations in making a sermon, is to disembarrass it as much as possible. The sermons of the last century were like their large unwieldy chairs. Men have now a far more true idea of a chair. They consider it as a piece of furniture to sit upon, and they cut away from it every thing that embarrasses and encumbers it. It requires as much reflection and wisdom to know what is not to be put into a sermon as what is.

He should become a philosopher also. He should make experiments on himself and others, in order to find out what will produce effect. He is a fisherman, and the fisherman must fit himself to his employment. If some fish will bite only by day, he must fish by day; if others will bite only by moonlight, he must fish for them by moonlight. He has an engine to work, and it must be his most assiduous endeavor to work his engine to the full extent of its powers; and to find out its powers, is the first step towards success and effect.

But all the minister's efforts will be vanity, or worse than vanity, if he have not unction. Unction must come down from heaven, and spread a savor, and relish, and feeling over his ministry. And, among all the other means of qualifying himself for his office, the Bible must hold the first place, and the last also must be given to the word of God and prayer.

Some men set up exorbitant notions about accuracy; but exquisite accuracy is totally lost on mankind. The greater part of those who hear, cannot be brought to see the points of the accurate man. The Scriptures are not written in this manner. I should advise a young minister to break through all such cobwebs as these unphilosophical men would spin round him. An humble and modest man is silenced, if he sees one of these critics before him. He should say, "I am God's servant; to my own master I stand or fall; I will labor according to the utmost ability which God giveth, and leave all consequences to him."

One errs who says, I will preach a reputable sermon; and another errs who says, I will leave all to the assistance of the Holy Spirit, while he has neglected a diligent preparation.

THE PHENOMENA OF THE BRAIN.

One of the most inconceivable things that is to be found in the nature of the brain, is, that the organ of sensation should itself be insensible. To cut the brain gives no pain, yet in the brain alone resides the power of feeling pain in any part of the body. It is only by communication with the brain that any kind of sensation is produced, yet the organ itself is insensible. But there is a circumstance more wonderful. The brain itself may be removed, may be cut down to the corpus calosum, without destroying life. The animal lives, and performs all those functions which are necessary to simple vitality, but has no longer a mind. It cannot think or feel, it requires that the food should be pushed into the stomach; once there it will thrive and grow fat. We infer, therefore, that the part of the brain called the convolutions, is simply intended for the exercise of the intellectual faculties, whether of that low degree called instinct, or of that exalted kind bestowed on man, the gift of reason.

INVISIBLE WRITING.—The plan of writing with rice water, to be rendered visible by the application of Iodine, was practiced with great success in the correspondence with Jellalabad. The first letter of this kind received from thence was concealed in a quilt. On opening it a small piece of paper was unfolded, on which appeared only a single word, "Iodine." The magic liquid was applied, and an interesting despatch from Sir Robert Sale stood forth.

Cruelty to the Fatherless Boy.

"Come on," said one of a group of boys, just dismissed from school, "let us bring snow from that bank and cover this steep place, and we can slide ever so far."

All assented to this proposal, but there was a difficulty in the want of tools; they loaded their sleds with snow with their hands and feet, but this was a slow operation. Charles found a thin piece of board, which he used for a shovel.

"Let me have it," said James. Charles saw no reason why he should do it, and he kept on using it himself. James then threw a large handful of snow in his face, saying, "take that then."

This caused Charles to drop the board in order to wipe his face. Another boy snatched it up.

"Please give me my shovel," said Charles.

"You threw it away, and now you sha'n't have it."

"Take that," said James, hitting Charles with a hard snowball.

"Give it to him," shouted Sammy, a very small boy, following the example of James; and this was followed by a general attack. Charles was provoked at this unjust treatment, and was at first disposed to avenge himself, but certain thoughts came into his mind which led him to drop the snowball he had formed, and walk away towards his home.

"He is going to tell his father," said one, in a taunting tone.

"He hasn't got any father," said another, in a triumphing tone.

Charles turned towards the last speaker with a look of sadness and sorrow, such as seldom shades the countenance of a boy of ten. But it had no effect, save on a small boy of seven years old, who had not joined in the attack. He ran after Charles, and as he happened to have a snowball in his hand, the boys supposed he was going to throw it at Charles.

"Give it to him, Will," said the brutal boy (for he deserved no better name) who said "he hasn't got any father." Willy's indignation was so great that he turned and threw the snowball at him; it struck him on the nose. He then ran and overtook Charles. "I'm going home with you," said he, to Charles, in a tone which showed how fully he sympathized with him. Charles took him by the hand, and they walked on in silence, when Willy seeing that he was weeping, asked, "Did they hurt you?"

"No, I don't care for snowballs: but I have nobody to care for me, my father is in his grave."

"But your uncle is good to you?"

"Oh yes, very; but then he can't talk to children, nor feel for them. He means to be very kind, and he is, only I feel very bad when I think of father."

Charles was the only son of a very kind father, who had died about six months before the occurrence of the incident above related. Charles was then sent far away from his native place to live with his uncle. His uncle and aunt pitied him, and loved him, and worked to make him happy. But they had no children of their own, and did not know how to sympathize with him. Their habits and manners were very different from those to which he had been accustomed. Everything was unlike his own home. He felt very lonely and unhappy, but tried to conceal it from his kind benefactors. He did not enjoy playing with the boys of the village much. At first they were all strangers; and they were often rude to him, though he was very careful to avoid giving any just cause of offence.

Willy spent an hour with Charles at his uncle's, and when he went home, told his mother how the boys had treated Charles.

"I am glad you acted as you did," said his mother, "except in one thing. Always take the part of the injured, my son."

"I always mean to, ma'am."

"Don't you suppose you are a great deal happier than if you had joined with the wicked boys?"

"I know I am, ma'am. But what was the one thing you meant, mother?"

"You should not have thrown the snowball at Thomas."

"Why, mother, he was so provoking that I could not help it. I think he deserved it."

"I know he deserved to be punished, but you were not the person to punish him. While it was proper that you should feel indignant at his unfeeling conduct, yet it should not lead you to do an angry act. 'Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord.'"

"I know that, mother. Charles said he was tempted to flog James when he threw snow in his face, but then he remembered what his father said to him."

"What was it?"

"He said a little while before he died, his father took him into a room alone, and told him he wouldn't have a father long; and told him what he wanted him to do when he was gone. He told him never to omit reading a chapter in the Bible, and pray every day—and to treat his mother kindly, and take care of her if he ever got old enough, and never to return evil for evil."

"He might have gone farther, and told him to return good for evil, after the manner of Him who said, 'Love your enemies, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you and persecute you.'"

NEW YORK, MAY 1, 1845.

OUR DUTY AND OUR HOPE.

It is a common objection to the independency of Churches, and a common argument in favor of episcopal authority, that in order to efficient action there must be some governing and directing power, which can look over the whole field of labor and provide for its cultivation. There is not only plausibility, but real weight, in this argument. In every denomination there are posts of special importance to be occupied—posts which can not be neglected without great loss. Yet if each individual church consults simply its own interests, and each minister of the Gospel seeks only his own advantage, some of these most important places will certainly be overlooked, and the general interests will suffer. There has been among our own churches and ministers, all will allow, a fault in this respect. Too little reference has been had to the general interests, in the movements of individuals and churches. The consequence has been, that in some cases sectional feeling has grown up, which has appeared to be almost as strong as the love of the common cause, and has threatened the worst evils to it. But it can hardly fail to be a source of deep satisfaction and joy to every friend of the truth, to witness the change which has taken place, or is now going on, in this respect—a change which promises to excite a new interest in the great cause, and to draw out our sympathies more fully towards a common object. We are sure that this is the first and principal thing now needed, and that if as a denomination we could act in concert, each branch of us considering and striving to promote the general good, our influence would be felt, and the truth with which we are identified gloriously advanced. This is our first duty, and this our only hope.

The question naturally arises, in this connection, to what particular point ought our Sabbath efforts now to be mainly directed? There are many whose eyes are turned towards the great conventions and reformatory movements of the day, and who hope much from efforts directed to them. It is important, undoubtedly, that these movements should not be neglected, but that the opportunities which they afford for disseminating the true doctrine in regard to the Sabbath should be promptly seized upon. The leaven which is cast in at such times will diffuse itself more or less widely, and its workings will at length be seen. Yet we cannot regard this as the only or principal field of labor. We believe it will be found that the truth in regard to the Sabbath, like unwelcome truth upon most other subjects, must begin to exert its influence, and must achieve its greatest victories, among the common people. The dignitaries of the church, and those especially who are engaged in the modern movements in favor of Sunday, have their own objects to secure, and are surrounded by a thousand influences which shield them against the naked truth. Their standing, their reputation, even their bread, in many cases depends upon their continuing to maintain the positions they have taken, and to favor long-established customs. Of course, in such circumstances, they are not the men to give ear to unpopular doctrines, however Scriptural. We repeat it, then, that we are to look to the common people, if to any class of men, for accessions, and are to direct our efforts towards them earnestly and hopefully. They are the persons who heard our Saviour gladly, and they have ever been foremost in promoting the reforms which have blessed the world. Labor expended upon them thus far has not been lost, nor do we believe that if put forth in the right spirit it can fail to produce the most happy effects. While, therefore, we would not advocate or encourage a neglect of the popular movements of the day, but would gratefully acknowledge the advantages which they afford for promulgating our doctrines, we must nevertheless regard that silent but powerful influence which may be exerted among the common people as the principal ground of hope.

The means of exerting an influence were never more fully at our command than now. We think there can hardly be a doubt, that the press is in this age and country the grand instrumentality for exerting a lasting influence. Through this we may speak to thousands for a trifling expense, and speak to them in such a way as to ensure a candid hearing. A frank and earnest presentation of truth in the form of tracts and papers is generally received with favor—very seldom with rudeness or neglect. Formerly it was difficult to obtain these. But now they may be had to an extent only limited by our pecuniary resources. Thus each individual, however humble and unpretending his station, has it in his power to become an effectual laborer in the cause; and having it in his power, cannot escape the responsibility. But the circulation of our publications should be connected with oral instruction upon the subject. Lectures and publications naturally go together, and each is an auxiliary of the other. Let us not separate things which are naturally joined. Casting an eye over the whole field, and seeing that each of these instrumentalities is needed, we ought to give each a place in our hearts, our prayers, and our contributions. Doing this, there is little reason to fear for the final result.

But there is one point in which we are greatly exposed, and upon which therefore we ought to be specially guarded; that is, of graduating our efforts by our apparent successes. There is often a restless anxiety to see the immediate results of labor, which prevents men from forming and carrying out any enlarged and consistent plans. When this anxiety takes possession of one, he is certain to meet with disappointments, and is in danger of becoming wholly discouraged. The only safety against such a result, is in learning not only to labor but to wait. Francis Bampfield, while a prisoner in London, had a severe trial upon this very point, and he did not find peace until his mind settled down upon this conclusion, "Duty is mine; the issues and consequences thereof are the Lord's, and do belong to Him." Let this conclusion be wrought into our hearts, and there is little danger that we shall become discouraged from apparent want of success.

CLERICAL NOTICES.

They have some curious ways of doing up things in England, among which we "reckon" their mode of circulating clerical notices. It seems that a paper has been established called "The Monthly Advertising Sheet of the Clerical Registry," with a guaranteed monthly circulation among the clergy of three thousand copies. Through this paper clergymen in want of assistants or situations can at once make known their wants to those who might feel an interest in becoming assistants or employing them. In a late number of the "Advertising Sheet," may be found a notice from a Rector in want of a Permanent Curate, who "must be a man of fortune, and be satisfied with one of the most beautiful parsonages, grounds, &c., in exchange for his services; he must also take the furniture, carriage, horses, &c., at a fair valuation; one condition being essential, viz. that he be a sincerely pious man, and devoted to his clerical duties." In the same number the editor gives notice that those "Incumbents having comfortable parsonage houses, either furnished or unfurnished, and who desire to meet with highly respectable Curates to take the sole charge of parishes in which these houses are situated, may meet with such Curates in many cases without any stipend," . . . "the chief desire of the clergymen in question being to find comfortable parsonage houses." But the most remarkable feature of these notices, is the descriptions which the parties give of their own qualifications and religious opinions. One man describes himself as "a clergyman of great respectability, and wholly orthodox views, but not a Tractarian." Another says he is "a sound Churchman, but evangelical in sentiment." A third "has a good voice, and is an acceptable preacher."

Now it needs no great acuteness of vision to foresee, that the natural consequence of countenancing and encouraging this system of trafficing in the the souls of men, must be to bring scandal upon the clergy, and blot out that distinction which has been usually recognized between their profession and that of other men. Indeed the fruit of it is already seen in the circulars which from time to time appear, wherein Messrs. So-and-so offer to "supply the nobility, clergy, and gentry," with "Curates or tutors, governesses, drawing-masters, dancing-masters," &c. One would suppose it sufficient to cure a clergyman of the advertising mania, if he could imagine himself walking into one of those offices and having the question politely asked him whether he wanted the situation of a curate or a dancing-master!

CLOSING THE CANALS ON SUNDAY.

"Why then should any man oppose the measure of closing the locks and giving the boatmen a Sabbath? Why, especially, should editors of papers, and professed friends of the Gospel, oppose it? Can there be any other motive than a deep-rooted hostility to the evangelical ministry, and a wish to secure the favor of infidels and libertines?"

Thus endeth an article in the Religious Recorder, published at Syracuse, N. Y., wherein the editor professes to bewail the impiety of certain persons who stoutly oppose the project for closing the canal locks on the first day of the week. We hardly know which most to admire in this extract, the editor's charity or his acumen. A charitable man he must certainly be, to suppose that all those who oppose this measure are actuated by such worthy motives. And who can doubt that he is an acute man, after his indirect acknowledgement that he sees no other reasons than are here named for opposing the measure? If we did not think the man too wise to be instructed by us, we would cheerfully undertake to enlighten him. As it is, we dare not.

CATHOLIC AND PROTESTANT OPINIONS.

"We find no divine authority in the sacred volume, by which the observance of Sunday becomes obligatory. Independent of the authority of the Church, or tradition, it is impossible to establish the assertion, that the first day of the week has been sanctioned by the resurrection of Christ. On this point, the Seventh-day Baptists are the most consistent Protestants." So says the Catholic Herald.

"How plausible an appearance can be given to egregious error!" So says the Sunday School Journal.

And yet, egregious as that error is, the editor of the Sunday School Journal dares not attempt to refute it. Hence his resort to an expression of contempt, which does no credit to his candor or piety. We are accustomed to judge that man unable to answer his opponent, who, instead of doing it, affects to despise him. Is not this a case of the kind, in which the editor of the Journal hopes by a sneer to cover up his conscious inability to refute the error of the Herald and make his own opinions appear equally "plausible?" It certainly appears so to the Sabbath Recorder.

"THE PULPIT," is the title of a monthly publication issued from No. 5 Spruce street, N. Y., containing Sermons, Sketches and Plans of Sermons, from living ministers, with other miscellaneous matter. It is edited by O. Scott, printed on a large sheet with 24 pages, and contains a great variety of articles interesting to the general reader as well as the minister. If this number is a fair specimen of what may be expected in future, the work will merit a liberal support.

LAURA BRIDGEMAN.—This interesting girl, though deaf, dumb, and blind, has been taught to converse and read with the fingers. Much interest has been felt in her case, on account of the experiments which her instructors have tried with her in order to test the doctrine of natural depravity. Whether they have any right to keep her in ignorance of Jesus Christ and the way of salvation through Him, for the purpose of teaching her what is called a pure Theism and the religion of Nature, is a question about which casuists might differ. But it seems that the attempt to present a specimen of uncorrupted innocence by keeping her away from all temptations, has signally failed, since she has once and again exhibited symptons of wilful disobedience and unprovoked anger. Such being the case, there is surely no reason why the experiment should be longer continued.

NORTHERN AND SOUTHERN BAPTISTS.—The action of the Foreign Mission Board at Boston, adverse to appointing slaveholding missionaries, seems to have roused the whole Southern portion of the Baptist denomination. A Southern Convention has been appointed to be held at Augusta, Ga., about the middle of May next, and the Southern Baptist papers are filled with articles upon the subject. A determination appears to exist at the South, to push matters to a crisis as soon as possible; and if any reliance can be placed upon newspaper reports in regard to Southern feeling, there is little reason to think that a reconciliation will take place, but every reason to expect that Northern and Southern Baptists will hereafter act through separate benevolent organizations. In such circumstances, the Anniversaries of the Baptist Societies, which take place at Providence, R. I., the present week, cannot fail to be deeply interesting and important.

REVIVAL IN ADAMS.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:

DEAR SIR:—As it is always pleasing to Christians to hear of the success of our holy religion in any part of the world, I thought that a brief account of what the blessed Lord has done and is doing in this vicinity, might at least be pardonable. About the first of March, Eld. Clark, pastor of the first-day Baptist Church in this place, and myself, commenced a series of evening meetings at the Seventh-day Baptist meeting-house. Religion seemed, in both churches, to be at a low ebb. We preached evenings, and during the day we visited from house to house, preaching and praying wherever we found admittance, the Lord, as we trust, going with us and setting home his truth to the hearts and consciences of the backslider and also of the sinner. Soon there was a good degree of interest manifested; the evening meetings were well attended; Zion began to pray; and sinners, being pricked in their hearts, inquired, "What shall we do to be saved?" We endeavored to point them to the "Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world;" quite a goodly number have been hopefully converted, and the work is still progressing, though less powerfully than at some periods of it. On the first Sabbath of this month I received 13 into the church by baptism; and others, some 6 or 8, intend to go forward soon. Some 20 or more have united, or intend soon to unite, with the other church in this place. After the meeting had continued about two weeks, my health failed me, so that I was obliged to keep my bed mostly during the day, in order to attend the meeting in the evening; but my beloved brother who was associated with me, and whom I love in the gospel, labored and toiled night and day, like an angel of God, and God blessed his labors in the gathering in of souls into the fold of Jesus. My health has in a measure improved, and as the work seems to call for laborers, I feel thankful for the privilege of spending my strength and feeble abilities in the cause of my blessed Master, praying that the Lord may revive all His churches, and gather souls into His kingdom.

REVIVALS.—We find in our exchange papers notices of revivals in different parts of the country, which cannot fail to encourage the hearts of all true Christians. From the notices now before us we select the following, which are but specimens of many others:—

The Indiana Messenger contains notices of revivals at Delphi, Lafayette, Crawfordsville, and some other places in the Wabash Valley. At Lafayette, 45 were added to the church.

A recent letter from Pennsylvania states, that interesting revivals of religion have for some time been in progress in five different towns of one county, where the population is chiefly German, and among whom the colporteur system of visiting families, sustaining meetings, and distributing religious books, has been prosecuted the past year.

About 400 or 500 persons were added to the Baptist churches in Platte Co., Missouri, during a late revival there.

SABBATH REFORM—A QUESTION.—Will some one of those who are anxious to stop the sale of ardent spirits on Sunday, and who consider the stopping of railroad cars on that day as a sign of SABBATH reform, do us the favor to show how near the consummation of all such measures will bring the Christian world to that Sabbath-keeping which the law of God requires—that law, we mean, for the breach of which we must answer at the day of our final account? Should Sunday be rigidly observed throughout the world in accordance with the wishes of some modern "Sabbath" reformers, would such observance indicate a triumph of Christianity, or of Paganism—a triumph of the law of God, or of the practice of heathen sun-worshipers?

TO OUR AGENTS AND FRIENDS IN WESTERN NEW YORK.—When we commenced the Recorder in June last, we were assured that if it had started a month or two earlier the list of paying subscribers might have been considerably increased in Western New York. We hope our friends in that section will mark the right time this year, and take advantage of it to obtain for us a large accession to our subscription list. To encourage this, we promise to send the Recorder gratis for the remainder of this volume to as many as shall subscribe and pay in advance for the next volume. Friends, are you looking to this matter? If not now is the time to begin.

"SABBATH UNION" IN RHODE ISLAND.—An exchange paper informs us that a Society has been organized under the name of the Rhode Island Sabbath Union, of which Dr. Wayland is President. Its object is stated to be to "abstain from worldly business, traveling, and amusements, on the Sabbath, and give attendance upon the worship of God." Its members belong to all denominations, or no denomination, according to circumstances.

NEW SUCCESS OF MISSIONS.—Nearly a hundred villages in the province of Madura, India, as appears from London papers, have very recently placed themselves under the care of one of the English missions; in connection with which about 1000 natives have been baptized, and about 1900 are now receiving instruction.

"EXPERIENCE."—Under this head, in "The Perfectionist," we find S. R. Leonard's account of his deliverance from certain evils, and his restoration to health, through the power of faith. It seems that among other things he was greatly afflicted with stuttering, so that he considered it almost the worst evil that could befal him. At length a crisis came in his religious experience, and he was permitted to have wonderful views of the goodness of God. The following is one of its results:—

"The spirit of stuttering has also been surperseded and overcome by the spirit of faith and patience. Like other evil spirits, it attacks me from without. And even now, sometimes when I am entirely alone, I feel such a concentrated baptism of that spirit upon me, that it almost draws my mouth into a pucker, though I have no one to converse with. But I find a remedy in 'quietness and confidence;' and in a few moments the oppressive influence passes off."

THE ANNIVERSARIES.

The Anniversaries of the different Societies take place in this city next week in the following order:—

SUNDAY, May 4th.—The Rev. Leonard Bacon, D. D., will preach the annual sermon before the Foreign Evangelical Society, at 7 1-2 o'clock, P. M., in the Church of Rev. Dr. Mason, Bleecker street. New York Bible Society, Sermon, Tabernacle, 7 1-2 o'clock, P. M.

MONDAY.—Am. Seamen's Friend Society, Broadway Tabernacle, 7 1-2 P. M.

TUESDAY.—Am. Anti-Slavery Society, Tabernacle, 10 A. M. N. Y. and Am. Sund. Sch. Union, Procession of Children and Exercises in the Tabernacle 3 P. M. and addresses at the same place at 7 1-2 in the evening. Foreign Evan. Society, Church on Washington square, 7 1-2 P. M.

WEDNESDAY.—American Tract Society, Tabernacle, 10 A. M. Am. Home Missionary Society, Tabernacle, 7 1-2 P. M. New York State Colonization Society, Bleecker-street Church, 7 1-2 P. M. Am. Female Moral Reform Society, Greene-street (Methodist) Church, 7 1-2 P. M.

FRIDAY.—A. B. C. F. M., Tabernacle, at 10 A. M.

NOTICE.

The General Agent of the American Sabbath Tract Society, has forwarded subscription books to brethren in most of the churches, hoping that they will do something to aid the Society in its operations. For the information of our friends, we publish the following list of persons to whom books have been sent. It is hoped that such names as may be obtained will be returned to the Corresponding Secretary with as little delay as possible, that a full list of members may be prepared for the Annual Report.

BESTOWMENT OF CHARITIES.—The following extract from a report of the missionary of the "Free Episcopal Church" in the city of Boston, is worthy of the attention of those who bestow charities:

"Another fact which I have noticed, and which is of importance to the poor, is that in the bestowment of public and private charities, the improvident, the helpless, the dirty, are more generally assisted, than the provident and the tidy. If a person is clean, whole and tidy, or the room is clean and orderly, though very poor, they are thought not to need assistance; (I have known them to be told so,) and the next neighbor, who perhaps, wastes more than the other gets, is thought to be more needy, because he is surrounded by dirt, confusion, and cheerless appearances. An old, respectable, but disabled man, applied for wood, last winter, to the city; he and his wife had been furnished for several winters, but were then refused. The reason for refusing them was, that they appeared decent. The man could do little or nothing, through infirmity, and the old woman, though sixty-five years of age, supported both by taking in washing. When the man urged his necessity, he was reminded that he wore a very decent coat on Sundays. Now the history of that coat was, that six years ago, by saving a ninepence or a quarter of a dollar at a time, five dollars were obtained, and a second hand coat was purchased, and once a week it was put on, to go decently to church in. How much clothing, in the mean time has been obtained, and improvidently destroyed, by those who got the wood, which was refused to the old people?"

METHODISM IN ENGLAND.—The Christian Advocate publishes an account of an extensive revival among the Methodists in England. The following extract from a letter will show something of its extent and character:—

The revival in Hull amounted to 2,000 souls, of whom about 700 were sanctified, and 1500 joined the Methodists. From Hull I went to Sheffield and spent four months, and preached almost every night—about 3,000 were converted, and about 1,000 professed sanctification during that time. We are now in the midst of a great revival in Huddersfield; 1300 converted, and about 600 sanctified. All glory be to God. So you see that I was sent of God to England. The scenes at our meetings are beyond any thing you can imagine.

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

Missionaries in Syria.—One of the editors of the Savannah Republican, now traveling in foreign lands, says in a late letter to that journal:

"During our stay we had an opportunity of becoming well acquainted with the American missionaries, who seem justly entitled to the respect which they receive. It is a singular fact, that up to a recent date the American mission is the only one established at Beyrout, and of the many Arabs who speak good English, there is not one who will not answer you that the missionaries have taught him."

A Generous Family.—A gentleman of this city, among his numerous larger benefactions, has recently paid to the American Tract Society the sum requisite for stereotyping the Pilgrim's Progress in the Welch language; and his benevolent sisters have paid to the General Assembly's Board of Publication the expense of stereotyping their very elegant edition of the same invaluable work.

Books.—As an illustration of the destitution usually found by colporteurs in the Western States, one employed for the past year in distributing books and tracts in Michigan states, that of 9,941 families visited by him and his associates in that State, 3,304, or about one-third, were found destitute of all religious books except the Bible, and 1,239, about one-eighth, had no Bible. In the course of the year, they distributed 4,560 volumes by sale, and 3,600 gratuitously.

The Secular Newspaper Press.—Rev. Dr. Armstrong, Secretary of the American Board of Missions, at the recent meeting in its behalf at the Tabernacle, remarked that the receipts thus far, for the current financial year, had exceeded those of the last, for the same months, $20,000. So that, should they continue to advance for the remaining months in the same ratio, they would amount to something like 270,000. He attributed this increase in a measure to the greatly increased amount of information which had been spread throughout the land by the secular newspaper press.

Missionaries in China.—The American Missionaries at Macao are now issuing a newspaper, and occasional tracts, printed in metallic type. The Mission is fast gaining the confidence and esteem of the most intelligent among the Chinese.

Example of true Generosity.—Hon. Samuel Willstone of East Hampton, Mass., a gentleman very actively engaged in business, has just secured to Amherest College $20,000, for sustaining a Professorship of Rhetoric and Oratory. A worthy memento, surely, to those not inclined to think of such high privileges and duties, till about leaving the world, or retiring from its active scenes—when the heart is perhaps incapable of wide expansion and enjoyment, the judgment often weak and perverted, and the influence of example in a great measure lost.

Temperance among Sailors.—The effects of strict temperance among seafaring men are clearly shown by some statements in the Sailor's Magazine. In 1840, 380 vessels and 502 lives were lost at sea; in 1843 the number lost was 404 vessels and 642 lives. During the year 1844, as far as heard from only 208 vessels and 105 lives have been lost. This exhibits a great decrease in the destruction of life and property, and is attributed to the increased sobriety of seamen.

General Intelligence.

New York Legislature.—The most important thing done last week was to pass the bill allowing the people to decide whether there shall or shall not be a Constitutional Reform Convention. The people are to vote at the next fall election "For a Convention," or "Against a Convention". If the majority are for it, then a special election is to be held in each County in the following April to choose delegates, who are to assemble in June and revise the State Constitution. A bill was also passed, appropriating $197,000—the surplus of the canal revenues in the treasury—to the completion of some of the unfinished works. Many petitions were received in favor of a revision of the militia laws, and a bill in favor thereof was reported by a committee on the subject.

Bowery Theatre Burnt for the Fourth Time.—On Friday last, about six o'clock, a fire broke out in the carpenter's room attached to the Bowery Theatre, which instantly communicated to the Theatre itself, and in three quarters of an hour that fine edifice was a complete ruin, with nothing but the high walls and massive columns standing. The inside of the building, scenery, furniture, wardrobe, machinery &c. &c. was entirely destroyed, and several of the performers lost private dresses and properties to considerable amounts. The evening's performances were to have been for the benefit of Mr. Davenport, and the actors and actresses were all in the building just commencing to dress for the duties of the night. It is thought that every person in the Theatre escaped in safety, although several of them with narrow risks of life and limb.

This is the fourth time that the Bowery Theatre has been burnt. First, in 1828, when it was partially insured, which enabled the proprietor to rebuild and put it in full operation within sixty days after the fire. It was again burnt in 1836 without any insurance. It was soon rebuilt, however, and destroyed a third time in the winter of 1837-8. We are informed that there was no insurance upon the building at the time of the present fire, and that according to the terms of the lease the ground can not again be occupied for the purpose of erecting a Theatre.

Latest from Mexico.—By an arrival at New Orleans on the 20th ult., news was received from Vera Cruz to the 11th ult., being ten days later than before received.

Mexico has NOT declared war against the United States: but the official paper, El Diario del Gobierno, of the 3d inst., announces that it is in possession of certain movements on the part of the Government of a warlike character, which it is constrained to withhold from the public, as secresy is the soul of military operations; but that journal adds that it trusts that the speedy and successful issue of these operations will soon relieve the public curiosity in regard to them.

Row at the University of Virginia.—We learn from the Richmond Star, that a most shameful riot has occurred at the University of Virginia. The students, it seems, commenced a series of mock serenades on the "Calathumpian" principle, which being denounced by the Professors, their houses were mobbed, one after the other, fire crackers thrown into them, and other outrages perpetrated of an exceedingly alarming character, especially to the females and children. These disgraceful scenes were followed up night after night, until it became necessary to call the police, and finally the military force, and the University is now in the possession of a body of 500 soldiers. Some efforts have been made toward a reconciliation, and a set of resolutions were passed by the students at a formal meeting for that purpose, but the rioters refused to sign their names to them. Most of the students have left; the Faculty, it is understood, will resign, and for the present the College appears to be broken up. Many of the students, says the Star, took no part in this shameful affair; but there is a point of honor among all students, not to be tale-bearers, even upon the guilty.

Lead Mine.—The St. Louis Republican gives the following statement concerning the Mammoth Cave, recently discovered in Missouri, which, it says, it believes to be the "most valuable Lead Mine in the United States." It has been purchased by a Company at St. Louis for nearly $25,000.

"The operatives are now at work in a cave, the opening of which is about 250 feet from where the discovery was made. This cave is 75 feet in length. The ceiling is of mineral, and it is estimated that there are from 200,000 to 400,000 pounds of ore in sight. It is from 12 to 15 inches in thickness. On the floor about the centre of the cave, as if fallen from the ceiling, there are pieces or bodies of the mineral which are estimated to weigh 40,000 lbs. Within the last three months, under a very defective system of operations, an average of ten hands have been able to raise between 350,000 and 400,000 lbs. One furnace has been in operation during the time, another is in progress of erection. As yet the riches of that section are but half developed. There are appearances which indicate to the skillful miner the presence of mineral in every direction. But of these, it is not necessary now to speak, as future operations will disclose the actual wealth to be found at the Mammoth Cave.

Incombustible Coating for Wood.—Take a quantity of water, proportionate to the surface of the wood you may wish to cover, and add to it as much potash as can be dissolved therein. When the water will dissolve no more potash, stir into the solution, first a quantity of flour paste of the consistency of common painter's size; second, a sufficiency of pure clay to render it of the consistency of cream.

When the clay is well mixed, apply the preparation as before directed to the wood; it will secure it from the action of both fire and rain. In a most violent fire, wood thus saturated may be carbonated, but it will never blaze.

If desirable, a most agreeable color can be given to the preparation, by adding a small quantity of red or yellow ochre. [Buffalo Com. Adv.

Looking Up.—The Pittsburgh Spirit of the Age concludes an article on the state of affairs in that place thus:

"Already is the gloom being dispelled—commercial men and manufacturers seem to forget their misfortunes in the struggle to regain their lost strength. Rough board shanties have been erected on some parts of the ruins, where articles are vended by "burnt out" merchants, as was their wont, and consumers appear as eager to buy. A general spirit of forbearance is manifested by those who escaped destruction—not many instances of meanness have we to record. Some few, of course, have taken advantage of the necessities of the unfortunate; but to the honor of the city, we can say they are few. The communitist might here realize his hopes of a perfect brotherhood—a system where the suffering of one member is diffused through all.

A new Chapter on the meaning of Flowers.—The morning of the last 4th of July witnessed a a scene full of instruction. The female convicts of a New York Penitentiary were assembled. Their emotions testified that the matron spake not in vain. The well of their feelings had been opened—the waters, long restrained, gushed out. And what said the merciful motron? What could she have said to roll the stone from the well's mouth? Her words were only a preface—a preface to a letter of the Superintendent. And now she reads. Hear how they sob!—Like children weeping to their mother! Ah! human nature, however depraved, retains always a mite of its Maker. And what said the Superintendent? He pitied the condition of the poor wretched women—that they could not partake in the joyous festivity. He sent them each a boquet of flowers, to remind them of the days of their innocence. And this caused the tears to flow from the eyes of the unhappy convicts. "Come," said the matron, "take courage; you may gather them yet in the gardens." She was answered by the sobs of conviction. Heaven bless the good Superintendent.

Transplanting Trees.—The fact is not perhaps so generally known as it deserves to be, that most of our indigenous nut-bearing trees, are as easily susceptible of improvement by transplanting and grafting, as fruit trees are. The oak, the beech, the walnut and the chesnut, may by these means be made to produce fruit far superior to any matured in an uncultivated or natural state. We have seen beech nuts nearly twice the size of those ordinarily grown in the forest, from a tree of twenty years' growth in a cultivated soil. The same is known to be a common result in reference to other indigenous deciduous trees.

Colored Population of Cincinnati.—A special census of this class shows the whole number in the city to be 2,049. Number who belong to Temperance Societies, 509; to Churches, 1000; and 369 have been Slaves, for whose redemption there was paid (chiefly by themselves) the sum of $166,050. They hold property in the city to the amount of $156,100. They have five Churches, three Literary Societies, and three schools.

A Wise Schoolmaster.—Discussing with a friend, the other day, the prevalent system of school instruction, the improvements which it is undergoing, and the personal merits of various teachers, our attention was instantly and forcibly arrested by a remark which our friend made of one gentleman to whose school he had sent his boys—Mr. Littlefield, who had his academy at Maiden, Ulster county. Speaking of Mr. Littlefield's attention to the physical developement of his pupils, our friend said, "Why, sir, he goes out snow-balling with the boys—lets them pelt him as much as they please, and pelts back again; and if they can they may get him down in the snow and rub his face with it. But when the bell rings he is master again in a moment." A sensible man that Mr. Littlefield. The simple fact mentioned of him gives us a high notion of his judgment and proper sense of the relation between himself and his pupils. [Com. Adv.

Saw Dust.—I have within the last sixteen or eighteen years often scattered saw dust, both raw and composted, on my ground; and am so well satisfied of its beneficial effects, that I have determined to rebuild my saw-mill, with such fixtures as shall secure the dust. One saw will cut say fifty bushels dust in the day, which, when only saturated with drainings from cattle or horse-yards, will make say two loads of rich manure, and this worth two dollars. Thus in the sawing season, which with me is about one hundred days, I shall secure annually an additional item of two hundred dollars to my farm. [Southern Plant.

To Prevent Rats from Destroying Grain.—After it is cleaned out and put in hogsheads or anything else, just sprinkle a little dry lime over the top, and they will eat no more. I have tried it on oats and wheat both. [Ib.

Joseph Bonaparte's Will.—The Courier des Etats Unis says:—Among the passengers in the Great Western, we notice the name of Mr. Maillers, one of the executors of Joseph Bonaparte's will. Mr. M. was formerly an officer attached to the staff of king Joseph, and has exhibited the excellence of his heart by the constancy of his attachment to that house. He will proceed from New York to Bordentown, (N. J.,) where king Joseph left a magnificent property, which he has bequeathed to his grandson, the Prince Lusignano, son of the Prince of Canino, who is the son of Lucien. The intention of the family heir has been to preserve this estate, which was a favorite residence of king Joseph.

A Want stronger than Hunger.—An old man, who had borne an irreproachable character up to the age of seventy-two, was lately brought before one of the tribunals of Paris for stealing a piece of lead worth eight cents. He admitted that he was wholly without means, and for the first time in his life knew not where to find a single sous; but it was not hunger that drove him to steal. After considerable questioning on the part of the judge, as to what could be stronger than hunger, he confessed that it was tobacco for his pipe. "Tobacco, monsieur judge!" said he, growing violent; "I have the misery to be a helpless smoker! I smoke at waking; I smoke while eating; I cannot sleep without smoking till the pipe falls from my mouth. Tobacco costs me six cents a day. When I have none I am frantic. I cannot work, nor eat, nor sleep. I go from place to place, raging like a mad dog. The day I stole the lead, I had been without tobacco for twelve hours! I searched the day through for an acquaintance of whom I could beg a pipe full. I could not, and resorted to crime as a less evil than I was enduring. The need was stronger than I!" The eloquence and pathos of the old man's plea mollified the judge, who condemned him only to eight days imprisonment.

The Steamer Swallow.—The Committee of the Senate have reported on the loss of the Swallow, and introduced a bill upon the subject. They report, among other things, that at the moment the Swallow struck the rock, she was running about fourteen or fifteen miles an hour; that she sank in from two to five minutes after the collision took place; and that the disaster, in their judgment, was attributable to the gross neglect and carelessness of the pilot, who was at the wheel at the time.

Statistics of Printing in Boston.—In an address delivered before the members of the Franklin Typographical Society on Saturday evening last, by its President, Mr. Harris, we learn that in Boston, there are about 500 journeyman printers, (mostly compositors,) about 200 apprentices and two-thirders to the printing business, 75 girls engaged in type sticking, and about 200 journeymen and boys on press work and other labors in a printing office, making nearly 1000 persons actually engaged in the printing business in the city of Boston.

Glass.—It is difficult to foresee to what perfection the manufacture of glass may be brought, and to what purposes the article may yet be applied. The balance spring of a chronometer is now made of glass, as a substitute for steel, and possesses a greater degree of elasticity and a greater power of resisting the alternations of heat and cold. A chronometer with a glass balance spring was sent to the North Sea, exposed to a competition with nine other chronometers, and the result of the experiment was a report in favor of the chronometer with a glass spring. In a manufactory in France, they are now making glass pipes for the conveyance of water, which cost nearly 30 per cent. less than the iron pipes now used, and will bear a far greater external pressure.

SUMMARY.

On Friday last, the Steamboat Empire, on her way down the river, ran into the long pier at the foot of 19th St. N. Y., with a tremendous crash, breaking the wharf timbers short off, plowing her nose into the solid gravel pier some twenty feet, and doing considerable injury to the boat. No one was seriously hurt, although the scene of confusion on board was distressing for a few moments.

A fire occurred at Roxbury, Mass., last week, at which a woman with an infant in her arms, jumped out of the third story window, killing the infant and seriously injuring herself. Two children are missing, and it is feared they were burned. Loss of property by the fire, about $40,000.

A frightful inundation has visited the beautiful valley of the Rhine, in consequence of the melting of immense masses of snow which had accumulated during the last winter. The flood extended from the borders of Switzerland to Holland, destroying a vast amount of property.

A shopkeeper in Philadelphia the other day stuck upon his door the following laconic advertisement: "A boy wanted." On going to his shop the next morning, he beheld a shining little urchin in a basket, with the following pithy label: "Here he is!"

It is said that Mr. Cushing, on being asked to dine with Mandarin Lin, discovered on the table something of which he ate exorbitantly, thinking it to be duck. Not speaking Chinese, and wishing to know what it was, he pointed to it, after he had finished, saying to his host interrogatively, "Quack, quack, quack?" The mandarin, with equal brevity, replied, with a shake of his head, "Bow, wow, wow." Mr. Cushing's feelings can be imagined.

A negro named Harkins, was arrested for attempting to vote in the 10th ward, he not being worth $250. A white man can vote from the penitentiary who is worth less than nothing, and a poor but respectable negro cannot vote because he is not worth 250 dollars. The report of the Rhode Island State Temperance Society, says an exchange, shows the appalling fact of there being in that State "fifteen hundred members of churches of different denominations, who have not signed the pledge—including ministers, officers and others, who manifest no interest in, and do nothing to sustain, the cause. Some of them offer wine to their guests, and use this and other liquors before their children and friends!

MARRIED.

In Lincklaen, N. Y., on the evening of the 9th ult., by Eld. Joshua Clarke, Mr. Hiram W. Babcock, to Miss Catherine M. Wells, both of Lincklaen.

In Verona, on the evening of the 15th ult., by Eld. Charles M. Lewis, Mr. William Cagwin, to Miss Esther Green, all of Verona.

In Adams, on the 19th ult., at Church, by Eld. Giles M. Langworthy, Mr. Franklin Hull, to Miss Margaret Sweet, all of the above place.

DIED.

In Genesee, Allegany Co., N. Y., on the 8th of February last, Daniel Edwards, Esq., in the 88th year of his age. Mr. Edwards formerly resided in Charlestown, R. I., and was for many years an active member of the First Seventh-day Baptist Church in Hopkinton. He was enrolled among the friends of freedom at an early period of the Revolution, and continued to peril his life in that cause while there was a demand for his services. As a Christian, he was distinguished for high moral principle, eminent piety, and remarkable equanimity of temper. As a husband and father, he was at once kind and faithful. His exit was sudden, but not unexpected. A large circle of relatives and friends mourn his departure.

In Genesee, N. Y., April 2d, Miss Sarah Crandall, daughter of widow Martha Crandall, aged 46 years.—She embraced religion in early life, and united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Hopkinton, R. I. Afterwards she removed to Genesee, and became a member of the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church in that place. She bore her lingering illness with Christian fortitude, and died in the triumphs of faith.

In Verona, N. Y., April 14th, of consumption, Miss Esther Williams, aged 36 years.—She embraced religion in her youth, and united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Verona, of which she remained a consistent and useful member until her death, which was peaceful and happy.

At his residence in Westerly, R. I., on the 21st of April, Mr. Paul Babcock, in the 86th year of his age. Mr. Babcock was blest with a strong constitution, and had enjoyed almost uninterrupted health until the past winter, when it began to fail him, and he was often heard to observe that his work was almost done. His last sickness was exceedingly painful, but he endured it with Christian patience, and without a murmur. For several days previous to his death, his desire was to depart, and he continued to express this desire until he breathed his last in full hope of a glorious immortality beyond the grave. In his death a large family has lost a kind father, the Church a faithful member, and the neighborhood a useful man.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION.

The Central Association will hold its Tenth Anniversary with the Seventh-day Baptist Church at Adams, Jefferson county, N. Y., commencing on the 11th of June, being the fourth day of the week before the second Sabbath in the month. Introductory discourse by Rev. Eli S. Bailey; substitute, Rev. S. B. Crandall.

It is hoped there will be a full attendance from all the churches of the Association, as there is business of vital importance to be transacted, especially our missionary business, and the publication of a Tract on Baptism. I hope, also, that our brethren will come prepared to discuss and dispose of the practice of laying on of hands on newly baptized believers, as there is now a division among us on that subject. G. M. Langworthy, Rec. Sec.

Adams, April 20, 1845.

EASTERN ASSOCIATION.

The Eastern Seventh-day Baptist Association will hold its Ninth Anniversary with the Church at Waterford, Ct., on the fourth day of the week before the fourth Sabbath, in May, (21st day of the month,) at 11 o'clock A. M. It is hoped that the churches associated will take measures to have a full representation; also that the several committees will be prepared to report upon the subjects referred to them.

In consequence of the variety of forms in which the churches are in the habit of making their statistical returns to the Association—some churches naming some things which others omit and vice versa—the revisers of the Minutes last year, took the liberty to suggest a form of statistics, expressing the desire that the returns might be so made at the next Anniversary. As it would much facilitate the labors of the clerks, and add much to the interest of statistics, they would again beg to call attention to the subject.

ANNIVERSARIES OF OUR SOCIETIES.

The Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association will hold its Third Anniversary in Plainfield, N. J., on the fourth day of the week before the third Sabbath in May next, being the 14th day of the month, at 11 o'clock A. M. It is desirable that all missionary reports should be made to the Secretary previous to that time.

W. B. Gillett, Rec. Sec., New Market, N. J.

The American Sabbath Tract Society will hold its Second Anniversary in Plainfield, N. J., on the fifth day of the week before the third Sabbath in May, being the 15th day of the month, at 10 o'clock A. M. Auxiliary Societies or Churches that have taken action to aid the Society, and Agents who have not already reported, are requested to make their reports with the least possible delay, that the Board of Directors may be able to present a full statement of their labors since the last Anniversary.

F. W. Stillman, Rec. Sec., New York.

SABBATH TRACTS—NOTICE.

The Board of Directors of the American Sabbath Tract Society would state, for the information of those who have ordered or are expecting Tracts, that in consequence of the late arrangement with the New York Sabbath Tract Society, by which this Society is hereafter to publish its series of Sabbath publications, and also from the few returns that have been made to the Treasury since the last anniversary, they have not been able as yet to reprint several of the series, the editions of which are exhausted. They hope, however, to have a good assortment ready at the Anniversary in May.

NOTICE.

The Missionaries who have been laboring under appointments from the Board of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association, are requested to make a full report of their labors since the last meeting of Conference, that it may be incorporated into the Annual Report of the Society. Please to send through the post-office, so that your letters may reach the Cor. Sec. about the first of May.

All local societies, and churches of Seventh-day Baptists, who have engaged in missionary labors during the past year, are requested to forward us an account of their labors through the same medium, and at or about the same time.

Brethren having important facts to communicate respecting opening fields for missionary labor will do well to forward the same to the address of Samuel Davison,
Cor. Sec. S. D. B. M. Ass'n.

TO A VICTIM OF THE SEDUCER.

Myrtle leaf that ill besped,
Pinest in the gladsome ray,
Soiled beneath the common tread,
Far from thy protecting spray!

When the Patridge o'er the sheaf
Whirred along the yellow vale,
Sad I saw the heedless leaf—
Love the dalliance of the gale.

Lightly didst thou, foolish thing,
Heave and flutter to his sighs,
While the flatterer on his wing,
Woo'd and whispered thee to rise.

Gaily from thy mother-stalk,
Wert thou danced and wafted high—
Soon on this unhallowed walk,
Flung to fade, to rot and die. COLERIDGE.

EXPLORING EXPEDITION.

EXTRACTS FROM THE NARRATIVE OF THE U. S. EXPLORING EXPEDITION UNDER LIEUT. WILKES.

On the 23d of November they stood for the magnificent harbor of Rio de Janeiro. The evil of slavery is thus depicted:—

"The slave population is stated at five times the number of that of the whites, and notwithstanding the existing danger of maritime capture, the supply still seems equal to the demand. Although many slavers are taken by the English cruisers, brought in and tried by the mixed commission, agreeably to treaty, yet means are found to introduce the slaves. Two slavers were lying in charge of the English squadron while we were there. On board of them, though quite small vessels, were two and three hundred negroes. It is difficult to imagine more emaciated, miserable, and beastly-looking creatures, and it is not a little surprising that they should be kept thus confined by those who affect to establish their freedom and ameliorate their condition. These vessels it is understood had obtained their victims on the eastern coast of Africa. Slaves are almost the only carriers of burdens in Rio de Janeiro. They go almost naked, and are exceedingly numerous. They appear to work with cheerfulness, and go together in gangs, with a leader who carries a rattle made of tin, and filled with stones (similar to a child's rattle.) With this he keeps time, causing them all to move on a dog-trot. Each one joins in the monotonous chorus, the notes seldom varying above a third from the key. The words they use are frequently relative to their own country; sometimes to what they heard from their master, as they started with their load, but the sound is the same. The coffee-carriers go along in large gangs of twenty or thirty, singing. One half take the air, with one or two keeping up a kind of a hum on the common chord, and the remainder finish the bar. These slaves are required by their masters to obtain a certain sum, according to their ability, say from twenty-five to fifty cents a day, and to pay it every evening. The surplus belongs to themselves. In default of not gaining the required sum, castigation is always inflicted. It is said that the liberated negroes who own slaves are particularly severe and cruel. The usual load carried is about two hundred pounds weight. Mr. Hale, our philologist, found here a field of some extent in his department, through the slave population; and it afforded more opportunities for its investigation than would at first appear probable. Vast numbers of slaves have been, and are still imported annually into this market; and as very many of the same nation or tribe associate together they retain their own language, even after they have been in the country for some years. It may be seen by the most cursory examination that they are marked in such a manner as to serve to distinguish their different races. Some have little of the distinctive negro character, and others more of it than any human beings we have seen.

"All these blacks are from different parts of the coast, and having been hostile tribes, retain much of their antipathy to each other. In general they are kindly treated, and become firmly attached to their masters; more however, from a clannish feeling than from gratitude, of which virtue they seem to possess little. They are baptized by their owners as soon as purchased, and in the cities attend mass regularly, and go to confession, but they are never thought to become entirely civilized. Those who receive their freedom in reward for faithful services, or purchase it, conduct themselves well; their descendants are much superior in point of intelligence. Many of them own slaves, and prove much more severe masters than the whites. Male slaves are put to any trade or craft they may desire. Females are for the most part employed as mantua-makers, and almost all the finery worn by the higher circles at public fetes is made by slaves. Indeed, many masters and mistresses are dependent on the labor of their slaves for their daily support. There are some blacks who are priests, and others officers in the army; indeed, some of the deputies would not pass for white men elsewhere."

The next extract we shall give is a description of some Patagonians:—

"The party of natives were seventeen in number, and, with a few exceptions, they were above the European height. The chief, who was the oldest man among them, was under fifty years of age, and of comparatively low stature; his son was one of the tallest, and above six feet in height. They had good figures and pleasant-looking countenances, low foreheads and high cheek-bones, with broad faces, the lower part projecting, their hair was coarse and cut short on the crown, leaving a narrow border of hair hanging down; over this they wore a kind of cap or band of skin or woollen yarn. The front teeth of all of them were very much worn, more apparent, however, in the old than in the young. On one foot they wore a rude skin sandal. Many of them had their faces painted in red and black stripes, with clay, soot, and ashes. Their whole appearance, together with their inflamed and sore eyes, was filthy and disgusting. They were thought by the officers more nearly to approach to the Patagonians than any other natives, and were supposed to be a small tribe who visit this part of Terra del Fuego in the summer months; they were entirely different from Petcherais, whom we afterwards saw at Orange Harbor. None of their women or children were seen, but they were thought to be not far distant in the wood, as they objected to any of our people going towards it, and showed much alarm when guns were pointed in that direction. They seemed to have a knowledge of fire-ams, which they called eu, or spirit; and kai-eu, which they frequently uttered with gestures, was thought to indicate their Great Spirit, or God. They had little apparent curiosity, and nothing seemed to attract or cause them surprise; their principal characteristic seemed to be jealousy. Though they are a simple race, they are not wanting in cunning; and it was with great difficulty that they could be prevailed upon to part with their bows and arrows in trade, which they however did after asking permission from their chief; this was always necessary for them to obtain before closing a bargain. They have had communication frequently before with Europeans; pieces of many articles of European manufacture were seen in their possession, such as glass-beads, &c. They refused tobacco, whiskey, bread, or meat, and were only desirous of getting old iron, nails, and pieces of hoop-iron. Their food consists principally of fish and shell fish. Their fishing apparatus is made of the dorsal fin of a fish, tied to a thin slip of whalebone, in the form of a barb; this serves as a good hook, and with it they obtain a supply of this food. Their arms consisted altogether of bows and arrows. The natives had the common dog, which they seemed to prize much."

The portraiture of the Petcherai Indians is less favorable.

They were entirely naked, with the exception of a small piece of seal-skin, only sufficient to cover one shoulder, and which is generally worn on the side from which the wind blows, affording them some little shelter against its piercing influence. They were not more than five feet high, of a light copper color, which is much concealed by smut and dirt, particularly on their faces, which they mark vertically with charcoal.—They have short faces, narrow foreheads, and high cheek-bones. Their eyes are small and unusually black, the upper eyelids in the inner corner are overlapping the under one, and bear a strong resemblance to those of the Chinese.—Their nose is broad and flat, and widespread nostrils, mouth large, teeth white, large and regular. The hair is long, lank, and black, hanging over the face, and is covered with white ashes, which gives them a hideous appearance. The whole face is compressed. Their bodies are remarkable from the great developement of the chest, shoulders, and vertebral column; their arms are long, and out of proportion; their legs small, and ill made. There is in fact little difference between the size of the ankle and the leg; and when standing, the skin at the knee hangs in a large loose fold. In some, the muscles of the leg appear almost wanting, and possess very little strength. This want of developement in the muscles of the legs is owing to their constant sitting posture, both in their huts and canoes. Their skin is sensibly colder than ours. It is impossible to fancy anything in human nature more filthy. They are an ill shaped and ugly race. They have little or no idea of the relative value of articles, even of those that one would suppose were of the utmost use to them, such as iron and glass ware. A glass bottle broken into pieces is valued as much as a knife. Red flannel, torn into strips, pleases them more than in the piece; they wound it round their heads, as a kind of turban, and it was amusing to see their satisfaction at this small acquisition. The children were quite small, and nestled in the bottom of the canoe on some dry grass. The woman and eldest boy paddled the canoe, the man being employed to bail out the water and attend to the fire, which is always carried in the bottom of the canoe, on a few stones and ashes, which the water surrounds. Their canoes are constructed of bark, are very frail, and sewed with shreds of whalebone, sealskin, and twigs. They are sharp at both ends, and are kept in shape as well as strengthened by a number of stretchers lashed to the gunwale. These Indians seldom venture outside the kelp, by the aid of which they pull themselves along; and their paddles are so small as to be of little use in propelling their canoes, unless it is calm. Some of the officers thought they recognized a party on the Hermy Islands that had been on board ship at Orange Harbor. If this was the case, they must have ventured across the bay at Nassau, a distance of some ten or twelve miles. This, if correct, would go to prove that there is more intercourse among them, than their frail barks would lead one to expect. Their huts are generally found built close to the shore, at the head of some small bay, in a secluded spot, and sheltered from the prevailing winds. They are built of bows or small trees, stuck in the earth, and brought together at the top, where they are firmly bound by bark, sedge and twigs. Smaller branches are then interlaced, forming a tolerable compact wickerwork, and on this, grass, turf, and bark are laid, making the hut quite warm, and impervious to the wind and snow, though not quite so to the rain. The usual dimensions of these huts are seven or eight feet in diameter, and about four or five feet in height. They have an oval hole to creep in at. The fire is built in a small excavation in the middle of the hut. The floor is of clay, which has the appearance of having been well kneaded. The usual accompaniment of a hut is a conical pile of shells opposite the door, nearly as large as the hut itself. Their occupancy of a hut seems to be limited to the supply of shell-fish, consisting of muscles and limpets in the neighborhood. These natives are never seen but in their huts or canoes. The impediments to their communication by land are great, growing out of the montainous and rocky character of the country, intersected with inlets deep and impassable, and in most places bounded by abrupt precipices, together with a soil which may be termed a quagmire, on which it is difficult to walk. This prevails on the hills as well as in the plains and valleys. The impenetrable nature of the forest, with the dense undergrowth of thorny bushes, renders it impossible for them to overcome or contend with these difficulties. They appear to live in families, and not in tribes, and do not seem to acknowledge any chief. On the 11th of March three bark canoes arrived, containing four men, four women, and a girl about sixteen years old, four little boys, and four infants, one of the latter about a week old, and quite naked. The thermometer was 46 deg. Fahrenheit. They had rude weapons, viz: slings to throw stones, three rude spears, pointed at the end with bone, and notched on one side with barbed teeth. With this they catch their fish, which are in great quantities among the kelp, Two of the natives were induced to come on board, after they had been along side for upwards of an hour, and received many presents, for which they gave their spears, a dog, and some of their rude native trinkets. They did not show or express surprise at anything on board, except when seeing one of the carpenters engaged in boring a hole with a screw-auger through a plank, which would have been a long task for them. They were very talkative, smiling when spoken to, and often bursting into loud laughter, but instantly settling into their natural serious and sober cast. They were found to be great mimics, both in gesture and sound, and would repeat any word of our language, with great correctness of pronunciation.—Their imitation of sounds are astonishing. One of them ascended and descended the octave perfectly, following the sounds of the violin correctly. It was then found he could sound the common chords, and follow through the semitone scale, with scarcely an error. They have all musical voices, speaking in the note G sharp, ending with the semitone A. when asking for presents, and were continually singing,

Yah mass scoo nah. Yah mass scoo nah.

Their mimicry became anoying, and precluded our getting any of their words or ideas. It not only extended to words or sounds, but actions also, and was at times truly ridiculous. The usual manner of interrogating for names was quite unsuccessful. On pointing to the nose, for instance they did the same. Anything they saw done they would mimic and with an extraordinary degree of accuracy. On these canoes approaching the ship, the principal one of the family, or chief, standing up in his canoe, made a harangue. He spoke in G natural, and did not vary his voice more than a semitone. The pitch of the voice of the female is an octave higher. Although they have been heard to shout quite loud, yet they cannot endure a noise. When the drum beat, or a gun was fired, they invariably stopped their ears. They always speak to each other in a whisper. Their cautious manner and movements prove them to be a timid race. The men are exceedingly jealous of their women, and will not allow any one, if they can help it, to enter their huts, particularly boys.

"The women were never suffered to come on board. They appeared modest in the presence of strangers. They never move from a sitting posture, or rather squat, with their knees close together, reaching to their chin, their feet in contact, and touching the lower part of the body. They are extremely ugly. Their hands and feet were small and wellshaped, and from appearance they are not accustomed to any hard work. They appear very fond and seem careful of their young children, though on several occasions they offered them for sale for a trifle. They have their faces smutted all over, and it was thought, from the hideous appearance of the females, produced in part by their being painted and smutted, that they had been disfigured by the men previous to coming alongside. It was remarked that when one of them saw herself in a looking-glass, she burst into tears, as Jack thought from pure mortification. The men are employed in building the huts, obtaining food, and providing for their other wants. The women were generally seen paddling their canoes. When this party of natives left the ship and reached the shore, the women remained in their canoes, and the men began building their temporary huts; the little children were seen capering quite naked on the beach, although the thermometer was at 40 deg. On the hut being finished, which occupied about an hour, the women went on shore to take possession of it. They all seemed quite happy and contented. Before they left the ship, the greater part of them were dressed in old clothes, that had been given to them by the officers and men, who all showed themselves extremely anxious "to make them comfortable." This gave rise to much merriment, as Jack was not disposed to allow any difficulties to interfere in the fitting. If the jackets proved too tight across the shoulders, which they invariably were, a slit down the back effectually remedied the defect. If a pair of trowsers was found too small around the waist, the knife was again resorted to and in some cases a fit was made by severing the legs. The most difficult fit, and the one which afforded the most merriment, was that of a woman to whom an old coat was given. This she concluded belonged to her nether limbs, and no signs, hints, nor shouts could correct her mistake. Her feet was thrust through the sleeves, and after hard squeezing she succeeded in drawing them on. With the skirts brought up in front, she took her seat in the canoe with great satisfaction, amid a roar of laughter from all who saw her. Towards evening Messrs. Waldron and Drayton visited their huts. Before they reached the shore, the natives were seen making a fire on the beach, for their reception, evidently to avoid their entering their huts. On landing, one of the men seemed anxious to talk with them. He pointed to the ship, and tried to express many things by gestures, then pointed to the south-east and then again to the ship, after which, clasping his hands, as in our mode of prayer, he said, 'Eloah, Eloah,' as though he thought we had come from God. After a little time, they gained admittance to the hut. The men creeping in first, squatted themselves directly in front of the women, all holding out the small piece of seal skin to allow the heat to reach their bodies. The women squatted three deep behind the men, the oldest in front, nestling the infants. After being in the hut, Mr. Dayton endeavored to call the attention of the man who had made signs to him before entering, to know whether they had any idea of a Supreme Being. The same man then put his hands together, repeating as before, 'Eloah, Eloah.' From this manner, it was inferred that they had some idea of God or a Supreme Being. Their mode of expressing friendship is by jumping up and down. They made Messrs. Waldron and Drayton jump with them on the beach, before entering the hut, took hold of their arm, facing them, and jumping two or three inches from the ground, making them keep time to the following song:—

Ha me la ha me la ha me la ha me la.
O la la la la la la la la la la.

All our endeavors to find out how they ignited their fire proved unavailing. It must be exceedingly difficult for them to accomplish, judging from the care they take of it, always carrying it with them in their canoes, and the danger they thus run of injuring themselves by it. Their food consists of limpets, muscles, and other shell-fish. Quantities of fish, and some seals, are now and then taken among the kelp, and with berries of various kinds, and wild celery, they do not want. They seldom cook their food much. The shell-fish are detached from the shell by heat, and the fish are partly roasted in their skins, without being cleansed. When on board, one of them was induced to sit at the dinner-table; after a few lessons, he handled his knife and fork with much dexterity. He refused both spirits and wine, but was very fond of sweetened water. Salt provisions were not all to his liking, but rice and plum-pudding were agreeable to his taste, and he literally crammed them into his mouth. After his appetite had been satisfied, he was in great good humor, singing his 'hey meh leh,' dancing and laughing. His mimicry prevented any satisfactory inquiries being made of him relative to a vocabulary. Some of the officers painted the faces of these natives black, white, and red; this delighted them very much, and it was quite amusing to see the grimaces made by them before a looking-glass. One of the natives remained on board for upwards of a week, and being washed and combed, he became two or three shades lighter in color. Clothes were put on him. He was about twenty-three years of age, and was unwell the whole time he was on board, from eating such quantities of rice, &c. His astonishment was very great on attending divine service. The moment the chaplain began to read from the book, his eyes were riveted upon him, where they remained as long as he continued to read. At the end of the week he became dissatisfied, and was set on shore, and soon appeared naked again. It was observed, on presents being made, that those who did not receive any began a sort of whining cry, putting on the most doleful-looking countenances imaginable. They are much addicted to theft, if any opportunity offers. The night before they left the bay, they stole and cut up one of the wind sales, which had been scrubbed and hung up on the shore to dry. Although we had no absolute proof of it, we are inclined to the belief that they bury their dead in caves."

Heartlessness Cured.

BY PROF. J. ALDEN, D. D.

It was a very cold December morning. It was not quite schooltime, but most of the pupils were in the school-house, crowding round the fire. A thin, pale girl, of about nine years of age, came in, and stood with a timid air, at some distance from the other children. Her clothing was very coarse and very thin, but it was clean. She stood alone, shivering with the cold, and trying to impart some warmth to her stiffened fingers by breathing upon them.

"Are you not cold?" said James Thompson to her, drawing back from the fire, that she might have a place to approach. The girl replied with a nod, and a faint attempt to smile, but before she could move towards the place so kindly proffered her, it was occupied by John Granger, who had just come in.

"Stand back, John," said James, "and let this poor girl warm herself."

John cast a hasty glance at her, and said, "Oh, she is not cold, she is used to it. The old house she lives in is not much better than our barn."

James could hardly restrain his indignation in view of this heartless speech; it was with great difficulty that he kept himself from seizing John by the collar, and tumbling him backwards across the room—a feat to which his strength was fully equal. He did restrain himself, however, and said to John, "That place was mine, and I gave it to her—stand back and let her have it."

"How long have you been governor?" said John, in an insulting tone.

James made no reply, but taking him by the collar, led him across the room. John knew too well the strength of that arm to make any resistance, though he was nearly a year older than James.

At that moment the teacher came in. He saw from the countenances of the boys that something wrong had occurred. He made no enquiries then, but at the close of the school, he requested James to remain and inform him of the facts of the case. Though James was one of the parties concerned, yet he knew he could rely on the truth of his statements.

The teacher was very much grieved to learn that John could behave in so unfeeling a manner towards a poor suffering girl. As to what was to be done, he was somewhat at a loss, but finally concluded that it was one of those cases in which parental influence was most likely to prove availing. Accordingly he communicated the whole matter to Mr. Granger.

The next evening, Mr. Granger took John into his room alone, and requested him to make a full statement of all that had taken place between him and James Townsend. "Recollect yourself, my son, and state the whole matter precisely as it was."

"When I came into the school-house in the morning, there was a vacant place by the fire, and I was very cold, and stepped into it. Then James said it was his, and because I would not give it up, he took hold of my collar and pulled me across the room—and then the schoolmaster came in."

Mr. Granger made no remark, but continued to fix his eye on that of his son, who began to blush and feel very uncomfortable, and after a long silence, he added—"and I did not do anything else to him."

"For a very good reason, you did not dare to: I can ascribe no better motive to one who could keep a half-clad, shivering girl away from the fire, and add insult to injury. I should expect that such a boy would be a coward, as well as a liar." And there was a frown on Mr. Granger's countenance, such as John had never encountered before. John attempted to say something in excuse for his conduct, but his father ordered him to be silent.

"I have never detected you before in a misstatement of the truth. You have not now stated anything that is false, but you have not told the whole truth, you intended to deceive me—you have made me feel that I have a son that now stands before me a liar." And Mr. Granger buried his face in his hands and wept. After some time he said, "you have given me more pain than a child ever gave me before. That poor girl that you insulted so cruelly, is the daughter of your mother's schoolmate and friend, an educated and amiable woman. When she married Davis, her prospects were fairer than those of your own mother, who was married about the same time. He met with misfortunes, became intemperate, and at length the miserable man he is now. What his wife and children have suffered, it is impossible to describe—what they have suffered from cold, and hunger, and beating; while you have had a warm house and clothing, and kind friends; and when that poor heart-broken child would escape for a time from that miserable home, you treat her as you did. Davis will not allow his wife to see your mother, or receive aid from her. If I had known that her child would have come to school, I should have charged you to treat her with special kindness. I did not suppose that I could have a son so utterly heartless and wicked as you have shown yourself towards her. How would your mother feel if she knew how you had treated the daughter of her unhappy friend?"

"Oh, pray, father, do not tell her—whip me, punish me any way, but do not tell her—I will never treat anybody so bad again"—and he wept bitterly.

"John, when I have confidence that you are truly sorry—when you prove it by your conduct, I shall forgive you, and restore you my confidence, and not till then. You may retire to your room."

John retired deeply humbled. The pale, sad face of the poor girl seemed to be before him. He could not see how it was possible he could be so thoughtless, for if he had thought of her misery, he would not have acted as he did for the world. He resolved that he would ask the poor girl's pardon, and ever treat her with the utmost kindness.

The next morning he could scarce eat any breakfast, his father looked so displeased and unhappy. He set out early, and went beyond the school-house to meet the poor girl. He did not meet her, and he went on till he came to the poor log hovel in which she lived. The door opened, and she came out weeping, and her poor mother, who followed her to the door, was weeping also. It was a bitter cold morning, but she had nothing but an old shawl to put over her. When she saw John, she stopped as though afraid to go on. John stepped up to her with tears in his eyes, and said, "I am very sorry I treated you so unkindly yesterday; I beg you to forgive me, and I will do everything I can for you."

The little girl could not answer him, but looked at him with a forgiving countenance.

"Come," said he, "I came to go to school with you." And he took her by the hand and led her towards the school-house. Observing that she shivered with the cold, he took off his cloak and threw it over her shoulders. It was made not unlike those worn by girls—in fact, it was one that his sister had formerly worn. The poor girl did not dare to refuse to wear it, though she rather thought she ought not to. They thus came to the school-house together.

School had not begun. He put away her hood and shawl for her, and led her to the fire. All the children looked on in silent astonishment. James went and took John by the hand, but neither of them could speak. They were warm friends for a life-time.

John continued to treat her with the kindness of a brother; and when soon after her father died, he was most active in carrying into effect the wishes of his father, in providing the family with a comfortable home. He received the forgiveness of his father, but for years the cruel expression uttered in the school-room would come up in his memory, and shoot a pang to his heart.

CHARITABLE HIGHWAYMAN.—It is said of Boulter, a highwayman, that one day, riding on the high road, he met a young woman who was weeping, and appeared to be in great distress. Touched with compassion, he asked her what was the cause of her affliction; when she told him that a creditor, attended by a sheriff, had gone to a house she pointed out, and threatened to take her husband to jail for a debt of thirty guineas. Boulter gave her the amount, told her to pay the debt and set her husband at liberty; and she ran off, loading the honest man with benedictions. Boulter, in the mean time, waited in the road till he saw the creditor come out, and then took from him the thirty guineas, and every thing else he had about him.

THE CHIEF SUFFERERS FROM WAR.—Know you not that glory and military honor spring directly from the misery and degradation of the people!—Whose bodies are those which fill the ditch? The laborers'. Whose comforts are reduced by heavy taxation? The laborers'. Who give up their all for their country's rights? The laborers. What creates an aristocracy? What tends to an enequal distribution of wealth? Military spirit.

MORAL AND CEREMONIAL LAW.

It is often objected, that "the distinction between moral and ceremonial law is a scholastic and not a scriptural discrimination." It is true, the Scriptures have not furnished us with these terms; nevertheless we apprehend that thorough investigation will show, that the ideas implied by them are perfectly scriptural. Laws are founded on certain relations, which are supposed to exist; and a bare inspection of the laws will show what the relations are. It would be utterly impossible to frame a law which should not take cognizance of any relation at all. The Jews sustained the same relation to God, that all the rest of mankind did; that is, they were the creatures of his hand. Besides this relation which they sustained in common with the whole human race, there was another special one constituted at Mount Sinai, whereby they were made "a peculiar treasure unto God above all people." Ex. 19: 5. These two relations are evidently not the same, but very different from each other. Each of them gives rise to certain laws; and although the Scriptures do not employ the term moral to denote the laws which grow out of the first relation, nor the term ceremonial to denote the laws which grow out of the second relation, yet it must be admitted that the laws are as different from each other as the relations are on which they are founded. To avoid circumlocution some terms seem to be necessary which shall express the distinction. Whether our opponents can suggest better terms than the foregoing, we know not; but their discernment will not allow them to confound things which are so clearly distinct. We shall adhere to these terms until better ones are furnished, always meaning by them what we have now explained.

When the Jews were constituted "the peculiar treasure" of God at Mount Sinai, both of these relations were recognized. Hence they received both the moral and the ceremonial laws. The moral, however, becomes the foundation upon which God proceeds with them in giving them the ceremonial. It is necessarily so, inasmuch as God cannot, consistently with the holiness of his nature, require any other service than what is based upon moral principle. Nor is there any other pledge that the Jews will faithfully observe the ceremonial institutions, than what is found in the moral principle of their hearts. If they exhibit moral principle by a conformity to the moral law, there is reason to conclude that they will be faithful to the covenant which requires them to observe the ceremonial institutions. Hence God lays at the very bottom of this covenant the moral law, which is the Decalogue.

Which is, we say, the Decalogue. By this we do not mean, that there are no other moral precepts except those of the decalogue; for when it is written, "ye shall not vex a stranger, nor oppress him," we have no difficulty in recognizing it as a precept of the moral law. But we mean, that the decalogue furnishes us with the elementary principles of the moral law, all other precepts being the diversified applications of these principles.

We except no one of the "ten words," when we call this code the Moral Law. Our opponents themselves can hardly make an exception; for they always admit the Sabbath to be a memorial of creation;—a memorial therefore of that very relation which gives rise to all the other precepts of the decalogue. Yet strange to say, they will often declare almost in the same breath, that the Sabbath was exclusively a Jewish law. But how it can be exclusively a Jewish law, and yet at the same time a memorial of creation, we do not comprehend. If it was a memorial of creation, it must have been established as such "from the foundation of the world," as Paul clearly teaches—Heb. 4: 3, 4—consequently, established before Jews were in existence, and before sin had created the necessity for any institution to foreshadow redemption. Exclusively Jewish, therefore, it could not be. For the same reason the institution could not have received its fulfillment by the coming of Christ.

We have said that the Moral Law was laid at the very bottom of the covenant which God made with Israel. It was therefore necessarily clothed with a covenant character, and penalties to be inflicted by the civil magistrate were annexed. Invested with such a character, it was put into the hands of Moses to be ministered; and he that despised it as thus ministered, died without mercy when convicted by two or three witnesses. Heb. 10: 28. Moses, though he administered its precepts, and enforced the civil penalties, could do nothing more. He could not extend the grace of pardon for the violation of it, nor impart the grace of the Spirit to incline the hearts of the people to keep it. It was therefore in his hands the ministration of the letter only—the ministration of death. 2 Cor. 3. But when Moses' ministration came to an end, that of Jesus Christ began. The covenant character of the decalogue was stripped off, because the covenant itself was abrogated; and the civil penalties were consequently all taken out of the way. But as its precepts were all founded originally on the natural relation of men to the Maker, its moral character remained untouched, and its penalties were yet to be dispensed by God himself as the righteous Moral Governor of the world. It is therefore put into the hands of Jesus Christ to be ministered by him. He can do more than Moses did. He can do more than merely minister the letter of its precepts. He can minister it right into the very hearts of his people. Heb. 8: 10. For through his mediation the Spirit is given, (John 16: 7, and 7: 39,) to incline his people to the keeping of the law. It is in his hands, therefore, the ministration of the Spirit—the ministration of life. 2 Cor. 3: 6, 8. He can minister the grace of pardon for any violation of this law. Wherefore, though the law, and nothing more, came by Moses, the grace and the truth came by Jesus Christ. John 1: 17.

It appears, then, that there is a very important difference between the law as ministered by Moses, and as ministered by Jesus Christ. In the one case no pardon is secured; but death for the violation of it. In the other there is pardon, by the blood of Jesus, and life in consequence of pardon. In the one case it is the simple letter which is ministered, and if the flesh has strength to obey, well and good; but if the flesh is weak in this respect, as it certainly is, (Rom. 8: 3,) still no help is secured. In the other, the weakness of the flesh is remedied by the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Spirit, shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Saviour. Titus 3: 5, 6. Yet it does not thence follow, that Jesus Christ ministers a different law from that which Moses ministered. It is the same law, only differently dispensed. Were it a different law, the superiority of Christ over Moses would not be so apparent. Christ's superiority over Moses is seen in his being able to accomplish what Moses could not. Yet if he does not try his skill and power in ministering the same law, how do we know that he is so much superior? The superiority of one over another is discovered by their making trial at the same things—not at different things. The superiority of one merchant as a salesman over another is discovered—not by putting one of them at the plough—but by putting both of them behind the counter. The superiority of one blacksmith over another is discovered—not by sending one of them to the legislature—but by trying them both at the anvil. So if Christ is worthy of more glory than Moses, it is because he is able to put that same law into the hearts of the people, which Moses could not.

Now the law as ministered by Moses was the law of Moses; but as ministered by Jesus Christ, it is not the law of Moses, though the precepts be the very same. Our opponents, in supposing that we acknowledge the binding obligation of the law of Moses, or contend that it is now in force, miss their mark. It is a charge brought against us, however, by multitudes, who endeavor thereby to create the impression that we Judaize!

The grand object for which the Jews were constituted into "a holy nation," was that they might foreshadow redemption from sin. But if they foreshadowed redemption from sin, it was necessary that they should know what sin was. Now sin is always the transgression of the law. 1 John 3: 4. To suppose, however, that there is no difference between moral and ceremonial law, is to suppose that there is no difference between that law that gave the knowledge of sin, and that which typified redemption from it! A conclusion so absurd, that the premises which lead to it will not be fathered by any man of intelligence.

Now that law which gives the knowledge of sin, must necessarily be binding as a rule of duty under the present dispensation. Rom. 6: 1, 15. Christ has not "fulfilled" it in any sense which discharges men from obligation to observe its precepts. Christ came to save his people FROM their sins. He effects this object by the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost. Titus 3: 5. But if they continue to live in deviation from this law, they are not saved FROM their sins, but are yet IN them, and under the dominion of them. In coming to save them from their sins, a previously existing standard of holiness is recognized; otherwise what need of his coming at all?

In giving this law to the Jews, in connection with the ceremonial institutions, it was given in such a way as to teach in the most emphatic manner, that they never could be justified by keeping it. It is true, an external conformity to it justified them in a civil sense; but in a moral point of view they were not justified by it, and it was impossible that they should be. The saints of that age were justified by faith, as much as the saints of this age are; for the way of salvation is always the same. It was because they could not be justified by keeping the law, that Christ came. For if there had been a law which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law. Gal. 3: 21. Now what our opponents mean by directing our attention, as they often do, to those passages of the Epistles, which show the impossibility of being justified by the deeds of the law, we do not exactly comprehend. Such passages have nothing to do with this controversy. The Old Testament saints did not observe the law for justification—that civil justification, of which we have spoken, excepted—but waited for the hope of righteousness by faith. Nevertheless, they observed the law. If they could observe the precepts of the law, without expecting to be justified thereby, so can we. Yet some people reason on this subject, as if there could be no difference between the simple observance of precepts as a duty, and depending upon such observance for justification. There is a very wide difference; and it is seen on the very face of those passages to which we are so often pointed. The object of the Apostle in such passages is—not to show that the precepts of the law must not be regarded—but to show that they must not be kept FOR justification. In the quotation of Gal. 3: 25, our opponents almost always omit the very important sentence "that we might be justified by faith;" by which omission the true scope of the Apostle's argument is concealed. This omission may not be intentional, but a mere inadvertency. Nevertheless it is an inadvertency into which they would not fall were they accustomed to discriminate properly as to the end of the author's reasoning. The foregoing passage—if applied to the moral law—teaches that it was continually showing the impossibility of being justified by keeping its precepts, and so made the people of God feel the necessity of looking for justification to another source, even to Christ. Thus the law acted as a school-master to bring us to Christ, THAT WE MIGHT BE JUSTIFIED BY FAITH. But after this object has been accomplished, after we have been taught the necessity of faith so as actually to exercise it, we do not need to be taught any longer. The school-master had a certain nd in view, which was—not to discharge the people of God from obedience to the law—but to eradicate from their hearts the disposition to rely upon it for justification.

Let any one read with care the 7th chapter of Romans, and he will see how the law performs its work as a school-master. It comes to the sinner's conscience with searching power, making him feel that he is a sinner, "exceeding sinful." So closely does the law lay its claims at his heart, that he sees he can never keep it so as to be justified thereby; and hence sin is only roused, and rages the more. The law still pressing its claims, he feels more and more his want of conformity to it, regards himself as a mass of loathsomeness, and cries out "Who shall deliver me?" He is now prepared to cast himself on Christ for justification: he does so, and renders thanks for the mercy. But does he now become free from the law as a rule of duty? Let the Apostle himself determine. In the very next chapter he describes Christians as those "who walk after the Spirit." But what is it to walk after the Spirit? Evidently to walk according to that which, in chap. 7: 14, he declared to be "spiritual"—the law itself. Yet in these very chapters, where the Apostle so clearly asserts the continued obligation of the law, he talks about freedom from the law. 7: 6, and 8: 2. But a just discrimination shows that it is freedom from the law as a rule of justification, and not as a rule of duty. The same discrimination must be applied to the Epistle to the Galatians, and to all other passages where the Apostle teaches that we are not under the law.

Col. 2: 16 is regarded by some as an express prohibition of the observance of the Sabbath. We infer that the Apostle has no allusion to the weekly Sabbath, from the fact that what he speaks of was "against us, and contrary to us." Our Saviour, however, has taught that the Sabbath was made FOR man, and illustrated this design of the institution by doing good on that day, making it the occasion of ministering to the comfort of both body and soul, and vindicating it from those Pharisaic austerities which made it an oppressive burden. If it was made FOR man, it cannot, with any propriety, be classed with those ordinances, which the Apostle says were AGAINST us, and CONTRARY to us. Besides, those ordinances of which the Apostle speaks were "a shadow of things to come." But as the Sabbath was instituted before sin had created the need of "a shadow"—being instituted from the foundation of the world, Heb. 4: 3—it cannot be embraced in the Apostle's reference. There were other Sabbath seasons under the Old Economy, which clearly originated in that Economy, and were therefore without any doubt "a shadow of things to come." So that there is no need to press the weekly rest into the category. *

AN INTRODUCTION TO THE POPE.—A correspondent of the Boston Daily Advertiser, writing at Rome, February 15, gives the following interesting account of an interview with the Pope, a hale old man of nearly eighty years:

"Pope GREGORY XVI. maintains in the splendor of the Pontifical Court all the personal simplicity of taste and manners which are appropriate to his early life. The same bed which he used in the Benedictine monastery passed with him to his Cardinal palace, and he now sleeps on it in his regal chamber in the Vatican. I had the honor of being received by him with the ease and politeness of a private gentleman. I found him without guards or servants, or a single attendant, in a room very simply furnished, and in a plain morning dress. He continued standing during an audience of half an hour, conversed affably, referred to the destruction of the Ursuline convent in 1834, seemed perfectly acquainted with the judicial proceedings, and refrained from any observations which might have justly applied to that unatoned enormity. The Pope wore a velvet slipper, having a cross upon it embroidered in gold. The Catholics, on being presented, kneel and press their lips upon this cross. I have seen the ceremony in public devoutly performed. It is called in derision kissing the Pope's toe. I need not say that nothing of the kind was demanded of me. The formality in dress and deportment was exactly that which propriety would require in a visit to the President of the United States; and I assure you that, differing, toto cœlo, from his religious faith, I was highly gratified in an interview with an individual who is not only a sovereign Prince in his own dominions, but is considered the head of the true church by more than one half the Christian world."

DELIGHT IN DOING GOOD.

At a recent Missionary Meeting in New York, the Hon. Theodore Frelinghuysen delivered an eloquent Address, of which the following is the concluding paragraph:—

This principle of delight in doing good is exemplified in Christian missions. While missionaries open for others, dark, benighted and perishing, the richest springs of purest enjoyment, they find a return of all the good done, in the blessed result to their own souls. This is a principle universal as intellent being, and lasting as eternity. The angels illustrate the truth of this principle; they take delight in doing good and are ministering spirits to the heirs of salvation. The Lord of angels himself rejoices in the treasures of satisfied benevolence—a delineation of His character freely given in the word of truth. And the Redeemer of the world—the great missionary and exemplar to all who labor in his cause—went about doing good. His very soul was imbued with this blessed spirit. To him sufferers never applied without obtaining relief—he healed the sick, the halt, the blind—restored the lame, raised the dead, cast out devils, wept with the mourner, and ever succored and saved the desolate, the distressed and the lost. He felt a rich satisfaction in doing good! It was a part of the "joy set before Him!"

Of all our charities, that is the most blessed which seeks the welfare of the soul—which reaches the immortal part—which guides to the weary and thirsty spirit the refreshing water of the river of life, and irrigates the parched moral wilderness with the fertilizing streams of the gospel. And this employment tends to exalt the standard of Christian principle. God has ordained this as a law of our moral nature that gives tokens of its presence in all our moral propensities. We not only gradually become what we desire and endeavor to be, but we also insensibly become what we desire and attempt to have others become. This law is clearly recognized and taught in the divine precepts. "He that walketh with wise men shall be wise." The company with which we associate, and the thoughts with which we hold communion, are constantly exerting a moral influence upon our character, and the man who labors to turn men to God finds those labors the means of grace to his own soul.

MR. MOFFAT'S RECEPTION.

The Rev. Mr. Moffat, the intrepid missionary in South Africa, left his station for a season, about two or three years since, to visit his friends in England. The following paragraph describes the cordial welcome with which he was greeted on his return to the people, for whose salvation he still labors in that land of darkness.

At length at three o'clock on the morning of the 13th of December, the long absent ones entered their own habitation, and many of the people had forgotten their slumbers, eager to see the faces of their old friends. The daylight came; and oh! what shaking of hands! what beaming looks of joy! Some danced with delight, some wept, and some silently looked up to heaven with heart-felt thankfulness. Every infant must shake hands; grandmothers, blind with age, came, led by the hand of a child, and though unable to look on the faces they loved, they felt, with trembling fingers, the well-known forms, and listened to the unforgotton voices. Wide and yet wider spread the news, and large and larger was the glad gathering. At one time there were twenty wagons on the station, each with its full load of visitors. There came the king's brother, the haughty chief Mahuro, for haughty he had been to his neighbors, but he had traveled ninety miles to welcome the missionary and his wife to their long forsaken home. And there, stooping with age, came King Mothibi, and the old Queen Mahuto, all motherly in manner and clean in attire. It was sixteen years since she and her husband were cruelly driven from the Kuruman, her eldest son just cut off by death, and her spirit bowed with sorrow; and she thought she could never bear to visit her old home again; but her mind has been renewed, her heart broken once more, not by earthly sorrow, but by the power of the living God, and here she and her husband came, with their sons and daughters, to welcome back the messenger of mercy. Oh! truly, "How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good things, that publisheth peace!"

When Wolff was missionary at Jerusalem, a Turk, pointing to Calvary, said—"There, on that very spot, where your Lord poured out his blood, the Mahomedan is obliged to interfere, to prevent you Christians from shedding the blood of each other."

VISIT TO THE DEAD SEA.

By a Correspondent of the Savannah Republican.

The descent to the sea was painful and difficult, our horses being led most of the way. We found the water of the sea to be nearly the color of chlorine, a yellowish green. Incrustations of salt, in beautiful chrystals, sparkled around, and we amused ourselves in examining the shores. There was some drift wood lying about, but so impregnated with salt that it would not burn. We saw none of the bitumenous substance—asphaltum—that rises from the bottom, and is cast ashore. Numerous handsome pebbles lined the beach, and here and there locusts, stiff with the salt and three and a half inches long, were observed, as well as some small fish which had been brought down, probably by the Jordan. No living thing can exist in the lake, and not a single boat is on its waters. The taste of the water is more acrid and bitter than anything which can be conceived of.

Not far from the beach the shore consisted of a vertical rock, where we saw the high water line—at least seven or eight feet above the present one. This fact sets at rest all the speculations about subterranean passages; for my readers will remember that the Dead Sea has no visible outlet. But in this climate the evaporation must be immense. The sea is 70 miles long, and the evaporating surface must be increased a great many acres by a rise of a few feet in the level. There are some fictions about no bird being able to fly over this water, but we saw several eagles balancing themselves in the air far above it. Dreariness, solitude and desolation presided over this lone sea, and in another than a bright day, I cannot imagine that the world presents a more perfect picture of gloom and horror. It is a curious circumstance that the Arabs still call it "Bahr al Lout," (the Sea of Lot.) It remained for the gentlemen of the party to take a bath; and now we observerd the most curious phenomenon. Attempting to dive, we popped up to the surface like corks. I tried to sink, as any swimmer can in fresh water, but could not.

Some old travelers speak about being buoyed up to the middle, but I found, on balancing myself for a moment in a vertical position, that the upper part of my shoulders was out of water. To swim was difficult—not so much from the density of the medium, as from the inability to sink deep enough in it. The sensation was curious enough, so lightly does one float. Lying on my back, without any effort to balance myself, I found that I invariably turned over, with my face downward. We came out of the water much gratified, but our eyes smarted terribly, and we carried off a most uncomfortable under shirt of delicate white salt.

ONE DOLLAR SENT TO CHINA.

Rev. I. J. Roberts, missionary at Hongkong, acknowledges the receipt of one dollar from a lady, which he applied in the distribution of Dr. Bridgman's Tract, "Way of Eternal Happiness," from house to house in "the new settlement of Victoria."

"Now," he says, "suppose I had never heard of the way of eternal happiness by the blessed and only Saviour, what an inestimable value should I place upon the information that might be contained relative to that way in a Tract of five leaves! Could I estimate the value of such by money? What amount would I prefer to such a Tract and such information in it as might save eternally my immortal soul? Would I prefer one hundred dollars? No! One thousand? No! no! Ten Thousand? By no means! One million? No! Oh no! I would trample the money in the dust, clasp the Tract to my heart, and praise and give glory to God and the Lamb who have brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel of our blessed Redeemer."

PROTESTANTISM IN FRANCE.

The London Watchman gives the following interesting statistics of the progress of Protestantism in France.

In 1815 there were 464 Protestant pastors; in 1830, 527; in 1843, 677; and now there are more than 700. Under the empire, the budget of the Protestant Church was 306,000f.; under the restoration, 476,000f.; and in 1843, 1,219,000f. The number of Protestant Churches has increased in proportion, but there are still 111 localities without them. The number of Protestants in France is given at 4,000,000. Within the last few years, no less than 33 villages in the north of France have renounced Romanism, and embraced Protestant Christianity. These cheering facts are almost entirely the result under the divine blesssng, of the labors of a poor and simple-minded class of men, called colporteurs, who traverse the country, selling copies of the Old and New Testament at a cheap rate, as agents of the British and Foreign Bible Society. The history of the labors of the poor colporteurs furnishes some of the most striking illustrations of the language of the Psalmist that we have ever met with:—"The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul; the testimony of the Lord is sure making wise the simple."

TALKING TO THE POINT.—Hunt, the veteran Temperance Lecturer, tells a story of an aged clergyman, in Virginia, who was wont to say, that a preacher of the Gospel should be ready, at a minute's warning, to preach from any subject furnished from the Bible. After going through with the preliminary exercises, one morning, a parishioner handed him this text, "Where art thou?" The preacher arose without hesitation, read his text, and said:—"The subject naturally divides itself into three heads. 1st. Every man is of necessity somewhere. 2d. Most men are where they ought not to be. 3d. Unless you take care, you will all soon be where you would not like to be."

CONSCIENCE.—We are all to guide our consciences by the word, that is, God's written will, and we are to guide our lives by our consciences.

The Sabbath Recorder.

NEW YORK, MAY 8, 1845.

CIVIL POWER IN THINGS SACRED.

The carnal mind is enmity—not at enmity, as often quoted, but enmity itself—against God; and this enmity will necessarily be developed in some form or other. This simple consideration shows the inexpediency of too great rigidness in human laws. We may forbid by the severest penalties things which we suppose to be contrary to the word of God, but we cannot by such severity change the heart. We do but oppose a barrier to those particular forms in which man manifests his corruption, while we put him upon racking all his powers of ingenuity to devise some other mode of displaying it. Enmity cannot be still; it is restless as the troubled sea. As well might we try to confine the fires of a volcano, as to still the enmity of the heart by legislative coercion.

On this principle we do conscientiously set our face against all attempts at imposing by human laws duties which are purely religious. All men feel the reasonableness of such laws as regulate the duties of one man towards another, so as to secure equal and just rights; but when it comes to prescribing some duty to God, something that is purely religious, man naturally plants himself in the attitude of hostility, and defies all attempts to subdue him. The wisest of our legislators, therefore, have taken the ground that the province of the civil magistrate is strictly within the second table of the divine law, or in other words, with the last six of the ten commandments, while the duties enjoined by the first four should be left wholly to the consciences of men. Roger Williams and other venerated men in the early history of our country, advocated this doctrine; but alas! they were in advance of the age. Puritanism only drew with tighter hands the veil of bigotry over those who lived in that time. Even to this day it seems as if people were slow to learn this cardinal principle of a free government.

The discerning John Leland said, that "government should be so fixed that Pagans, Turks, Jews, and Christians, should be equally protected in their rights." We endorse this sentiment most heartily, and in the spirit of it do protest with uplifted hand against all those laws upon our statute books which recognize one mode of worshiping God in preference to another. Those laws which recognize the first day of the week as the Sabbath, and impose it upon men as such, are in violation of the spirit of our republican government, and contribute in numerous ways to harass those who conscientiously believe in the sacredness of another day. But independent of the vexation they give to a numerous and worthy class of Christians, we hold that they are unnecessary, and were they rigidly enforced, would do more hurt than good. In saying thus we endeavor to bring the case home to ourselves, and to suppose that our own doctrine concerning the Sabbath were quite as prevalent as that of our opponents now is. And even in this case, we adhere to our position; we would not have our Sabbath enforced by human law.

Suppose we try the experiment. A loaded team drives through our village on the Sabbath, and by way of carrying out the law, we require it to stop till the sacred season is over. In fear of the penalty, the driver of it complies; but what is the natural effect of all this proceeding on his heart? He cannot see that the simple passage of his team through the place invaded the rights of a single individual; the highway was made for him, as well as for all others. He is conscious too that he is a peaceable, industrious, orderly citizen at all times; he pays his taxes for the support of government cheerfully, he renders to all their dues, he defrauds none, he oppresses none, he slanders none; in fine, so far as the duties of one man towards another are concerned, he is not conscious of failing in any of them. Only he is not a religious man, and conscience does not bind him to the performance of any thing purely religious. As for the Sabbath, he looks upon it as purely a religious institution, by which the pious draw near to God. He can conceive of no reason binding him to keep it that would not bind him with equal force to every other religious institution. But now it is forced upon him by law in opposition to the native enmity of his heart against God, which is galled by it and roused to spiteful opposition. What then does he do? His mind cannot cease to think, his heart cannot cease to feel. He therefore sets about some new mode of displaying his opposition to godliness, which in the end shall be quite as pernicious in its effects upon society, and perhaps a great deal worse; or at all events he becomes hardened against religious influences, embittered against the very name of Christianity, and settles down into determined infidelity. By the very act of forcing upon him an institution of religion to which his affections are opposed, we have placed him in such a position that we cannot reach his heart with that truth which concerns his everlasting welfare. Men will not be forced into religion, they must be persuaded—and if they will not be persuaded, they must be let alone.

Talk not to us about the necessity of a Sabbath for the sake of human society. We admit it. But pure and undefiled religion is just as necessary; and every argument urged in defence of legislating for a Sabbath, may be urged with just as much force in favor of establishing every other religious institution by law—in plain English, may be urged for a union of Church and State. We would leave this matter entirely to the persuasive power of argument, and the force of public opinion. True, we want protection to our religious assemblies, but we want that on any day, and at any time we choose to hold them. But what is protection? Not a license to wax wroth at those who do not choose to perform the duties of religion, and in a spirit of vindictiveness to start out and "seize by the throat" every traveling teamster—those who ride in fine carriages are usually let alone—for daring to have different feelings from ourselves in regard to religious things. True piety has no such blue-law spirit. The spirit of piety is the spirit of compassion towards them that are ignorant and out of the way. Heb. 5:2. It is a spirit that mourns over the errors of the wicked, and with kind counsels and arguments endeavors to win them to God. But it resorts not to the civil law to help the thing along. Do we ever hear of the Saviour calling the law to his aid?

Suppose a wagon should pass a place of worship on Wednesday or Thursday, creating some little noise for a few moments—do any of that worshiping assembly feel that their religious rights have been invaded? Has there been such a neutralizing of the benefits they proposed to themselves by assembling, that they can proclaim themselves injured persons, and feel that the law ought to come in for their redress? Certainly not. Then why claim any such special protection for those meetings that are held on the day considered to be the Sabbath? We question if the disposition to resort to law in such cases does not arise from a spirit of persecution which seeks to take some sort of vengeance upon those of a different creed, rather than from a pure zeal for the glory of God. *

ULTRA LUTHERANS IN GERMANY.

A high-church party has sprung up in the Lutheran Church of Germany, which speaks of other denominations in language somewhat remarkable for its intolerance, extravagance, and nonsense. One of the champions of the party, for instance, says, "We cannot call the Reformed the Church, or even a part of the Church of Christ, for they lack the marks of the Christian Church, the purity of the sacraments, and unity in doctrine; neither can we call them a sister church, for the Church of Christ cannot have sisters. The Lutheran Church is the only true church in our times, she alone has the pure sacraments, and unity of doctrine." Acting upon the dogma here laid down, these ultra Lutherans have withdrawn from all connection with the missionary institutions of Germany, because those institutions do not require their missionaries to insist upon the differences between the Lutheran and Reformed Confessions of Faith. They have formed a mission institute of their own, and have chosen the German emigrants in the United States as their principal field of labor. As yet the party embraces but a minority of the orthodox Protestant clergy, and is thought to be without any very flattering prospects of increase. It is sufficiently numerous, however, to produce not a little disturbance among the Lutherans, and to show that though assuming the name of Luther it is quite possible to be destitute of his spirit.

THE EXCISE LAWS OF NEW YORK.

Many petitions have been sent up to the Legislature of this State within a few weeks, asking that the people in each town may be entrusted with the decision of the question whether any licenses shall be granted in their own town. A bill in accordance with these petitions passed the Assembly with scarcely a dissenting voice. But when it came before the Senate, all but the enacting clause was stricken out, and a substitute introduced providing that licenses might hereafter be granted by the commissioners gratuitously. It would be better, undoubtedly, to leave each man to sell intoxicating liquors as he might please, than for the commissioners, by authority of the State and in consideration of a certain sum paid, to confer the privilege on a favored few. But the bill just passed by the Senate actually leaves the venders of ardent spirits protected by a legal license, while they are exempted from their former tax to help defray the expense of the poverty and crime which their traffic occasions. This amendment of the Senate differs widely from the law which was asked. It gives to the petitioners a stone instead of bread—a scorpion instead of a fish.

Practice vs. Precept.—Our readers have heard something about the Rev. W. G. Ward, Fellow of Balliol College, Oxford, England, who was lately tried and degraded for publishing certain unpopular views respecting the English Church, in his book entitled, "Ideal of a Christian Church." He there advocated very strenuously the celibacy of the clergy and other kindred doctrines. But alas for poor human nature, after all that Mr. Ward has said upon the subject, it seems that he has fallen from the high stand which he had marked out for others by becoming a married man. He has since published a letter on the subject, in which he maintains that celibacy is a higher condition of life than marriage; that vows of celibacy, when duly taken, are perpetually obligatory; and that, under a really effective church system, the priests would be, if possible, wholly selected from those who have taken such vows. In his own case, however, there was "no vocation felt for a life of celibacy," and he acted accordingly.

Great Scientific Convention.—A great Convention of American Geologists and Naturalists was held in New Haven, Ct., last week. Many distinguished scholars were present from different parts of the country, and the deliberations were of an exceedingly interesting character. Papers were read on a variety of scientific subjects, among which was one on the tracks of birds and animals found at Middletown, Conn.; others on the geology of Mississippi; on the geology of the Upper Missouri; on a chain of erratic and serpentine rocks in Berkshire, Mass; synopsis of the fishes of North America; on the subject of the Gulf Stream; on the Atomic Theory; a review of the Chemical Theory, &c. The Convention held several sessions, and the character of the remarks and inquiries indicated a good degree of earnestness and interest in promoting its objects.

BAPTIST ANNIVERSARIES AT PROVIDENCE.

AMERICAN BAPTIST HOME MISSION SOCIETY.

The Annual Meeting of this Society was held at Providence on Tuesday, April 29.

The Treasurer's Report showed that there had been received into the treasury, $18,675; paid out, $13,857; leaving a balance of $5,736. The State Conventions had reported $30,625 appropriated to Home Missions.

The Annual Report commenced with a notice of the decease of several early friends and officers of the Society. It stated that the operations of the Society had been extended over eighteen States of the Union, besides having stations in Texas and Canada. The Valley of the Mississippi, however, is the principal theatre of the Society's action. It employs 99 missionaries, in connection with whose labors 51 churches have been constituted, and 818 persons baptized. Considerable more has been done by the Society the past year than during any preceding year.

At an early stage of the proceedings, a resolution was introduced by Dr. Welch, instructing the Executive Board not to appoint any man as a missionary of the Society who holds slaves as property. This led to considerable discussion upon the subject of a division between the North and South. A committee was appointed to report a plan for the division of the Society, so as to secure the rights of Northern and Southern members. Their report recommended that as the Society was planted at the North and had an Executive Board there, its control should be given up to the North, or to such as felt willing to co-operate with it on the principle of restricting missionary appointments to non-slaveholders.

AMERICAN AND FOREIGN BIBLE SOCIETY.

The Annual Meeting of this Society was opened by an address from the President, Rev. Dr. Cone, who explained the principles on which the society was founded, and referred briefly to the successful efforts which had been made during the winter past to prevent the society from obtaining a charter.

The Eighth Annual Report was read by Dr. Babcock. It appears from the report that the total receipts for the year have amounted to $34,562; volumes issued, 26,239, valued at $9,483. Ninety new auxiliaries have been recognized; 25 life directors and 285 life members have been enrolled. The receipts of the year are $11,000 larger than the preceding year. Since the formation of the society, it has devoted $131,342 to foreign distribution of the Scriptures, and $49,743 to the home supply.

After the reading of the Report, addresses were made by Mr. Evarts and Mr. Neale; also by Mr. Dean, missionary from China, upon the encouragements to labor in that field, and by Mr. Kincaid upon the duty of fully translating the Bible.

AMERICAN BAPTIST PUBLICATION SOCIETY.

The receipts of the Publication Society for the year have amounted to $20,803, most of which has been expended. The society has circulated 4,230,255 pages of tracts gratuitously, and 143,809 bound volumes. The colporteurs of the society are mostly traveling preachers, whose expenses are borne by a small profit on the books they sell. The society is now engaged in publishing the complete works of Andrew Fuller. After the reading of the Report several resolutions were discussed, setting forth the benefits of the colporteur system which joins missionary labor with the circulation of books.

FOREIGN MISSION BOARD.

The thirty-first annual meeting of the Board of Foreign Missions was held on Wednesday. It appears from the Annual Report, that the receipts for the year have been about $82,000, and the expenses $94,000. The present debt of the society is $40,188 40. The number of missions under the direction of the Board is 17; number of stations 130; missionaries and assistant missionaries 109, of whom 42 are preachers; native preachers assistants, 123; baptisms reported, 2593; and church members, more than 5000; schools, 56; scholars, about 1350. Two preachers and 3 female assistants have joined the missions during the year, and 4 preachers and female assistants have been removed by death or other cause.

The principal subject of discussion at the meeting was in relation to the appointment of slaveholding missionaries. The Committee on the Alabama Resolutions reported—"1. That the spirit of the Constitution and proceedings of the Convention recognize eligibility to appointments without distinction on the ground of slaveholding. 2. That in carrying out this principle, contingencies might arise requiring recognition, seemingly actual, of institutions offensive to the North. 3. That in such cases reference should be made to the Convention." This report was warmly discussed, and was finally adopted in connection with a resolution expressing approbation of the late document of the Acting Board.

This subject having been fairly disposed of, a public missionary meeting was held in the evening, at which addresses were made by Rev. Mr. Dean of China, Rev. Mr. Kincaid, and others.

The New York Anniversaries.—The present week is one of great interest to the religious and philanthropic community, on account of its being the anniversary season of the principal benevolent societies. It appears from the programme that no less than twenty-one of these societies hold their anniversary meetings in New York during the week, at which reports are read of the last year's transactions, and addresses are delivered by the leading friends of the different objects. We publish to-day accounts of some of the meetings; accounts of others must be left until our next number.

ANNIVERSARIES IN NEW YORK.

The Presbyterian Board of Missions held its Anniversary in the Duane Street Church on Monday evening of the present week. The following statement of its labors is collected from the Annual Report:—

"The receipts during the year were $82,672 84. Expendiatures, $81,469 71. Balance in the Treasury, $1,203 13. There had been printed and circulated of the "Missionary Chronicle," 6,240 copies; of the "Foreign Missionary," 14,200 copies. Nine ordained missionaries had been sent out, of whom one had been sent to Texas, two to the Indian tribes of our own country, one to Africa, and five to China. There are now laboring, under the direction of the Board, 81 missionaries and assistant missionaries. These missionaries occupy as fields of labor—1st, Texas, having four stations; 2d, the Indian Tribes, three stations; 3d, Western Africa, four stations, with a boarding school containing 40 scholars, and three common schools containing 143 scholars; 4th, Northern India, three stations, at which there are 7 ministers, 1 physician, 1 printer, 4 printing presses printing annually 8 millions of pages, 6 boarding schools with 179 scholars, 4 high schools with 301 scholars, and 12 common schools with 300 scholars; in China, 3 missions, attached to which are 7 ministers, 2 physicians, 1 printer, and a type foundry. The press was started in June last, and at the last accounts had printed 1,000,000 pages of the Scriptures. About the middle of last year the Board commenced operations in papal Europe, and had already sent $50,000 to that field of labor."

The American Seaman's Friend Society held its Seventeenth Anniversary in the Tabernacle on Monday evening. The Annual Report gave a cheering account of the moral and social improvement which has taken place among sailors. The following facts from it will be encouraging to the friends of seamen:—

"There are now in existence fifty Mariners' Churches where divine service is regularly performed and where the Seamen has always the privilege of attending. The Sailor's Home in New York has 3916 Sailor boarders, and during the past 3 years the number has been 11,008. The number of those who have voluntarily stopped their allowance of grog in merchant ships is surprising, in one instance the number was 300 out of 303. The Seaman's Bank for Savings in this City has now on deposite more than half a million of dollars, mostly belonging to seamen. The receipts of the Society for the past year have been $17,322; expenditure, $18,178, and if the funds from all the auxiliary societies were included the amount would be over $75,000. A general and increased interest in the grand movement of temperance was stated as having done an important part of the good which has thus far resulted. The Report gave an interesting account of many seamen in merchant ships and whalers having been converted to the light of Gospel truth and the importance of Religion. The great benefit conferred by the labors of foreign chaplains was mentioned and the general claim which the Society has upon the aid and sympathy of all philanthropists."

INFIDEL CONVENTION.

It has been the opinion of some, that in the "last days" there would be a systematic organization of infidels for the purpose of effecting the extermination of Christianity, and that the antichrist of scripture—instead of being the Church of Rome as commonly supposed—would grow out of such organization. Those who hold this opinion will probably feel themselves strengthened by hearing, that there has been in session during the present week in this city an Infidel Convention, in which as many as ten different States are said to have been represented. They will look upon this as one of the "signs" that the "god of this world" is mustering his hosts to the great battle. Indeed some such ideal forces itself upon our own mind, for the calling of a Convention seems to be a new feature in the history of infidelity. The great Deceiver probably "knoweth that he hath but a short time," and thinks that he must make the most of it.

As we passed by the place of convocation the other day, we halted a few moments at the door; and it was pitiable to behold an old grey-headed man, standing on the steps, and to some ten or a dozen persons who were gathered around him preaching his abomination, reviling the scriptures, and intermingling with his invectives the most revolting profanity. Who he was we know not—possibly some of the delegates—but oh, how mournful to see him madly attempting to blow out the only lamp that can light up the darkness of the tomb. We subjoin some appropriate remarks from the Tribune:

"Shall we offend a sensible Infidel in saying that we found or fancied, in scanning the heads of their Convention, among many bespeaking lofty aims and intellectual development, a rather larger proportion of countenances deformed by passion or marred by sensuality than we have ever remarked in a similar assemblage of those they consider the dupes of priestly fraud and votaries of superstition? True, these were but a small proportion of the whole number; yet, as a whole, the Convention could hardly be deemed under obligations to the discoveries of Gall or Lavater. Saying nothing of the influence of belief, who can doubt that the isolated condition of all infidels, their independence of the restraining and impelling influence of sympathy and fellowship, are clearly unfavorable to high moral attainments? We rejoice, then, that they have determined to know each other, and fix upon some definite and enduring plan of organization and action. This will soon teach them the emptiness and inutility of a brotherhood founded in mere negation, and inevitably suggest something better instead. Rather a cold and loose fraternity, we suspect, could be made up of those who don't believe that Capt. Kidd's money will ever be found. But let the Infidels begin to act efficiently together, to form societies, hold meetings and maintain an active correspondence, and they cannot fail to find some better ground to stand upon than that of opposition to and denial of others' faith."

Episcopal Ordinations.—We learn from "the Churchman" of last week, that Rev. Isaac P. Labagh and Rev. David Pise, having been dismissed as candidates for Holy Orders from the Diocese of New York to the Diocese of Delaware, were on the 24th ult. admitted by Bishop Lee of Delaware to the sacred order of Deacons, in the Protestant Episcopal Church. The ordination took place at Wilmington, and is said to have been solemn and interesting. It is understood that Mr. Labagh is about to devote himself entirely to labor among the Jews, especially in the city of New York. Bishop Lee has written a letter warmly recommending the enterprise to all members of the Episcopal Church, and encouraging Mr. Labagh to go forward in the work.

Revival in Albany.—An interesting work of grace has been in progress among the Baptist churches in Albany. More than a hundred persons have been added to one of the churches, and many to the other churches. Among the number added by baptism, was a Mr. Farr, who had been for twenty years a Methodist preacher. He has since been ordained, and is now settled as a pastor of a Baptist church.

New Mission.—The Baptists in Nova Scotia, have just commenced the work of sending missionaries to the heathen. They have appointed Rev. Richard E. Burpe, and have held several meetings preparatory to his departure for Burmah. He is to go out under the direction of the American Baptist Board of Foreign Missions, who have offered to afford the mission every facility in their power.

Church and State.—The Hon. T. B. Macaulay expresses his opinion of the advantages to be derived from the Union of Church and State, in the following language, which we commend to the consideration of those men who are just now praying for legislative help to give importance to their own notions:—

"The whole history of the Christian religion shows, that she is in far greater danger of being corrupted by the alliance of power than of being crushed by its opposition. Those who thrust temporal sovereignty upon her, treat her as their prototypes treated her Author. They bow the knee and spit upon her; they cry Hail! and smite her on the cheek; they put a sceptre into her hand, but it is a fragile reed; they crown her, but it is with thorns; they cover with purple the wounds which their own hands have inflicted upon her, and inscribe magnificient titles over the cross on which they have fixed her to perish in ignominy and pain."

Conversion of a Mussulman.—The following account of the conversion of a Mussulman is given by Mr. Abbot, missionary at Ahmednuggur, under date of December 27:—

"About a mouth ago, a Mussulman Moonshe was received into the church. He had come to this place from Nassick to give testimony in a law case. He was taken sick on the road, and on arriving at Ahmednuggur, he was in the civil hospital about a month. Finding that he was not likely to recover, he sent for us, and expressed a strong desire to be baptized and admitted to the church. He stated that he had been convinced of the truth of Christianity six or eight years, and that he had in the mean time lived a profligate life. He said that his mind had been filled with remorse in view of his past couduct, and that, for a few days past, he had resolved to renounce his sins and his faith in Mohammed, since which time he had been filled with peace. He also said that he had no fear of death—that he trusted in a crucified Saviour alone. He lived only three or four days after his baptism. He continued to the last expressing full confidence in Christ as his Saviour. Had he lived, he would have had an opportunity to show whether he was a child of God or not."

A Noble Enterprise.—Rev Mr. Simpson, of Antrim, Ireland, says in a letter to a friend in Charleston, that 300 Irish schools are established, with about 7,000 scholars—all Roman Catholics—learning to read the Bible in Irish. Seven young men, all converts from popery, are also in training at college, to become preachers in Irish, five of whom were intended for the popish priesthood.

Bible Circulation.—On an average, 3445 Bibles or Testaments were sent forth on their errands of love, every day of the last year, by the united efforts of the "British and Foreign," and "American" Bible Societies.

Help from Heathen Lands.—The people of Tahiti and the neighboring islands, have contributed £527 (more than $2,000) to the British and Foreign Bible Society.

Switzerland.—It is stated that the General of the Jesuits at Rome, has resolved to suppress the Jesuits' college in Switzerland, in order to prevent the civil war which is menaced by the continuance of the Jesuits in that country.

The people of Granville, Mass., have made arrangements for celebrating, on the 27th of August next, the Semi-Centennial Anniversary of the settlement of their Minister, Rev. Timothy M. Cooley, D. D. The venerable Pastor is to deliver an Historical Discourse in the forenoon, and in the afternoon the Lord's Supper is to be administered, accompanied by a sermon from Rev. Dr. Hitchcock, President of Amherst College and a descendant of one of the first Deacons of the Church.

General Intelligence.

Fifteen Days Later from Europe.

The Hibernia arrived at Boston on Tuesday morning, bringing London and Liverpool papers to the 19th ult.

The general aspect of trade remains about the same. There is nothing important from either Spain or France. The Oregon question continues to attract considerable attention in England.

Flemish papers give sad accounts of inundations in various parts of Belgium and Germany, arising from the change in the weather.

Ireland continues comparatively quiet, though there are rumors that O'Connell intends soon to make a new move of some kind.

Mr. Everett the American minister, entertained a distinguished party of the nobility on Thursday. Lord Brougham was among the number.

The Post office revenue exhibits an improvement over last year to the amount of £57,000.

The frost has been so intense on the Danube, that rocks, which for centuries had obstructed the navigation near Lintz, suddenly burst, and thus opened the bed of the river.

THE PAST WINTER IN EUROPE.

It appears by the following items, translated from a German paper published in this city, that the past winter has been one of almost unprecedented severity in some parts of Europe. A writer under date of Berlin, March 22d, says:—

Yesterday, Good Friday, was on many account a day to be remembered. First, on account of ths weather. A snow storm began early in the morning, which lasted all night. This extreme cold weather has now continued for four months. They were still skating yesterday on the canals in the city, a thing which no living man ever witnessed in Berlin before at this period of the year. That want, distress and sickness are daily increasing amongst us in geometrical progression, is too plain to be denied. Even among the better classes, the want of many necessary articles of comfort makes itself known; for example, coals, which now have become absolutely necessary as fuel, are exhausted, and we must wait until May for fresh supplies. The larger apartments cannot be kept warm with wood. The number of those in want increases daily; they crowd round the doors begging, in spite of all regulations and police officers. And who could have the heart to turn off the half clad, half starved, wretched sufferers, the children, sickly women and old men, and hand them over to the mercy of the law?

A few days since was the annual market day. Pedlars of wooden ware came in from the neighboring villages of the forest with their large baskets full of wares. They were mostly children. The poor wretches would take no refusal, they came into the open houses and thrust themselves in through the open door. "Ah," they cried, "let us into the warm room; take what you please from our wares and give us only the least morsel of bread," and their entreaties were choked with tears of distress! And when their frozen limbs felt the warmth of the heated rooms, their eyes glanced with heartfelt thanks.

DISTRESS IN EAST PRUSSIA.—There are 4000 families in the county of Oletz without food or work. Seed corn even had been exhausted. Three-fourths of the sheep and one-third of the cattle were lost for want of fodder through the winter, and the remainder were poor and good for nothing.

DISTRESS OF THE POORER CLASSES IN POMERANIA.—The continuance of the severe cold had produced extreme distress among the poorer classes. In one of the shantees, a little way out of town, a man had been found frozen to death, and a child nearly exhausted with cold. The misery throughout the country was extreme.

The death of the rich Countess K——, who was everywhere known for almost incredible meanness and parsimony, is very remarkable. She had 20,000 dollars a year income, and died of cold because she was too miserly to keep her rooms warm; a few hours before her death she had foddered her horses with her own hands. Every corner of her house was filled with gold and valuable papers. Fifty thousand dollars have already been found.

Letters from Poland state that the distress there is frightful; people were dying at times of hunger, sometimes of cold. The harvest last year was destroyed by the overflow of the Memel. The destruction of cattle, occasioned by want of food, was considerable. The prospect for this year is no better, for half the winter grain is gone, and the great masses of snow still lying on the ground, threaten fresh inundations.

◆

EARTHQUAKE AT MEXICO.—The city of Mexico was shaken by an earthquake on the 7th ult., at a little past three o'clock in the afternoon. The following account of its effects is from a Mexican paper of the 8th ult:—

"It is impossible yet to ascertain the extent of destruction. Not a house or a door but bears a mark of this terrible calamity. Many of them are cracked and greatly injured—others are tottering, and others entirely fallen.* San Lorenzo, La Misericordia, Tompeate, Zapo and Victoria streets, and the Grand street, have particularly suffered. The aqueducts were broken in several places. The bridge of Tezontlale is demolished. The Hospital of Saint Lazarus is in ruins, and the churches of San Lorenzo and San Ferdinand greatly injured. The magnificent chapel of St. Teresa no longer exists. At the first shock the cupola, a building of astonishing strength and great beauty fell, and was soon followed by the vault beneath the tabernacle, and the tabernacle itself. Fortunately all those in a church so much frequented, succeeded in escaping. At 8 o'clock in the evening, seventeen persons had been taken from the ruins of other buildings and carried to the Hospital.

LIFE IN FRANCE.—"Disembarrassing" (getting rid of troublesome ties by poisoning the encumbrance,) has increased to such alarming frequency, that the authorities are seeking some legal method of prevention. All dealers in pharmacy are to be compelled to appear weekly before the authorities of the neighborhood and render a report of the doses of arsenic and other poisons they have sold, names of purchasers, and other information, by which the drug could be traced in a case of mischief. This, it is supposed, will be sufficient in the provinces. Other more special precautions will be taken in the metropolis.

HANDSOMELY DONE.—A letter from Lexington, Ky. to a gentleman in this place, speaking of Mr. Clay, says:—

"He (Mr. Clay) has been largely in debt, but within the last week the entire indebtedness, (amounting to near $30,000) was cancelled, and his notes delivered to him from the Bank! The great man was deeply affected, and asked who had done this thing. 'We know not,' was the reply, 'the money was deposited to your credit and your notes are cancelled. It need not concern you who did it; it was not your enemies."

[Somerville Reporter.

As this matter has been made the subject of invidious comment in journals hostile to Mr. Clay, we shall not now violate any confidence by stating the facts more clearly. The truth is this: Mr. Clay, who has not for many years incurred or owed a debt on his own account, had involved himself by endorsing for a relative who became deeply embarrassed and failed. The debts came upon Mr. Clay to such an extent that his property must have been swept away to pay them. The circumstances came to the knowledge of some of Mr. Clay's political friends and admirers (few of whom knew him personally,) and they quietly subscribed the sum necessary to relieve him from embarrassment. The first intimation he had of it was by the return of his cancelled notes.

COST OF TRANSPORTATION ON RAILROADS.—The Hon. W. Jackson, in his address at Providence, makes the following calculation:

He says one locomotive will do the work every day of 668 horses; and it does this work with the aid of only four men; whereas with four horse teams doing the same transportation, would be required 167 men. The interest on the cost of the locomotive, amount expended for its repairs, wages of the four men, with wood and oil, show the annual expense of maintaining this team to be about $11,000. Similar items in relation to the horse teams will show an annual aggregate expense of about $120,000. A saving of $109,000.

FRANKLIN PRINTING PRESS.—There is exposed to view in the National Gallery in this city, the identical press at which Franklin worked, when in London, about a hundred and twenty years ago. It is, however, bereft of tympan, frisket, and bed stone, but in all other respects appears to be perfect of its kind. The remains of ink upon its framework are as hard as asphaltum, and as black as the tar of the present day. The press was presented by Messrs. Harrild and Sons, Printers' Brokers, to John B. Murray, Esq., New York, in November, 1841.

In Franklin's time, two hundred and fifty sheets an hour was considered good work; but now, to such perfection has the printing press been brought, that from two to five thousand impressions are thrown off within this period of time!

PRESERVING APPLES.—Mr. Lawrence, of Monmouth county, N. J., has succeeded in preserving apples for eighteen months. On the 1st of January, 1844, he put away a quantity of the crop of 1843, packing them in barrels with plaster of Paris—a layer of apples and of plaster alternately. In the following summer he took them out and packed them in a close box, between layers of dry oak saw dust and had them for family use until the crop of 1844 was ripe. On the 11th of March, 1845, while cleaning out the box, his servant found three apples remaining of the crop of 1843, all perfectly sound.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.—The following order has been issued by the present Postmaster General, which will prove acceptable to publishers:

"Money for newspaper subscriptions, not exceeding 10 dollars in each case, may be paid to a Postmaster for the purpose of being paid to the publisher of a newspaper at any other office. The Postmaster is, in such case, to give to the person paying the money, a receipt therefor, and to advise forthwith the Postmaster who is to pay said amount of such deposit. Upon presentation of this receipt, the amount is to be paid over. The Postmaster receiving the amount is to debit himself therewith in his account, and the Postmaster paying that amount is to credit himself therewith in his account of contingent expenses."

THE EXCISE BILL.—The bill to allow the people of the State to decide by vote whether they will or will not license the sale of ardent spirits was on Monday evening defeated in the Senate, by a vote of 15 to 12. By this vote the whole bill was stricken out, and Mr. Lott's substitute inserted (by 14 to 12) prescribing that no charge shall henceforth be made for licenses.

THE SWALLOW.—The attempt to raise the wreck of the Swallow has been made, and on Sunday evening the workmen had succeeded in raising it clear of the bottom when the cables by which she was made fast to the shore parted, and soon after, the De Witt Clinton, one of the boats alongside, was found to be badly strained, and sinking. Of course, it became necessary to let go of the wreck, when she went to the bottom two or three feet deeper than before. The work will therefore have to be re-commenced.

THE LATE FIRE AT HAMBURGH.—The generous relief afforded to this city after its late severe calamity, is one of the most pleasing and encouraging events of our day. The entire subscription for the benefit of the sufferers amounts to near four millions of dollars, of which Prussia contributed 800,000. The whole sum given would amount, if we mistake not, to about 20 per cent of the entire loss; which, judiciously distributed, would go far towards preventing any aggravated individual suffering. Such acts certainly do honor to the age.

TEMPERANCE LADIES IN PHILADELPHIA.—Some weeks since a petition with 16,000 names was presented to the Court of Sessions, against the grievances of intemperance. It is to be presented monthly, with some 10,000 additional names each month.

VICTORIA'S BRACELET.—The bracelet worn by her majesty on gala days and festivals, is of princely splendor and beauty, and immense value. It is of purest gold, set with four of the rarest diamonds, which from their former illustrious owners, are as interesting as rare. The largest and most valuable of these belonged to the amiable and lamented Princess Charlotte Augusta, of Wales, the second and third were once the property of the unfortunate Queen, Maria Antoinette of France, while the fourth at one time graced the forehead of Mary Stuart, Queen of Scotland, and afterwards glittered in the diadem of the brother of Bonaparte, king Joseph Napoleon. One may well question whether ever a woman's arm was encircled with a ring so potent of emblems so grave, and souvenirs so full of meaning.

THE LAND OF BLOOD.—We will venture the assertion, that a file of the Louisville Journal for the past twelve months, will average at least one record per day of duels, affrays, murders, or lynching, south and west of the Ohio river, very many of them resulting in the loss of one or more lives. Redress of wrongs by law is quite superseded by the law of retaliation; and unhappily for the well being of morals and good order in the land, the outrages are countenanced and engaged in very often by the influential, respectable, and leading members of society. The assertion we know is a sweeping one—would that facts made it less true, less alarming, and less disgraceful. [Cleveland Herald.

TALKING TELEGRAPH.—Professor Locke, of Cincinnati, has made an amusing modification of Professor Morse's Telegraph, by which it articulates sounds or the elements of words as well as records the letters. The letters used are those of Morse, and they are made audible by a pipe sounding in monotone during the time of a dot or line executed by the proper Morse Telegraph; but interrupted during the blank or space part of the letter. Indeed, the Telegraph exhibited will register the words on paper at the same time that the pipe is sounding them, the pipe being open and continuing to sound while the style is marking the revolving fillet. Thus it will both speak and write at once. Professor Locke considers this invention only as an amusing modification of Morse's Telegraph, by which the communications may be made currently intelligible to a large audience, provided they understand the alphabet, which becomes a kind of monotone music; the short lines or dots being represented by short notes, and the longer ones by tones more protracted.

VIRGINIA UNIVERSITY.—The Charlottesville Jeffersonian states that the magistrates, sitting in the capacity of a county court, and a jury, have been investigating the disturbances at the University, and will make a publication of the facts. We further learn from it that order had been restored, and that the lectures would be resumed yesterday. The board of visitors was in session Wednesday.

GALVANISM.—Place a sheet of copper on the ground, at one end of a row of potatoes, just planted, and a sheet of zinc at the other end; connect them by a copper wire, and let the moisture of the ground complete the galvanic circuit. What is the result? The life of the germs is greatly quickened, and you will have potatoes in that row two inches and a half in diameter, when the potatoes in other rows beyond its influence, are scarcely larger than marrow-fat peas.

Can any thing look more improbable, viewed apart from actual experiments? Two pieces of metal, connected by a copper wire, developing an influence that raises the power of vegetable life twenty fold!

PERIODICAL LITERATURE IN ENGLAND.—This is a book-making age, and the English as well as the Yankees, are a book reading people. Light literature, however, is the order of the day. It is said that on the last day of May, 1844, two hundred and twenty-seven monthly periodical works were sent out from Paternoster Row, the great literary mart of London. There are also thirty-eight periodical works published quarterly, making a total of two hundred and sixty-five.

SUMMARY.

The President of Texas has issued his proclamation convening Congress on Monday, the 16th day of June next, for the purpose of considering the joint Resolutions respecting the annexation of Texas to the United States.

Robert H. Morris has been appointed Deputy Postmaster in the city of New York, in place of John Lorimer Graham, removed.

The Mormon settlement in Iowa County, Iowa Territory, is in arms and divided into two parts, threatening each other with destruction. The difficulty was occasioned by their leader appropriating the money and property of the association and refusing to account for it.

An apothecary of Boston, a few years since, who was very peculiar in his notions, and remarkably attentive to business, had the misfortune to lose his wife. At the hour of burial, he placed the following label on his shop door:—

> "Gone from home to the funeral of his wife.
> Be back in half au hour."

The fare on the Boston and Providence Railroad has been reduced from $1 50 to $1 25.

A stalk of rye was plucked in head on the 16th inst. on the farm of Jonathan Bavington, Bristol, Penn.

A Mr. Tuttle, of Washington County, Indiania, has recovered $500 from H. W. Smith, the clerk of Washington County, for issuing contrary to law, a marriage license to his daughter.

A savage once said to a white man, who reproached him with wanting the conveniences of society: "Your whole life is spent in laboring for the things we have learned to do without."

A Mr. Johnson, from Washington county, Ala., arrived at St. Louis on the 16th, taking with him $56,000 and seventy negroes, his design being to settle in Missouri and raise hemp and tobacco.

An adjourned town meeting was held in Springfield last Monday. The town voted almost unanimously to instruct the selectmen not to approbate the sale of spiritous liquors.

In 1818 the message of the governor of New York was 13 days in reaching Rochester from Albany. The last message arrived at Rochester in 10 1-2 hours.

It is stated that several eminent capitalists of Boston are now building a large steam ship in that city to run between New York and Liverpool. This steamer will be eighteen hundred tons in size, and be finished on the 4th of July next, and take the first mail contract under the new Post Office Law.

The Missionary Herald for May acknowledges the receipt of two donations, of $100 each, to constitute James K. Polk and Geo. M. Dallas Honorary Members of the American Board of Foreign Missions—the former from a Revolutionary pensioner in New Lebanon, N. Y., and the latter from 'a friend' in Pine Orchard, Greene Co., N. Y.

The remains of the National Theatre, in Washington, and the ground, have been sold at auction for $11,600.

Mr. Astor's Wealth is now computed to be $25,000,000, and is increasing about 4 per cent. per annum, or, at the present rate, $1,000,000 as his nett yearly income. The city tax on his real estate alone last year, was $34,000. This includes nearly 1,600 building lots, the most of which are occupied with houses. He commenced business with small means, and has accumulated his immense fortune by economy, perseverance, shrewdness, good judgment, and close application to his business.

The salutary effects of strict temperance principles among seafaring men are clearly shown by some statements in the Sailor's Magazine. In 1842 no less than 380 vessels and 602 lives were lost at sea; in 1843 the number lost was 404 vessels and 642 lives. During the year 1844, as far as heard from, only 208 vessels and 205 lives have been lost; twenty vessels are yet missing. This exhibits a great decrease in the destruction of life and property at sea, in favor of 1844, which is attributed to the increased sobriety of seamen.

The trial of the Anti-Renters at Delhi took place last week. The grand jury, in consequence of there being some ten or twelve down-renters on it, found only one bill against Silas Tompkins, Ezekiel C. Kelly, Chas. Knapp, and Anson K. Burrill, who were taken in disguise at Roxbury. A separate trial was granted them, and on Friday a verdict of guilty found against Silas Tompkins, constable and collector of the town of Middletown, who was taken in Roxbury, by the posse.

Nearly all the old mail contractors have, it is rumored, been underbid; so that, next year, the carrying of the mails will be in fresh hands.

The Legislature of Rhode Island met at Newport on Tuesday the 6th of May. The question of liberating Gov. Dorr will come up for decision.

The St. Louis Republican of Saturday says: A rencounter took place in the street to-day, in which F. Kennett, Esq. inflicted personal chastisement on the Rev. Mr. Linn, the pastor of the Centenary Church, in this city.

A colored man visited Woodbury, N. J., a few days since, and attempted to lecture on slavery, when he was assailed in a ruffianly manner by a number of men and boys, and compelled to desist. One stone struck an inoffensive citizen from the country, and injured him considerably. [Newark Adv.

The Postmaster General has ordered the offices of the ten traveling agents of the Department and five deputies, to be abolished, and by this movement alone some $35,000 will be saved.

An immense piece of Tapestry has just been finished at the royal manufactory of Gobelins; which is intended to ornament the grand Ambassadors' Hall in Versailles. This beautiful work was begun in the year 1783; it has a border of garlands of flowers and arbesque figures. In four corners are four large boquets of roses, composed from water color paintings, executed by Madam Elizabeth, the virtuous sister of Louis XIV, and representing every variety of roses known in France at the close of the eighteenth century. This tapestry is soon to be hung in its destined place.

A monument to Christopher Columbus is to be erected at Turin, Italy. The King has given 50,000 livres for the purpose, and a commission has been appointed to raise further subscriptions.

There is no widow so utterly widowed in her circumstances as she who has a drunken husband; no orphan so perfectly destitute as he who has a drunken father.

TOUCHING INCIDENT.—An unexpectedly touching scene was presented to the Academy of Sciences very lately. The new invention of Van Peterson was to be exhibited—an artificial arm, by which, if the wearer has but a third of the shoulder remaining, he can pick up a pin, lift a glass of wine to his lips, hold a newspaper, etc. A committee had been appointed by the Academy to decide on its merits, and an old soldier from the Hospital of Invalids, was the subject of experiment. He had been for many years deprived of both arms at the shoulder, and when the substitutes were attached, he performed all that was set down by the inventor with the greatest ease—taking a glass of wine, etc. But half an hour of these restored functions had moved the heart of the old militaire. As the arms were detached, his breast heaved with emotion difficult to be suppressed—"harder o bear," he murmured, "than the first loss, when he did not know their value." The Academy sat a few moments in breathless silence, all present evidently affected.

"Well!" exclaimed M. Arago, at last, "has no one any thing to propose? Are we to let this brave old man go back mutilated, when we can relieve him? How much do they cost?"

"Five hundred francs, each."

"Ah! it would be costly to re-furnish all the maimed soldiers of the Hospital, but the others have not been reminded of their loss. We will subscribe the thousand francs for this one."

The proposition was received with acclamation, and the veteran walked away gesticulating with new arms. [Evening Mirror.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION.

The CENTRAL ASSOCIATION will hold its Tenth Anniversary with the Seventh-day Baptist Church at Adams, Jefferson county, N. Y., commencing on the 11th of June, being the fourth day of the week before the second Sabbath in the month. Introductory discourse by Rev. Eli S. Bailey; substitute, Rev. S. B. Crandall.

It is hoped there will be a full attendance from all the churches of the Association, as there is business of vital importance to be transacted, especially our missionary business, and the publication of a Tract on Baptism. I hope, also, that our brethren will come prepared to discuss and dispose of the practice of laying on of hands on newly baptized believers, as there is now a division among us on that subject. G. M. LANGWORTHY, Rec. Sec.

EASTERN ASSOCIATION.

THE EASTERN SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST ASSOCIATION will hold its Ninth Anniversary with the Church at Waterford, Ct., on the fourth day of the week before the fourth Sabbath, in May, (21st day of the month,) at 11 o'clock A. M. It is hoped that the churches associated will take measures to have a full representation; also that the several committees will be prepared to report upon the subjects referred to them.

In consequence of the variety of forms in which the churches are in the habit of making their statistical returns to the Association—some churches naming some things which others omit and vice versa—the revisers of the Minutes last year, took the liberty to suggest a form of statistics, expressing the desire that the returns might be so made at the next Anniversary. As it would much facilitate the labors of the clerks, and add much to the interest of statistics, they would again beg to call attention to the subject.

ANNIVERSARIES OF OUR SOCIETIES.

THE SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION will hold its Third Anniversary in Plainfield, N. J., on the ourth day of the week before the third Sabbath in May next, being the 14th day of the month, at 11 o'clock A. M. It is desirable that all missionary reports should be made to the Secretary previous to that time.

W. B. GILLETT, Rec. Sec., New Market, N. J.

THE AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY will hold its Second Anniversary in Plainfield, N. J., on the fifth day of the week before the third Sabbath in May, being the 15th day of the month, at 10 o'clock A. M. Auxiliary Societies or Churches that have taken action to aid the Society, and Agents who have not already reported, are requested to make their reports with the least possible delay, that the Board of Directors may be able to present a full statement of their labors since the last Anniversary.

F. W. STILLMAN, Rec. Sec., New York.

SABBATH TRACTS—NOTICE.

The Board of Directors of the American Sabbath Tract Society would state, for the information of those who have ordered or are expecting Tracts, that in consequence of the late arrangement with the New York Sabbath Tract Society, by which this Society is hereafter to publish its series of Sabbath publications, and also from the few returns that have been made to the Treasury since the last anniversary, they have not been able as yet to reprint several of the series, the editions of which are exhausted, They hope, however, to have a good assortment ready at the Anniversary in May.

NOTICE.

The Missionaries who have been laboring under appointments from the Board of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association, are requested to make a full report of their labors since the last meeting of Conference, that it may be incorporated into the Annual Report of the Society. Please to send through the post-office, so that your letters may reach the Cor. Sec. about the first of May.

All local societies, and churches of Seventh-day Baptists, who have engaged in missionary labors during the past year, are requested to forward us an account of their labors through the same medium, and at or about the same time.

Brethren having important facts to csmmunicate respecting opening fields for missionary labor will do well to forward the same to the address of SAMUEL DAVISON,
Cor. Sec. S. D. B. M. Ass'n.

TRACTS RELATING TO THE SABBATH.

BETTER MOMENTS.

BY N. P. WILLIS.

My mother's voice! how often creeps
Its cadence on my lonely hours!
Like healing sent on wings of sleep,
Or dew to the unconscious flower.

I can forget her melting prayer
While leaping pulses madly fly,
But in the still, unbroken air,
Her gentle tone comes stealing by—
And years, and sin, and manhood flee,
And leave me at my mother's knee.

The book of nature, and the print
Of beauty on the whispering sea
Give aye to me some lineament
Of what I have been taught to be.
My heart is harder, and perhaps
My manliness hath drank up tears;
And there's a mildew in the lapse
Of a few miserable years—
But nature's book is even yet
With all my mother's lessons writ.

I have been out at eventide
Beneath a moonlight sky of spring,
When earth was garnish'd like a bird,
And night had on her silver wing—
When bursting leaves, and diamond grass,
And waters leaping to the light,
And all that makes the pulses pass
With wilder fleetness, throng'd the night
When all was beauty—then have I
With friends on whom my love is flung
Like myrrh on wings of Araby,
Gaz'd up where evening's lamp is hung,
And when the beautiful spirit there
Flung over me its golden chain,
My mother's voice came on the air
Like the light dropping of the rain—
And resting on some silver star
The spirit of a bended knee,
I've pour'd out low and fervent prayer
That our eternity might be
To rise in heaven, like stars at night,
And tread a living path of light.

A Chapter on the Heathen.

Sandwich Islands.—Thirty years ago the people of these Islands were savages, cannibals. Now, tuition on the piano is advertised in the newspaper published on the Islands. See what Christianity has wrought!

Women, in Mahometan countries, perform all the labor, while the men spend the day in idleness; drinking coffee and smoking.

Women, in China, are the slaves and concubines of their masters. Their treatment drives thousands of them yearly to commit suicide. How full is earth of wrong and outrage!

20,000,000 of the human family die yearly without the knowledge of Christ.

A Devoted Missionary once asked in view of approaching difficulty and embarrassment, "Cannot the same hand make cold and hunger and nakedness and peril, to be a train of ministering angels, conducting me to glory?"

Christianity is the only religion which has an essential universality, therefore the only religion of mankind. The religions of men are local, suited only to a nation and a point of progress. There has been a religion of Egypt—of Rome—of America, and even of Judea. It has for its origin in man—sin; which has corrupted the race. Meeting the common necessity, it is at once and everywhere received as Divine.

Heathen Authors.—We educate our children in one religion, and then expect them to practice another. Cram them with books of heathen philosophy, and then bid them go and be good Christians. We teach them to admire the heroes and gods of the old poets, when there is hardly a hero and certainly not a god who would not be tried in our country and executed on our gibbits.

Newspapers.—In Asia, there is one newspaper for every fourteen million inhabitants; in the United States, one for every ten thousand.

One spirit.—One living intelligent spirit is of higher reckoning and mightier import than a dead universe.—Dr. Chalmers.

Gods of Hindostan.—There are said to be 330 million gods in Hindostan. Every conception finds a fearful embodiment in some deity.

Dr. Madden, the celebrated traveller, says, "That the blessings of education and good government are only wanting to make the natives of Africa, intellectually and morally, equal to the people of any nation, on the surface of the globe!"

Mosheim pertinently remarks: "After Christianity became incorporated with the government, it is difficult to determine whether Heathenism was most Christianized, or Christianity most heathenized."

Missions and their Support.—The Episcopalians, according to the "Spirit of Missions" numbers 60,000 members! the amount expended by them for foreign and domestic missions is $80,000 per annum. This is one dollar and a quarter a year or 2 1-2 cents per week for each communicant.

The Presbyterian, (old school,) church contains 17,000 members, and contributes $80,000 to Missionary purposes. Fifty cents a year, or one cent a week for each communicant.

We have no statistics of the new school.

The Methodist Episcopal Church numbers upwards of one million communicants, and contributes $150,000 per annum for missions; or 13 cents a year, or a farthing a week for each communicant.

The general average a week for each communicant of the American Churches is only a half cent for foreign and domestic missions. The average contribution of each American citizen to missions is the one hundredth part of a farthing a year, or the fifty two hundredth part of a farthing a week.

Awful reflection.—It is an awful thing to be lost amid the darkness of Heathenism! It is far more fearful to be lost amid Sacraments, Sabbaths, Sanctuaries and Revivals.

LIGHT OF THE MOON.

As the Moon's axis is nearly perpendicular to the plane of the ecliptic, she can scarcely have any change of seasons. But what is still more remarkable, one half of the moon has no darkness at all, while the other half has two weeks of darkness, and two of light alternately—the inhabitants, if any, of the latter half bask constantly in the earth-shine without seeing the sun, whilst those of the former never see the earth at all. For, as just stated, the earth reflects the light of the sun to the moon, in the same manner as the moon does to the earth;—therefore at the time of conjunction or new moon, her further side must be enlightened by the sun, and the nearer half by the earth,—and at the time of opposition or full moon, one half of her will be enlightened by the sun, but the other half will be in total darkness. To the Lunarians the Earth seems the largest orb in the universe—for it appears to them more than three times the size of the sun, and thirteen times greater than the moon does to us—exhibiting similar phases to herself, but in reverse order; for when the moon is new, they will see the earth full.

The face of the moon appears to us permanent, but to them the earth presents very different appearances—the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans, in the course of each twenty-four hours, will successively rivet their attention; and the velocity of motion must excite both surprise and conjecture. Though, as aforesaid, certain of those gentlemen only behold the earth for half a month at a time, those near the border see it only occasionally, and those on the side opposite the earth never see it at all.

The moon being but the fiftieth part of the bulk of our globe, and within 238,000 miles of us, may be brought by a proper telescope which magnifies 1,000 times, to appear as she would to the naked eye were she only 250 miles off.

The Jews.—The civil and political disabilities under which this persecuted people have hitherto existed appear to have at length excited the attention of the continental nations of Europe. The following paragraphs from English papers evince a strong desire to meliorate their condition, and are in accordance with the spirit and temper of the age:

A letter from Dresden, of October 14, says:—"In the second sitting of the Congress of Orientalists, now held in this city, which reckons three rabbis among its members, Professor Weber, of Bremen, passed some jocose remarks against the Jews. Immediately all the Christian members of the society, forty-two in number, rose and interrupted him, and M. Tiersch observed to M. Weber how improper it was to offend persons on account of their religious belief, particularly in a society altogether scientific. M. Weber wished to explain, but the president refused to allow him to speak, as the matter, he said, was terminated by M. Tiersch's very proper remarks. The other Christian members loudly applauded this decision, and M. Weber left the sitting. A few minutes after M. Weber sent a letter to the president, declaring that he had not intended to offer any offence to the Jews in what he had said. He has since left Dresden."

A letter from Hamburg, of November 22, says:—"The Senate and College of the Ancients have just declared in favor of emancipating the Jews. What principally decided two highest bodies in the state to consent to this act of justice is the immense sacrifices which the Jews of Hamburg have made to succor the numerous victims of the fire of 1842, and the spirit of patriotism and charity with which that body has been animated for a long series of years. The emancipation of the Jews will be, it is said, complete, except that they cannot form part of the Senate, which indeed would be impossible, for all the solemn and public acts of the Senate are intimately combined with religious ceremonies, in which no one could take part without belonging to the predominant religion, namely, the Confession of Augsburg; so that even Christians of other confessions are in fact excluded from our Senate."

A letter from Brunswick, November 29, says:—"Our reigning Duke, who has more than once declared in favor of the emancipation of the Jews, and has shown them so many marks of favor, has just presented to the States a bill, having for its object, 1. To abolish the present law, ordering all Jews to take the oath in Courts of Justice more judaico only and, 2. To permit them to swear in the same way as Christians, by raising the right hand and invoking Almighty God.

A letter from Berlin, December 3, says:—"It is confidently stated that the Government is preparing a bill to grant the Jews some of the civil rights which they are at present deprived of. Persons generally well-informed even assert that it is intended to confer them all civil rights, without exception, so that they should be excluded only from the exercise of political rights, which among us consist in being able to elect deputies to the States, and to be elected to such functions."

The two chambers of the Hungarian Diet, in their last session, passed a law for granting to the Jews the greater part of the rights enjoyed by the people who are not noble, but it did not receive the royal assent. These chambers have now voted another bill, the objects of which are, first, to confer on the Jews the right of living in all the towns of the kingdoms indiscriminately, and there carry on their trades and professions, even some of the learned professions; secondly, to abolish the special capitation tax imposed upon them. The Jews have sent a deputation to the Emperor of Austria, as King of Hungary, to supplicate his Majesty to grant his sanction to the measure. It is composed of the grand rabbi and six distinguished merchants of Presburg, and has been received by the Minister of the Interior, Count Kollowrath, who has promised to solicit the Emperor to grant it a private audience.

We mentioned recently, in a summary of foreign news, that Sir Robert Peel had declared the intention of the British Government to bring forward a measure for the relief of the Jews from the civil disabilities under which they labor in the United Kingdom.

FAREWELL.

When eyes are beaming
What never tongue might tell,
When tears are streaming
From their crystal cell;
When hands are linked that dread to part;
And heart is prest by throbbing heart,
Oh bitter, bitter is the smart
Of them that bid farewell—

When hope is chidden
That fain of bliss would tell,
And come forbidden
In the breast to dwell;
When fetter'd by a viewless chain
We turn and gaze and turn again,
Oh! death were mercy to the pain
Of them that bid farewell.

Heber.

A King Reproved.—A king was riding along in disguise, and seeing a soldier at a public door, stopped and asked the soldier to drink with him, and while they were drinking the king swore. The soldier said,

"I am very sorry to hear young gentlemen swear."

His majesty took no notice, but swore again. The soldier said,

"I'll pay part of the pot, if you please, and go, for I so hate swearing, that if you were the king himself I should tell you of it."

"Should you, indeed?" said the king.

"I should," said the soldier.

A while after, the king having invited some lords to dine with him, the soldier was sent for, and while they were at dinner he was ordered into the room to wait awhile. Presently the king uttered an oath; the soldier immediately (but modestly) said,

"Should not my lord and king fear an oath?"

The king, looking first at the soldier, rose and said,

"There, my lords, is an honest man—he can respectfully remind me of the great sin of swearing, but you can sit and let me stain my soul by swearing, and not so much as tell me of it."

Luther's Childhood.—The habits and manners of that time were generally harsh and rude, and so was his childhood. Luther relates that his mother once scourged him till the blood came, on account of one miserable nut; that his father had punished him so severely that it was with great difficulty that he could get over the child's terror and alienation; at school he was flogged fifteen times in one forenoon! He had to earn his bread by singing hymns before the doors of houses, and New Years' carols in the villages. Strange that people should continually exalt and envy the happiness of childhood, in which the only certain foretaste of coming years is the feeling of the stern necessities of life; in which existence is dependant on foreign help, and the will of another disposes of every day and hour with iron sway! In Luther's case this period of life was full of terrors.—Ranke's Reformation.

Sagacity of a Dog.—The keeper of the gate at the intersection of the Worcester Railroad and Tremont street, was attracted to the door of his room, where he was waiting for the evening train on Friday, by the scratching and howling of a strange dog, whose manner plainly indicated a desire to lead the man away from his station, along the road; but as the cars were momentarily expected, the keeper was unable to follow him. In a few moments, however, two men were discovered coming from the direction to which the dog seemed desirous of conducting him, and they suddenly stopped and picked up a man, who proved to be the owner of the superior animal, in a helpless state of intoxication, and lying directly across the track, over which the train passed, at full speed, five minutes afterwards. It was then ascertained that the man had fallen overboard a short time previous, in his drunken fit, and been rescued by the dog. Officer Pierce, Jr., who was near by, took the man into custody for being drunk, and had much difficulty in getting him to the watch house because of the opposition of the dog; and even after arriving there, when the man had been locked up in the cell, and the faithful little quadruped accommodated with more respectable quarters, he showed fight to keep the officers away from the room. The man was taken before the Police Court the next morning, and fined—as will be seen by the Police Report. The dog is of the species commonly known as the Bull Mastiff, and is only seven months old.—Bee.

A craniologist, strolling through a church yard, took up one of the skulls, and after examining it for some time, exclaimed, 'Ah, perhaps this was the skull of a philosopher.' 'Perhaps so,' said the grave-digger, 'for I perceive that it is somewhat cracked.'

A schoolmaster asked poor Tam the idiot, how long a man could live without brains. Tam, laying hold of the dominie's button, and gazing a few moments in his face, replied, "How lang hae ye lived, dominie?"

Danger of Prussic Acid.—A singular case of the death of a medical practitioner (Mr. Daniel S. Holmes,) occurred at Stratton, near Cirencester, last week. From the evidence adduced at the inquest it would appear that he suffered occasionally from pain in his head, and at such times was in the habit of touching his tongue with the stopper of a bottle of prussic acid, which gave him relief. About six months ago deceased had been heard jocularly to remark upon the strength of the dose he had taken, as it made him giddy. Lately he had been in fair health and excellent spirits. On Wednesday in last week he left his home to attend a ball at some distance, and returned in the afternoon of the following day, apparently much delighted with the festivities he had shared, though he complained much of fatigue, having ridden a long distance. His housekeeper advised him to take tea and get to bed. He said he would, and then went into the surgery. His housekeeper almost immediately returned to the room, and, as she entered the door, heard the noise of a bottle falling. She looked towards deceased, and saw him stagger and fall to the ground. Medical assistance was procured, but he died shortly afterwards. The bottle was picked up, and was found to be labelled "Hydrocianic acid of Scheele's strength—minor dose, one drop." As it was proved that the deceased died from the effects of prussic acid; as all accounts concurred in representing him to have been at the time in question of sound mind and in good spirits; and as he was known to have occasionally had recourse to the prussic acid to relieve headache; they entertained no doubt that he had inadvertently put the stopper of the bottle, while too much of the fatal acid clung to it, to his tongue, and that instant death was the result. The verdict was, "Death from accidentally taking too large a dose of prussic acid."

What! a Girl read.—That our readers may have some idea of the degrading condition of children, and especially women and girls, in heathen lands, we take the following anecdote, from a letter received at the rooms of the American Sunday-school Union, from Mrs. Shuck, the wife of an American Missionary in China. After acknowledging the arrival of some books and infant school cards, which were sent to her by the society, and begging for another supply she says:

A few days ago as I was standing on the water's edge, waiting to take an excursion in a boat then coming for me, a crowd of Chinese gathered around me, asking a variety of questions. After satisfying their inquiries, I turned to a little girl who seemed more active and sprightly than her companions, and asked if she would not like to come and live with me, that she might be taught to read. She replied with great astonishment—'Why I am a girl; a girl read?' said she. I tried in vain to convince her, and those standing around, that it was proper for females, as well as males, to receive instruction. I have seen the little girl several times since, and her salutation has been every time, 'Read, ha! a girl read!' I humbly trust, however, that the time is not far distant when this state of things shall change; when China's degraded daughters shall be raised from the state of ignorance in which they now dwell, and shall enjoy the privileges possessed by the females of Europe and America.—Y. P. Gazette.

Error.—It hath been well observed that error seldom walks abroad in her own raiment; she always borrows some of truth, to make her more acceptable to the world. It hath always been the subtlety of grand deceivers, to graft their greatest errors on some material truths, to make them pass more undiscernable to all such who look more at the root on which they stand, than on the fruits which they bring forth.—Bishop Stillingfleet.

Importance of an Emphasis.—A minister reading a sentence of Scripture, accidentally put an emphasis on a wrong word, which set his hearers laughing. It was read thus: "And he said, saddle me the ass, and they saddled HIM!"

This reminds us of a fat friend of ours, who at dinner helped every one so abundantly that there was very little left, whereupon a wag quietly says to him—"You had better now sit down and EAT YOURSELF!"

St. Patrick.—A gentleman traveling in Ireland was desirous of seeing some of the saintly relics belonging to a convent, and on being shown by a priest two apparently very old skulls, one that of a child, the other seemingly that of a grown person, asked to whom they belonged, when the priest replied, "The larger one was that of St. Patrick—the smaller one that of the same saint when a boy."

A gentleman traveling in a stage coach, attempted to divert the company by ridiculing the Scriptures: "As to the prophecies," said he, "in particular, they are all written after the events took place." A minister in the coach, who had hitherto been silent, replied, "Sir, I beg leave to mention one particular prophecy as an exception, 2 Pet. iii. 2. 'Knowing this first, that there shall come in the latter day, Scoffers.' Now, sir, whether the event be not long after the prediction, I leave the company to judge." The mouth of the scorner was stopped.

A person asked Zeno, the philosopher, if wise men ever fell in love. His answer was, "if wise men do not fall in love, beautiful women must be very unfortunate."

"My father was one of the framers of the constitution," said a youth of patrician blood the other day to another of more plebeian origin.

"Who cares for that?" quoth the latter; "my father was one of the framers of the new meeting-house."

DR. JOHNSON.

During his last illness, his dread of death was for a time very great, but at length, through a humble trust in the Redeemer, his fears subsided, and he said, "The bitterness of death is past." After he had found peace in believing, he sent for Sir Joshua Reynolds, to beg as a dying friend, three favors of him:—First, that he would never paint on the Sabbath; second, that he would relinquish to him thirty pounds, which would enable him to leave that sum to a distressed family; third, that he would often read the Scriptures, and always on the Lord's day. With all of which, it is said, Sir Joshua complied.

In his last hours, Johnson said to his physician,—"Dr. Brocklesby, you are a worthy man, and my friend; but I am afraid you are no Christian. What can I do better for you than offer up in your presence a prayer to the Great God, that you may become a Christian in every sense of the word?" He fell on his knees and prayed; but rising up he took the Doctor's hand and said, "Doctor, you do not say, Amen!" The Doctor then said "Amen." Johnson continued, "My dear Doctor, believe a dying man; there is no salvation but in the sacrifice of the Lamb of God."

As Hume, in his last hours, had made a bold declaration of his infidel opinions, Johnson was desired, in like circumstances, to make a confession of his faith. Seizing his pen, and enquiring what was the usual form of commencing a will, he wrote,—"I offer my soul to the great and merciful God; I offer it full of pollution, but in full assurance that it will be cleansed in the blood of the Redeemer." Having written for some minutes, he expressed something of his former dread of death. Sir John Hawkins, who was present, replied, "If you, Doctor, have these fears, what is to become of me and others?" "O, sir," said he, "I have written piously it is true, but I have lived too much like other men." He now claimed no merit: he had in common with all others, violated Heaven's righteous law and could find no peace, no hope, but humble penitence and cordial trust in the atoning Saviour.

A Hint to Wives.—When a woman seeks to guide her husband, it should not be like one who breaks a horse to his own purpose, using bit and spur, now checking and now goading his career—but like the mariner who steers the ship, directs it by a single touch, while none can see the power that rules its motion. [Mrs. S. C. Hall.

Constraining them to be Good.—An ingenious mode has lately been hit upon of constraining our great men to be good men. We think we saw an account some time since, that certain pious persons had clubbed together to make Henry Clay a life member of some association of Christian Benevolence. By the papers, we perceive that this same kind of gentle coercion has been applied to Daniel Webster, by Mr. Williams of Baltimore, who has caused that statesman to be a member of the Baltimore Sabbath Association.

Why might not the same device be used in carrying forward the Temperance reform? Let the good people in various sections club together, and constitute all our "great men," life members of the Temperance societies? Some might kick a little at the idea of the pledge, but still a decent regard for the honor conferred on them might reconcile them to their novel relations.

☞ The whole number of members of the M. E. Church, within the bounds of the Philadelphia Conference is, according to the late minutes, 41,245 whites, and 10,742 colored, make an aggregate of 51,987. The Conference has received this year from the Book Concern at New York, $800, being a little more than one and a half cents per member.

A poor editor falling into the hands of the Philistines, breaks forth in the following moving appeal:

"Sheriff! spare that press!
Touch not a single type—
Don't put me in distress,
To stick to me through life!
'Tis all in all to me,
If lost, what shall I do?
Then why not let it be,
O Sheriff—boo!—hoo!—hoo!"

"I'll pay you for this!" cried a man to a roguish little boy who had stuck up a ludicrous handbill on his door.

"O no, sir, I don't charge nothing," said the lad very innocently.

PROSPECTUS

OF THE

LITERARY EMPORIUM.

A COMPENDIUM OF

Religious, Literary, and Philosophical Knowledge.

"MULTUM IN PARVO."

We shall be modest in our pretensions, while we give as true a description of our intended course as we can, in plain English. In the first place, light literature will find no place in its pages, i. e. love tales, literary trash, &c. In the second place, sectarianism will not be admitted into the Emporium; that is to say, it will favor no particular denomination of Christians; but we do not mean by this that it will not advocate the religion of the Bible. It is intended that it shall do this, and in the strongest terms. It will urge the necessity not only of a change of heart, but of a virtuous and holy life, in order to be truly happy in this world, and to be prepared for that which is to come. It is intended that its religious matter shall be of such a nature as will be calculated to cultivate, to inspire and please a good and correct taste—that which will inform, expand, and elevate the mind, and also excite in the soul love to God, holiness, virtue, and humanity. In regard to its literary character, it is designed to be of such a nature as to water the thirsty soul that is studiously endeavoring to acquire a knowledge of man in his past and present condition; also, some information in relation to the different sciences and arts, and the variety of the works of nature, with such miscellaneous reading as will invigorate the faculties of the mind, give scope to the imagination, while it shall address itself to the good sense of all who desire to be truly elevated by reading.

Each Number contains 32 pages of handsome paper and type; it also contains splendid plates; is published monthly, at $1 a year, if paid in advance. One third allowed to persons who procure subscribers for the work. Good agents wanted to circulate the Emporium. All letters, orders, &c., should be addressed to

NARRATIVE OF A SLAVE CAPTURE.

Selected for the Recorder, from Harris' "Highlands of Ethiopia."

The following narrative, by a native of Suppa, in Enávea, detailing the history of his capture and subsequent vicissitudes, may be taken as a fair specimen of the usual circumstances attending the capture and transfer of the kidnapped victim from one merciless dealer in human flesh and souls to another, in his progress through the interior to either the border kingdoms, or to the eastern or western coast.

"When twenty years of age, being engaged in tending the flocks of Betta, my father, an armed band of the Ooma Galla, with whom my tribe had long been in enmity, swept suddenly down, and took myself with six other youths prisoners, killing four more who resisted. Having been kept bound hand and foot five days, I was sold to the Toome Galla, one of the nearest tribes, for one dollar twenty-five cents. The bargain was concluded in the Toome market-place, which is called Sandaffo, where, in consequence of the dearness of salt, two male slaves are commonly sold for one dollar. After nightfall the Mahomedan rover came and took me away.

"Having been kept bound in his house another week, I was taken two days' journey with a large caravan, and sold to the Nono Galla for a few ells of blue calico. My companions in travel were assorted according to their age and size, and walked in double file, the stout and able bodied only, whereof I was one, having their hands tied behind them. In Meegra, the market-place of the Nono, I was, after six weeks confinement, sold by public auction to the Agumcho Galla, for forty pieces of salt, value one dollar sixty-seven cents.

"Hence I was taken to the market place which is beyond Segaula, on the plain of the Háwash, and sold for seventy pieces of salt, or near three dollars; and immediately afterwards to Rogué, the great slave mart in the Yerrur district, where I was sold for four dollars eighty-four cents. From Rogué I was driven to Alio Amba, in Shoa, where a Mahomedan subject of Sahela Selassie, the king of Shoa, purchased me in the market of Abdool Russool for twelve dollars; but after three months, my master falling into disgrace, the whole of his property was confiscated, and I became the slave of the King, which I still am, although permitted to reside with my family, and only called upon to plough, reap, and carry wood. Exclusive of halts, the journey from my native village occupied fifteen days. I was tolerably well fed, and not maltreated. All the merchants through whose hands I passed were Mahomedans; and until within a few stages of Alio Amba I was invariably bound at night, and thus found no opportunity to escape.

"Prior to my own enslavement, I had been extensively engaged as a kidnapper, and in this capacity I had made a party in three great slave hunts into the country of the Doko negroes beyond Caffa, in the course of which four thousand individuals of both sexes were secured."

From this simple narrative it is pretty evident that the great stimulus to the slave capture, and its subsequent trade, is avarice and the want of other commerce. Here in a journey of fifteen days from the interior, a profit is made of more than ten hundred per cent. A few ells of blue calico are made to bring twelve dollars! And by the time the slave arrives at Cuba he will bring five hundred dollars!

To my mind, this fact suggests the true way to abolish the slave trade. Not by an armed squadron of observation placed upon the coast, but by strong and peaceable commercial caravan companies being sent into the interior with an abundant supply of all the commodities in demand among those tribes and states; where they shall be bartered on fair and easy terms, for the products of the country. The interior of Africa is rich in all the mineral and vegetable productions of tropical climes; and if once a market were opened for them, the natives would soon produce them in quantities and on terms amply to repay the enterprise. I wish to see it gone into on a great national scale; and it would not only break up the slave-trade, but open up a way to evangelize those wretched countries.

Many a slave is now sold in Africa for a pair of Birmingham scissors, a few ells of blue calico, and many other equally cheap and portable manufactures of enlightened nations; but let these things be carried to them, and offered for the mineral and vegetable productions of those tropical climes, and in a short time they will find it a thousand times easier to obtain them by honest industry than by the present system of rapine and bloody feuds.

So long as a slave can be bought in the interior of Africa for a looking-glass, a string of beads, or a pair of scissors, and sold in the ports of Cuba for five hundred dollars, all the powers of Europe and America cannot prevent the trade; there are men reckless enough to brave every danger, to gratify a raging cupidity, when the profit to be made is two thousand per cent. If the inhabitants of the temperate zones must have tropical productions, why transport men from one side of the Atlantic to the other, at such a waste of life and treasure? Why not induce those natives to raise them and export them from their own fertile lands? The merchants who first prosecute this enterprise on a sufficiently large and liberal scale to insure success, will reap a lucrative harvest, and confer a lasting benefit to the cause of humanity.

CHRISTIAN MISSIONS—THE MINISTRY—NO. 2.

All are ready to admit that it is the duty of the church to engage in missionary labors. That some regular and systematic organization is necessary, we have learned from observation. That people have accomplished most, though with small means, where union and order have marked all their doings. The want of a perfect agreement in our organizations, has undoubtedly militated much against us in our missionary operations. Yet it would be impossible to adopt a Constitution that would in every particular exactly suit the views of all. The best Constitution ever adopted by any people, would admit of alteration and improvement. In order to act unitedly in any great work that has the good of souls in view, it is needful that much forbearance should be exercised in reference to many minor points, since all cannot in their views perfectly harmonize without it. A Constitution has been adopted, and a Missionary Association formed among us; and, so far as I have been able to learn, it has given general satisfaction. All that is necessary, then, in reference to carrying out its design, is action on the part of its friends, and this action is confidently expected. The wants of many of our small and destitute churches are calling loudly upon us, and can we withhold? Can we listen to those Macedonian cries and not sympathize with such as are destitute of the Word of Life?

For some reason, many of our churches are destitute of Pastors. This ought not to be. Let a missionary spirit be kindled in every heart, and such churches will at once see and feel the necessity of having settled Pastors, to break to them the bread of life. Churches may at times increase in numbers without Pastors, but they will seldom prosper permanently unless some one discharges for them the duties of a Pastor. And why will you make it necessary to rob other churches to do your service? The gifts are in the church; proper encouragement will call them out; and how can we better encourage them, than to present to them in its proper light the wide field spread out for usefulness, and the means at hand to sustain them in their work? The means we possess God has given to us, and there is but one thing in the way of our giving to our ministers an ample support, which is the want of a disposition to use the means that we have as we should. We have no trouble about paying our state and county taxes, and supporting the mechanic and the school teacher. With the same ease can a part of our substance go to support the Gospel if the heart is but right in the sight of God. It is not necessary that the pastor or the missionary should be supported in affluence, extravagance, or luxury; but he should have for his service a reasonable compensation, such as you would expect were you to engage in any business for which you were qualified. And that should be paid too, not promised only. Let your minister know that he has a faithful and honest people to deal with, who are laboring with him to build up the church of God. Those churches that are thus supplied, should not be satisfied to do nothing more while others are destitute. But they should wish to do something beyond the limits of the vicinity in which they live. If they can do nothing more, they can send out their pastor two or three months in a year, furnishing him with his traveling expenses and ensuring his support at home during his absence. Much labor might thus be performed to the advantage of the cause of God.

But we fondly hope that the present Missionary Association will be sustained. Twenty-five dollars constitutes a person a life member; and when the constitution was adopted, it was expected that the churches would make their ministers and other brethren life members. But to our disappointment only one church has as yet thus responded. The church in Shiloh, N. J., has five life members, and three of them were made so by the church. The payment of five dollars makes an annual member; five dollars secures a representative from a church or society, and such may become auxiliary. Who are now ready to act? Here is the field open before us; here are the men who are saying, "Send us;" and past success tells us that our efforts will not be in vain in the Lord.

B

Law of Kindness.—We are but passengers of a day, whether it is in a stage-coach or the immense machine of the universe. In God's name, then, why should we not make the way as pleasant to each other as possible? Short as our journey is, it is long enough to be tedious to him who sulks in his corner, sits uneasy himself, and elbows his neighbor to make him uneasy also.

THE REFORMER.

BY R. H. BACON.

The true Reformer, like the pioneer;
  Who hews the western forest, must throw by
  All thoughts of ease or resting till he die:
Nor in his noble breast admit the fear
Of ill; although, through life, he may not hear
  The voice of friend, nor see one loving eye
  To cheer him on his way of duty high,
And warn him when his foes are lurking near!
  Yet fields of beauty, by his dauntless hand,
Shall rise in loveliness, where now the gloom
  Of error doth the light of truth withstand;
The lonely wilderness he fells shall bloom
  Throughout all after time; and those who
  Scowl with mad hate, before his tomb shall bow.

From the Crescent and the Cross.

THE JEWS OF PALESTINE.

The Jews are very fond of news, and very partial to foreigners, particularly to the English. I introduced myself to a venerable and noble looking Hebrew in the street one day, by asking my way to the Pool of Hezekiah, whither he accompanied me, and afterward invited me to his house. We entered by a very humble doorway from the silent street, and passing through a dark gallery of some length, entered a large apartment which equaled in oriental luxury any thing that I had yet seen. The ceiling was slightly arched, and crusted with stalactites of purple and gold that appeared to have oozed out from some rich treasury above. The walls were of paneled cedar, or some such dark and fragrant wood, exquisitely carved; and curtains of Damascus silk were gathered into thick folds between pilasters of cedar, polished, yet rugged with rich carving.

The windows were without glass, but the foliage of some orange trees softened the sunshine into a delicious gloom, lending all the effect of painted glass, with the addition of a quiver which added coolness to its shade. The furniture was simple, as is customary in the East, and consisted only of divans, or wide silken cushions, ranged round the walls, but little elevated above the floor. This was of marble mosaic, wrought into floral emblems, such as bells, pomegranates, &c., with a white marble basin of clear water in the midst. A rich tufted carpet, in which the foot sank as in a meadow, was spread in each corner of the upper end; and leaving our slippers on the marble floor we took our seat on the divan.

When seated, my host laid his hand upon his breast and repeated his welcome. He then clapped his hands, and pipes—an unusual luxury among the Jews—were brought by two little black slaves, with white tunics and scarlet caps. They retired, and we smoked the pipe of repose in such luxury and calm as my troubled pilgrimage had seldom known till then. I should have supposed myself in some Pasha's seraglio, but for the gabardine and dark turban of my host, and that firm look of lofty determination that is to be seen on every Hebrew brow, undimmed by the disasters and degradations of two thousand years.

My entertainer spoke with respect of Bishop Alexander, and of the other missionaries; he said he gave them credit for the best motives, but it was all in vain to hope to proselyte his people. "The Romans," he added with enthusiasm, "could not condemn Manlius in sight of the Capitol, and the Hill of Zion is not a likely spot for a Jew to forsake the faith of his forefathers." "The Christians do not honor Zion less," I observed, "because they also point to Calvary. They go with you hand in hand as far as regards this world's sacred history, and far beyond you then, into a heaven which you had hoped for from the days of Abraham, and which you will not receive, because different from that which you expected." The dark eye of the Hebrew literally glowed beneath his gray and shaggy eyebrows, as he raised his arm in vehement gesticulation that contrasted strangely with the repose of the rest of his draperied figure. "Englishman," he exclaimed, in a voice that seemed to gurgle from his heart, "you know not what you say." * * *

I asked whether he considered that there was a perceptible increase in the number of his people at present in Jerusalem. He replied, "that the time was not yet arrived." "Many have their eyes now fixed upon Zion," he continued, "and a very slight matter that we know not of might direct multitudes to this spot; at present we are not more than 4,000 in Jerusalem; but if our Rabbis were to speak, ten times that number would arrive here before the next passover.

"There is barely means of subsistence at present for the numbers within the city, and our poverty and Turkish oppression prevent the country round from being brought into cultivation." As he spoke of poverty, I glanced round the splendid apartment, and he added, "It is the mass of our brethren who are poor, even to extremity, and supported entirely by alms from us, and the Jews of Europe; any of us who are possessed of any wealth take some pride, perhaps, in the exhibition of it in our houses; which ought not to be. But I must ask you to excuse my taking leave of you unless you would wish to accompany me to our synagogue, whither I am now obliged to go." We passed out through the dark passage and the mean gate, into the dirty street, and afterward, when I sought that house again, I could not even identify it among the squalid dwellings with which it was surrounded. Nor did I ever see my host after I parted from him at the door of the synagogue.

How to be Happy.—Said a venerable farmer, eighty years of age, to a relative who lately visited him, "I have lived on this farm more than a half a century. I have no desire to change my residence as long as I live on earth. I have no wish to be any richer than I now am. I have worshiped the God of my fathers with the same people for more than forty years. During that period I have rarely ever been absent from the sanctuary on the Sabbath, and never have lost but one communion season. I have never been confined to my bed one single day. The blessings of God have been richly spread around me, and I made up my mind long ago, that if I wished to be any happier, I must have more religion.

ACCOUNT OF LUTHER'S DEATH BY THE ROMANISTS.

In the beginning of 1545, a pamphlet was published at Naples to inform the world that Luther was dead, and it professed to give the particulars of his departure. In this veritable publication it was stated that Luther spent his time in gluttony and drunkenness, and blaspheming the Pope; that, perceiving his end to be near, he commanded his attendants to place him upon an altar and worship him as a god; that he received the sacrament and immediately died; but the consecrated water leaped out of his stomach and remained suspended in the air, to the astonishment of all beholders; that when he was buried there was such a frightful storm, with thunder and lightning, that people thought the day of judgment had actually come; that in the night the storm returned with greater violence, and the next morning the tomb was found empty, but such an intolerable smell, and such an odor of burning brimstone come forth from it, that it made every body sick who ventured near it; whereupon many repented and joined the Catholic Church, etc., etc.

The Landgrave of Hesse sent a copy of the pamphlet to Luther, who made himself very merry over it, and published a large edition in Italian and German, adding nothing but the following very characteristic note at the close: "Now I, Martin Luther, Dr., acknowledge and testify by this present writing, that I received the foregoing angry tale respecting my death, on the 21st of March, and that I have read it with great mirth and jollity, except the blasphemy that such lies should be attributed to the high, divine Majesty. For the rest, it tickles me to my right knee-pan and my left heel, that the devil and his crew, the Pope and the papists, hate me so heartily. May God convert them from the devil. But if it be decreed that my prayer for a sin which is unto death be not heard, very well—then God grant that they may speedily fill up the measure of their iniquity, and do nothing else for their own comfort and joy than write such books as these."

THE MISSIONARY'S WIFE.

There is something exceedingly interesting in a missionary's wife. I saw much of the missionaries abroad, and made many warm friends among them, and I repeat it, there is something very interesting in a missionary's wife. She who had been cherished as a plant that the winds must not breathe on too rudely, recovers from the separation from her friends to find herself in a land of barbarians, where her loud cry of distress can never reach their ears. New ties twine around her heart, and the tender and helpless girl changes her very nature and becomes the staff and support of the man. In his hours of despondency she raises his drooping spirits, she bathes his aching head, and smoothes his pillow of sickness. I have entered her dwelling and have been welcomed as a brother; have answered her hurried, anxious, and eager questions; and sometimes when I have known any of her friends at home, I have been for a moment more than recompensed for all the toils and privations of a traveler in the east. And when I left her dwelling it was with a mind burthened with remembrances to friends whom she will perhaps never see again.

[Stephens' Incidents of Travel.

WHO ARE THE CHRISTIAN ISRAELITES?

Joseph H. Moss, one of the Sect, thus answers the question in the Boston Transcript:

They are not the unbelieving, or unconverted Israelites, or Jews; neither are they all descendants of Judah and Benjamin, which two tribes constitute the visible, or known Jews. But they are descendants of the twelve tribes of Israel which have been lost in the race of the Gentiles for more than 1800 years, and thus have become amalgamated with them.

The Christian Israelites differ from the Jews, by a full and hearty reception of the New Testament, and a firm belief in the divinity of the Mission and Person of the Lord Jesus Christ. They differ from the Gentiles or Christians, by their observance of the ancient laws, with the exception of those parts which stood typical of the offering of the body of Jesus (which were bloody sacrifices.) These all having been fulfilled in the antitype, they have nothing to do with them. But, the law of circumcision, as given to Abraham 400 years before that given in Sinai, they do most sacredly hold and observe, as well as certain other parts of the law, such as wearing the beard, and refraining from meats, &c.—not that they believe the observance of these necessary to the "common salvation," or the salvation of the soul; but as a distinguishing proof between the seed of Israel, and the descendants of the Gentile nations. And also as a mark or proof of their obedience, that they may be found worthy to come into a full realization of the great promises made to their ancestors, the time for which they believe to be very near.

The Church of Christian Israelites has been organized about 25 years. The greatest portion of its members are in different parts of Europe, though there are branches of it in Asia and America. New additions are constantly being made to the Church, though as yet it can only be said to be in its infancy.

They have a beautiful Sanctuary at Aston, in England, the interior of which is built of polished mahogany. Their singing at the Sanctuary is accompanied with a fine band of instrumental music, including a fine organ. They have a Public Service at the above place every Sunday afternoon, as well as at all other places where there is a branch of the Church established.

SERIOUS SOCIETY IN ENGLAND.

Although, in general, there is more ceremony in society than is usual with us, it never becomes troublesome, and being in keeping with the usages of society generally, is not out of place. It sometimes required a little nerve to decline the request of a lady whose guest you were, to "have the pleasure of a glass of wine with you," especially when according to usage, you should have made the request of her. After the ladies retire, the cloth is removed, and the wine moves around the table freely. "I do not recollect ever to have preached a sermon in England without being offer- Wine was frequently distributed in conference during its active session. The temperance movement has not taken hold of our brethren in England, and they see wine drinking, not as we do, but as we did twenty years ago.

[Dr. Durbin's Observations in Europe.

LUTHER'S VIEW OF USEFUL PREACHING.

When Dr. Erasmus Albert was called to Brandenburg, he desired Luther to set him down a manner and form how he should preach before the Prince Elector. Luther replied, 'Let your preaching be in the most simple and plain manner; look not to the Prince but to the plain, simple and unlearned people, of which cloth the Prince himself is made. If I, in my preaching, should have regard to Philip Melancthon, and other learned doctors, then should I work but little good. I preach in the simplest sort to the unskilful, and the same giveth content to all. Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, I spare until we come together, and then we make it so curled and finical that God himself wondereth at us.'

RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

Armenians of Turkey.—Rev. Mr. Goodell, writing from Constantinople, January 31, says, "There is now a very interesting state of things among the Armenians at the Capital, and there are many new instances of awakening. There is probably not an evening in the week, on which there is not a prayer meeting held by native brethren at some place in Constantinople proper. At our public services on the Sabbath, the congregation is large, and the Word is preached with power. And although all the ingenuity, and wisdom, and influence of the very mightest among both Armenians and Turks are actively employed to arrest the work, yet it is carried forward by a hand unseen and by a power not to be resisted.

Mission to Burmah.—A very interesting ceremony recently took place in Halifax, on the occasion of Rev. Mr. Burpe being designated as a missionary to carry the tidings of salvation to the Heathen. Rev. Dr. Belcher expressed his joy that the venerable pastor who had commenced his labors in that Province 50 years ago, when Nova Scotia itself was missionary ground, should have lived to see the day when a Missionary was to be sent from her shores to far distant Burmah.

Madras.—In a letter, dated December 24, Rev. Mr. Winslow writes to the American Board: "We have just finished the complete and uniform edition of the whole Tamil Bible, in one volume, with the headings and chronology according to the English authorized version, and with references." The edition is six thousand copies.

Ceylon Mission.—There is a growing desire on the part of the students, says a correspondent in the Misoionary Herald for May, to obtain a more thorough education. The demand is for men of higher attainments. Hence the desire to remain in the Seminary; whereas ten years ago it was deemed necessary to offer a premium to those who should continue through the prescribed course, and 5 years ago, an additional premium was given to induce a few to enter a select class. Candidates for admission to the Seminary are making sacrifices to fit themselves for its instructions, which till recently, we did not venture to expect. In proof of this we will mention the fact that of the thirty-five boarding scholars belonging to the preparatory class, a large majority are paying for their board in ready money, and in part also for their books.

Christian education is steadily advancing in the province; the displacing of heathen school-masters by educated young men, whose religious views and preferences are on the side of Christianity, is an important step, and has already produced salutary results.

China.—There are now, says a recent letter, five or six congregations gathered in Hong Kong among the Chinese every Sunday, and instruction is communicated, for the most part, in an intelligible manner. It is a great attainment to be able so to expound Christian truth to the Chinese, as to be sure that what we say is understood.

The field here is immense, and the doors of access to it are rapidly multiplying. Some of the obstacles to the spread of Christianity, which are found elsewhere, either have no existence here, or act with a greatly diminished power of resistance.

Quaker's Reproof.—Some time since, a sailor on one of the wharves was swearing most boisterously, when one of the Society of Friends, passing along, accosted him very pleasantly, and said, "swear away, friend, swear away, till thee gets all that bad stuff out of thee, for thee can never go to heaven, with that stuff in thy heart." The sailor with a look of astonishment and shame bowed to the honest Quaker, and retired.

According to the English Churchman, Dr. Lushington has decided that the holding of Roman Catholic doctrines is not sufficient to deprive a clergyman of his living, and that "the English Church is not protestant, nor does she require her members to profess protestantism."

The Sabbath Recorder.

NEW YORK, MAY 15, 1845.

THE DAY AND THE DUTIES OF THE SABBATH.

It is surprising to see what shifts men will sometimes adopt in defending long-established but erroneous practices—shifts, not unfrequently, which are directly at war with their own principles, and subversive of the very doctrines which they profess most highly to prize. Abundant illustrations of this may be found in the common objections to the observance of the Sabbath upon the seventh day of the week instead of the first day. When the claims of the seventh day are pressed home upon the conscience, it is not uncommon for men to resist this by replying, that the duties of the Sabbath are to rest from labor and to worship God, and if these duties are given it matters not so much about the day, one day will serve the turn as well as another. This notion possesses the minds of many who are called very religious and well-disposed, and whose opinions, therefore, are [illegible] with great consideration. But there are objections to it which seem to us altogether insurmountable.

In the first place, God has seen fit to join together in one commandment both the day itself and the duties of the day, so that the particular day has the same authority to enforce it that the duties of the day have. Now in a contract between man and man, if a certain duty was specified to be done on a certain day, no man would hesitate to pronounce a failure in respect to the day to be a breach of the contract. Why then should we not pronounce it such in this case? We cannot put asunder that which God has joined together as he has joined the seventh day and the duties of the Sabbath, without marring His Word and dishonoring Him. To put them asunder, and thus yield obedience to one half of the fourth commandment while we neglect the other half, is not to have respect unto all God's commandments, which is required of good men.

In the second place, this doctrine that the particular day of the Sabbath may be separated from its duties, has led to a low esteem, and in some cases to a total neglect, of the sabbatic institution. Who does not know, that it is generally by small and apparantly unimportant deviations from the standard of truth, that the way is opened for the introduction of the greatest errors? In this particular case, when the principle is once allowed that the day may be separated from the duties, it is but a short step to the conclusion, that the duties may be separated from any particular day; and so each man may rest and worship just when it suits his convenience. Now we know, as a matter of history, that exactly this view has very extensively prevailed. Take the Catholic Church, for instance, and how is it with them? As for the seventh day, that is made a common working day; and as for the first day, that it is true is called the Lord's day, but it is kept as a common holiday, which has no higher sanction than the church or tradition can give it. Thus Rome has blotted out the fourth commandment as effectually as the second, and has in effect left but eight commandments of the Decalogue. Turn now to the Protestant churches, and how is it with them? In Germany, ever since the Reformation, the prevailing opinion has been, that the fourth commandment does not require the observance of the first day of the week, and that there is no propriety in calling that day the Sabbath. The consequence is, that instead of keeping it holy "according to the commandment," the people treat it like any other day which is derived from tradition and rests wholly upon human authority. In England, every historian knows that only a short time has elapsed since it was the common belief, that the "Lord's day" and the Sabbath day were entirely distinct institutions—that the Sabbath day had been abolished, and that the "Lord's day" was an institution of the Church. The Puritans introduced a different doctrine into that country, and brought it with them to this country; but they were never able to create that sense of obligation to observe the first day of the week, which would be felt if the fourth commandment required it. Such instability and uncertainty are the necessary fruits of separating the day of the Sabbath from its duties; and it is in vain to expect unanimity of opinion concerning the Sabbath, or intelligent zeal in promoting its sanctification, until all agree to honor the very day and duties required by the fourth commandment.

—But here we are met by the very grave inquiry, Have not thousands of our predecessors, who have lived and died in ignorance of this point, gone to heaven; and may not we likewise go to heaven without observing the Sabbath? To this we may answer, that it is a bad sign when men are anxious to know how many errors they may hold, and yet go to heaven. The inquiry of a real Christian will rather be, how many errors he can get rid of before he goes there. But suppose our predecessors have actually gone to heaven, what is that to us? Their case differed widely from ours, inasmuch as they were ignorant of many things which are perfectly familiar to us. Shall we, because they were saved in ignorance, therefore presume upon God's mercy by refusing to follow the light which we have? We might as well presume, because Lot and Noah and David have gone to heaven, that therefore we may live in the sins which they committed and still go there. But we do not believe that he whose heart is right will ever ask this question. Such a person will endeavor to grow in knowledge daily, rather than to go to heaven as blind and ignorant as he possibly can. He will not willingly 'bequeath unto God a soul blind of one eye, when he may give him a soul with perfect sight of both eyes.' He will rather say with the Psalmist, "I esteem all thy precepts concerning all things to be right, and I hate every false way."

UNIVERSALIST VIEWS OF THE SABBATH.—Adin Ballou has recently published in the Practical Christian a series of articles on the subject of the Sabbath. He is disposed, of course, to modify somewhat the rigor with which Puritan Sabbaths were formerly kept, but he agrees essentially with the views entertained by the popular churches in regard to the usefulness of a Sabbath, and the necessity of having some rules by which its duties shall be regulated. In comparing those who hold to a Sabbath with those who deny it entirely, he maintains that the former are "radically right," whilst the latter are "radically wrong." His conclusions, like those of the principal movers for a Sabbath reform so-called, seem to be based upon the usefulness of a weekly rest-day, and of a prescribed method of observing it. With him, as with them, the simple fact that God has commanded it is not regarded as a sufficient basis on which to rest its claims.

"A SEVENTH-DAY SABBATH MAN."

Our attention has lately been directed to an article under the above heading, which appeared some time ago in the New York Observer, purporting to be an extract from Alex. Campbell's Millennial Harbinger, in which the religious standing of Mr. Magruder, a member of the late Baltimore Lord's Day Convention, is rather uncourteously assailed. It is not our object to vindicate Mr. M. from the aspersions so liberally bestowed on him by the oracle of the Harbinger; that he has done for himself through the columns of the Religious Herald, showing that so far from being at the time of his appearance in the Baltimore Convention "an excluded member" from the church in Charlottesville, and undertaking "on his own responsibility, and on his own behalf, to appear amidst the delegates of that very respectable assembly," he was "regularly and formally deputed a delegate by the congregation of Disciples of Christ at Free Union, Albermarle county," of which he was a member. In proof of which, he refers to his credentials, which were presented and filed among the records of the Convention. What we are at present concerned with, is the heading of the article referred to. The discriminating pen of Alex. Campbell never wrote that heading. Erratic as his views in theology are, he has too much good sense to stake his reputation as a man of knowledge, by a heading so inappropriate and bungling. Whether the heading was given by the Observer we know not, nor is it important for us to go about to discover the originator of it. The Observer seizes upon it with avidity, and on the principle that the retailer of a slander is responsible in law, as well as the author of it, we hold its editors guilty.

Since our attention was first directed to it, we have been puzzling ourselves to determine whether the Observer is distinguished most by obtuseness of discernment, or by malicious bigotry. Perhaps this is a problem which cannot be solved with certainty, and as great events are not very likely to hang on the decision of the question, we shall not spend much of our time upon it. We would merely say, however, that if the conductors of that print really do not know what Seventh-day Baptists are in doctrine, and have no more discernment than to confound them with the order of Christians represented by Mr. Magruder, we are ready to furnish them with a copy of Buck's Theological Dictionary, with a leaf turned down at the very spot where they will find such information as may help to keep them from blunders in future. We mention Buck, because he being a first-day man, his view of the case will probably be more acceptable to the Observer than any thing we could say—and as all the learning and common sense reside with our opponents, wisdom being destined to die with them, and ourselves being but "pitiful quibblers," a first-day man must of course know better what we believe than we do ourselves.

As for Mr. Magruder, since he rejects the Sabbath from his creed entirely, it is not probable he will thank the Observer for identifying him with us; yet we think he would be quite willing to instruct the editors as to his doctrinal views, provided they are willing to learn.

But, carefully balancing all the probabilities in the case, we are rather of opinion that the Observer knows, and has known all along, how the matter stands. That is to say, its editors know well enough that Mr. M. is not "A SEVENTH-DAY SABBATH MAN," and that Seventh-day Baptist sentiments were in no respect whatever the cause or occasion of the exhibition of unsanctified feeling made in the Baltimore Convention. We rest for the present, therefore, in the opinion that it was not obtuseness of discernment, but a spirit of bigotry ill becoming enlightened Christians, which prompted the choice of such a heading for the article in question.

We think we discover in the Observer two objects. 1. To destroy the reputation of Mr. Magruder by way of revenge for the trouble he had given the Convention; and, 2. To injure the good name of Seventh-day Baptists, by slyly intimating that he was identified with them. But why destroy Mr. M.? Alas for unsanctified nature. Mr. M. and his coadjutor Mr. Lemmon had received unchristian and shameful treatment from the leaders of the Baltimore Convention, and when these leaders came to reflect soberly on it, they could not but feel the tingle of mortification in their cheeks for the part which they had acted. And knowing that the community would cry out shame, how could they turn off odium from themselves but by embracing the first opportunity to turn it on to those they had injured? Accordingly the testimony of Mr. Campbell is seized upon with eagerness for this purpose. But Seventh-day Baptists are too great an annoyance to be passed by, and an awkward, clumsy-fisted blow must be leveled at them at the same time. Hence a heading is given to the whole paragraph which conveys to the minds of those not informed of the facts, a positive untruth. *

ENGLISH PROTESTANTISM vs. CATHOLICISM.

The public mind in England has been much agitated of late by the discussion of a proposal to endow from the public treasury a Roman Catholic College at Maynooth. The subject was before Parliament when the last steamer left, and petitions against the measure were pouring in from Churchmen and Dissenters beyond all former precedent. The bill proposes to incorporate the trustees of the College in such a way that they may receive an annual income of about $125,000 for the support of professors, students, etc. This is regarded by the body of the people as an outrage upon their feelings as Protestants, and as an attempt to compel them to support a form of religion to which they are conscientiously opposed. Various are the motives attributed to Government for favoring the plan. It is generally believed that Sir Robert Peel is endeavoring in this way to repay the Pope for the aid which he gave him against O'Connell by discountenancing the Repeal agitation. Whatever may be his motive, it is evident that his power and influence will be seriously tested by the struggle. There is reason to believe, that great good will come from the discussion of the subject. It has already called attention to the fact that the English Government has heretofore virtually endowed catholicism in Canada and idolatry in India. It has likewise brought up in a practical form the general subject of compelling men to support religious arrangements which they do not approve. Evangelical Churchmen say, in view of this case, that they cannot in conscience support Roman Catholic doctrines, because they believe them to be erroneous. How then—the question will naturally arise—can they any longer consent to be supported themselves by money wrung from the pockets of those who as conscientiously believe that the doctrines of the Church of England are founded in error and at variance with the word of God? That's a poor rule which will not work both ways. Perhaps its application in one case may open the way for its application in another.

ANNIVERSARIES IN NEW YORK.

Report concluded from last week.

THE AMERICAN ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY met at the Tabernacle on Tuesday, May 6. The Treasurer's Report showed that the receipts of the year had been $8,566. A large debt has been extinguished, and there are now no out-standing accounts against the Society. The Secretary's Report was very voluminous, and only fragments of it were read. It represented the Society as being in a flourishing condition. Speeches were made by Wendell Phillips, Esq., Miss Jane Hitchcock, and others, in which the dissolution of the Union was advocated as the only means of removing the curse of Slavery.

THE FEMALE MORAL REFORM SOCIETY held its Anniversary in the Greene Street Methodist Church, at which there were present some 400 persons. The financial condition of the Society was represented as being sound and prosperous; the receipts for the year have been $6,820 06, leaving a balance in the treasury of $495. The Annual Report stated, that the present is regarded as a favorable era in the history of the Society. The cause is gaining public attention. One hundred thousand signatures were obtained to the petitions to the New York Legislature. Twelve thousand copies of the Advocate of Moral Reform are now issued semi-monthly. 73,000 pages of Tracts, and nine editions of the "Walks of Usefulness," have been published.

THE AMERICAN SOCIETY FOR MELIORATING THE CONDITION OF THE JEWS held its Anniversary in the Broome Street Church. Rev. Mr. Milledoller, President of the Society, in introducing the exercises, spoke of the present number and condition of the Jews; of the various times which have been fixed upon for their Restoration to the land of Palestine; of the claims of the Jews upon the sympathy and aid of Christians; and of the encouragements to labor on their behalf. He was followed by the Rev. Mr. Herschell, who has lately come to this country from England, to engage in the service of the Society. Several other gentlemen addressed the meeting. The receipts for the year were stated at $3,716, being nearly double the receipts of the preceding year.

THE FOREIGN EVANGELICAL SOCIETY held its Sixth Anniversary on Tuesday evening, May 6. The receipts of the Society for the past year were $15,968, being considerably larger than those of any previous year.

Of the funds of the Society a great portion has been expended in France and Belgium, the principal scene of their labors. Much has also been done in Italy and Switzerland. There are now from 75 to 80 laborers in these countries. In the cities of Moscow, St. Petersburgh, Stockholm, Cairo, Hamburgh, &c., Tract Agents, or Colporteurs, have done great benefit. In Italy the success has not been so encouraging; what is done there is through the Agents in Geneva, and the dissemination of books and libraries is generally the means used. In this country the only field of the Society's labors is Canada. Some tracts have been published in Spanish for circulation in South America and other portions of the continent. It is believed that the revolutions in Spain have done much for the spread of the true gospel in that country. In all the stations of the Society's efforts great encouragement is given by partial success. The Society is only 6 years old and has at present over 100 laborers engaged in the work of propagating evangelical truth in countries nominally Christian,—which is the great object of the Society. In Catholic countries much good has been accomplished, and a mild and forbearing spirit is practiced in all their efforts.

THE NEW-YORK SUNDAY SCHOOL UNION celebrated its 29th Anniversary on Tuesday. The following is an abstract of the Annual Report:—

The total number of Schools belonging to the Union is 107, belonging to 13 denominations. Of these, 19 are Missionary, unconnected with churches, and 5 that are. The number of male teachers is 941, of female 1,036; of these 1,582 are members of Churches, and 1,088 were formerly pupils. The number of male pupils is 7,077, of female, 7,881; of these 8,163 can read the Bible. In the Library are 23,116 vols.; 15 teachers have begun to prepare for the ministry, and one has already been ordained. During the past year the expenses have been $1,850.

The 29th Anniversary of the AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY was held on Wednesday, Hon. Theodore Frelinghuysen in the Chair. The receipts of the Society for the year have been $152,376; its expenses a little more than its receipts.

The number of new publications has been 68, many of them being editions of standard works. The number of volumes circulated has been 374,757, an increase over the circulation of the previous year of 61,255,773 pages. 36,000 volumes have been circulated in German. Heavy grants of publications have been made during the year, amounting to 23,708,195 pages. The number of stereotype plates cast for the Society has been 52,717, in various languages. During the year there have been engaged 143 colporteurs in the territory of the United States and Texas, inclusive of those employed by auxiliary societies. Of this number 3 have been devoted to Welsh, Irish, and colored persons, 3 to sailors, 4 to French, and 26 to Germans. The residue, 107, to the people at large.

THE AMERICAN HOME MISSIONARY SOCIETY held its 19th Anniversary on Wednesday. The Treasurer reported $122,163 82 received in the course of the year, which was sufficient to meet all the liabilities of the Society. An abstract of the Annual Report says:—

The general aspect of the Society's work is encouraging, and the openings for increasing usefulness have greatly multiplied. The number of ministers of the Gospel in the employment of the Society during the year, has been 943. Of these, 209 have been appointed since the last anniversary. The amount of missionary labor performed during the year, is 736 years. The missionaries have been stationed in 23 States and Territories of the Union, and in Canada and Texas. The number of Congregations supplied, in whole or in part, with the preaching of the Gospel, has been 1,285.

THE AMERICAN PROTESTANT SOCIETY'S Second Anniversary was held on Thursday evening. Its receipts and expenditures have been about $7000. The following will show its objects and encouragements:—

The purpose of this Society is the conversion of Roman Catholics to Protestantism. The Society has during the year circulated 180,000 pages of tracts, besides many books. Tracts have been printed in the French and German languages and circulated to a large extent. One missionary reported the conversion of sixteen Roman Catholics. Another reported 16 or 18 cases of conversion; another in Portugal had preached to audiences of from 100 to 400 persons. Testaments and tracts in Portuguese had been sent to him, and he had written for more, saying that the people were hungry for more. Another Missionary in France had made 10 or 12 or 20 converts in a place. Another Missionary, who had been a Catholic Priest, was stationed in a country of 100,000 Catholics, and by a letter just received from him it appears that he is meeting with the most encouraging success. The plan of operations pursued by the Society is mainly to operate by means of Colporteurs, who preach wherever they can get Catholic hearers.

THE CHRISTIAN ALLIANCE held its Anniversary in the Baptist Church in Broome street, where a large audience attended. The following is an abstract of the Report:—

It was not the privilege of the Secretary to report any very extensive results, inasmuch as the Society had been during the past year rather in a forming state. The experience of the year had however proved the practicability of the design of the Society, which is that of enlisting the sympathies of different denominations in the spiritual welfare of Papal countries. The Society had as yet made little effort to collect funds. They were not in haste about this. They have evidence from several sources that the Christian Alliance has already caused dread in the regions of popery, and that it has presented so formidable a barrier to the schemes of Popish aggression as to cause the Pope himself to issue a bull against them.

THE NEW YORK BIBLE SOCIETY held its Anniversary in the Tabernacle, where a large audience attended. The Treasurer's and Managers' Reports alluded feelingly to the death of Dr. Milnor and other friends of the Society. The following facts are collected from those reports:—

465 new Life Members and Directors have been added; 70 new Auxiliaries have been formed, and most of them County Societies. The total receipts have during the past year been $166,652, being an increase of $12,212 over those of the last year; the whole of it has been expended, and the Society still owes $11,000 for paper, and has many other liabilities to meet; for nearly the whole year the Society has had no Financial Secretary. During the year there have been 429,092 Bibles and Testaments issued from the Depository, beside those published abroad at the expense of the Society. This number is an increase of 114,510 copies over the previous year, and makes an aggregate of 4,013,352 Bibles, &c. issued since the formation of the Society. The books published last year have been sent to Canada, Texas, Oregon, the West Indies, Mexico, Buenos Ayres, Brazil, Greece, besides all the States, &c. of the Union; 1,500 Modern Greek New Testaments have been given to the Baptist Mission in Greece; and $500 worth of other books in the Levant.

AMERICAN BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS.—A meeting in behalf of this Board was held at the Tabernacle on Friday. The following is gathered from the Secretary's statement of the transactions of the past year:—

The field of operations of this Mission is most extensive. Coterminous with the prevalence of error, the Missionary labor has met, in various portions of the world, with encouragement, viz: in Turkey, where a fundamental maxim of the Koran has been abandoned, in the relinquishment of religious persecution. Dr. Grant, of the Nestorian Mission in Kurdistan, having died, that Mission has been abandoned. Much difficulty had been thrown in the way of the Missionaries in that country and Persia by the power of French intrigue. The Mission to Jerusalem has been translated to Beyroot, and unusual success has awaited the laborers in Mount Herman, near the sources of the Jordan. Great obstacles have been opposed to this Mission by the Greek Hierarchy. Much has been done among the Armenians of Turkey. The demand for the Bible increases in energy. In Constantinople is a great centre of this action. The Missions on the Gaboon promise well, though they had sustained great loss in the death of Rev. Mr. Griswold in 1844. The Missions to the Hindoos thrive. The work now to be done is, not to refute Hindooism, but to teach Christianity. The same success has been met with in Southern India. All difficulty has been done away with in Borneo and other parts of Belgic India through the direct interposition of the Government at home. The Missions in China promise much, so that it is now contemplated to establish another Station on the Northern Coast. These Missions are of the Dutch Reformed Church. The condition of the Sandwich Island Churches promises yet greater improvement. The advance of the North American Indians is generally sure. The Cherokees, Choctaws and Chickasaws will bear comparison with their neighbors of Anglo Saxon blood. A new station has been established among the Ojibways—among all the Indian tribes the greatest difficulty has been found to be the influence of the dissolute whites among them. The financial condition of the Institution is improving. The receipts during the financial year from August 1, 1844, to April, 1845, have been $185,000, a sum greater by $21,315 than those of the last year, and less than the appropriations by $13,000. If for the balance of the year the receipts are increased in the same proportion, the Society will be out of debt. The Society has 26 missions under its charge, and supports 800 missionaries, besides various helpers. It has 15 presses, whence have proceeded 50,000,000 of pages in 31 languages exclusive of English.

THE AMERICAN TEMPERANCE UNION held its Ninth Anniversary in the Tabernacle on Thursday evening. The Annual Report gave a flattering account of what had been accomplished by the Society, and demonstrated at the same time that much yet remained to be done. After the reading of the Report, addresses were made by several distinguished gentlemen, and a number of resolutions were passed.

NEW YORK INSTITUTION FOR THE BLIND.—The Annual Exhibition and Concert of this institution was held in the Tabernacle on Wednesday, where a dense crowd attended. It consisted of exercises in music and reading, together with an examination in chemistry, history, geometry, astronomy, &c. Several poetical productions of the pupils were recited, in which the imagery was drawn so much from external nature as to be quite remarkable. The whole exhibition was highly creditable to those concerned in it, and most gratifying to the spectators.

INSTITUTION FOR THE DEAF AND DUMB.—The Exhibition of the pupils of this interesting charity was attended by a large audience at the Tabernacle. The pupils were so arranged as to make an imposing appearance; and the intelligence which marked their countenances, not less than the creditable manner in which they performed their exercises, gave good proof of their improvement. The exercises consisted in part of translations of the Bible into manual expressions, and vice versa, which were made with great facility; compositions upon various themes taken on the spur of the moment; and pantomimic representations of the passions, which were given in the most perfect manner. The kind and parental demeanor of the teachers towards the pupils, and the respectful and cheerful demeanor of the pupils, cannot be too highly praised.

THE AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY'S DIFFICULTIES.—During the anniversary week a meeting was held of the Life Members and Directors of the American Tract Society, for the purpose of considering the recent discussions respecting the principles and administration of the Society. After mature deliberation, a series of resolutions were passed, reiterating approbation of the principles of the Society; recommending the rejection of such books as require much alteration in order to make them acceptable to the denominations represented in the Society; advising that in the preparation of any work for publication by the Society, no change should be made implying a denial, or inconsistent with a cordial recognition, of the ministry and churches of any evangelical denomination; and stating that whenever any changes are made, a distinct announcement of the nature and extent of the changes should be prefixed to each copy. The difficulties of the Society seem to be satisfactorily adjusted, and the result will undoubtedly be a great watchfulness hereafter in regard to the alteration of books.

MORE ANNIVERSARIES.—Several Societies hold their Anniversaries in Philadelphia during the present week. Among them we notice meetings of the Foreign Evangelical Association, the Central American Education Society, the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, and the Philadelphia Home Missionary Society.

TROUBLE IN SWITZERLAND.

The difficulty between the Catholic and Protestant parties in Switzerland, seems not to have abated. The foreign papers received by the Hibernia contain full accounts of the movements there, from which we learn that blood has actually been spilt between the rival factions. A free corps invaded the Canton of Lucerne, Switzerland, where they met with a hostile reception. Hundreds of them perished in the conflict, and the retreat. Such a conflict, and such cold-blooded butchery, for what are regarded as religious opinions, gives lamentable proof of the low state of real piety. It is feared, that these ruptures, if continued, will lead to the dismemberment of the Swiss Cantons, and their partition among the adjacent powers of Europe. The following is from Willmer's News Letter:—

"From the accounts we have received, which are somewhat confused, we collect that the free corps presented themselves before Lucerne, upon the morning of the first, and were received by a fire of musketry, and two attempts to enter the town were repulsed. It is added that the besiegers, believing in a capitulation, retired to the faubourgs, where they were received by a fire of grape shot so terrible that from 800 to 1000 were killed. The remains of the corps returned to their homes. The troops of the city captured a park of artillery, consisting of four howitzers, four cannon, three howitzer caissons, and a large quantity of smaller ordnance. It is said that out of 600 men who marched from the half canton of Bale country, only 100 have returned, and that a single man alone has got back to Liestal. Steiger and Rothpletz, two of the leaders who had been captured, had been brought before a military commission. It is stated that Dr. Steiger was tried and condemned, and immediately shot.

"Letters from Zurich of the 9th state that the exasperation of the conquering party is so great that serious apprehensions were entertained as to the fate of the prisoners taken before Lucerne. These prisoners are said to be 1,602 in all. Among them are 180 Bernese and 694 Argovians."

NEW YORK LEGISLATURE.—The time for closing the session is at hand; and, as usual in such cases, business is beginning to be transacted in a hurry. Many private or unimportant bills were disposed of last week. The bill to supply the city of Utica and the State Lunatic Asylum with wholesome water, was passed; also the census bill; and the bill to reduce town and county expenses. A bill was passed appropriating $5000 per annum for three years to establish an Agricultural School in connection with the Fairfield Medical College. The bill to increase the Common School Fund by adding to it $84,000 of the Land Distribution money, was passed. The Excise Bill was reported complete to the Senate, with an amendment excluding the City of New York from its operation. It is thought that the bill can only pass in this shape.

A SOUTHERN METHODIST CONVENTION has just been in session at Louisville, Ky., at which the question of a division between Northern and Southern Methodists was warmly discussed. It seems to be conceded that a separation must soon take place on the question of slavery. The greatest difficulty is to divide the property satisfactorily to all concerned.

✓INSTALLATION.—On first day, April 27, Eld. SHERMON S. GRISWOLD was installed as Pastor of the Seventh day Baptist Church in Independence, Allegany Co., N. Y. Prayer by Eld. James H. Cochran; charge to the church by Eld. James R. Irish; charge to the pastor by Eld. James H. Cochran. The exercises commenced at 10 o'clock A. M., at which time a lecture on Sacred Music was delivered to the choir, who during the day favored the audience with some excellent and appropriate pieces. The assembly was large, and continued attentive until the close of the services at 4 o'clock P. M. COMM.

ELD. S. S. GRISWOLD having taken the pastorial care of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Independence, N. Y., wishes his correspondents to address him at that place.

MISSIONARY NOTICE.—All persons having in their possession any part of the Standing Fund of the American Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Society, are notified that the same must be refunded to the treasurer, H. C. Hubbard of Scott, or to myself, without delay.

S. S. GRISWOLD, General Agent.

Independence, April 27, 1845.

☞ Our Bank Note List and Price Current have been entirely re-set this week, and corrected according to the best authorities in such matters.

☞ We send our paper to press this week a few hours earlier than usual, for the purpose of attending the Anniversaries at Plainfield, N. J., of which we shall give a full account in our next.

MINISTERS DEAD.—The Rev. B. Westlake, of Peru district, and the Rev. Mr. Buckingham, of Logansport district, died of late of erysipelas or black tongue. It is also said that the Rev. R. Hargrave died a few days since in a fit. During a few months past the deaths of the following faithful messengers of the cross have been recorded in Indiana, to wit:—Clippenger, Patrick, Guthrie, Elder, Crouch, Games, Ballingall, Westlake, Buckingham and Hargrave, all Methodist ministers.

TEMPERANCE IN NEW ORLEANS.—From a letter of Hon. John H Cooke, of Virginia, who has lately visited the South-Western States, it appears that the cause of Temperance is rapidly advancing in that region. In New Orleans, where, he says the temperance reform had scarcely commenced when he visited that city seven years since, its various societies now number about ten thousand.

General Intelligence.

FOREIGN ITEMS BY THE HIBERNIA.

In France a long debate on the abolition of slavery in the colonies belonging to that country has taken place. The Peers have passed a law, by which the slave can purchase his freedom. The right of the slave to property is recognized. For his moral and religious rights the bill also provides. It remains to be seen how the bill will fare in the Chamber of Deputies.

A duel with swords took place in Paris on the 5th inst., between the Duc De Rovigo and M. Perregault. Both combatants were wounded, the Duc De Rovigo rather dangerous. Among the seconds were two peers of France, the Prince of Moskwa and General Lagrange.

Dr. Wolff has arrived in England; and in a letter to Capt. Grover, which is published in the papers, has given a graphic sketch of his "hair-breadth 'scapes" in the mission from which he has returned.

The Inquirer, through whose columns the pecuniary embarrassments of Father Mathew were first made public, announces that the sum collected for this estimable reformer amounts to nearly £7000, and that he is now free from debt.

A cargo of free labor sugar has arrived at Liverpool from Manilla, consisting of not less than 20,000 bags; the largest importation by one ship ever received at that port from the same place.

The official return of the revenue for the year and quarter ending on the 11th of April was highly satisfactory. On the year, there is an increase of $1,410,726; and on the quarter, as compared with the corresponding quarter of last year, there is an increase upon the ordinary revenue of $228,241.

Stultz, the celebrated London tailor, has given a donation of $70,000 to the Tailor's Benevolent Society, and promises as much more as soon as a site for certain buildings which the Society is about to erect can be purchased.

The monster gun for the Princeton was nearly completed. It is the largest cannon ever made in England, and requiring great skill and attention to perfect it as a solid mass, it has become an object of considerable interest and curiosity amongst nautical and scientific men.

Marvelous discoveries have been made by Lord Rosse's Telescope. It is said that Regulus, instead of being a sphere, is ascertained to be a disc; and, stranger still, that the nebula in the belt of Orion, is a universal system—a sun with planets moving round it.

The total value of the property destroyed by fire in Liverpool, during the last three years, was, in 1842, £517,927; in 1843, £119,584; in 1844, £24,390.

They were exporting Flour from Ireland to the West Indies, and expected to undersell the Americans in most of the Islands.

The stock of American cheese on hand in London is equal to the whole stock of English cheese of every kind.

ANOTHER EARTHQUAKE.—Our readers doubtless remember the details we published a few days since, of a frightfully destructive earthquake which was experienced at Mexico on the 7th of April. We have now to add a repetition of this awful disaster in the Capitol on the 10th of April.

An examination of the papers has failed to enable us to discover many details of the amount of ruin and desolation occasioned by the convulsion, but from the fact that the journals unite in describing the effects as terrific, we presume the destruction must have been great. The Diario of the 11th states that the earthquake occurred about 10 o'clock A. M., and lasted forty seconds; that it overthrew many new buildings, and many others that had escaped the former visitation; that most of the inhabitants, stricken with terror, left their houses, and took refuge in the open fields and public squares, passing the night without shelter and in the utmost consternation.

The "Verahcruzano" of the 14th April, states that private letters furnish a gloomy picture of the desolation that has fallen upon Mexico. The 'Hesperia' of the 12th states that the earthquake of the 10th completed the destruction of the cupola of Santa Teresa, and increased the damage done to the churches of Santa Domingo and San Fancisco. But for the shortness of its duration the entire city would have been laid in ruins. Mexico did not suffer alone. The shock was felt in a number of towns and villages within the radius of several hundred miles.

TROUBLES IN SUFFOLK COUNTY.—The fires which have been raging at different times for the past month, and which are now daily occurring, have swept through a large portion of the woodlands of Suffolk County, destroying whole forests of young and growing timber, and consuming immense quantities of cord wood, piled up ready for market. In some instances the fires have extended from the railroad to the south side of the island, consuming in their progress numbers of dwelling houses, barns and other property. The whole amount thus annihilated is variously estimated at hundreds of thousands of dollars. The locomotives are generally regarded as the origin of these conflagrations. The sufferers are highly exasperated, and look upon each train that passes as a demon of destruction; and this feeling has extended widely through the County, and the people are under so great a state of excitement as just now threatens to be productive of serious consequences.

RHODE ISLAND.—The General Assembly adjourned on Saturday at 12 o'clock, to meet on the fourth Monday in June.

The Act of Amnesty introduced into the Senate by Mr. Potter was referred to a Select Committee, with instructions to report in June.

In the House a Resolution was introduced by Fenner Brown to appoint a Committee to prepare a bill providing for the liberation of Dorr. The Resolution was laid on the table by a vote of 38 to 28.

An act was passed liberating Messrs. Bosworth and Heath on their taking the oath of allegiance.

CHICAGO.—This city contains 10,864 inhabitants, according to a census taken in December. During the last year, there were erected 871 buildings of all sizes. The foreign population of this city is as follows:—1056 Germans; 972 Irish; 531 Norwegians, and 683 of other countries. There are three hundred dealers in merchandise of different descriptions; nearly one half of whom sell at wholesale and retail. The different professions seem to be as well stocked as the mercantile community. There are 48 lawyers, 28 physicians, and 17 clergymen.

HONEY is, according to Mr. Milton, who has lately published a treatise on bees in England, a universal specific, and among its other valuable properties, he declares that it prevents consumption, and states that that destroyer of human life is not known in countries where honey is regularly taken as an article of food. Those who have less faith in the specific, may perhaps attribute the cause to difference of climate rather than to honey. The Italian singers, it is also affirmed, are greatly indebted to honey, but their practice is to sharpen it with a few drops of acid though they sometimes take it in a pure state.

JOURNEYMEN!—There is a general law, or custom, in Germany, that apprentices, after the expiration of their service, shall travel two years before prosecuting their trade as master workmen. Hence, the etymology of the word journeymen! They are allowed to go from kingdom to kingdom without a passport. Some of these mechanics, especially those recently going from Hamburgh, are pious men, and give a part of the space in their knapsacks to Tracts, which they carry, unobstructed, into Catholic countries, as well as others—thus becoming generous, voluntary Colporteurs!

WARNING TO LIQUOR DEALERS.—A gentleman of Cincinnati is in possession of the names of all liquor dealers in two streets of that city for the last fifteen years. There were sixty-seven in all, of whom fifty-three are dead, and forty-six of them died drunk!

THE GERMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH.—The schism among the Catholics in Prussia seems to be on the increase. Immense numbers have recently declared for what is called the new German Catholic Church, and the government has authorized collections in support of it.

SUMMARY.

Hon. Leverett Saltonstall died at Salem, Mass. on Thursday morning, having been some months suffering from an affection of the heart. He was 64 years of age, having graduated at Harvard in 1802, as a class mate of Gov. Lincoln, Samuel Hoar, Rev. Dr. Codman, &c. He was a member, we believe, of the much execrated Hartford Convention of 1814-15. He has been many times elected to the Legislature, and twice chosen to Congress, where he served with great ability and efficiency, retiring in 1843.

A tremendous hurricane occurred in the vicinity of Chicago on Friday week. It extended from the Lake shore to Fox River, sweeping everything in its course. One occount says that from Chicago to Napersville, about thirty miles, every building was either blown down or otherwise damaged. The path of the hurricane was about five miles in width. Some lives were lost, and a great amount of property destroyed.

Three or four hundred thousand dollars worth of Jewelry was stolen on Thursday night, from the bar of the Langrave House, Boston, where the articles were deposited for safe keeping.

The Directors of the Long Island Route to New York have reduced the fare from $5 to $3,50, to commence May 7th.

Fifty thousand cigars were seized on Friday in Boston, by the Custom House officers, for violation of the revenue laws.

Ripe peaches and grapes were exhibited on Saturday in Boston, at the Hall of the Massachusetts Horticultural Society.

There was a heavy frost with ice, at Utica, on Wednesday last.

A large number of new buildings have been erected at Pittsburgh since the fire.

Last Sunday being a fine day, the travel on the Harlem Railroad was immense, notwithstanding an additional number of cars was provided.

The St. Louis New Era, of the 30th ult., speaking of the tremendous flood in the Missouri last year, says:—"In some instances fields were ruined by heavy deposites of sand, but in many others the deposite was a decided improvement, and in a very great number of cases the laudable industry of the inhabitants has placed the farms, fields, and improvements in a much better condition than they were before the inundation.

A destructive hail-storm passed over Michaelsville, Md., on the 28th ult., doing great damage to crops and buildings. Many animals were killed by the hail.

Cincinnati has contributed upward of $6000, and Louisville $4000, for the relief of the Pittsburg sufferers.

Hardy Carroll was hung at Louisburg, N. C., on the 28th ult., in presence of a large crowd, for the crime of Grand Larceny—the article stolen being, says the Raleigh Register, a pair of suspenders from a store!

A baby killed itself at Rochester recently by crying, rupturing a blood vessel.

Baltimore has now 100 Churches, of which 32 are Methodist Episcopal, 13 Presbyterian, 11 Catholic, 10 Protestant Episcopal, 9 Baptist, 7 Lutheran, &c.

The Rochester Democrat says a family by the name of Allen have left that city for Wisconsin. The colony will consist of sixty-two members of the family—including the father, with the sons, their wives and children. The patriarch of the family will be 88 years old in July. He is one of the venerable relics of the revolution, and is in receipt of a pension for his patriotic services. They have located on a spot in Walworth County, and have christened the centre of their purchase Allen City.

A Mr. Coit, of Otselic, Chenango County, was killed by James C. Griffin, on the 6th inst. Coit had seduced the wife of Griffin, who was living with him. Griffin went after her, having a pistol, with which, however, he shot himself accidentally in the thigh, and then killed Coit, who had come out to see what was the matter, by striking him on the head with a whippletree. Griffin was in custody.

The Anti-Slavery Convention of the Western States at Cincinnati, on the 11th of June, will assemble in the Tabernacle, which will hold about 3,000 persons. C. M. Clay, Birney, Gerrit Smith, Elihu Burrit, ('the Learned Blacksmith,') Dr. J. F. Lemoyne, and Alvan Stewart, are expected to attend.

The saving under the New Postage Law in the Mail Contracts for New-England and New York (just let for four years from the 1st of July next) amounts to $195,990, of which $91,792 is in the State of New-York.

A fire broke out in South-Cedar-street, Boston, on Sunday afternoon, in a carpenter's shop, and consumed about thirty buildings.

A destructive fire has been raging for several days in the Catskill Mountains.

Dr. Waterhouse of Scarboro', Maine, died at that place, aged 90 years, in the house in which he was born, having never occupied any other. He never owed more than two dollars at one time. He had 15 children, 10 now living; 75 grandchildren, 51 living; and 113 great grandchildren, 97 living.

The amount annually expended in this State for the relief of pauperism amounts to the sum of ONE MILLION OF DOLLARS! One person out of twenty-six is a pauper! And this in the great, rich, labor-paying, provision-abounding State of New York!

Help from Heathen Lands.—The last Report of the London Missionary Society, which expends about $400,000 annually, acknowledges the receipt during the year, of $78,801 from contributors at its various missionary stations.

LOCAL AGENTS.—We have had under consideration for some time past the best means of giving efficiency to the system of Local Agencies. Our agents have heretofore been taken, for the most part, from among the leading members of the churches; and have been men, therefore, who were both able and disposed to subscribe for the paper and exert and influence in its favor. But they have had, in many cases, too much business of their own on hand, to allow of their giving that attention to the affairs of the Recorder which its interests demanded. Now it has occurred to us, that there might be found in each of our Societies some person who has more time than money, and who would therefore be glad to spend a little time in obtaining subscribers and collecting money for the paper on condition of receiving it gratuitously himself. In most Societies two days would suffice to visit every person who is or ought to be a subscriber, and to do up the business in order. If this could be done, it would add greatly to the efficiency of Local Agencies, and would greatly promote the interests of the paper. We will venture therefore to request of our Local Agents, that they will take this subject into consideration, and that in cases where their own time is too much occupied they will engage some one to attend to the business for them with the assurance of having the paper furnished for their labor. We are already under great obligation to agents for their efforts on our behalf. That obligation will be increased by their continuing those efforts where they can, or by their engaging some other person where they can not.

In places where there are no Local Agents, we hope that private individuals will engage in the work. We have within the past year received from several persons before unknown to us, the names of some half a dozen new subscribers, with a request to forward the paper gratis to him who obtained them. We have always done so most cheerfully, and shall continue to do the like in future.

MARRIED,

In Independence, N. Y., on the Sabbath, April 17, in presence of the congregation, by Eld. S. S. Griswold, Mr. MAXSON G. LIVERMORE, of Independence, to Miss CLARISSA C. CLARKE, of Andover. Also, at the same time and place, Mr. DECATUR M. CLARKE, of Independence, to Miss MARY CLARKE, of Andover. After the performance of the ceremony, a discourse was delivered by Eld. Griswold on the duties of the marriage relation, from Eph. 5: 33.

FOR SALE—A BARGAIN.

THE well-known premises of the late JONATHAN R. DUNHAM, deceased, situated in the township of Piscataway, County of Middlesex, N. J., about one quarter of a mile from the New Market Depot on the Elizabeth town and Somerville Railroad, within about two hours' ride of the city of New York, the cars making three trips each way daily—including 12 acres of excellent land, with a good Apple Orchard and other fruit trees. On the premises is a large and convenient DWELLING HOUSE, two stories high, with sevenrooms on the first floor; also a large TAN-YARD, with a sufficient number of vats; a Shoemaker and Currying Shop, and Bark House; a Barn, and other necessary out-buildings. Adjoining the premises is a small Dwelling House and Garden. Terms reasonable.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION.

The CENTRAL ASSOCIATION will hold its Tenth Anniversary with the Seventh-day Baptist Church at Adams, Jefferson county, N. Y., commencing on the 11th of June, being the fourth day of the week before the second Sabbath in the month. Introductory discourse by Rev. Eli S. Bailey; substitute, Rev. S. B. Crandall.

It is hoped there will be a full attendance from all the churches of the Association, as there is business of vital importance to be transacted, especially our missionary business, and the publication of a Tract on Baptism. I hope, also, that our brethren will come prepared to discuss and dispose of the practice of laying on of hands on newly baptized believers, as there is now a division among us on that subject. G. M. LANGWORTHY, Rec. Sec.

Adams, April 20, 1845.

EASTERN ASSOCIATION.

THE EASTERN SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST ASSOCIATION will hold its Ninth Anniversary with the Church at Waterford, Ct., on the fourth day of the week before the fourth Sabbath, in May, (21st day of the month,) at 11 o'clock A. M. It is hoped that the churches associated will take measures to have a full representation; also that the several committees will be prepared to report upon the subjects referred to them.

In consequence of the variety of forms in which the churches are in the habit of making their statistical returns to the Association—some churches naming some things, which others omit and vice versa—the revisers of the Minutes last year, took the liberty to suggest a form of statistics, expressing the desire that the returns might be so made at the next Anniversary. As it would much facilitate the labors of the clerks, and add much to the interest of statistics, they would again beg to call attention to the subject.

SABBATH TRACTS—NOTICE.

The Board of Directors of the American Sabbath Tract Society would state, for the information of those who have ordered or are expecting Tracts, that in consequence of the late arrangement with the New York Sabbath Tract Society, by which this Society is hereafter to publish its series of Sabbath publications, and also from the few returns that have been made to the Treasury since the last anniversary, they have not been able as yet to reprint several of the series, the editions of which are exhausted. They hope, however, to have a good assortment ready at the Anniversary in May.

NOTICE.

The Missionaries who have been laboring under appointments from the Board of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association, are requested to make a full report of their labors since the last meeting of Conference, that it may be incorporated into the Annual Report of the Society. Please to send through the post-office, so that your letters may reach the Cor. Sec. about the first of May.

All local societies, and churches of Seventh-day Baptists, who have engaged in missionary labors during the past year, are requested to forward us an account of their labors through the same medium, and at or about the same time.

Brethren having important facts to communicate respecting opening fields for missionary labor will do well to forward the same to the address of SAMUEL DAVISON,
Cor. Sec. S. D. B. M. Ass'n.

TRACTS RELATING TO THE SABBATH.

AN ADDRESS TO THE BAPTISTS OF THE UNITED STATES, from the Seventh day Baptist General Conference; wherein is shown the perpetual obligation upon Jew and Gentile to observe God's Holy Sabbath, as INSTITUTED IN PARADISE upon the SEVENTH or last day of each week; and the subsequent substitution of the FIRST day is shown to be inconsistent with the institution, and subversive of the Bible as a perfect rule of faith.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

THIS Institution has a pleasant and quiet location thirteen miles south-east of Angelica, and six miles south of Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y., under the care of W. C. KENYON, as Principal, and Miss CAROLINE B. MAXSON, as Preceptress, aided by able and experienced assistants.

Teachers' Classes will be exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining every facility of a Normal School, without its usual disadvantages. Within the past year, more than one hundred and fifty students of the institution have been employed as teachers in this and the adjacent counties—a number much larger than from any other institution in the State.

Students are prepared for entering any class in College. Ample advantages are also secured to those pursuing Modern Languages and the Fine Arts. The institution is liberally endowed and supplied with a choice and valuable library, and apparatus sufficiently extensive to illustrate every department of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. It has also well selected cabinets of Geological, Mineralogical and Conchological specimens.

The plan of instruction aims at the development of the moral, intellectual and physical powers of students, so as to render them thorough, accurate, and practical scholars.

Lectures on Chemistry, accompanied by a full course of experiments, will commence with the second week of the fall term, and continue daily to its close. During the fall and winter terms, daily lectures will be given on School Teaching. Lectures on Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Physiology, illustrated by experiments, will be given each term of the year.

TUITION, per term of fifteen weeks, from $3,50 to $5. Board per week, in private families, $1. The entire expense of the academic year, including tuition, board, washing, light, and fuel, need not exceed $60. No extra charges incurred.

WARNINGS.

BY ALEXANDER A. IRVINE.

In the night a voice is crying
Through the street before my door,
With a solemn accent telling
Of the hours that are no more;
When I listen, all is silent—
At that noise again I start:
Lo! it is the quick sand running
With a dull sound from my heart.

In the night a bell is tolling
With a melancholy sweep,
Slow the solemn sound is passing
Rousing me from fevered sleep—
Silent is the mighty city—
At that sound again I start,
For I know that measured tolling—
'Tis the beating from my heart.

In the night I hear a knocking
Sounding through the empty hall,
On the step no form is standing,
Shadowless the moonbeams fall—
Weary on my pillow turning,
At that sound again I start,
Loud and loud and louder growing—
Death is knocking at my heart.

NEW DISCOVERIES AT POMPEII.

The Excavations—Shops and Private Dwellings brought to view—Discovery of beautiful Paintings—The side of a Street—Female figures—interior of the houses—Pompeii Merchants, &c.

TORRE DEL GRECO.

I have just returned from a visit to Pompeii, and the object of my present letter is to report the progress which is being made in the excavations.

A fine courser, called the 'Bolton,' bore me in a few minutes to the gates of Pompeii! The sentinel's box still stands there, but untenanted; the barracks are close at hand, but the clash of arms is no longer heard. The lordly Roman has vanished from a scene once eloquent of his power and wealth; whilst the inhabitants of this remotest conquest, the savage uncultured Briton, displays at his very gates the most wonderful invention that science has ever suggested or art perfected, and seems to triumph over the victor. As my Cicerone lazily preceded me through the Forum towards the Strada del Sepolchri, it appeared to me that nothing was being done; and comparatively speaking, nothing is being done, since eight men and four wagons are engaged at the work—a number very inadequate to the excavation of a city, of which two-thirds, perhaps, lie buried. The systems adopted in the excavations is that of following the ancient ways of the city, so as to lay open the edifices in regular order; and the street which has for some time occupied the principal labor of the workmen is that which leads to the theatre, —all in the same vicinity. The street, at its commencement, is more than twenty-six palms wide; and following the right side, down to the theatres, I find that not less than thirteen shops or private dwellings have been brought to view within a year, varying much in their style of building, some being simple and rough enough, others exhibiting greater marks of taste and luxury. In all these houses are to be found the "Lararium," as indeed in every house in Magna Greæcia in the present day, devoted to the reception of the modern Penates—the Madonna and the Saints.

The absence of marble in the dwellings of Pompeii is striking; but the want, many will think, is more than compensated by the beautiful mosaics and frescoes which remain—some of them as fresh as when they received the last finish from the hand of the artist. The subject of the paintings in the lately excavated houses, as you will conclude, are mostly taken from the classic mythology; and very generally represent events in the history of Ceres and Bacchus; who may be eminently called the two gods of Campania, since their worship, more than any other district in which they seem to vie with one another in the abundance of their gifts. In some apartments I observed landscapes which, though good in point of coloring, and well executed in the individual parts, were curiously defective in the perspective. One house in particular cannot fail to command attention, from the superior beauty of its ornaments. Here are swans and peacocks and fruits represented to the life. Bacchus, crowned with ivy, holding in one hand the thyrsus, and with the other giving drink to a panther, who is couching in a beautiful painting. Equally beautiful are Winter, represented as a female, with her garments floating in the wind; Autumn (not so well preserved), holding a cornucopia in one hand: and Spring, who in her left hand holds a hem of her garment. Narcissus crowned, holding in his right hand a spear, (this design is a funeral emblem), whilst his image is reflected on a fountain beneath, and a Love extracting a thorn from his foot, are both pretty paintings. Two other paintings are deserving of attention, not merely from their beauty, but from the deviation from the ordinarily received method of presenting these subjects.—Narcissus, whose head is erect; instead of being directed towards the fountain, in which, however, his image is reflected, and another painting of two Serpents bound to Biga, each with a small wing on his back.

It would be impossible, of course, in a letter, to give you a detailed description of all the paintings which recent excavations have brought to view; and I must content myself, therefore, with saying, that many are good in point of invention and coloring, displaying both the wealth and the taste of the Pompeii merchants, who, to the pursuit of commerce, knew so well how to unite the elegance and taste of the Fine Arts, which are so perceptible in the interior of their dwelling. It was a different spirit which animated commerce in those days; when behind the shop of the perfumer, or the dyer, or the oil merchant, ran a suit of apartments, combining all that we consider in the present day to be the result of education, and wealth, and taste.

It is not, however, merely with the beauty of ornament that one is struck, on wandering among these recent excavations; there is a seeming life about everything which is startling. In returning on the opposite side of the street, I discovered traces of the oxidation of an iron bar which bound together some parts of the building. In another house the iron ring still remains, which, eighteen centuries since, opened and closed the shop door. In this part, too, of the city are eight unfinished buildings, as is evident from the freshness of the materials; from which, and other indications, it is inferred that this side of the street had been thrown down by an earthquake, and was at that awful time being reconstructed.

Leaving this part of the city, I turned my steps to a still more recent excavation—that of the last week only. Here the accumulation of loose soil was left on the ground till orders arrived for its removal or till the King himself visits it; such being the practice, with a view, perhaps, to secure every fragment of art which may be found there, from plunder, or else to pay an easy compliment to any royal or distinguished visitor. Having a permission from Signor Avellino, the superintendent of the works, and the learned editor of the "Bollentino Archæologica," I entered: and was enabled to examine the interior walls, which were being cleaned or slightly restored. They were covered with matting, in order to defend them, during the process, from the action of the external air; and lifting these I discovered what to my unpractised eye appeared to be some of the most beautiful and best preserved paintings I had seen.—One in particular struck me, which represents a female figure seated and half veiled; behind her, and leaning over her, is a warrior, who wears a helmet, with its plume: beside these kneel another female, who is examining something on the ground; and in the distance is a Love of a Genius. The coloring is as fresh as if it was laid on but yesterday; and the expression of the female's face displays the hand of no mean artist,—who, in representing a lady of Pompeii, has given us precisely the same style and expression of face which is so strikingly peculiar to the women of these districts in the present day. Leaving the interior of these houses, it is a peculiar spectacle which the outer walls present, bearing inscriptions in large ill-executed red letters,—many well preserved, and easily to be deciphered—others almost obliberated. Here, we learn, dwelt a "perfusor,"—one who directed the "sparsiones" at public games. Not far is the shop of a company of "offectores," those who restored dresses to their original color. One house bears the inscription "Felix hic locus est;"—some may think perhaps as a temptation to those curious of the future to enter and try the art of the inhabitant, as the walls of the shops are covered with circles, lines and numbers. Another shop is inscribed "Lucru acipe,"—with the not unusual omission of the M in the first word, and of the double consonant in the second—an inscription more intelligible than the last, being evidently an admonition from the god of gain, whose caduceus is represented beneath, to the Pompeii merchant. More important however, are some of these recently discovered inscriptions for the palæography; thus F is written I I,—double L is written E, as in the following inscription:—

QVIIRIIS
IIAEACIIMIIT
IIABIVMINDIIOVRIA
COTINI

Which may be read thus: "Quæres Fallacem et Labium in decuria Cotini."

I must not, however, dwell at any greater length on these points to which I cannot say that my Cicerone directed my attention. He, poor fellow, was intent on far different subjects; and, on visiting once more Pansa's house, his imagination had discovered the kitchen, and, in the designs on the wall, the emblems of a feast and of the culinary art. Alas, for him, it was all a dream!—for his hungry mien seemed to say that his Fine Arts brought him but humble fare. But the bell is ringing—the railway bell! the train indeed is fast approaching, and forty minutes will bear me into the heart of Naples!

A SOUTHERN PLANTER.

The following description of a Southern Planter appeared in a late number of the 'Planter's Banner,' and as its correctness is vouched for by the New Orleans Tropic, we presume that it may be copied without apology into a northern journal:

Now for the picture of the Planter. He wouldn't sell a chicken, nor a dozen of eggs, nor a bushel of peaches, nor a calf, for any consideration. He is above that! He raises cotton, he does! He rides in a six hundred dollar carriage, for which he is in debt. His daughters thrum a piano that never will be paid for. He buys corn which he could raise at ten cents a bushel, and pays sixty cents for it, after 2 1-2 per cent advance to his commissin merchant. He could raise his own tobacco, yet he pays $3 a pound for 'Richmond scented.' He could raise his own hogs—yet he patronizes Cincinnati. The consequences are disastrous. Being the possessor of one staple, he fluctuates with the market of that article. He takes the 'Price Current'—he pays postage—he gobbles down English news like a cormorant. If he sells to-day he'll lose—therefore he'll wait for better advices. He is 'mixed up' in cotton, and is a gambler therein. Meantime he wants money; drafts on his factor! He wants cotton goods and clothes for his plantation, that he could make at home. He orders them, and feels 'large.' The manufacturer, the insurer, the shipper, the freighter, the drayman, the ware-house man, the seller, and finally the commission merchant, all have a finger in the pie of profits, and the proud, foolish planter, pays them all. The year closes, and he is 'up to his eyebrows' in debt! This the result of his not 'calculating,' nor even guessing the difference between farming and planting. One supports a family; the other supports pride until pride gets a fall.

IMPORTUNITY OF PRAYER.—The Saviour thrice repeated in the garden his petition for the removal of his bitter cup. He went to God thrice upon the same accont. Christians should not be discouraged, though they have sought God once and again, and received no answer of peace.

The Tree Of Love.

BY MRS. L. H. SIGOURNEY.

Fast by the dear, domestic bower,
There sprang a tree of healing power;
Its leaflets, damp with gentle rain,
Could charm or quell the pang of pain;
And 'neath its shade, a maiden grew,
She shar'd its fruit, she drank its dew;

And by her side, a youth was seen,
With glance of love, and noble mein,—
At twilight hour, a favor'd guest
Her trembling hand he warmly prest,
At length, with guileless heart and free,
She said "I'll plant that tree for thee."

Her little brother climb'd her knee,
"You must not go away from me;
The nightly prayer with me you say,
And sooth me when I'm tir'd of play;"
Her sister's eyes with tears was dim,
She said "I'll plant that tree for him."

"Its roots are deep," the mother said,
"Beyond the darkling grave they spread."
"Thy hand is weak," the father cried,
"Too young thou art to be a bride;"
Serene she spake, "I look above
For strength to plant the tree of love."

Before the holy priest she stood,
Her fair cheek dy'd with rushing blood,
And as with hands to heaven display'd,
Stong vows upon her soul he laid,
Her heaving breast like fluttering bird
Her snowy mantle wildly stirr'd.

But when the hallow'd cirque of gold
Of deathless love the promise told,
Mysterious strength her spirit felt,
And at the altar's foot she knelt,
"My God—my God—I'll cling to thee
And plant for him, that blessed tree."

Around their home, its branches spread,
Its buds she nurs'd, its root she fed,
Tho' flaunting crowds, with giddy look
Of toil so meek, slight notice took,
Yet hovering angels mark'd with pride
The green tree of the blessed bride.

THE SILENT MINISTRY OF EXAMPLE.

BY MRS. M. A. R. SARGENT.

What is said to mothers in one number of the 'Mother's Assistant,' will apply to both father and mother. Says the writer, 'Mothers, strive to exhibit, in your lives and conversation, whatever you wish your children to become. Do not send them into an unexplored country without a guide. Put yourself at their head. Lead the way, like Moses, through the wilderness to Pisgah. The most certain way for you to fix habits, is the silent ministry of example. Thus impressed on the young mind, amid the genial atmosphere of a happy fireside, they become incorporated with established trains of thought, and with the elements of being. They have their soul, till, through the grave of death, it goes forth to judgment.'

I have always thought that universal respect between parents, under all circumstances, is as conducive as any one thing to produce happiness in the domestic circle. If parents treat each other with that respect which their holy relation and high station demand, it will add immensely to their own happiness, and produce the most salutary effect on the minds of their children. This cannot be accomplished without care and effort. The mother, amid a thousand anxious thoughts for her family, the toils of the perplexities which meet her at every step, the depression resulting from ill health, or any of those things which tend to perplex the mind, or sink the spirits, must not, for one moment, lose sight of the position she holds and the object before her, namely, the good and happiness of her family. An inconsistent word, a sullen look, a contention with her husband, or her servants, petulance from an error or an unhappy lot, will dash in pieces the lessons of months.

The mother must be all she wishes to see in her children. She must embody the whole in her own person. It must dwell on her lips, and in her heart, and radiate from her soul. She must speak it, and exhibit it, all fresh from a mother's heart baptized in the fountain of love. It must come forth from whatever she does, as the unadulterated coin from the mint.

The mother is the child's oracle in life, language, and action. To the child she is a perfect model of all excellence. God has ordained this; and an undeviating, respectful course of conduct to all, will stamp her image on the souls of her children, as deathless as the soul itself. And this is not all,—a thousand excellences follow in the train of this grace, and shed their radiance on the character. Such a mother will always be supreme in the little world which moves around her. She lives in the region of love. But this paradise becomes confusion when precept is not followed by example. The father, too, must aid in this work. His companion must not be left single handed in a labor on which depends the happiness of a family. It is true, there is not so much depending on every look, word, and action of the father; yet a father's looks, words and actions may change a paradise to a pandemonium. He is more in the world, and necessarily more from home; but if it must be so, and he must contend on the world's grand stage of political glory, literary pre-eminence, or wealth, let strife cease and the contest be over, before he approaches the hearth of his family. Let him not bring the dust and rubbish of the battle-field to the sacred shrine. The father's life, from necessity, is in many cases a stormy one, and if it must be one of storm, let him put on his armor elsewhere, and throw it off before he approaches his home. Let the cloud disperse from the brow, the hands be clean, the mind calm and composed and the sun of peace will dawn on the soul and fill the heart, the fountain of the affections, and pure streams will gush forth. Let him, then, quench the fire on the altar of mammon, wipe off the blood of the victim—cease bowing to the altar of fame, and lay aside the rigid features of the philosopher, before he goes to worship in the heart's pure affection.

The depression of incessant toil and poverty, has an influence on the mind of many fathers, similar in its nature to the rush for wealth; it clouds the brow, makes bitter the springs of the soul, and corrodes the mind; but, for the sake of the family, a battle must be fought, and a victory won, even if it costs many an effort, many severe struggles.

Mr. A. was a man of a strong, well cultivated mind, of a good moral, religious character, and of consistent deportment. To be respectful to all was the law of his lips, and every word was the fruit of this law. He was a man of business, and had experienced the reverses of fortune, as well as its smiles; sickness and death as well as health had visited his abode. He had placed in the silent tomb the loveliest objects of his affection; neither was he always free from the bitterness of envy and hate. But, whether in prosperity or adversity, he was the same respectful, consistent man. Of his companion it is enough to say, she was the image of himself. In this family all was kindness, respect. Among the brothers and sisters, the eldest did all in her power to instruct the younger ones. She led them out at the close of day, and pointed out to them the works of God, and the beauties of nature. She showed them the sun, after his long journey in the sky; the clouds painted with the most beautiful gold and orange, and the moon rising in the east. But the purest and best thing exhibited was the affection manifested to one another, and the respect which always flows from this.

Mr. G. was a man of strong mind, intelligent and pious, but he had a hasty and irritable disposition. When he came in from his daily avocations his mind was filled with anxieties, and he appeared perplexed and irritated. The consequence was, the other members of the family caught the same spirit. He perhaps would speak unkindly to his companion, or to one of his children, and in return receive a petulant answer, and thus he lost that respect which would otherwise have been given him by his wife and children; for if the husband and wife cannot be respectful and affectionate, what can we expect from the children?

Belfast, Me., Feb. 1845.

FOR THE CHILDREN.

The Discovery.

Unthinking, idle, wild and young,
I laugh'd, and talk'd, and danced and sung;
And, proud of health, of freedom vain,
Dream'd not of sorrow, care or pain;
Concluding in those hours of glee,
That all the world was made for me.

But when the days of trial came,
When sickness shook my trembling frame,
When folly's gay pursuits were o'er,
And I could dance and sing no more,
It then occurr'd, how sad 'twould be,
Were this world only made for me.

The Flower-Beds.

Dear mother! will you give us little gardens? one for William, one for Emma, and one for me; so that we may each take care of our own.

The mother granted Frederick's request, and gave them each a little piece of ground; and the children were greatly pleased.

William and Emma sowed seeds in their garden, and begged the gardener to give them some pinks, and a few other plants that were not in flower; but little Freddy had naturally an indolent mind and an impatient temper, so he did not like to take all the trouble his brother and sister did with their gardens, at the same time he wished to have his garden the first in bloom. So he went, foolish boy! and gathered sprigs of different flowers, and stuck them down in the earth; and his joy was great when he saw his flower-bed so gaily filled. He called to his mother, and William and Emma, to admire it; but they laughed, and said one to the other, "He will soon find he has taken this trouble only for the gratification of a day; and if he perseveres in his folly, he will lose the proper time for the cultivation of his garden, and will only have weak and scanty flowers, which no one will value."

The sun shone brightly that day, and all the rootless flowers in Frederick's garden faded and drooped, and looked as if they were entirely dead. When he perceived this, tears of disappointment came into his eyes. He ran to his mother, and told her of his misfortune. She said to him: "I am glad, my child, that you see the consequences of your impatience. Let this be a warning to you, that without care and time and labor spent upon it, your garden will yield nothing but weeds. And so it is that I wish you to cultivate your mind, that it may not be a waste, or filled with follies. You must sow the seeds of learning. For this reason, dear child, I insist upon your learning grammar before you attempt to write French. On the contrary, as I am sure you will find, with regard to William and Emma's gardens, their labor will be richly rewarded in time; for the seeds they have sown and tended will become healthy, blooming plants; and I may promise you that if your mind is properly cultivated, and becomes deeply rooted in the principles of any art or science, you may hope to excel in it, and to win just admiration; but certainly not otherwise."

Good learning is not to be had without patient labor, nor wisdom without earnestly praying to God for it.

The Lost Child.

What a beautiful sight!—that dear little boy, upon his knees, with his folded hands, and his dark eyes raised to heaven! Hark, he is praying under that high oak, 'O God! have pity, have pity on me!' and the tears are following each other down his cheeks.

He was chasing a beautiful butterfly, and it led him on, over the fields and through the groves, far away into the woods. At last he thought of his mother, and turned, to run back again to the village, but lost the path, and could not find his way out of the forest. So he falls upon his knees—he was a very pious and lovely little boy—and prays that God will direct him to his mother again. A farmer, just returning from his work, hears a voice, and going in its direction, discovers the sweet little stranger, as he is seen in the picture, and is melted to tenderness by his plantive prayer.

The rest of the beautiful story you may learn, by obtaining that pretty little book called "The Lost Child."

But remember this, children, whenever you are in difficulty or danger, always seek the blessing and protection of God. He heard the prayer of Louis, and He sent to his rescue this good and pious farmer. 'They that seek me early shall find me.'—S. S. Messsenger.

The fool answered according to his folly.

The usual congregation had assembled in the bar-room of one of those indispensable appendages of a country village, which the powers that be, license to manufacture drunkards. And after having received the inspiration of the spirit, in the form of three or four glasses of cider-brandy each, they very naturally fell upon the evidences of Christianity, and in their own opinion found no diffulty in annihilating them;—one did not believe in a hell; another did not believe in a God; and another believed if there was another world, that a man's conduct in this world would have no influence upon his condition in that.

At length one of these purple-nosed gentlemen, who seemed to be a Rabbi among them, began to boast not only of his skepticisms, but of his reasons for it; he could give a reason for the unbelief that was in him; a reason why he did not believe in the existence of a God, a heaven, or a hell.—Just at that point of his very edifying discourse, a stranger youth, who sat warming himself by the fire, taking part neither in the inspiration or discourse, very gravely commenced with our philosopher the following short dialogne.

"Do you say, sir, that you do not believe in the existence of a God, or a heaven, or a hell?"

"Yes, I say I don't believe in none of them; such fables may do to frighten children and silly old women; no man of sense will belive them; any man who is a philosopher will reject them."

"Why, sir, do you not believe in their existence?"

"Because I never saw them, and I don't believe any thing I never saw."

"Sir, did you ever see your brains?" (Stammering and choking.) "Why—I don't know—as ever I did—why?"

"Well, sir, I suppose you have no brains—that some night when you were asleep, a rat eat them out, and the cavity is now filled with pumpkin seeds."

By this time our congregation of philosophers began to gather round the bar for some additional inspiration; and our believer, having sufficiently warmed himself, paid for his peck of oats, jumped into his carriage, and left the infidel to find out as best he could, what composed the contents of his cranium.

"GIVE US THIS DAY OUR DAILY BREAD."—A poor widow called her four little children to her one morning, and said to them, 'My dear children, this morning I can give you nothing to eat; there is no more bread, nor meat, nor even a potato in the house. I have worked for you as hard as ever I could, and I am now sick and can do no more. You may pray to God, who has himself said, Call upon me in the day of trouble, and I will deliver you.'

Little Johnny, who was scarcely six years old, being very hungry, was much troubled by what his mother had said. As he was on his way to school, he knelt down and prayed aloud: 'O God! my Heavenly Father and my dear Saviour, through whom I may come to thee, hear me, a little child, pray. Our mother has no bread, nor meat, nor even a potato—do give us something, that we and our dear mother may not starve. Help us, O Lord; thou art rich and good, and can easily help us. And thou hast promised to hear the cry of the poor and needy, so hear and help us for thy dear Son's sake.'

This was Johnny's simple prayer. After saying it he hurried on to school. When he returned home in the middle of the day, what was his surprise and joy to see a great loaf of bread, a large dish of meat, and a basket full of potatoes upon the table.

'Now God be thanked,' said he, 'for he has heard my prayer. Dear mother, did not an angel bring all these things to you through the window?'

'No,' said his mother, 'but God heard you when you were praying. A lady was near the place, where you could not see her; but she could both see and hear you, and so she sent us all these things. She was the angel that God sent to help us in our need. And now, dear children, let us return thanks to God, and trust in him always.

Our Father full of grace divine,
To thy great name be praises paid;
Thy kingdom come, thy glory shine,
And be thy will on earth obeyed.

Give us our bread from day to day,
And all our wants do thou supply;
With gospel truths feed us, we pray,
That we may never faint or die.

Extend thy grace, our hearts renew,
Our each offence in love forgive;
Teach us divine forgivness too.
And let us free from evil live.

For thine's the kingdom, and the power,
And all the glory waits thy name;
Let every land thy grace adore,
And sound a long and loud Amen.

CONVERSATION.—Most ordinary people can talk upon some one subject, but how few are there who can happily discuss a dozen, or even maintain their ground in an excursive conversation with sufficient ability to act as the drawer out of others. Conversational, in fact, seems the rarest of talents, when we recollect how few are noted for its possession, and that even they who enjoy the reputation of talking well, more frequently harangue instead of conversing—pouring out their own thoughts with eloquence, but never mingling the stream with another's. It is one thing to delight a whole table, and another to fix the favor of each one present at it, by eliciting their powers of entertainment.

NEW YORK PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

How few of all the crowds that daily throng to the great Metropolis ever give a thought to the Public Schools! Yet there is nothing connected with the city of deeper interest to the philanthropist and Christian. Independently of their practical importance, a visit to one of these institutions where several hundred children are assembled with their happy faces and clean hands, earnestly toiling on that rugged, only way to intelligence and virtue, awakens emotions of deep and solemn interest.

The Public School Society was founded in 1805, by De Witt Clinton and others, for the purpose of establishing a free school for destitute children; since which time it has extended the field of its operations, until it has now under its control thirty-four Public Schools and sixty-five Primaries, affording gratuitous instruction to more than thirty thousand children of every rank and condition. Fifty Trustees are elected annually by the Society, who have monthly meetings to discuss the affairs of the schools. These are divided into sections to take especial care of schools appropriated to them. Many of the Trustees spend the best portion of their time in this service, and ask no other reward than the consciousness of well-doing. Examinations are held by them at each Public School semi-annually, which in rigidity resemble those at West Point rather than those of Common Schools, at the conclusion of which a report is published of the relative condition of the schools.

The method of instruction pursued is a modification of the systems of Bell and Lancaster, being to a certain extent monitorial. Study is made attractive, and frequently relieved by change, manual exercises, and singing in all but the boys' Public Schools. In the Primaries, the children are exercised in reading, spelling, slate-writing, the tables, and general questions designed to elicit enquiry; and especially are they taught to observe order and love school. From these they are promoted to the Public Schools, where they acquire a thorough knowledge of the common English branches of Education, including Algebra, Geometry, Trigonometry, History, Astronomy, etc. The girls have substituted for some of these, drawing and needle-work, and the specimens of these to be seen at all times at the schools exhibit a high degree of proficiency.

One of the most striking features of these schools is the great order which is observed in their numerous exercises. You may see a school of three hundred rise from their writing desks with military precision, and file off to "change," keeping time with their voices in some sweet song, and in all the time the teacher has not spoken a word. You see no "vengeful rod," no stern command. A tap of the hand—the whistle or bell sounds, and it is enough. It is not necessary to say that corporal punishment is not used in these schools. In some of them disgraceful punishment has not been inflicted since their foundation. To guard against the tendency to corruption of morals and manners which would exist in a heterogeneous collection, the teachers accompany them in their recreations.

It may be asserted without fear of contradiction, that the children of this city can have without cost better elementary education than can be purchased for the most pampered child of opulence. The annual expense of each pupil to the public is about four and a half dollars. The qualifications for teachers are very high, and the situation of principal is eligible only through the subordinate ranks. His salary is $1000; that of the principal of a girls' school $400. Each have three salaried teachers.

Much has been said of late through the public prints of the "Bible in the Schools." A chapter from the Bible is required to be read without comment each morning in the Public Schools. This gave the Romanists a pretext for calling for a portion of the school fund to have schools of their own. A portion of it had already been obtained for their Orphan Asylum in Prince Street. They were at length successful through the influence of Irish votes, and eighteen large edifices have been erected for the "Catholic," or Ward Schools, where the Bible is not allowed. This was felt by Americans to be an encroachment upon the rights they had inherited from their fathers, and not to be endured. Hence rose the "Native" movement in this city, which saved the Public School Society from the vandal hand of party politics. The Bible was introduced by the efficient County Superintendent, and until his term of office expires it will remain in the Ward Schools.

LE ROY.

To quote Scripture in a jocular sense, says Johnston, is a custom which a witty man will despise for its facility, and a good man dread for its profaneness.

THE CHILD'S ANTICIPATIONS OF DEATH.

The mountain daisy soon decays,
The lilly and the rose as soon;
And while I dream of future days,
My sun of life may set at noon.

Oh, I have seen companions die,
As young, as healthy and as gay;
The luster faded from their eye,
And Jesus called their souls away.

Now on the grave the green grass springs,
I see their drooping forms no more;
But recollection sadly brings
The thought of what they were before.

Soon must I feel their dying strife,
And low, like them, I soon must be;
Make me, Great God, in early life
Consider what it is to die.

THE MODERN JEWS.

The last number of the North American Review gives a very interesting sketch of the present situation of the 'chosen people,' still a host, though but a remnant. From various causes it is difficult to ascertain their numbers, but they cannot be estimated below six or seven millions. "Of the two and a half tribes, Judah and enjamin, and half Manasseh," quotes the North American from Judge Noah, "the number in every part of the world may be computed as exceeding six millions Of the missing nine and a half tribes, part of which are in Turkey, China, Hindostan, Persia, and on this continent, it is impossible to ascertain the numerical force."

"No estimate can be formed of the number of Jews residing in Roman Catholic countries, particularly in Spain and Portugal, who conceal their religion under a Christian garb; probably there are several hundred thousands of them. The numbers given for Asia and Africa certainly fall short of the truth. They are powerful in Persia and the countries upon the Indian Ocean, in China, and on the borders of Tartary. Black Jews are found in Abyssinia, Ethiopia, and Hindostan. They have a congregation in Calcutta, and are quite numerous on the coast of Malabar, where they speak of brethren residing in Northern India, Tartary and China."

Their position in the East is well known to every reader. Though possessed of some real power, they are not so of any degree of honor or security, and are the mark of insult alike to Turk, Moor and Christian. But the following story of barbarity practiced against them so little while ago, and founded upon the old superstition as to their making human sacrifices, may be new to some:—

"The accounts received four years ago, of grievous cruelties practiced upon the Jews at Damascus and Rhodes, though they excited, especially in Great Britain, unusual sympathy, exhibited instances of suffering by no means extraordinary. In 1823, all the Jews of Damascus suspected of the crime of having wealth, were thrown into prison, and redeemed their lives only by an enormous payment. In February, 1840, Father Thomaso, a priest, who practiced medicine, disappeared, as well as his servant. Certain Turks and Greeks affirmed, that both had been seen in the Jewish quarter the evening before. A Jewish barber was at once seized, and carried before the Pacha, and examined under the most dreadful tortures. For a while he protested utter ignorance; but at length, in the extremity of his suffering, at the suggestion of some Greeks standing by, he denounced the seven wealthiest men in the city; declaring, that they had promised him eight hundred piastres, if he would sacrifice the priest, so that they might have his blood for the unleavened bread; which he had refused to do. The Pacha, in a great rage, sent for the seven Jews, and subjected them, notwithstanding their protestations of innocence, to to the bastinado and other extreme cruelties, keeping them on their feet fifty hours, without food or sleep. He then sent for the three chief rabbins, and put them to the torture, requiring them to say if they used blood for the paschal bread. Of course they denied the charge. The Pacha then sent to the college of children, put all the inmates in prison, loaded them with chains, forbade their parents to visit them, and fed them on a small allowance of bread and water, in hopes of thus extorting from the parents a confession. A Jew who ventured to expostulate with the Pacha, and to represent the absurdity of such an accusation and such proceedings, was at once beaten to death. The Pacha then caused the houses of the accused to be razed to their foundations; and finding no trace of the two persons who had disappeared, he threw the prisoners into a sewer beneath the palace. No longer able to endure such torments, they admitted the truth of the charge. One of them said the blood had been put into a bottle and committed to another of their number; this one, however, denied all knowledge of it, until a thousand strokes with rods compelled him to say he had put the bottle into a certain closet. Of course, it could not be found; but in the closet was a large sum of gold, which the Jew had vainly hoped would save him. Meantime, an astrologer declared he had discovered by his art that the accused were the murderers of the priest, and five others, whom he named, of the servant. Three of the latter fled before they could be apprehended. Some of the others embraced Islamism and were released. The French consul at Damascus was accused of being one of the chief instigators of these persecutions; but other representatives of European powers interfered, and the Jews of London sent a commission to remonstrate with the Sultan. Mehemet Ali soon issued orders forbidding further persecution until the matter could be fairly investigated; and when released from the fear of torture, those who confessed retracted their admission, the barber declaring that they had threatened to torture him to death unless he confessed, and had promised him safety if he would denounce the murderers.

In the island of Rhodes, about the same time, the Christians accused the Jews of sacrificing a child of ten years old. Here again certain European consuls were said to have been the instigators. Witnesses were found to affirm, that a Greek child had been seen following a Jew on the public highway. The Jew was arrested, thrown into chains, and bastinadoed; his nostrils were pierced with iron, heated stones placed on his head, and a heavy weight on his heart. His persecutors endeavored to induce him to denounce the chief rabbi; and, at last, he accused several Jews, though not the rabbi. As many of these as could be found were seized, and subjected to similar tortures, under which seven persons suffered until almost deprived of life. The accused, or some of them, were afterwards taken to Constantinople for trial, and their innocence fully established; and the Jewish commission from London, with others who interested themselves for the persecuted people, succeeded in obtaining a firman, dated Nov. 6th, 1844, putting an end to these cruelties both at Damascus and the Island of Rhodes, and declaring that the Jews should be protected, and should enjoy the same rights as other nations dependent on the Porte.

These accumulated statements of cruelties practiced upon the Jews, especially in Mohammedan countries, if taken by themselves, would undoubtedly give an exaggerated idea of their sufferings. It must be recollected, that vast numbers of them are too poor in reality, and many others too poor in appearance, to tempt cupidity; that their oppressors treat them with some degree of leniency, as they do the brutes subjected to their service, from motives of self-interest; that the rulers often protect them from the malice of the people, in order that their own revenues may not suffer; that the natural feelings of humanity, quite extinct in no human breast, unnerve the arm of persecution; and the necessary influence and ready artifices of a race preeminently shrewd and intelligent save them from many imminent perils."

In this country, France, Holland and parts of Germany, their freedom is almost complete, and few privileges are denied them, except by private prejudice. Napoleon gave an impulse in the true direction here, as on many other subjects. In England, their position casts a strange blur on her pompous advocacy of the cause of human freedom. In Italy, Spain Portugal, they are scarcely tolerated.

CLAIMS OF THE HEATHEN.

At the recent meeting in behalf of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, an address was delivered by Rev. Mr. Hutchings, missionary from Madras, of which the following is an abstract:—

"He spoke of the difficulties of the labors of the Missionary, and of the reasons why often so little was heard, when perhaps the success had in part been greatest. In fact, the missionary might consider himself successful if he even procured a hearing for his preaching. He prepared the way for others to follow him, he sowed the seed of the harvest of which others would reap. Is there no success in all these labors of the Missionaries, when many of the natives have been married, and bring their wives and children to worship at the footstool of Jesus? When we look at what is done in this land for the advancement of Christianity, it is a matter of astonishment that so little is done towards the evangelizing of the Heathen. Why, in one district of Hindoostan, with a million of inhabitants, there are over 16,000 Brahmins (Priests) with a host of attendant Brahmins and followers of all kinds; with over 2,000 dancing girls, (Bayaderes,) guilty of all sorts of vices and licentiousness, to carry on their particular kind of craft. And as all these get their living by the grossness, ignorance and superstition of the poor Hindoos, of course they oppose Missionary efforts by every means in their power. Hydra-headed caste stands in our way. The bodily austerity of the wild and naked Fakirs is used to deceive the people, who run riot with licentiousness and obscenity. Female purity prevails not; female modesty is not respected—nay, is thrown to the winds. There is a horrible indulgence in impure practices; no moral obligations are regarded there.—All the superstitions stand in our way; their luxurious self-indulgence is the obstacle; and when we look at what is given by the people for the cause of the Church, compared with what is given by the world for secular purposes, how trifling is the amount of the former. Why, sir, there are $2,500,000 given in India for one single festival—and for what? To worship a log of wood; and at one festival, one person alone gave $1,500,000; and the money when taken through the streets filled 20 or 30 carts. And yet see how little is given by 400,000 Christian communicants for the whole of the great cause of Foreign Missions. If the people of Christ would give as freely for Christianity as the Heathens do for the cause of the King of Darkness, we should soon have the world evangelized. In this country you havo 18,000 Christian pastors; one to every 1000 persons; that is at the East; and in the West you have one to every 1400 people; and all this in a land of Bibles, tracts, deacons, elders, &c.; where there are over 3,000,000 evangelical communicants, and where every one in five over 10 years of age is a communicant. In India we have only one missionary to every 100,000 persons, and that too in a land of darkness. In the island of Tahiti there are 18 missionaries to 16,000 people, or one to every 900. But if we had 60 missionaries in Madras, we then should have only one to every 10,000 souls. You must therefore pray more, believe more, hope more, give more! Still even now there are 50,000 in Southern India undergoing a course of Christian instruction. The Church must pour its property freely into the Treasury of the Lord; then the idols of the heathen will be utterly abolished, and God will be exalted above the heathen.

TOO LATE.

I once saw a man upon whose head had beaten almost eighty winters, rise in a large congregation to request the people of God to pray for him. Never shall I forget the scene. There he stood, covered with the locks which time had whitened, leaning upon the top of his staff. He felt that he was a sinner. His locks had whitened in the service of Satan. With a trembling voice and quivering lip he said, "I wish to go to Jesus; but I fear it is too late." A thrill ran through the assembly. Too late! An aged sinner tottering upon the brink of eternity with a world of glory yet to be lost or won!

Aged friend, is it too late for you? Has the heavenly messenger been grieved for the last time, and left you like the shattered oak of the plain, to ripen in the beams of the sun for the consuming flames? Oh, turn your trembling footsteps to Calvary, peradventure there is mercy yet in store for thee. Hasten to that fountain opened for sin and uncleanness. Linger not for a more convenient season. Fall into the hands of mercy. Then shalt thou lean upon the top of thy staff and worship. Then shalt thou go down into the dark valley of the shadow of death, leaning upon the arm of Jesus; then shalt thou be gathered into the great company of patriarchs, apostles and saints, where immortal youth shall bloom forever upon thy temples, and where death is never known.

N. O. Prot.

From the Boston Recorder.

SEND ME THE PAPER.

1. Because I am wiser than I was last year at this time. I then wrote stop! on a valuable religious periodical, and sent it to the editor. I am now wise enough to write stop on such a course of folly.

2. Send me the paper, because I have been no gainer by stopping it. I thought it would be an accession of a couple of dollars or more to my capital. But the money was put into a bag with holes. I have made such a speculation as it would be going on board ship, where they were taking in lumber at the hatches, while a rogue was pitching the best of the cabin furniture out of the windows. I do no know that there is a penny more in my pocket for writing stop, and I do know, that spiritually, I am lean and thin visaged to a mournful degree. If it was proper to compare so noble an animal as man with a quadruped, I would submit myself for comparison with the ill favored kine mentioned in Genesis. The truth is, I have been starving this twelvemonth. I have picked only here and there a morsel of religious information during the whole period. I have not had nourishment of this kind enough even for a babe in spiritual things.

3. I have been placed in not a few awkward and mortifying predicaments by stopping my paper. My pastor in preaching has referred to many important facts respecting the spread of the gospel, to which I was as much a stranger as if I had been the keeper of a light-house on the north-west coast; and in conversation he has often said, in allusion to religious intelligence, 'Brother, you know that and that.' But I must be as mute as a fish, and assume as striking a look of intelligence as possible, without saying a word, for I could not say yes, without breaking a well known moral precept, or say no, without committing a dreadful act of violence to my pride. I have thought the pastor made some of his assumptions about my knowledge for some other purposes than ministering to my self-complacency. But suspicious as I have sometimes been about the matter, I had not quite evidence enough, nor quite the conscience to pick a quarrel. But upon this I am resolved, I will not walk on slippery places another year.

4. I have trouble of another sort by stopping my paper. I was once not only a contributor to benevolent objects, but a very cordial one. I have seen the day, when I took for a charitable object, a dollar out of my pocket, with as much pleasure as ever a miser put the same amount into his. But intelligence respecting the wants and miseries of the world has ceased reaching me, my money has assumed a preciousness very marvellous. Iron seems to have become silver, and wood brass, and stones iron, and everything that I have, has mounted up to a prodigious height in my estimation. The consequence is, that when a collector of charity calls, he sees the sternness of a wintry sky in my countenance. A dazzling brightness and beauty seems to attach itself to every coin I possess. The consequence is, said coins do not leave my possession without longing looks being sent after them, and not a little sourness is felt toward any one who has been skillful enough to part me and my beloved. It was otherwise with me when knowledge concerning the perishing was poured every week upon my mind. But I shut down the gate. The stream was stopped, and I became as a land where no water is; was parched, shriveled up with covetousness, and hence my trouble. But I will up with the gate again; so send me the paper, and I will see whether the sealed fountain will not gush forth once more in kindness and good will towards men.

5. One more reason why I want the paper. My neighbors belong to a different kingdom from that to which I am professedly attached. With the interests of the kingdom of this world they seem perfectly familiar. Political events and political men, political triumphs and defeats, all over the land, are known in all needful minuteness. But, about the kingdom to which I professedly belong, its honor or injury, its advancement or declension, I have had for the last twelvemonth, only shreds and patches of knowledge. "Shame on the man," says my conscience, "that can suffer the children of this world to be wiser in these matters than the children of the kingdom." Send me the paper, therefore. I must know, I will know the joys and sorrows of Zion. I will sympathize in her sadness, and glory in her triumphs. I will once more look out on the moral features of the world. I will not hide my face from the gloom and misery of a race perishing in sin. I will not shut my eyes from what a friend of the Redeemer, to what one, hopefully an heir of his eternal mercy, ought to see, know and feel. Stop my paper? No. I am ashamed of that. It is stopping love, and zeal, and prayer, and usefulness. It is stopping up fountains of happiness. No; I will not stop the paper; so send it, Mr. Editor; and when you see Stop, written on another of my papers returned, you may be assured it has been by one who has gone to the poor-house, or mad-house, or the house appointed for all the living.

THE GRAVE OF HARRIET NEWELL.

I had long desired to see that honored spot, and when the captain informed us of his purpose to touch at the Isle of France, I determined to visit the burial ground. Having learned that a missionary of the London Society resided in the island, I succeeded, after making many inquiries, in finding him. His name is Le Brun; he has been there thirty years, and says there has been a great change for the better since he came. He has a small congregation of French Protestants, to whom his labors are mainly confined, though he does something among the seamen. In both he is assisted by his son, who was educated partly in France and partly in England, and is now a professor in the Royal College at Port Louis. The population of the island is 120,000, besides the coolies from India, on the sugar plantations, of whom there are from 25 to 30,000. For the religious instruction of these nothing is done.

The next day I went again, and the younger Mr. Le Brun kindly accompanied me to the burial ground. It is about a mile from Port Louis, on the sea shore. The approach to it is through a long and beautiful avenue of fir trees. Some of the tombs are splendid, and the ground is adorned with trees of various kinds. Catholics and Protestants lie intermingled. On the grave of the former were flowers which had been deposited by friends, and which are frequently renewed. This, I was told, is common, if not universal in France and other Catholic countries. The grave of Harriet Newell we found without difficulty, though Mr. L. had twice before looked for it in vain. It is covered with a large stone, on which is an inscription prepared by the American Board, and at the head is an upright stone with the initials of her name, H. A. N. The latter seemed to have been put up recently and probably for the purpose of more easily identifying the spot. On this, Mr. Judson and three or four others had left their names in pencil. By the side of this departed saint rested the remains of a Wesleyan missionary, who lived there but about six months, who was much persecuted by the ungodly, both among Protestants and Catholics. Long could I have lingered in this lovely spot, but my guide was in haste. Two or three days after we had left the island I learned that the devoted Thomason, of Calcutta, was also buried there.

[Rev. Mr. Hutchings.

PROSPECTS OF GENERAL PEACE.

During a recent debate in Parliament, Lord Palmerston, in his attack on the slave trade negotiation now going on between the Duc de Broglie, and Dr. Lushington, accused Sir Robert Peel of having made dishonorable concessions to France. The right hon. baronet, in repelling the charge, enunciated principles which must afford great gratification to the friends of peace. He avowed his predilections for a pacific policy, and announced his determination to pursue that policy as long as he could do so without compromising the honor or sacrificing the interests of the country. It is pleasing to find that the leading powers of Europe are not only avowing, but acting on the same pacific principle. Guizot is emphatically the minister of peace. Louis Phillippe is the monarch of peace. He estimates the blessings of peace at so high a value, that from his language it might be supposed that he would sooner lose his crown than become a party to another European War.

There is, therefore, every ground to believe that the peace of Europe will be long preserved. The political sky wears a pacific aspect. We are mistaken, indeed, if the days of European war be not over. Apart from mere feeling on the subject, the nations are at length opening their eyes to the folly and miseries of war. What was ever gained by it? What European country can be named that has ever been benefited by hostilities with another country? What country, on the contrary, ever engaged in a war that was not a loser by it —a loser in treasure as well as in the lives of its subjects? Even the victorious power is often ruined by its triumphs. Look at England. We vanquished Napoleon; but what was the price at which our victories were purchased? The answer is to be found in the present overtaxed condition of the people. Our triumphs were purchased at the cost of £600,000,000. We are suffering for our victories now. Nor will the pernicious consequences of our wars and our victories be confined to ourselves. They will outlive us for many a long year; our descendants for ages to come will have to smart severely for the folly.

TRUTH MINGLED WITH ERROR.—Jeremy Taylor says, that where there are divers opinions, they may all be false; there can be but one true; and that one truth oft-times must be fetched by piece-meal out of divers branches of contrary opinions. For it falls out not seldom, that truth is through ignorance or rash vehemency, scattered into sundry parts; and, like to a little silver melted amongst the ruins of a burnt house, must be tried out from heaps of much superfluous ashes. There is much pains in the search of it; much skill in finding it; the value of it, once found, requites the cost of both.

"Would you like to hear me preach, Lamb," said the eloquent and mystical Coleridge. "I never heard you do anything else," was the reply.

NEW YORK, MAY 22, 1845.

Our Anniversaries.

The SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION, and the AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY, held their Anniversaries in Plainfield, N. J., on the fourth and fifth days of last week. Considerable interest has been felt in the meetings of these Societies—not so much on account of the actual labor which they have performed, as on account of the indications which the meetings would give in regard to future labor. Our benevolent organizations had been for a time past in a sort of transition state. The old Societies had been given up, and the new ones designed to supply their places had scarcely assumed a settled form. Of course those who felt interested in our benevolent movements, could not fail to look anxiously for the result of the Anniversaries. We are happy to express our conviction, that the Societies are fast assuming a form which will ensure their permanent and ex~~tensive usefulness. It is true that their receipts~~ for the few months which have elapsed since their last reports, have been small; but it is equally true, that there is a growing interest in their welfare—that the duty of co-operating with them is more deeply felt—and that the plans for making them useful by occupying the field spread out before them, are more comprehensive and liberal. We cannot look upon these facts without deriving encouragement from them. A brighter day is dawning upon us. If we will but engage heartily in the support of these organizations, they will do more than all other means to remove sectional jealousies, and promote harmony and general improvement. Let us resolutely put our hands to the work; and by patient continuance in it, we may be sure that the cause of truth and our own peace will be equally advanced.

SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.

The Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association held its Third Anniversary in Plainfield, N. J., on the fourth day of last week, May 14.

The Introductory Discourse was preached by Solomon Carpenter, from Matt. 28: 19, 20—"Go ye therefore and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and lo I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." The discourse presented in a clear manner the condition of the unevangelized portion of the world, and the necessity and encouragement for Christian effort on their behalf.

After the discourse, the President, Thomas B. Brown, called the Society to order; committees were appointed to arrange the business of the Society for an afternoon session, and also to nominate officers for the ensuing year.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Afternoon Session was opened with prayer by Wm. B. Maxson. The committee on the nomination of officers reported the names of the following persons, who were thereupon chosen, viz.:

For President,
THOMAS B. BROWN, of Milton, Pa.
Vice Presidents,
RANDOLPH DUNHAM, of Plainfield, N. J.
WM. B. MAXSON, Berlin, N. Y.
DAVID DUNN, New Market, N. J.
WM. M. FAHNESTOCK, Bordentown, N. J.
Recording Sec.—W. B. GILLETT, New Market, N. J.
Corresponding Sec.—S. DAVISON, Plainfield, N. J.
Directors,
NATHAN V. HULL, Clarence, N. Y.
SOLOMON CARPENTER, Shiloh, N. J.
JOHN WHITFORD, Berlin, N. Y.
CLARK GREENMAN, Mystic, Ct.
F. W. STILLMAN, New York.

The Report of the Executive Board was then read by Samuel Davison, from which we collect the following statements:—

During the eight months which have elapsed since the last report, six missionaries have been under appointments from the Board, four of whom have fulfilled the appointments conferred upon them by laboring in the States of Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Virginia. Besides these, the Central Association has had three missionaries under appointment during parts of the same time; and the churches in Ohio and Indiana have had an itinerant missionary. These brethren have labored with much benefit to the souls of men. Brother Richard C. Bond, who has labored among the five Sabbath-keeping churches in Western Virginia, reports that his labors have been much blessed. A gracious revival has been enjoyed by the church in New Salem, Va., as the result of which upwards of thirty persons have been baptized, and several have embraced the Sabbath. Bro. Lucius Crandall has continued his labors at Newport, R. I., and several other places in the vicinity. The prospects of the mission are regarded as encouraging. Several persons have embraced the Sabbath; a few have united with the church by letter; and the missionary has baptized six persons on profession of their faith. Bro. Thos. E. Babcock has filled his station in Persia, N. Y., and vicinity, with much acceptance to the people and advantage to the cause. He has distributed tracts, preached, and in other ways labored for the salvation of souls. Two persons have embraced the Sabbath, and two have been baptized. Bro. Azor Estee has spent about four months in a missionary tour through parts of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Maryland. He visited the German Seventh-day Baptists in Pennsylvania, and labored among them for a time with considerable encouragement. They manifested much interest in our movements, and gave evidence of a disposition to engage with us in the work of promulgating the truth. He also visited, in passing from place to place, a large number of ministers of the Gospel, with whom he had conversation on the subject of the Sabbath, and whom he supplied with Sabbath publications. The field formerly occupied by Bro. James L. Scott, in Illinois and Iowa, has remained for the most part unoccupied since the last report, in consequence of his having returned to the State of New York, and there being no other person ready to enter the field. There is, however, a pressing demand for labor in that region, and it is earnestly hoped that by some means one or more persons may be stationed there. In conclusion, the report alludes to the extent of the work yet to be done, and speaks encouragingly of the prospects, if we will engage earnestly in the work.

The Report of the Treasurer was read by A. D. Titsworth, from which we learn that the receipts since the last Anniversary have not been ~~large. We are not able to give the exact sum.~~

A resolution was introduced by Samuel Davison, and seconded by David Dunn, that the Constitution of the Society be so altered as to entitle any person paying into the treasury one dollar annually, to become a member of the Society. This proposition led to considerable discussion, but was finally adopted by a unanimous vote.

EVENING SESSION.

The Evening Session was appropriated mainly to the discussion of a series of resolutions, which were finally adopted. The discussion was of an interesting and animated character, but our notes are not sufficiently full to enable us to give even an outline of it. The following are the resolutions under consideration, with the names of the movers and seconders, each of whom addressed the meeting upon the subjects embodied in the several resolutions:—

1. Presented by Wm. B. Maxson, and seconded by David Dunn—

Resolved, That the spirit of missionary enterprise is inseparable from true piety, and indispensable to the prosperity of our churches.

2. Presented by Lucius Crandall, and seconded by Geo. B. Utter—

Resolved, That according to our numbers and resources as a denomination, we are bound to see that the ministry of reconciliation is extended toward the recovery of an apostate world.

3. Presented by Thos. B. Brown, and seconded by Solomon Carpenter—

Resolved, That the system of theology which harmonizes with the true doctrine of the Sabbath, is the system which above all others is calculoted to bless mankind; and that increased effort ought to be made for its diffusion.

The following resolution was brought before the Society at a session on fifth day, May 15. The subject was felt to be one of great importance and solemnity, and the discussion upon it was therefore continued for some time. After a careful consideration of the arguments for and against it, the resolution was unanimously adopted, the subscription contemplated in it opened, and liberal sums subscribed:—

Resolved, That the Executive Board be instructed immediately to open a subscription for the purpose of establishing a Foreign Mission; that they be instructed to use their best endeavors to procure one or more individuals who may be willing and ready to engage in such a work; and that the Board be requested to forward from time to time to the editor of the Sabbath Recorder for publication, such information as may come into their possession adapted to enlighten the people upon this important subject.

After having held three interesting sessions, the Association finally adjourned to meet in Berlin, N. Y., on the sixth day of the week before the first Sabbath in June, 1846, at which time Eld. Nathan V. Hull is to preach the Introductory Discourse, Geo. B. Utter being his alternate.

AMERICAN SABBATH TRACT SOCIETY.

The American Sabbath Tract Society held its Second Anniversary on fifth-day, May 16. The President, Lucius Crandall, took the chair, and the session was opened with prayer by Thomas B. Brown.

The report of the Treasurer was then read, from which it appears that the money received since September last, amounts to $359,45, of which $266,31 has been expended in agencies and the gratuitous circulation of tracts. A balance remains in the treasury about equal to the claims against the Society for tracts, printing, etc.

The Annual Report of the Board of Directors was read by Thomas B. Stillman, from which we collect the following facts:—

The Board express their sense of the growing importance of the Society's labors, and their conviction that a more extended system of operations ought to be entered upon for diffusing abroad the true doctrine of the Sabbath. They also feel confident that there is an increasing and encouraging zeal to carry forward the work. An arrangement has been made with the New York City Sabbath Tract Society, by which this Society has come into possession of the stereotype plates of the series of Sabbath Tracts, the Sabbath Vindicator, and the Address to the Baptists. Two new tracts have been added to the series within a short time. A new edition has just been printed of Tracts No. 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9; also a cheap edition of the Baptist Address for general circulation, and a fifth edition of Sabbath Vindicator No. 1. The Society has under consideration the publication of an edition of George Carlow's book, entitled "Truth Defended," in reply to Mr. Ward; the work being now in the hands of a revising committee. To defray the expense of this undertaking, reliance is placed mainly upon the prompt sale of the books. In order to facilitate the Society's work, books of subscription for members have been circulated, in connection with an address upon the subject. Sufficient time has not yet elapsed to secure full returns, but so far as received, the returns are favorable. The Board have on hand several old and valuable books, of which they are desirous to publish a complete edition, or at least an epitome, as soon as circumstances will warrant it. Among these they mention a book of Theophilus Brabourne, first published in 1632, of which only two copies are known to be in existence; another by Edward Stennett, the father of the family of ministers of that name, published in 1664; also works of Francis Bampfield, Thomas Bampfield, Robert Cornthwaite, and others. The Board think that the circulation of these books would serve to excite among Sabbath-keepers that spirit of devotion to the truth which manifestly characterized its early champions. They hope, at the same time, that the books would find many readers among those who now regard the question as altogether a modern one. Since the last Anniversary, the Board has furnished credentials to brethren N. V. Hull, and ~~T. B. Brown, to attend a Convention in Balti~~more, at which Bro. Hull was present, and distributed a considerable quantity of Sabbath publications. Bro. Azor Estee was engaged for a time as an agent of the Society so far as he could present its claims compatibly with the interests of another Society for which he was laboring. In conclusion, the Board express a hope that the friends of this cause will furnish them with the means of carrying forward with greater energy the work in which they have engaged.

A committee having been appointed for the purpose of nominating officers for the ensuing year, presented the following report, which was unanimously adopted:—

For President,
LUCIUS CRANDALL, Newport, R. I.
Vice Presidents,
1. GEORGE B. UTTER, New York.
2. DAVID DUNN, New Market, N. J.
3. ALFRED STILLMAN, New York.

Treasurer—T. B. STILLMAN, N. Y.
Board of Directors,
JOHN WHITFORD, Berlin, N. Y.
SOLOMON CARPENTER, Shiloh, N. J.
WM. B. MAXSON, Berlin.
THOMAS B. BROWN, Milton, Pa.

RESOLUTIONS.

1. The following resolution was presented by Thomas B. Brown, and seconded by Solomon Carpenter:—

Resolved, That this Society regards the circumstances of the present time, and especially the efforts now making to promote a stricter observance of the first day of the ~~week, as both encouraging and demanding increased ex~~ertion on the part of Sabbath-keepers to make known their views.

In presenting this resolution, Mr. BROWN spoke of his satisfaction in view of the discussion now going on. Sabbath-keeping is to many persons a self-denying duty; and when they are called upon to keep the first day of the week with greater strictness, they will naturally inquire in regard to the reason of the thing. The result of such inquiry may be, that when men see no command for the observance of that day, they will fall into neglect of it. But this will prepare the way for a reformation in regard to the Sabbath, and will show the imperative necessity of it. With us the Sabbath should be a prominent subject of discussion—not to the neglect of other important doctrines, to be sure—but in connection with them, and in just proportion to its real importance. Other doctrines have their advocates. This is committed to us. It is the banner which God has given us to lift up, and He will hold us responsible for displaying it. There are times when some particular form of truth becomes especially important, and is really a test of Christian character. It has been so in regard to the true doctrine of baptism. In this country at the present time, the maintenance of it is no test of character; but in Copenhagen, where Baptists are outlawed and imprisoned, it is felt to be the test. So is it in regard to the Sabbath. At the present time, while the most violent opposition is manifested towards the Sabbath, though under the name of zeal for a rival institution, it becomes our duty to unfurl our banner for this truth, and to oppose all papal usurpations.

Mr. CARPENTER, in seconding the resolution, spoke of the advantages now enjoyed for disseminating the truth upon the subject of the Sabbath. We are at liberty to speak our opinions freely; we have a common standard, the Bible, to which all denominations profess to refer as authority for their practice; there is, therefore, common ground on which to meet our opponents. The over-action of the friends of the first day has produced a re-action, opening the eyes of many persons to see the subject in a new light. God thus prepares the way for the truth, and will accompany with his blessing the efforts to make it known. These considerations demand increased exertion. At the same time, let us guard against all just occasion for the charge of sectarianism and bigotry, by giving to every doctrine its true importance and merited attention.

2. The following resolution was presented by Samuel Davison, and seconded by Isaac D. Titsworth:—

Resolved, That in efforts to make known their views, Sabbath-keepers should avail themselves of the aid of the press, and may look with confidence to the circulation of tracts and papers as a means of exerting an influence.

In support of this resolution, Mr. DAVISON spoke of the changes which are continually taking place in the modes of presenting religious truth. But it seems to be conceded by all other denominations, and by all reformatory societies, that the press, and especially tract distribution, is a most successful auxiliary. Truth presented in this way does not meet with that direct and violent opposition which it does in the form of discussion. To overlook this aid, therefore, is to cut off the right arm of our strength. Mr. D. then spoke of the movements of divine Providence in connection with the press, and referred to many instances in which men shut up in prison or some retired corner, have exerted a greater influence through the press than they could in any other way. In conclusion, he urged the importance of engaging more resolutely in this work, and spoke of the encouragement to be derived from our past observation of its influence.

Mr. TITSWORTH illustrated the value of tract distribution by reference to many facts which had come under his own observation. He attended the Baltimore Convention, and saw there with what eagerness publications were seized upon. He had distributed tracts in his own neighborhood, and had seen the disposition of some who were afraid of the truth, to destroy all the tracts which came in their way. These facts convinced him of the efficiency of this instrumentality, and inspired him with confidence in the final result of tract distribution.

3. The following resolution was presented by George B. Utter, and seconded by Thomas B. Stillman:—

Resolved, That this Society deems it important to re-publish, for the sake of preserving and circulating, such works of old authors on the subject of the Sabbath, as are adapted to illustrate the history of the discussion, and to enforce the claims of truth.

Mr. UTTER, in presenting this resolution, spoke of the growing interest in the works of old authors upon theological subjects. Although we do not rely much upon the authority of "the Fathers," there is nevertheless good reason for feeling an interest in what has been said by those who have gone before us. This is especially true of the old authors on the subject of the Sabbath. In their works we see how very nearly the same truths have affected different minds in different ages. We see also how fearlessly men have defended the true doctrine of the Sabbath in the face of danger; and how cheerfully they have endured persecution, and even death, in its defence. We owe it to ourselves to re-publish those old works, that we may by the study of them catch something of the spirit of their authors. We owe it to the writers, that their memory may be cherished among us, and their labors appreciated. We owe it to the world, that they may see that the views we hold are as old as the Reformation, and as ably and successfully maintained as any of the doctrines which the Reformation served to bring under discussion.

Mr. STILLMAN, in seconding the resolution, said, I think, sir, the publication of the early works of Sabbatarian writers would have the effect to inspire us with some degree of that spirit and zeal which led them, in the days of persecution, to suffer imprisonment and death for this truth. Who can read the spirit-stirring appeals of Brabourne or Stennett without partaking in some degree of the feelings which actuated them in publishing, in the face of their adversaries, this unwelcome truth? It has been said here, that we are often asked why we have waited till the nineteenth century before this question is pressed upon the consideration of the church. Sir, read this book I have in my hand, and you will not say the Sabbath had no advocates before the nineteenth century. It was written more than two hundred years ago; and what became of these works? Why, they were considered heretical; their authors imprisoned and persecuted; their followers fined and forbidden by law to meet on the Sabbath for worship. I trust we may be enabled to read their works and treasure their spirit in our day. It would accomplish much.

4. The following resolution was presented by Wm. B. Maxson, and seconded by Lucius Crandall:—

Resolved, That while we as a Society acknowledge with gratitude the success which has attended our past efforts, we rely upon the aid of the Holy Spirit for future success, and therefore ask the prayers of the people of God in behalf of the object for which we are laboring.

Eld. MAXSON accompanied his resolution by remarks upon the need of the Spirit's influences in order to rouse men to labor in this cause, to enable them to prepare fit works on the subject, and to make those works effectual. The Spirit's influences are needed in every department of Christian effort, but more especially in this, because obedience to the truth is opposed by so many worldly interests. The need of divine influence is too much overlooked in controversy; hence there is much said that does not reach the heart. But let our eyes be directed to aid from above, while we maintain the right, and a different result will be seen. This will be a protection to ourselves, an encouragement to others, and a pledge of success.

Mr. CRANDALL seconded the resolution, and said that the need of spiritual influence was not a favorite theme with him, on which account he might not do it justice. Several considerations might be mentioned, however, to illustrate this need. It is known to those who have had some experience in public discussions of the Sabbath question, that it is often difficult when speaking on the subject to interest our hearers and sustain our own spirits, as we can when speaking upon other points. This may be because the subject is a controverted one—because we feel that our hearers put themselves in a posture of defence. Now in such a case we stand in need of the influences and graces of the Spirit to sustain our minds and temper our addresses so that the speaker may be animated, the hearer interested, and the truth accepted. We have reason to pray that our fellow-men and fellow-professors should have the influences of, and be directed by, the Spirit of God. We find it very easy to convince men, even professors of religion, that the seventh day is the Sabbath. Taking the Bible as the rule of faith and practice, multitudes of Protestants can be convinced that our views of the Sabbath are correct. But they will not practice in accordance with their convictions. And what is the reason they give for their course? They say, "It is not convenient; we could not get along and keep the seventh day." So you see they act on a worldly principle. They are dictated by the spirit of the world. They decide as men of the world decide. So far as an intelligent conviction goes in the case, or is necessary in bringing men right, we can work out the form of the man, but we cannot make him act. Unless the Spirit of God breathe into him life, he will not act—he will not become a living soul. And we may convince the nations of the world of the truth of our doctrine, but if they have not the influences of the Spirit of God, if they are not directed by it, they will be no better off than they are now. For tho' from their premise, the Bible, we bring them by a direct line to the conclusion that the seventh day is the Sabbath, yet men who are under the control of the spirit of the world, instead of practically carrying out the conclusions resulting unavoidably from rules which they themselves acknowledge, will, whenever their temporal interests demand it, turn a short corner, or deviate from a straight line as much as may suit their convenience. But when men are under the direction of the Spirit of God they pursue a straight course, whatever the difficulties of the way may be. This is a peculiar mark, which distinguishes those who are led by the Spirit of God from those who give themselves up to the guidance of the Spirit of this world.

5. The following resolution was presented by Samuel Davison, and after a full and free discussion, was unanimously passed:—

Resolved, That the Executive Board be requested to take into consideration the best means of interesting the Jews in restoring to the world just views on the subject of the Sabbath.

After a lengthy session, the Society adjourned to meet at Berlin, N. Y., on the fifth day of the week before the first Sabbath in June, 1846, on the evening of which day Lucius Crandall is by appointment to preach a discourse upon the subject of tract efforts—Thomas B. Brown being his alternate.

SOUTHERN BAPTIST CONVENTION.

A Convention of Southern Baptists met at Augusta, Ga., two weeks ago, for the purpose of considering the expediency of forming a Southern organization for benevolent purposes. There were three hundred delegates in attendance from the States of Maryland, Virginia, North and South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Louisiana, Kentucky, and the District of Columbia. A committee of sixteen was appointed to prepare a preamble and resolutions for the Convention, who reported in effect, that "the Boston Board have, in their answer to the Alabama resolutions, most clearly and unnecessarily exceeded their power and violated their trust;" that in declaring they will not appoint as a missionary any one who persists in holding slaves, they have departed from the course hitherto pursued by the Triennial Convention; that this decision was not reversed at the late meeting in Providence; and that, therefore, it is proper and necessary for the Convention to proceed at once to organize a Society for the propagation of the Gospel. This report was adopted, and the Society which it contemplates was accordingly formed, with officers taken from the leading men among the Southern Baptists. The opinion of the members of the Convention seems to have been, that with this Southern organization all things would go on "swimmingly." Perhaps they will, but we see little reason to expect it.

◆

"RHODE ISLAND SABBATH UNION."—We see it stated, that this newly-organized Union has ordered from the American Tract Society 25,000 copies of Dr. Edwards' Sabbath Manual, (a pamphlet of 82 pages,) with a view of furnishing a copy to every family in the State. This surely indicates a commendable zeal for the enlightenment of the people of Rhode Island. We trust our friends in that State will take a lesson from this movement.

◆

PROGRESS.—A line of steamboats has lately been established between this city and Providence, R. I., one of which leaves New York regularly on Sunday evening at five o'clock. Such a "desecration" of the first day of the week is quite new on this route, and may possibly indicate that the "Progress of Sabbath Reform," so much talked of, is backward rather than forward. The New York Evangelist may well ask, in view of it, "Where is Dr. Edwards?"

◆

"SLIPSLIDIFICATION."—Under this heading, we find in the Baptist Record an article from an Episcopal paper, setting forth that "at a meeting of the Standing Committee of Pennsylvania, on Tuesday, the 6th inst., the Rev. Gideon B. Perry, D. D. L. L. D., pastor of the New Market Street Baptist congregation, Philadelphia, was received as a candidate for orders in the Church." Thus the successors of the apostles are multiplying from the ranks of the unordained.

◆

Bishop DeLancy of the Episcopal Church, on Friday last, met with a serious, and it is feared fatal accident, near Batavia, N. Y. He was on his way to fulfil an appointment at East Bethany, when the horses took fright, and the Bishop jumped from the carriage, striking his head in the fall, and producing a severe congestion of the brain.

General Intelligence.

FIFTEEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The Steamship Britannia reached Boston on Monday last, bringing Liverpool dates to the 4th inst. We select the following items:—

The mammoth steamship Great Britain is to leave Liverpool for New York on the 26th of July next.

M. Guizot, of the French Foreign Department, has been dangerously ill, but is recovering.

The news from Switzerland is of a pacific character. The Extraordinary Diet makes no progress; but Commissioners of Government have negotiated for setting free the prisoners, for which Lucerne will receive about 500,000f.

It was reported in the Paris Bourse, on Saturday week, that England had applied to France to join her in a protest against the Annexation of Texas to the American Union.

A very disastrous accident occurred at Ashton-under-Lyne, on the afternoon of the 19th ult., involving the destruction of at least fourteen lives, the serious injury of two men, and a considerable pecuniary loss.

According to the official return of the Lords of the Admiralty, the naval force of Great Britain consists of 680 ships of war, carrying from one to one hundred and twenty guns each. Of this number there are 125 armed steam vessels, constructed on the most approved principles. This immense fleet employs in the time of peace 25,000 able-bodied seamen, 2000 stout lads, and 94 companies of Royal Marines.

Emigration to America.—Our advices from various ports from which emigrants depart, state that emigration to Canada and the United States is going on to a larger extent than ever before known. From Germany, also, it is equally large; 200 passengers have just arrived at Havre from Rotterdam, on their way to the Western World. It is to be regretted that the authorities in New York, Boston, &c. do not establish protective societies, not in name but in spirit, and secure the poor emigrant from the robbery and plunder to which he is subjected by the sharks who are allowed to board the ships on their arrival at their destined port.

A large number of persons from the Highlands of Scotland propose emigrating to Canada.

Egypt.—An act of the most wanton and barbarous character was perpetrated on a native Coptic Christian at Damietta. This person was accused of having spoken slightingly of the Mahomedan religion, and on the fact having been made known to the populace, they collected around him, gave him 500 lashes, paraded him naked through the streets mounted on a buffalo, with two dead dogs and a pig attached to his legs and shoulders, and afterwards beat him until he expired under the effects of the punishment. The European consuls have taken it up strongly, but the punishment inflicted on the principals has been limited to five years' incarceration in the Castle of Aboukir.

Reports from Syria stated that the plague had broken out at Jerusalem, and that the number of deaths is 40 a day.

New York Legislature.—This body closed its sixty eighth session on Wednesday, the 14th inst. —128 days after the time of assembling. The whole number of Acts passed is 367. Several prominent measures which have been under discussion were lost, including the bill to punish seduction, adultery, and brothel-keeping, and the bill proposing to reduce the burthens imposed upon the people by the militia system. The Tribune says:—

"The measure for which this Legislature will be longest remembered is the act 'Recommending a Convention of the People of this State,' though it does not recommend, but simply authorizes the People to call such a Convention, and provides the ways and means of making such call effectual. Next in importance is the bill relating to Excise, which separates the whole subject of Excise from our Political contests, and enables the People to determine, at a wholly independent poll, whether they will or will not permit the sale of intoxicating Liquors. The bill releasing the Erie Railroad Company from the payment of the $3,000,000 heretofore loaned it by the State, and looking to an early and effective prosecution of that work to its completion, is important, and we trust will prove beneficent. The bill appropriating $197,000 (being the surplus earnings of last year over and above all charges) to the continuous construction of the Erie Enlargement and Lateral Canals, though killed by the Governor's Veto, will be found one of the features of the Session.

Harnden's Emigrant Passenger Agency.—We learn from Mr. L. S. Littlejohn, agent of Harnden & Co., that during the season of canal navigation for 1844, commencing in April and ending in November, Harnden & Co. paid $107,775 21 to the Canal Association of Forwarders, for the transportation of passengers and their extra luggage upon the Erie canal. The whole number of passengers was sixty thousand, most of whom were immigrants from Europe, seeking a home in the far West. We are assured, also, that this vast business was conducted in a manner satisfactory to all parties.

From Mexico.—Vera Cruz, April 22.—A correspondent writes, that the arrival of the American squadron (consisting of the Potomac, the Falmouth, the Somers, and the Lawrence,) off the port of Vera Cruz, created much excitement. The sole topic of the day, he adds, continues to be "war with the United States. The people seem eager for it; but the government hesitates." [N. O. Pic.

From the interior it was reported that the earthquake shocks are continued, but no particulars are given. With respect to Texas, the Mexican government appears disposed to recognize her independence, and is willing to select France and England as umpires. Such is the tenor of our information. A proposition was before the Congress, to discontinue proceedings against Santa Anna if he would go into voluntary banishment for ten years. [Bee, 7th.

Some time ago, a gentleman, aware that Mr. Astor was better acquainted with the resources of Oregon than any person in this city, asked him what he thought of Oregon, and whether it would be a valuable acquisition? Mr. A. replied, "it was good for nothing but to furnish furs, and they were all gone long ago."

THE NEW POST OFFICE LAW.

We present the following abstract of the most essential provisions of the new Postage Bill of the last Congress, which takes effect from and after the 1st of July next.

1. The postage on every single letter or parcel, not exceeding half an ounce in weight, for any distance under 300 miles, is to be five cents, and for any distance over 300 miles, ten cents. Double letters are to pay double those rates; treble letters, treble those rates, &c. But every letter or parcel not exceeding half an ounce in weight, is to be deemed a single letter; and every additional half ounce, or additional weight less than half an ounce, is to be charged with an additional single postage. All drop letters, (i. e. letters placed in any Post Office, not for transmission by mail, but for delivery only,) are to pay two cents each; and letters advertised are to pay the cost of advertisement, in addition to the regular postage.

2. All newspapers of a size not exceeding 1900 square inches, are to be sent free of postage to any distance within thirty miles of the place where they are printed. For any distance over thirty miles, such papers are to pay the same rates of postage as heretofore, by the law of 1825. Newspapers of greater size than 1900 square inches, are to be subject to the rates charged upon magazines and pamphlets.

3. All printed or lithographed circulars, handbills, or advertisements, printed on quarto post, or single cap paper, or paper not larger than single cap, folded, directed, and unsealed, to be charged two cents postage for each sheet, whatever be the distance.

4. All pamphlets, magazines, periodicals, and every other kind of printed matter, (except newspapers) to be charged two and a half cents for each copy of not more than one ounce weight, whatever be the distance, and one cent additional for each additional ounce: and any fractional excess of not less than half an ounce, is to be charged as a full ounce.

5. The franking privileges granted by former acts, are abolished; but provisions nearly equivalent to them are made in the new act, viz: the franking privilege is allowed to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives, the delegates from Territories, the Secretary of the Senate, and the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Postmasters are authorized to charge, and have allowed to them in the settlement of their accounts with the Post Office Department, all postage which they may have paid or had charged to them, for letters or packages received by them on the business of their offices or of the Post Office Department, upon a verification on oath of their accounts for the same, and the transmission of the charged letters as vouchers. And they are also authorized to send free of postage, all letters and packages which it may be their duty or they may have occasion to transmit to any person or place, and which shall relate exclusively to the business of their offices, or to the business of the P. O. Department; but in every such case the Postmaster sending any such letter or package, must endorse thereon, over his own signature, the words 'Post Office business,'—under a penalty of three hundred dollars for any and every such endorsement falsely made.

6. The establishment of any and all private expresses for conveying letters and packages, or other matter properly transmittable by mail, (except newspapers, pamphlets, magazines, and periodicals,) is prohibited, under heavy penalties.

Melancholy Accidents.—In the town of Andes, Delaware Co., three persons were killed last week. On the 6th a number of individuals were engaged in preventing the fire from a burning fallow spreading to the woods, when a large maple tree burnt off near the ground, and, falling suddenly, crushed beneath it two persons, Nicholas Akerly and Timothy Perse. Mr. Akerly lived but a few minutes, being insensible all the time. He has left a wife and two children to mourn his melancholy death. Perse died soon after. On the 8th, a lad aged 13, named John O. Roney, was engaged in drawing logs down a hill, and not returning soon, search was made for him, when he was found dead, supposed to have been killed by either the horse or logs going over him.

Singular Trial—Dominick McBride has recently been tried in Colborne District, C. W., for attempting to murder a Catholic Priest, who was sleeping in his house. At the request of McBride's wife, the Priest had admonished him on his intemperate habits, when he swore he would have his revenge. In the middle of the night he arose, got his gun, and entering the priest's room, stabbed him in several places with the bayonet. A couple of young men, sleeping below, heard the scuffle and came in time to save the priest's life. The jury acquitted McBride.

Discovery of Ancient Treasure.—We find the following story in the Columbus (Georgia) Enquirer:

"We learn from a source which we think entitled to full credit, that a large deposite of silver coin was discovered about two weeks since on the East bank of the Altamaha River, about five miles below the junction of the Ocmulgee and Oconee, in Tatnall County. The place is called Milligan's Bluff, near Hall's Ferry. The circumstances related, are that a man by the name of John Maze, discovered three dollars, which had become exposed by the blowing up of a tree. He commenced examining the earth below, and the coin continued to appear, until he had exhumed the handsome amount of Forty-five Thousand Spanish Dollars. They appeared to have been deposited in canvass bags, and at some remote period, as the latest date on the coin was over 160 years since.

Decline of Cities.—While travelers abroad lament over the declining glories of Amsterdam and Venice, they forget that we have parallels on a smaller scale at home. The little port of Perth Amboy was once a rival of New York. Newport, seventy years ago, was the next sea-port of the East. Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, at one time transacted more business than Baltimore. Jamestown, once so important a place, is now in ruins; and the spot on which Roanoke was built is not even known. "So runs the world away."

Newspaper Postage.—This tax on the diffusion of useful knowledge to the people, must be rescinded. The newspaper press will never rest satisfied, we trust, until newspapers shall go free of postage, all over the United States. We will set this ball in motion—who will aid in rolling it onward? [United States Journal.

Counterfeit 5's of the Madison Co. Bank have been detected.

Statistics of Benevolence.—From the Reports of the leading Benevolent Societies, whose Anniversaries have been recently held, it appears that all of them have very considerably advanced during the past year. The following are the receipts of some of them:

Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions	$82,672
Foreign Evangelical Society	18,744
American Tract Society	152,376
American Home Mission Society	121,946
American Bible Society	166,652
American Board of Foreign Missions, during the last nine months, about $185,000; so that if the contributions continue in the same ratio the next three months, they will, for the year, amount to	246,666
Baptist Board of Foreign Missions	82,276

Evangelization of New England.—Mr. Alexander Campbell says, in the Millennial Harbinger, that a few benevolent churches in Ohio and Virginia have agreed to send their evangelists to make a tour through New England during the summer months. Four or five of the most intelligent and eloquent are named for this mission. Mr. C. states that on the Western Reserve of Ohio alone, there are almost 20,000 disciples, and he anticipates similar success in evangelizing New England. [Reflector.

A new Phase in Millerism.—A paper has been started in Utica, N. Y., called "The Voice of the Shepherd." In this paper the position is taken that the Lord Jesus did come on the 10th day of the 7th month of last year, entered into the hearts of his true saints, set up his kingdom there; that they are now actually in heaven, and the day of judgment is past.

Return of Missionaries.—The Rev. N. M. Crane, wife and five children, from the Madeira mission, and Mrs. Wyman, from the Ceylon mission, arrived at Boston on Sunday morning, May 4th. The children of the Rev. R. O. Dwight, who died of cholera about a year ago, came passengers in the same vessel. Mr. Crane sailed from Boston in 1836, and has been compelled to suspend his labors on account of ill health. They were all under the patronage of A. B. C. F. M.

British and Foreign Bible Society.—The receipts of this institution for the past year amount to £97,755, or nearly half a million of dollars. The issues of copies of the Scriptures, during the same time were 915,089.

The Bible Refused.—Some of the colored refugees in Canada, anxious to learn the revealed will of God, and unable to purchase the Bible for themselves, made an application to the Bible Society of Orange county, New York, for a donation of Bibles. The application was refused. The society was opposed to slaves running away, and determined to punish them for their love of liberty, by withholding from them the book which of all other things, they needed to help them to a true knowledge of the God they desire to serve. We cannot find words sufficiently strong to express our detestation of men who could be guilty of so unchristian—so unmanly a deed. Of whom but such as these is it said, "I was hungry and ye fed me not; naked, and ye clothed me not?" [Wash. Pat.

SUMMARY.

The whole absolute debt of New York City on the first of May, inst., was $12,454,497 50. The interest on the debt is $770,000 per annum.

A great horse-race took place on Long Island on Tuesday of last week, at which it is estimated that there were present 70,000 people. At least $100,000 was transferred from the pockets of the North to the pockets of the South on the occasion.

A Slaver was recently brought to Boston, a prize to the U. S. Brig Truxton. She was seized in March last at a slave factory on the coast of Africa; evidence having been lodged against her that she had already made a successful trip from the same place to the island of Cuba, with 346 slaves.

A single pin factory at Derby, Ct., turns out two and a half tons of pins in a week, or about 130 tons in a year—sufficient, one would think, to "pin up" the whole community.

The Boston people are in the last throes of agitation about a project for introducing water into their city, and their papers are full of arguments, pro and con, upon the subject; they have obtained an act from the Legislature authorizing them to bring in water either from Long Pond, which is a pond in Natick, some 14 miles from the city—or from Charles River. The question is to be put to the popular vote of the citizens, whether this act shall be accepted and acted upon.

Some of the papers, constitutionally addicted to the use of stimulating paragraphs, have published rather alarming accounts of the prevalence of Small Pox in the city. Although there have been rather an unusual number of cases at the Small Pox Hospital on Blackwell's Island, and perhaps in certain portions of the city itself, yet we can ascertain nothing authentic that ought to create apprehension.

News from Independence, Mo., informs that the emigrants, now near that point, number about 7000, all destined for Oregon and California. They will start about the same time, divided into convenient companies for traveling with ease and safety. The Indians will not attack a party of five hundred. Of course the emigrants this season stand in no fear of the red skins. It is astonishing what a tide is setting toward the fertile lands on the Pacific.

The New York Historical Society, by a nearly unanimous vote, have determined that it is not expedient that any effort should be made by the different learned bodies of the country to unite upon some specific geographical name for the country.

We learn that on Thursday afternoon two bodies, a man and a boy, were taken out of the river near Hudson—no doubt two of the passengers who were on board the Swallow. One of them is believed to be the son of General Mather. The Swallow has been raised.

The Croton Water department is in a flourishing condition. The receipts for the year ending the 31st December, 1844, were $118,000, and, from present appearances, they promise this year to reach the sum of $160,000.

A letter from Nashville, states that the health of Gen. Jackson is more rapidly failing, and that he cannot possibly long survive.

The Providence Gazette announces that Messrs. Bosworth and Heath are again at liberty. They took the oath of allegiance, and were discharged from custody.

There probably is not at this moment a more beautiful tree in the State than the high chestnut tree in Trinity Church yard, on Broadway, at the head of Pine-street—it is now in full bloom from top to bottom.

Chauncey Paul, an abolitionist of Springfield, Ill., was decoyed from his house, at midnight, last week, and cruelly beaten by a gang of ruffians.

Daniel Shannon, an inhabitant of Jackson, Mich., received a letter a few days since, informing him of a deposit in a bank in Ireland of £90,000 a portion of an estate to which he is heir at law.

$1's of Eagle Bank, Boston, altered to fives, exceedingly well done, are in circulation.

Passengers come through from Montreal to New York in 34 to 36 hours. Fare $6. Distance 400 miles.

The expense of travelling from New York to Cincinnati is now about $25; time required, five days.

The Bible Association of Friends in America held its annual meeting in Philadelphia on the evening of the 21st ult. The receipts of the year amounted to $2,794. Expenses, $2,707 35. Issues during the year, 2618 Bibles and 844 Testaments, being an increase of 1774 Bibles and 377 Testaments over the issues of the previous year.

Three full columns of the New York Express are taken up with arrivals, copied from registers of the different hotels. This list contains some eighteen hundred names! Of the number, 150 stopped at the Astor House, and 128 at Howard's Hotel.

A letter from Washington, N. C., May 1, states that the large swamps in Beaufort, Tyrel and Hyde counties, were on fire; two whole families burned up in Tyrel, one of the families consisting of a man, his wife, three children and three negroes; of the other family the writer did not learn how many were burned. The whole woods were on fire.

It has been ascertained that there are one hundred places in Chicago where liquor is retailed, and the nefarious trade is increasing in a fearful ratio to the growth of the city.

Buffalo is infested with mad dogs at present, and the authorities are ordering all to be shot, without regard to distinction. Several persons have been bitten.

The Cincinnati papers say that shad have made their appearance in the Ohio river, having traveled a distance of three thousand miles. It is time for the catfish to emigrate.

It is rumored that Orson Hyde is to become the prophet and head of the Mormon church. It is not said by what process he is to derive his authority.

The town of Warwick, R. I., decided, at the late election, by a vote of 353 to 62, to grant no licenses for the sale of spirituous liquors.

The English government clears three millions of dollars annually on its penny postage. The franking privilege is wholly abolished. Even Mrs. Victoria has to buy her penny stamps.

Worcester Co., Mass., has the honor of being the birth place of three members of the present cabinet, viz: Messrs. Bancroft, Walker, and Marcy—the two former were natives of Worcester, and the latter was born in Southbridge.

North Carolina presented the melancholy fact by the census of 1840, of possessing a greater number of white persons who could neither read or write, in proportion to the population, than any other State. She has no State prison, or any place for the confinement of prisoners, except the common county jails; and her penal code is severe even to barbarity. Some ten or twelve offences are punishable with death; among them, felony, by breaking into a house—and a negro was lately hung in Raleigh for this offence. Branding and whipping are among the punishments for certain deeds.

The Bible in Schools.—An interesting and useful Convention of County and Town Superintendents of Common Schools was recently held in Syracuse, N. Y. Among the many important subjects discussed was that of reading the Bible in Common Schools. A conciliatory resolution was introduced by Dr. Potter of Union College, to the effect that "the Convention regard the introduction of the Bible into schools as an object earnestly to be desired; but that the time and manner in which this object is to be accomplished, is a question which ought to be decided by the inhabitants of the Districts."

DIED,

At Manayunk, Pa., on the 26th ult., of pulmonary consumption, Vernelia Jane Ayars, only surviving child of Jonathan D. Ayars, aged 23 years. Her days were few and full of trouble. It is believed, however, by those who attended upon her in her last illness, that her afflictions were sanctified for the good of her soul.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION.

The Central Association will hold its Tenth Anniversary with the Seventh-day Baptist Church at Adams, Jefferson county, N. Y., commencing on the 11th of June, being the fourth day of the week before the second Sabbath in the month. Introductory discourse by Rev. Eli S. Bailey; substitute, Rev. S. B. Crandall.

It is hoped there will be a full attendance from all the churches of the Association, as there is business of vital importance to be transacted, especially our missionary business, and the publication of a Tract on Baptism. I hope, also, that our brethren will come prepared to discuss and dispose of the practice of laying on of hands on newly baptized believers, as there is now a division among us on that subject. G. M. Langworthy, Rec. Sec.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

THIS Institution has a pleasant and quiet location thirteen miles south-east of Angelica, and six mile south of Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y., under the care of W. C. Kenyon, as Principal, and Miss Caroline B. Maxson, as Preceptress, aided by able and experienced assistants.

Teachers' Classes will be exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining every facility of a Normal School, without its usual disadvantages. Within the past year, more than one hundred and fifty students of the institution have been employed as teachers in this and the adjacent counties—a number much larger than from any other institution in the State.

Students are prepared for entering any class in College. Ample advantages are also secured to those pursuing Modern Languages and the Fine Arts. The institution is liberally endowed and supplied with a choice and valuable library, and apparatus sufficiently extensive to illustrate every department of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. It has also well selected cabinets of Geological, Mineralogical and Conchological specimens.

The plan of instruction aims at the development of the moral, intellectual and physical powers of students, so as to render them thorough, accurate, and practical scholars.

Lectures on Chemistry, accompanied by a full course of experiments, will commence with the second week of the fall term, and continue daily to its close. During the fall and winter terms, daily lectures will be given on School Teaching. Lectures on Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Physiology, illustrated by experiments, will be given each term of the year.

Tuition, per term of fifteen weeks, from $3,50 to $5. Board per week, in private families, $1. The entire expense of the academic year, including tuition, board, washing, light, and fuel, need not exceed $60. No extra charges incurred.

SAMUEL RUSSEL,
President of the Board of Trustees.

RADIANT CLOUDS AT SUNSET.

BY MRS. L. H. SIGOURNEY.

Bright clouds! ye are gathering one by one,
Ye are sweeping in pomp round the dying sun,
With crimson banner, and golden pall
Like a host to their chieftain's funeral;
Perchance ye tread to that hallowed spot
With a muffled dirge, though we hear it not.

But methinks ye tower with a lordlier crest
And a gorgeous flush as he sinks to rest,
Not thus in the day of his pride and wrath
Did ye dare to press on his glorious path;
At his noontide glance ye have quaked with fear,
And hasted to hide in your misty sphere.

Do you say he is dead? You exult in vain,
With your rainbow robe and your swelling train;
He shall rise again with his strong, bright ray,
He shall reign in power when you fade away,
When ye darkly cower in your vapory hall,
Tintless, and naked, and noteless all.

The soul! the soul! with its eye of fire,
Thus, thus shall it soar when its foes expire,
It shall spread its wings o'er the ills that pained,
The evils that shadowed, the sins that stained;
It shall dwell where no rushing clouds hath sway,
And the pageants of earth shall have melted away.

Christian Burial,

Or the manner in which the early Christians treated their dead.

After watching and praying by the sick person, the first care of the early Christians, upon his dissolution, was to shut his mouth and close his eyes. This was agreeable to that decency and decorum which nature seems to dictate. It likewise corresponded to the usage of the Greeks and Romans, before their conversion to Christianity.

When the eyes and mouth were closed, the body was then laid out, and carefully washed with water. This ceremony, which was common to the Jews, Greeks, and Romans, the first Christians also adopted. Thus we read, 'Tabitha fell sick, and died; whom, when they had washed, they laid her in an upper chamber.' Washing the corpse is mentioned by Tertullian, Eusebius, and many others. It appears to have been retained in the western Church for many centuries, not as a mystical ceremony, or religious rite, but as a civil usage, and a decent preparation of the body for its burial.

The next operation was embalming the body, to preserve it from putrefaction. This art the Jews probably borrowed from the Egyptians, by whom it is supposed to have been invented. In Genesis we find, that about 1700 years before the birth of Christ 'Joseph commanded his servants, the physicians, to embalm his father.' Joseph himself was embalmed, and put into a coffin in Egypt. In like manner we read of Asa, that 'the bed on which he was laid in the sepulchre was filled with sweet odors, and divers kinds of spices, prepared by the apothecary's art.' And to mention a still more memorable instance, after Joseph of Arimathea had taken down the body of Jesus from the cross, 'Nicodemus came, and brought a mixture of myrrh and aloes, about a hundred pounds' weight. Then took they the body of Jesus, and wound it in linen clothes, with the spices, as the manner of the Jews is to embalm, or prepare the body for interment.'

The eyes and mouth being closed, and the body washed with water, and anointed with oil or perfumes, and in some cases embalmed, it was then decently clothed with the funeral garments. These were commonly made of fine white linen. Prudentius mentions the white garment, which was the most usual funeral dress. Yet we find that the bodies of the rich were sometimes dressed in magnificent robes, embroidered with gold; and Durant has observed, that at the obsequies of pontiffs, kings, and princes, splendid vestments were thought allowable. The funeral vestments of Christians were always new; upon which Chrysostom remarks, 'We clothe the dead in new garments, to signify their putting on the new clothing of incorruption.'

The corpse, thus robed in its funeral attire, and prepared for burial, was deposited in a chest, or coffin, which was commonly made of wood: for in this instance the primitive Christians adopted the practice of the Greeks and Romans, in preference to that of the Jews, who only wound up the body in linen clothes. The coffins were at first generally plain, and without any ornamental covering. Constantine, however, was put into a coffin of gold, or at least overlaid with gold; which was covered with a rich purple pall. At Rome likewise the coffins of the nobility, and other opulent citizens, had a covering inwrought with gold thrown over them. There is, however, reason to suppose that pompous and expensive decorations at funerals were not very common in his day.

From the time that the body was put into the coffin till it was carried out for interment, it was watched by the relations and friends of the deceased, by charitable neighbors, and other persons religiously disposed. The body in the coffin was sometimes taken into the church. This office was more especially performed in the night time, during which the company assembled sung hymns, psalms, and praises to God, as they were accustomed to do on the vigils preceding the festivals of martyrs.

The Jews, who did not bury in coffins, but simply wound up the body in linen, carried out their dead on a bier; but the Christians carried theirs on their shoulders. This office was commonly performed by friends or near relations, and oftentimes, in cases of plague or persecution, by charitable persons of distinction, who chose rather to run the risk of sacrificing both their fortunes and lives, than to leave this last office of Christian charity unperformed. In the first four centuries we have numerous instances where men and women of eminent sanctity were borne upon the shoulders of bishops, and of the clergy of superior order.

Both in the eastern and western Churches the priests at the funeral procession went before the corpse; and next to it came the more immediate friends of the deceased. After them the rest of the company followed. This order of the funeral procession, divines and moralists have remarked, is 'an admonition to the survivors, that their deceased brother is gone before them to the place where they must soon follow.'

In peaceable times the corpse was always carried forth with psalmody to the grave. The Apostolic Constitutions direct the bodies of the faithful to be carried forth with singing, and cite some of the passages that were more generally used. Chrysostom likewise acquaints us with various particular portions of the psalms and hymns selected from the Old and New Testament, which were sung on these occasions, and observes, 'The object of this psalmody, the prayers, and the solemn meeting of fathers, and the multitude of brethren, is, not to lament and mourn, but to give God thanks for having taken unto himself our deceased brother.' Jerome also frequently speaks of psalmody as a custom universally received from ancient tradition.

After the body was placed in the coffin, attired in its funeral robes, it was customary for the Greeks and Romans to bedeck it with garlands and chaplets of flowers; and it was not unusual among the early Christians to strew evergreens and flowers upon the grave.—Saturday Magazine.

A MONSTER FATHER.

A harsh, a horrid name; but if he does not deserve it, the reader may find a milder and apply it.

A few days ago I took my seat in the cars on the railroad. A gentleman of great wealth and widely known through the state came in, and met a friend whom he had not seen for some weeks. His friend congratulated him on having returned from a journey, and, in answer to an inquiry, the gentleman proceeded to state the object of his trip to the South, and the success with which he had met. I will give his remarks, very much in his own language; and I have no scruples of propriety on the subject, as the remarks were made before the cars started, when there was an entire stillness, and in such a tone of voice that they were heard, as they were designed to be, by all in the vicinity of the speaker. It is only just that I should add, that an occasional oath, with which his conversation was garnished, is omitted. He said:—

"I was determined not to stop till I found a school where there was no religion. I wanted to send my son to a school where the clergy were not allowed to come near the pupils, and where they could be taught what they go to school to learn, without being plagued for ever with a set of lazy priests hanging around and interfering with every body's business but their own. I had hard work to find such a place, but I did at last, away in the heart of Virginia. There I found a school, and there is not a church within seventeen miles of it, and they never have a minister near the premises. That is the place for me, and I left my son there; and when he is fitted for college, I mean to send him to the University of Virginia, and there's no religion there."

This is the substance of the remarks made by the gentleman. He repeated many of these views again and again, and expressed, in the most unqualified manner, his utter and bitter contempt of religion, and especially of religious ministers.

He was the first man from whom I ever heard the wish, that his children might grow up without religious principles. I have seen wicked men, and heard them profanely and vilely denounce the Bible and its blessed doctrines; but never did I hear of a father who had traveled four or five hundred miles to shut up his own son where the influence of that Bible could not find its way to that child's heart. And as I looked at him, there was certainly in his appearance, after the gross and shocking avowals, more of the MONSTER than the father or man. I hardly know whether to despise or pity him; if it were ignorance, he was to be pitied; but I knew it was not, and therefore it was necessary to suppress the strong emotions of loathing which his remarks awakened.

The temptation was strong to hand him Daniel Webster's speech (I had it my hand) on the Girard will case, in which the great statesman and orator no nobly and eloquently vindicated the American clergy against the dead man's calumny. And what a contrast was here, between the masterly argument of the first intellect in the country, defending the christian religion as indispensable to the formation of a complete American citizen, and the puerile declamations of this father, who would search the land over to find a Girard prison, in which to immure the immortal mind of his son!

And then I thought of the boy—the child of such a father—sent away for such a purpose, and to such a school. The father thinks his child is safe from the reach and power of religious truth! Is he? Perhaps, indeed, no Sabbath shines on that secluded school, and no Gospel sheds its hallowed influence on the youthful heart. Who will hinder the soul from finding God in every leaf that stirs, and every star that rolls? The boy has heard of him who made him, and one who died to redeem him; and away from home and friends, and perhaps away from a mother who prays for him, he will hear the voice of God in the melody of nature's voices, as above and around him all speak their great Creator's praise. He will hear the voice of God when conscience whispers to his soul, and tells him of sin and a hereafter. Perhaps the Holy Spirit will visit him there, and in the very place where, of all others, his wicked father thought it most unlikely that religion would find him, even there he may be brought, by grace divine, to the Saviour. While the father was speaking, the thought occurred to me, that that son might yet be a monument of sovereign mercy, a brilliant illustration that nothing is impossible with God.

I mean to watch that lad. The father has exposed him, more dangerously than Moses' mother did, and I will wait and see what the Lord will do for him. Let us pray for him; let us pray much, and perhaps after many days, he may be brought out in safety, and become a distinguished servant of God.—Christian Parlor Magazine.

THE APPROACH OF SPRING.—The caroling of the birds—the bursting of the verdant leaf and the unfolding of the crimson buds—the appearance of the pioneer flowers and the unceasing beauty of the green sward—the glitter of the gurgling stream, and the genial warmth of the sun already remind us of the approach of lovely spring. How beautiful is young life? how interesting is nature in all her movements? And how callous is that heart that is not vulnerable to her charms, that furnishes no echo to her gladness, no responsive throb to the pulses of her joy; let none confide in its friendship, nor trust it with the treasures of her affection.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.

From the True Wesleyan.

School Teachers.—These are a numerous army! Immense in their responsibility and influence. There are in the United States 3,700,000 children, between the ages of five and fifteen, committed to the care of school teachers.

Colleges.—There are more than one hundred chartered colleges in the United States, exclusive of medical and law schools, and sixty theological seminaries. Their professors, students and alumni, make a college population in the United States of more than 50,000 men.

Luther and the German Language.—The influence of Luther is not felt merely in theological literature; it extends itself to the very language of Germany itself. Luther is in fact the FATHER of the German language. The language which Luther used in the times of the Reformation is almost entirely such as is used at the present day: hence, Luther's works are still read with pleasure by Germans of literary taste: while Tetzels, (cotemporaneous and raging at the time,) are neglected.

Newton and the Apple.—We owe the great discovery of Newton—of gravitation—and all its important consequences to a very trivial accident. When a student at Cambridge, he had retired during the plague into the country. As he was reading under an apple-tree, one of the fruit fell and struck him a smart blow on the head. When he observed the smallness of the apple he was surprised at the force of the stroke. This led him to consider the accelerating motion of falling bodies; whence he deduced the principle of gravity, and laid the foundation of his philosophy.

Scholars, Dictionaries and Lexicons.—Reference is frequently made by juvenile philogists to Lexicons and Dictionaries for authority in controversy. No scholar depends on Lexicons. He makes every book its own interpreter—to settle the meaning of doubtful words by a reference to other places where the same author uses the word. The known and settled sentiments of an author should bear weight in interpretations.

Learning is never underrated except by men who are destitute of it. Literature and Religion both sunk together in the dark ages, and both emerged at the same auspicious era.

Learning has this strong recommendation, that it is the offspring of a most valuable virtue; I mean industry; a quality on which I am ashamed to see pagans frequently set a higher value than we seem to do.

The learned Grotius.—Under the awful apprehension of a future account, at the close of life, the illustrious Grotius, who had with equal ability cultivated both secular and sacred studies, wished that he could change characters with a poor pious peasant, who used to spend most of his time in reading the Bible at his gate.

Walter Scott's Advice.—Walter Scott, in a narrative of his personal history, gives the following caution to youth:

"If it should ever fall to the lot of youth to peruse these pages, let such a reader remember that it is with the deepest regret that I recollect in my manhood the opportunities of learning which I neglected in my youth; that through every part of my literary career I have felt pinched and hampered by my own ignorance; and I would at this moment give half the reputation I have had the good fortune to acquire, if by doing so I could rest the remaining part upon a sound foundation of learning and science.

Schools in Luther's time!—Chastisements and fears were the only impulses to education. Martin Luther, a fair representative of the boys of Mansfield, was frequently and severely flogged. It is said that his master flogged him fifteen times in one day. That was certainly the dark and cruel age in school-keeping.

Cicero and Cato.—Cicero spoke it as the highest commendation of Cato's character, that he embraced philosophy, not for the sake of disputing like a philosopher, but of living one. The chief purpose of Christian knowledge is to promote the great end of a Christian life.

Pitt, Burns and Southey. When applied to for some help for Burns, the poet, Mr. Pitt answered, "Literature will take care of itself." "Yes," answered Mr. Southey, "it will take care of itself, and of you too, if you do not look to it." Literature is wonderfully democratic.

Paul.—Louginus, the celebrated writer on sublimity, thus speaks of Paul: "The following men are the boasts of all eloquence and of Grecian genius, viz: Demosthenes, Lysias, Æschines, Hyperides, Jacus, Anarchus, Isocrates and Antiphon, to whom may be added Paul of Tarsus."

Whitefield.—Garrick, first of dramatic actors, rejoiced that Whitefield had not chosen the stage, confessing that if he had his own fame would have been eclipsed.

Reuchlin and the Scriptures.—Reuchlin was the first who took off the seals from the ancient Scriptures; this was done by the publication of the first Hebrew and German Grammar and Dictionary. This Luther used in his convent in studying the ancient Bible. The illustrious friend of Luther, Melancthon, was educated under Reuchlin, and through his influence became a Reformer.

THE SHEPHERD'S DOG.

In the ninth No. of the last volume of the Cabinet, was given a beautiful cut of the Shepherd's Dog, with an interesting account of him from a correspondent The following lively article we take from the Salem Register, Ohio, which credits it to a late English work.—ED.

The Shepherd's Dog in his own department is a perfect miracle of intelligence. He understands the sign, the voice, the look, of his master. He collects the scattered sheep at the slightest signal, separates any one that is indicated from the rest of the flock, drives them wherever he is told, and keeps them all the while under perfect control, less by his active exertions than by the modulations of his voice, which expresses every tone from gentle instruction to angry menace. These are his ordinary performances, visible every day in a thousand pastures. But he can do greater wonders. It chanced one night that seven hundred lambs, committed to the keeping of the Ettrick Shepherd, broke loose from his control and scampered away in three divisions over hill and plain. "Sirrah, my man," said Hogg mournfully to his colly, meaning it for an expression of grief, and not for a direction, "they're awa." Silently and without his master's knowledge, for it was too dark to see, the dog left his side, while the shepherd passed the hours till morning in a weary and fruitless search after his wandering charge. At the dawn of the day he was about to return home with a heart full of despair, when he caught a sight of Sirrah guarding at the bottom of a deep ravine, not as he at first supposed, one division of the lambs, but the whole of the vast flock, with a solitary exception. "It was," says James Hogg, "the most extraordinary circumstance that had ever occurred in my pastoral life. How he had got all the divisions collected in the dark is beyond my comprehension. The charge was left entirely to himself, from midnight until the rising of the sun, and if all the shepherds in the forest had been there to have assisted him, they could not have effected it with greater propriety." On another occasion the same famous shepherd saw a dog, when it was utterly dark, put upon the path of a ewe that had been lost by her owner near a neighbor's farm, and which was supposed to have mingled with her fellows that were feeding in the surrounding pastures. "Chieftain," said the master of the dog, pointing to the spot from which the sheep had gone off, "fetch that, I say, sir—bring that back; away!" And away he went, and back he brought, in half an hour, the identical sheep. A sheep-stealer, who was at last discovered and hanged, used to carry on his trade by secretly signifying the particular sheep that he desired out of a large flock, as he viewed them under the pretence of purchasing, to his dog, who returning by himself, a distance of several miles, at night, drove the selected sheep, which was undoubtedly the fattest, to his fastidious owner. Both Scott and Hogg relate this picturesque story more circumstantially from annals of the Justiciary Court, in Scotland. Sir Thomas Wilde knew an instance in which three oxen out of some score, had mingled with another herd. "Go fetch them," was all the instruction the drover gave his dog, and he instantly brought along with him those very three. A cattle dealer, accustomed to drive his beasts for nine miles to Alston, in Cumberland, once for a wager, sent them alone with his dog. The animal perfectly understood his commission. He kept the straight road, ran when he came to a strange drove, to the head of his own to stop their progress, put the beasts that blocked the path upon one side, then went back again to the rear to hie on his charge, and thus adroitly steering his way and keeping his herd together, he carried them safely to the destined yard, and signified their arrival by barking at the door of the dwelling.

TEMPERANCE ELEVATES THE CHARACTER.

In the year '38, about 8 o'clock at night, 33 miles from P——, at the Widow B——'s tavern, might have been seen a poor miserable object of a man, begging for a night's lodging, to shelter him from the "pelting of the pitiless storm," for it was a stormy and gloomy night indeed, not to be easily forgotten. The man had evidently seen better days, but now, wobegone, ragged and dirty, his plea with the widow for shelter was vain. The only article left in his possession was a razor, which he proffered as a last resource for a night's lodging, but it was refused, and he was about being driven forth to the beating wind and rain, when a good natured Scotchman agreed with the landlady to pay for a night's lodging for him, and "bitters in the morning," for the razor. In the morning the landlady presented him the bottle, as per contract. He hesitated, and asked for bread in its stead, but her reply was, "the bargain was bitters in the morning; here is the bottle, you'll get no bread here." He grasped the bottle and filled a half-pint tumbler to the brim, and swallowed the contents down amid the gibes and jeers of the landlady and her customers. He journeyed on arriving at night at the city of P——. Who can imagine the feelings of his heart? In a strange city without a friend, or even an acquaintance, miserably clad, and literally starving, —no smiles from his children to cheer his stricken heart, for this miserable man had children, who were far away, and knew not whether he was living or dead. His wife had long since gone to her Father's home in heaven. His present houseless and hopeless condition had been brought on him by drunkenness. Who, I ask again, can tell the feelings of his desolate heart? He obtained employment with a kind hearted man in the city of P——, and after some few months, he began to resume his former appearance; but the drunkard's god still claimed him as his own. Another fit of drunkenness and wandering seized him, and he quit his place of refuge in P——, and started for another and yet another city, plunging at every fresh place still deeper into drunkenness and suffering, until at last he made an attempt on his own life, and would have rushed unbidden into the presence of his Maker, but Providence permitted it not. This picture is not overdrawn, in fact, the coloring is not strong enough.—Turn we now to the other side.

In the year 1844, in a Western city of some note we find this same man surrounded as far as a poor man can be, with the comforts of life, employed at his mechanical occupation, with his children smiling affectionately upon him, and cheering his happy hours with all the fondness of undying love, and he a member of a christian church, with authority to teach the doctrines of the Cross, encircled by the best of friends and neighbors, who rejoice in his happiness and redemption from the curse of the cup. This happy change in this man, reader, has been produced by total abstinence from all that can intoxicate. Hence we say that Temperance elevates the character.

WRITINGS OF VOLTAIRE.

The following masterly analysis of the character of the literary giant, Voltaire, is extracted from Rev. George Putnam's Phi Beta Keppa oration before the Harvard University:

Voltaire is not read as living and ruling minds are read. His histories are not referred to as authorities, but have become notorious rather for their perversion, careless or fraudulent of dates and facts. His name, we are assured, is hissed when quoted by the Historical Professor in the lecture rooms of Paris. His poetry, with all its artistic perfection, is no fountain of inspiration or spiritual refreshment to any body; and the highest French critics, with all their national feeling, have ceased to glory in the Henriade. His dramas, which are his best things, will probably be retained on the stage for some time longer, on account of the felicity of their literary execution and dramatic adaptation. His batteries against religion, that bristled once so fierce and formidable, are dismantled, and that beyond repair. His philosophical speculations have scarcely a place of refuge left them, except in a few crumbling chateaux of the French provinces, where some octogenarian survivors of a graceless era still mutter in the ears of an unheeding world the last things they learned—the denials of infidelity and the dogmas of jacobinism.

Why is all this so? Why has it turned out thus with the great man, so brilliant in wit, of gifts so varied, an intellectual activity and productiveness so immense, and an influence so wide and triumphant? Considering the position he once held, and the power he once exercised, it is not too much to say, that Voltaire has come to naught. And why? His deficiences were, no doubt, many and radical. But one just reason, and a comprehensive one is, that the love of truth is not in him. It is not merely because there was error in many of his opinions; this must happen to all—to common men and great men. Errors of opinion will not sink a man, but indifference to truth will sink any man. It is not that he hateth truth, or desired wickedly to propagate falsehood, but he did not love and worship truth. He felt not the overawing divinity there is in it. He did not distinguish between it and the plausible and politic. He had no faith in the heart of anything.

If he had had but a loving faith, only some touch of a believing spirit, he had been saved; faith in anything—in God, or man, or nature; in things temporal or things eternal; in a problem of mathematics, or a Huttonian theory of the earth; in some conclusion of logic, or some deep aspiration of the soul; in some religion, whether of the Bible, the Koran, the Shaster, or the heart; in some priesthood, whether of papal appointment, or an inner, unrecognized and spiritual anointing from above; in some nobleness, whether by kingly endowment, or a God given patent, stamped on the brow of greatness; in some beauty, whether of heroic virtue or only a garden flower; only a faith, taking any direction, but clinging to something as true, and, therefore dear and sacred—then there had been something for him to love and labor for—to live and die for, for its own worth to him; then he had been a true and earnest man, and his whole intellectual destiny changed. But this load star of the soul was wanting. He never felt its heavenward attraction. The divine principle was not in him, and so he was given over to the sway of his vanity and lightness, his spite and spleen, and all the pack of infirmities which his temperament and position engendered. He sinks into the seat of the scoffer. His genius goes out in mocking and contempt. His greatness is in denial. His power is in pulling down. Such a man by the very turn of his mind, must be shallow, never profound. He seeks not the true in thought, but the striking, the available, the effective. The first mind of his age, and producing vast immediate effect, revolutionizing the ways of thinking for a whole generation or two, he had yet added nothing to the world's stock of knowledge, nor originating a single idea that bears fruit, nor an influence whereby souls grow larger and richer by partaking. He is henceforth no man's spiritual benefactor. For a great man, the first intellectual man of his age, this result I call a failure.

Stealing a free man and selling him for a slave in Kentucky, is punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary for five years. Stealing a slave in Kentucky to make him free in Ohio or Canada is punishable by imprisonment for twenty years. So much more securely is it deemed necessary in the estimation of legislators, to guard the rights of property than of liberty.

The Sabbath Recorder.

EDITED BY GEORGE B. UTTER. "THE SEVENTH DAY IS THE SABBATH OF THE LORD THY GOD." PUBLISHED AT NO. 9 SPRUCE STREET.

VOL. I. NEW-YORK, FIFTH DAY, MAY 29, 1845. NO. 49.

The Recorder.

LETTER FROM WM. M. FAHNESTOCK.

The following letter was read before the Missionary Association at its late Anniversary in Plainfield, N. J. It presents thoughts deserving of a more extensive perusal, and we therefore publish it.

BORDENTOWN, May 13, 1845.

To the Members of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association, and of the American Sabbath Tract Society, in their Anniversary Meetings at Plainfield, N. J.

DEAR BRETHREN:—Up to this moment I have indulged the fond anticipation of meeting with you in your assembled capacity to-morrow, and of enrolling myself as a co-worker with you in the great project of disseminating knowledge among the inhabitants of our extensive country, and eventually, I trust, throughout the whole world, on the subject of the desecration of the Holy Sabbath, and of endeavoring to restore the observance of that blessed institution; but other duties, solemn and imperative, to the afflicted, require me to remain at my post, and compel me to forego, for the present, the gratification of mingling in the exercises of these important movements.

Deprived of the privilege of that Christian interview, and of becoming personally acquainted with the operations of these two arms—the two great working arms—of your denomination, I still desire, by this my substitute,* to constitute myself a member of both associations; and cannot refrain from adding a few words of encouragement, to stimulate you to renewed exertions in prosecuting and carrying out the full design of this noble enterprise.

Accustomed, from my daily habits of investigation for more than a quarter of a century, to trace the reciprocal bearings of all subjects brought under consideration, and to group together all phenomena in their different aspects, to determine final causes, and deduce the laws of being and of the universe of God, both natural and spiritual, I have looked for many years past upon the movements of your denomination with intense interest, as I behold in it the hope of the Sabbath cause—the germ of a great and glorious revolution—the restoration, with all its blessings, of God's Holy Sabbath; of which he has been robbed, on this His footstool, by an arrogant and presumptuous Hierarchy; and which Protestants in name—Christians professing to take the Bible as the only Rule of their Faith, and protesting against all corruptions and perversions of that Holy Book—have, for ages, endorsed and upheld, even under the repeated taunts of the Church, which boldly boasts of having foisted the alteration of the day of rest upon them, and yet they conform to it, sustain it, defend it. "O consistency, consistency, thou art a jewel!" But, my friends, far as the Protestant Church has gone astray in this matter, there is still hope of her, still brighter prospects ahead. The period is rapidly approaching in which she will cast off every vestige of error and superstition, and return to her first love, the pure word of God. Yes, my dear friends, in looking out upon the different phases of the Church, and the buffeting currents of the jarring sects of Christendom, I see distinctly, upon the dark tumultuous billows, a distant speck rising from the surrounding gloom, and "shining like a star on eternity's ocean," which is destined to increase in brightness and diffuse a noon-day light over the troubled waters, and guide the benighted disciples who have made "shipwreck of their faith," by casting away the Bible as their Compass and following the Charts of man, until they have foundered on the shores of tradition, and become engulfed in the whirlpool of contention and discord. The Sabbath torn from the Decalouge and trampled upon, there remains no longer an oasis in the wilderness—no trysting time or trysting place for believers—no holy convocations of the general assembly of the saints, agreeably to God's own appointment, to mingle their sympathies and strengthen each other's hands; but all is confusion and warfare—turmoils, conflict and persecution. And what appears superlatively ridiculous in this violent contest is, that the one party, protesting most vociferously against corruptions and usurpations, yet actively sustains the worst, the most injurious of those usurpations, the perversion of the Almighty's positive institutions and express ordinances.

The Lord will end this conflict, and is now employing this their folly to its speedy consummation. Your denomination is the ark bearing the glorious germ of the Sabbath reformation. It is as a beacon, set up amid the warring elements and the blackness of the storm, by the Great Head of the Church, to draw the stranded and dismasted barques into a safe harbor, there to refit and clear again with clean papers and sufficient ballast, to ride over the surges of time, and be safely landed in the heavenly Canaan. Your organizations, I sincerely believe, are ordained to that honored office. Look upon yourselves, brethren, I beseech you, in this aspect, and give all your energies, all your strength, to its fulfillment. I urge it upon you the more, inasmuch as I am thoroughly convinced of its being your allotted sphere of duty in the vineyard of the Lord. Of one thing I am persuaded, God will vindicate his Sabbath—His Holy Sabbath—which He has sanctified and hallowed; and while I firmly believe that He will vindicate and restore it, which He can accomplish by any exercise of his power he may elect, yet as He always works by instrumentality, I also firmly believe that He has made your denomination the chosen vessel of honor, to achieve that great purpose.

This view of the Lord's determined purpose, and his using instrumentality in carrying out that purpose, is beautifully illustrated in a passage in the life of the Apostle Paul, and which will equally apply to this undertaking. Paul, you recollect, when he was sent with certain other prisoners to Rome, was overtaken on the voyage by a tempestuous hurricane called Euroclydon, and after casting out all things, even the tackling of the ship, to lighten the vessel, and all hope of being saved was abandoned, stood up, amid the gloom of the scene and the dismay of the crew, and declared, "There shall be no loss of any man's life among you, but of the ship;"—which assurance he had from Him "who rideth upon the whirlwind and directeth the storm," by an angel who announced unto him, "Lo, God hath given thee all them that sail with thee." Yet with this positive assurance directly from the eternal throne, and firmly confiding in that assurance, when they approached the rocks of Adria, and the shipmen, to flee out of the ship, let down the boat into the sea, Paul as emphatically declared to the centurion and the soldiers, "Except these abide in the ship, ye cannot be saved." The men who were about to leave the ship were the mariners upon whom devolved the management of the vessel, as they neared the shore, that the passengers might escape safely to land, "some on boards and some on broken pieces." Had these men deserted their post, all must have perished. So there is no inconsistency in asserting, that the great Sovereign of the Universe will vindicate and restore his Holy Sabbath, while it depends on the contingency of the people He has enlightened to carry out that pur~~pose. You, my friends, are to stand by the ship.~~ You are to do this work, and it shall be done. O, awake to your mission! Arise to your work? Arms, efficient arms ye have, if not suffered to be folded in supineness; but arms, efficient arms, to the pulling down of strong holds, in the cause of the mighty Jehovah. Strike them out, wide and deep, throughout the length and breadth of the land. Proclaim a crusade against the desecration of God's Holy Sabbath. Sound the tocsin. Raise high your banners. Send out the cry, "The Seventh Day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God." Peal forth the sound, loud and long, till the ocean tell it to the mountains, and the mountains echo it through the distant forests, and the hills reverbate it again and again, till it reach every valley, penetrate every ear, and touch every heart—and God, our God, will bless you and bring you out more than conquerors.

Yours fraternally,
W. M. FAHNESTOCK.

"LITTLE FIRES."

"We can do little more in a world like ours," says the Rev. Mr. Todd, in his volume of excellent Hints to Young Men, "than to kindle little fires here and there, which will burn, and which will light other fires, after we have passed away and are forgotten. You may give bias to the character now forming, you may make an impression on the mind of some companion, perhaps unknown to him and to yourself, which will influence thousands yet unborn, for their good. I believe it is Lockhart, the accomplished writer of Sir Walter Scott's memoirs, who mentions that in those days of mirth and revelry which came near being his ruin, the room in which he and his associates met was opposite that in which Scott was writing. While thus assembled, he used to watch that unknown hand turning off sheet after sheet—untiring, unceasing. In the midst of mirth and folly, he would turn his eyes and feel a pang of severe reproof by that silent, unknown, everlasting hand! How little did Scott know that his diligence was rebuking and forming the character of a young man who would one day even honor him by writing his life! The hand that dropped the pebble into the smooth waters has passed away and is forgotten, but the wave is widening and spreading till it has been felt in every part of the lake. [Watchman of the Valley.

PREVENTIVE OF INFIDELITY.—John Randolph, in his best years, always gave the weight of his influence to Revealed Religion. But it is well known, that about the time when his character was forming, the atheism and materialism avowed by certain leading politicians, were making extensive havoc of the principles of young men in many parts of the land. Mr. Randolph, (as stated to us by the Rev. Dr. Alexander of this city, formerly a resident of the same section of the country,) was once speaking on this subject, to a distinguished Southern gentleman, and used this remarkable language: "I believe I should have been swept away by the flood of French infidelity, if it had not been for one thing—the remembrance of the time when my sainted mother used to make me kneel by her side, take my little hands folded in hers, and cause me to repeat the Lord's Prayer."

LINES

Suggested by reading the poetry, in the 37th number of the Recorder, over the signature of L. M. C., on the death of sister R. A. Davis.

And she did drink the proffered cup,
She drank it to the very dregs;
Her spirit then ascended up,
It flew to purer, brighter realms.

There round the Eternal's throne to dwell,
In rays of pure, celestial light;
With Seraphim, and Cheruim,
And saints aray'd in dazzling white.

Their harps will most melodious sound,
Joyful will be the glorious strain;
A Saviour for the nations found,
A Saviour's goodness they'll proclaim.

And this will please their Father well,
His Son to worship and adore;
Lord God of Hosts, of light and love,
With one accord they'll praise thee more.

No pain can there disturb their rest,
No howling storms their peace destroy;
They'll lean upon the Saviour's breast—
How calm the bliss they'll there enjoy.

Hark! hark! methinks I hear a strain
Melodious! Oh! it connot be;
For I on earth must yet remain,
And from earth's snares am not yet free.

May I her footsteps close pursue,
May I that Saviour too adore;
When call'd from earth, may I review
My friends on earth so lov'd before.

Oh may I join the angelic choir
Around that bright and dazzling throne;
His love my heart as deep inspire,
His praise as loud employ my tongue.

LAST DAYS AND DEATH OF LUTHER.

The death of Luther was a scene of deep and solemn interest—an impressive illustration of the blessed influences of the great truths with which he had shaken the world. We subjoin an account of his last days, prepared by the Editor of the Vermont Chronicle, from an excellent article in the last number of the Biblical Repository, by Prof. Stowe.

The death of Luther occurred Feb. 18, 1546. On the 23d of January previous, he left Wittemberg for Eisleben, his native place, with a view to effect a reconciliation between the count of Mansfield, his brother, and the inhabitants. He was attended by Dr. Jonas and his two sons, the eldest of whom was then about 22 years of age. Owing to the season of the year, the journey was to him one of great fatigue and danger.

When they came in sight of the church tower of Eisleben, a rush of tender reminiscences crowded upon the mind of Luther with such an overwhelming force, that he fainted entirely away. When he recovered, he said, "the devil must needs insult me from the old steeple yonder. But I will give him a pull or two yet before I die." Luther found himself very much exhausted by the fatigues and inconveniences of his journey. He had an issue for the pains in his head. This had been neglected since he left home, and had become very painful. After a night's rest, however, he entered on business, and pursued it with unremitting diligence.

February 14th, he ordained two preachers, and received the Lord's Supper for the last time. The next day he preached his last sermon from Matt. xi. 25—30, which is given in full by Lomler, Vol. III. p. 182—197.

February 16th, at supper Luther spoke with great cheerfulness on the brevity of human life. Among other remarks, he said: "when an infant of a year old dies, he probably has from one thousand to two thousand of the same age to go into eternity with him; but if I die at the age of sixty-two, I shall scarcely have sixty or a hundred of my age who will die the same day." Being asked if we should know our friends in the other world, he replied: "Adam, when he awoke from his sleep and found Eve by his side, did not gape and stare, and say, 'Who are you? Where did you come from?' but he knew her at once, and exclaimed, 'Bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh.' Though he had never seen her before, he felt, through marrow and bone, that it must be she and could be no other; and so shall we feel when we awake in eternity, and see our loved ones standing around us."

His appetite had been very good, and his meals remarkably cheerful; and he observed that, getting back to his native town, his food tasted to him as it did when he was a boy.

On the morning of February 17th, he appeared so unwell that the Count of Mansfield begged him not to attend to business that day, but keep his room. This he consented to do; he saw no company, and his dinner was sent up to his apartment. In the afternoon, he said he could not bear to eat his meals alone, it was so gloomy and unsocial, he would go down and take supper with the family. His two sons were with him, his friend Dr. Jonas, and his servant Ambrose. He walked thoughtfully up and down in his chamber, and at length said: "I was born here in Eisleben; what if I should die here?" He complained of pressure for breath; he walked to the window and opened it; his lips moved and a low murmur was heard, as if he were in earnest prayer. His servant Ambrose, supposing he might want assistance, came softly behind him, and heard him speak to the following purport: "Lord God, Heavenly Father, I call upon thee in the name of thy dear Son, Jesus Christ our Lord, whom I by thy grace have acknowledged and preached, that thou wouldst, according to thy promise and for the glory of thy name, graciously listen to my prayers at this time. Oh grant, according to thy great mercy and loving kindness toward me, that the light of the gospel, which now begins to shine on the earth, may every where take the place of the terrible apostacy and darkness and blindness of the Pope, before the great day of judgment, which cannot now be far off, but is at the door: and withal preserve thou the church of my fatherland pure unto the end in the steadfast profession of the truths of thy holy word, and graciously keep it, that all the world may know that thou lidst send me to do this work. Ah, dear Lord God, Amen, Amen."

Not a word was spoken by any of his attendants. They felt as Jacob did in Bethel, "how dreadful is this place!"

He resumed his seat and said to Dr. Jonas and his sons: "Oh, I wish this business of the count of Mansfield's were settled, that I might go home and lay myself in my coffin to sleep, and give this poor body to the worms!"

He took his supper with the family, and about nine in the evening returned to his chamber, but was at times in severe pain. About one o'clock in the morning, having laid down, he said in Latin:—

"Father, into thy hands I commit my spirit: Thou hast redeemed me, O Lord, God of truth." The countess of Mansfield wished him to take some of the medicines she had brought; but he said his poor dear Catey, in her abundant anxiety for him, had put up, just before he came away, a little case of refreshments and medicines, and if he took any thing he would rather have some of that. His son went to his trunk, took out the parcel he spoke of, and handed it to him. He took one or two things it contained, just put them to his lips, handed them all back to his son, and told him to put them away, and never to forget the kindness of his mother. Soon after, he said, "Dear God, I am in dreadful pain, I must be going." Mr. Cœlius said to him: "Venerated father, call upon our dear Lord Jesus Christ, our great high priest, our only Mediator; you have done a great work for Him; God will be gracious to us, you will yet recover." "No, (said Luther firmly,) I feel the cold sweat of death—I am breathing my soul out—my distress is increasing." He then prayed in German: "My heavenly Father, eternal, most merciful God, Thou hast revealed to my Thy dear Son, our Lord Jesus Christ; Him have I professed, Him have I preached; I adore Him as my only Saviour and Redeemer, while the ungodly and the vile persecute Him. O take my poor soul to Thyself." He then said in Latin three times in quick succession:—"Into Thy hands I commit my spirit," and added: "God so loved the world that he sent his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him might not perish, but have everlasting life." After a moment's silence, he again spoke in German: "O, heavenly Father, although this body is breaking away from me, and I am departing from this life, yet I certainly know I shall forever be with Thee, for no one can pluck me out of Thy hand." And then subjoined with a cheerful tone in Latin: "Our God is a God of salvation—our Lord delivereth from death."

He appeared to be fast sinking, and the countess of Mansfield again administered some cordials, and directed him to be bathed with spirits. Then Dr. Jonas said to him, "Most beloved father, do you still hold on to Christ, the Son of God, our Saviour and Redeemer?" His fading countenance once more brightened, his clear blue eye sparkled with intelligence, and he replied in a distinct and thrilling tone, "O yes." He then folded his hands across his bosom, turned his face a little on one side, and began breathing softly and gently as a sleeping infant. His eyes were becoming fixed in their sockets, the glassy hue of death was fast gathering on them, when one of the old men in attendance, who had been his companion in childhood, (and who, in bad weather, had often carried the favorite little Martin to school in his arms,) in that awful moment forgetting entirely the mighty reformer, and thinking only of the friend of his heart, knelt down by the sofa, and putting his arm across his bosom, and his face to his cheek, exclaimed in the plaintive notes of childhood, "Martin, dear Martin, do speak to me once more!" But there was no reply. The mighty spirit had already gone. Before the words were fully uttered, Luther was already with Moses, with Paul, with John, and with Christ—and in the last only did he find a superior. The countess of Mansfield would not be persuaded that he was dead. Even when she heard the death-rattle in his throat, and after that all was still—when she saw his lips open with a slight and scarcely perceptible gasp, and then move no more, still, with all a woman's perseverance and hopefulness, she stood intently watching his face, and anxiously rubbing now his feet, and now his hands, till at last perceiving that they grew ice-cold to her touch, and she could warm them no more, hope was forced from her, and she turned from the couch, threw herself into a chair, and covered her face and wept like one who refuses to be comforted.

Luther died of a cancer in the stomach, or angina pectoris, at half past two o'clock on Tuesday morning, February 18, 1546, at the age of 62 years, 3 months, and 10 days. As he seemed to anticipate, his native city, by a singular providence, became also the place of his death.

Luther's death, though peaceful, and full of unwavering confidence in Christ and his gospel, was not so joyous and extatic as that of many a Christian in humble life. For this, two reasons may be assigned:

1. His personal hopes were never of the exhilerating kind. Of himself he was often distrustful; it was only in respect to the cause in which he was engaged that he was always undoubtingly confident.

2. He was probably, during the whole time, suffering excruciating bodily pain. Though he said but little about it, it is evident from what he did say that his sufferings were extreme. And it must have been so, for he had a mighty muscular frame to be shaken down, and such a frame could not, in so short a time, have been brought to dissolution, without terrible torture.

ENORMOUS LEVIES OF SOLDIERS.—In the spring of 1793, the French Convention levied 300,000 men, and early in August, 1,200,000 more; in all, 1,500,000, in less than six months, from a population of some 26,000,000;—about one in seventeen, or one soldier to every third family! How long would it take such a process to exhaust a country both of its men and its property?

NEWSPAPERS.

The value of these swift winged messengers is becoming daily better appreciated. They are welcomed to every family, and read by every class of men. They may be made, therefore, most important instruments for disseminating moral and religious truth. The following remarks by speakers at the late New York Anniversaries, will show the estimation in which newspapers are held by them:—

Rev. Dr. Parker, of Philadelphia, in his address at the Anniversary of the American Tract Society alluded to it, as a subject of high congratulation and encouragement, that the Newspaper Press was chiefly in the hands of those favorable to the Bible and to correct religious sentiments. He felt truly thankful for the general readiness manifested by Editors to publish whatever might contribute to the furtherance of truth and Christian enterprise. They had, in this way, he said, rendered most essential service to the cause of benevolence and general improvement.

Rev. Mr. Kirk, of Boston, in the course of an eloquent speech before the Foreign Evangelical Society, said: Our meetings are more important in their bearings than we are apt to imagine. To-morrow, every thought uttered here to-night, may be flying on iron steeds, or with telegraphic despatch to every part of the Union, to move the mind and heart of a young nation, that God has made for great purposes. Let us remember, then, our responsibility; let us remember, not that we belong to this or that sect or party, but that we belong to God and immortality; and that every utterance of our lips—every resolution we here pass—every movement of our mind and heart, may with electric speed affect other minds and hearts, for good or for evil, throughout the nation and the world.

Rev. Mr. Spaulding, a returned Missionary from India, remarked before the Tract Society, that while the press in America was rendering such extensive service to the cause of truth, in his adopted country they had but one small newspaper, advocating the cause of evangelical religion, among ten millions of Tamuls; and he invoked the aid of Christians and patriots for giving the Press, with its happy instrumentalities, to all the millions of the East.

THE MIND IN ADVANCED LIFE.

Among other arguments for the cultivation of the intellect, there is one to be drawn from the perpetual progress of the mind towards perfection, without a possibility of ever arriving at it. The infant body springs into boyhood, hardens into manhood, dwindles down to the decay of age, and returns to the dust from which it was formed. The mind runs a similar career in its onward progress, but not in its retrogression. Though the inroads of disease or the feebleness of sensibility may fetter its powers and obscure their brightness, yet the fact that intellect is frequently retained in its pristine vigor by the advanced in years is an argument that the mind does not necessarily retrograde in old age. In one morning of advanced life, Johnson amused himself by committing to memory 800 lines of Virgil. At the age of 73, when staggering under an immediate attack of paralysis—sufficiently severe to render him speechless—he composed a Latin prayer, in order to test the loss or retention of his mental faculties. Nor is this a solitary instance. One of the most beautiful sonnets in the English language was composed by Mason on the attainment of his 72d birth day. Locke at 72, and Newton at 84, retained their faculties in unabated vigor. The feeble frame of the Earl of Chatham, at 70, sank under the effort to express the convictions of his mighty mind, after a speech so singularly eloquent, bold, ardent, and animated, as to rival, if not outvie, the most brilliant outpourings of his youth or early manhood.

AN INCIDENT.

"Will you please give me a drink of water?" said a little boy at the door of one our citizens on Saturday.

It was mid-day, and the weather was exceedingly warm. The door opened near the dining room, and the dinner had been placed upon the table.

"Come in my little fellow," said the gentleman at the house, while he waited.

"I thank you sir, but I have some chips here, and wouldn't like to leave them."

"Bring them into the entry and come in. Have you dined?"

"No, sir," said he timidly, "nor I didn't have my breakfast yet. Mother is sick and I have been tending to her to-day. I have now just got some chips to make a fire with, and shall go home to make her some soup."

"Soup. Then you are a cook too, eh?"

"Yes, sir, I got some cold meat last night and that will make her a good soup."

"Come, my boy, sit down first and eat a good dinner with us—you will feel better."

The boy laid his slouched hat in the corner, and after some coaxing, seated himself and ate hastily. He said but little, and rose to go.

"I am very thankful, sir," said he, and a tear stood in the little fellow's eye—"I wish I could pay you," he stammered, "but I am very poor, and havn't got anything." He brushed the drop from his cheek and turned to take his hat; but a smile played on his lips as he glanced at the chips and he added—

"O—I forgot—I have got two baskets of good clean chips here, and if you will take one of them, I shall be very glad; I can get another. You have been so kind to me, and they will be handy ma'am," said he, turning to the lady, "for you to kindle your fire with. Shall I leave them?"

"No, my good boy; keep them, and take this too," said the gentleman as he handed him some change. "When you are in need—come to me again."

The poor little fellow seemed almost alarmed at this—but with many thanks he departed for the dwelling of his sick mother.

The Sabbath Recorder.

NEW YORK, MAY 29, 1845.

WHAT WE NEED.

No one who was present at the Anniversaries of our Societies, of which we gave an account last week, could fail to receive from them deep and salutary impressions. He would see in those young benevolent organizations the germ of institutions which are destined yet to exert a mighty influence. It is true, they are but the germ, and much careful culture is necessary to bring them forward to perfection. But it is in this way that God works; first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear; first a grain of mustard-seed, and afterwards a tree in the branches of which the fowls of the air may lodge. This we trust—nay, believe—is to be the course of those now incipient organizations. But in order that such results may be realized, several things are needed, and must be had. These needs are beginning to be felt, have been freely spoken of by many persons, and ought to be understood by all.

In the first place, we need men to identify themselves with our benevolent organizations, to furnish patterns of self-denial on their behalf, and to draw the churches up to their support. There are among us, it is true, ordained ministers and licentiates exceeding the churches in number; and to them the people naturally look as leaders in the benevolent movements of the day. But it cannot be disguised, that a considerable portion of these ministers and licentiates are from necessity or inclination so much occupied with other things as effectually to prevent their taking the lead. Indeed, in many cases they are the very last persons to engage in benevolent enterprises, and push them forward to their appropriate results. This is not said to blame them, but to call attention to a fact, against which it is not only vain but suicidal to close our eyes. A change in this respect is imperatively demanded, and is indispensable to the success of our efforts. It is our settled conviction—and in stating it we but express the conviction of many others—that at the present time we need men more than money; and that if properly-qualified men were at hand, ready to lay themselves out for God and the truth, the means of carrying forward our enterprises would not be wanting. Let us, then, with increased earnestness, "pray the Lord of the harvest that he will send forth LABORERS into his harvest."

In the second place, we need more systematic exertion, and more entire consecration, on the part of the members of our churches. We do not believe that the backwardness of the churches results wholly from a want of interest in the movements which are going on, or from indisposition to lend their aid. Indeed, there is reason to think, that scarcely any people are more ready to take hold when the work to be done, and the plan for doing it, are made perfectly plain. Systematic exertions among them would soon make them familiar with the field and the encouragement, and prompt them to effort. To this systematic exertion, let us add entire consecration, and it is impossible to over-estimate the results which might be achieved. We need to have the Christian motto written upon our hearts, "None of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself; for whether we live, we live unto the Lord, and whether we die, we die unto the Lord; whether we live, therefore, or die, we are the Lord's." With this blessed spirit of consecration to Christ, we are all-powerful. God grant us a baptism of it!

In the third place, we need a spirit of prayer and faith. It should never be forgotten, that benevolent organizations are merely the machinery for doing good—the external preparations—the frame-work which is to be filled in and moulded by God's grace. Unless these voluntary organizations be pervaded and directed by the Spirit of God, they will be the most powerful agents of wickedness and confusion. This consideration should make us feel our need of the Spirit's guidance, and should drive every Christian to his closet and his knees. Benevolent efforts, which commence and are continued in the spirit of prayer, will not fail of success in the end. Delays may be experienced, and faith may be demanded. But the delays will only enhance the value of the final blessing; and the faith which we are called to exercise will fit us to receive that blessing. Be not discouraged then. Let our associated efforts be sustained by individual prayer and faith. Let our faith rest upon God's promise, that His Word shall not return unto him void. Let us persevere in the work which we have begun; and in due time we shall reap, if we faint not.

AMERICAN AND FOREIGN BAPTIST MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—This Society, which was established for the purpose of carrying out anti-slavery principles, held its anniversary in New York a short time since. From the treasurer's report it appears that within the past year $2,294 have been received, and $1,809 expended, leaving a balance of $485. In view of the probability of a speedy division between slaveholders and non-slaveholders, it was resolved to support this Society until such division shall have been so defined as distinctly to mark the anti-slavery or pro-slavery character of the parties. It was also resolved to avoid all unnecessary conflict with other missionary organizations, and to act in concert with them so far as it can be done consistently.

SECRET SOCIETIES.—The probable influence of Secret Societies is fast becoming a subject for discussion among ecclesiastical bodies. The third Presbytery of New York had the subject under consideration at a late meeting, and passed resolutions against such societies. Other organizations have followed in their track. Among them we notice the proceedings of a Congregational Church in Massachusetts, where the position was taken that secret societies are dangerous in their civil and political tendencies; that they greatly obstruct the cause of religion, by transferring to the societies that interest which properly belongs to the church; that they promote social evils, by creating jealousies and strifes, and giving undue advantages to some members of the community; and that, therefore, it is the duty of Christians, and others likewise, "to keep themselves pure from all such associations." This is the true ground to take, and we are glad to see the interest which is felt in maintaining it.

EASTERN SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST ASSOCIATION.

[From our Correspondent.]

The Eastern Association of Seventh-day Baptist Churches closed a very harmonious and delightful session last week in Waterford, Conn. The meeting was opened by a discourse from Bro. W. B. Gillett, from Dan. 12: 4—"Many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased."

The Officers of the Association were appointed as follows:—

DAVID DUNN, Moderator.
S. DAVISON, Recording Secretary.
P. STILLMAN, Assistant Rec. Sec.
G. B. UTTER, Corresponding Sec.

Letters from the churches being called for, were read, and their statistics taken; from which it appeared, that although the number of additions to the churches during the year has not been large—but in respect to some of them a diminution—there have nevertheless been some cheering indications of the continued care of the Great Head. Among the tokens of a healthy condition, we noticed that most, if not all, of the churches had taken hold of our benevolent institutions with much spirit, and seemed disposed to lay themselves out with new zeal in carrying forward the great work committed to us as a denomination. These tokens we hail with peculiar satisfaction, as they afford, in connection with those enjoyed at our anniversaries in Plainfield, N. J., proof that we are making progress towards that systematic organization in benevolent things which we have so long needed.

Bro. Alex. Campbell was appointed to represent the Association at the next annual meeting of the Missionary Association in Berlin, June 1846. Bro. Lucius Crandall was appointed a delegate to the Tract Society, at the same time and place. This is as it should be; and we wish our other Associations would not only vote to send their representatives, but actually send them.

A resolution contemplating the action of the General Conference in the preparation of a new Hymn Book for the denomination, elicited considerable discussion, and was at length indefinitely postponed.

The afternoon of Thursday was appropriated mainly to the consideration of a series of resolutions, prepared by the committee on resolutions. We select the following:—

Presented by Bro. W. B. Maxson, and seconded by Bro. Alex. Campbell—

Resolved. That this Association has heard with great pleasure of the determination of the Executive Board of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association, to enter into Foreign Missionary labors, and that we commend the enterprise to the liberal support and devout prayers of the brethren of this Association, and that in view of its responsibilities, we again commend to all our brethren the more general attention to the monthly concert of prayer on the evening after the first Sabbath in every month.

Bro. MAXSON said that he was glad the Missionary Association had determined on an effort in the foreign field, and that that determination had been brought to the knowledge of this body. It is time we took a broader view of our duty. We had been troubled a good deal with sectional jealousies, and we wanted something to kill such feelings. God had appointed something which was just calculated for the purpose; it was the work of carrying the great commission into execution according to the full extent of its meaning. We must have something to draw us from our little squabbles. Satan always found something for idlers to do, and if we do not perform the Lord's work, it is inevitable that we will be doing the devil's. Some might object that we lack ministers, but this was rather the very reason why we ought to engage in it. God looks down on that people who are disposed to do something, and will give them the men. One reason why we have so few, is because we have so little for them to do. God will not send other worthy men into our ranks to have their hands tied. Again, he rejoiced in this effort because it would tend to promote the cause of education among us. For a foreign mission we must have educated men; hence the subject of education will be brought to bear upon our feelings in all our operations. He considered that our position hitherto was a good deal like that of a farmer eating up his seed wheat. A farmer that would sow so sparingly that he must eat his seed wheat could never prosper; nor could we in spiritual things if we engaged so sparingly in efforts to evangelize the world. In conclusion, he thought we were able in a pecuniary point to establish a mission, and place it on high ground.

Bro. CAMPBELL, in seconding the resolution, said that he wanted the resolution not only adopted by vote, but adopted into our very hearts. He felt it high time to wake up to this great work. God speaks to us in the language of the commission, "Go ye into all the world." None of us can admit that we have nothing to do in this work. We may imagine objections, that we are a small people, and have no means. But look at the means which were in the hands of the disciples to whom the commission was immediately given. Did they say, We are too few, we are too small? No. But they had a strong faith that God would bless his Word, and that is what we want—a faith that will work, and work out this commission to the ends of the earth. God will be with us.

Presented by Elder Daniel Coon, and seconded by A. B. Burdick—

Resolved, That we have heard with pleasure of the increased prosperity of the American Sabbath Tract Society, and commend it to an increased liberality as an institution indispensable to the promoting of correct Sabbath views; and that in view of the necessity of God's blessing to attend its labors, we also recommend a monthly concert of prayer to Almighty God for his blessing upon it, the evening after the third Sabbath in every month.

Bro. COON remarked, that there was something in this resolution that might by some be regarded as rather forbidding. The community was already so much flooded with tracts, that it was natural to conclude that much error had been spread among the people by their means. But if so, it was necessary to have an antidote, and we as a people claim to have that antidote in the system of theology which develops the true doctrine of the Sabbath. True, there is such a deep-rooted prejudice against this doctrine, that many suppose it to be a hopeless task to diffuse it; yet the means must be used, people could not believe that of which they had not heard. Indeed, something had already been done, which we might regard as a pledge that God will bless our well-directed efforts. He was glad to see that the resolution recognized dependence on the divine blessing, and he was confident that a real heart-felt prayer was never lost. God always hears it.

Bro. BURDICK said, it was of little importance for us to speak to resolutions and pass them here, if we forget them as soon as we go home. If we will do something, we may expect God's blessing. Here was a mode of operation in which we might effect much. The tract operation presents facilities that no other can claim. A cent or two will purchase a tract, and a child can present it. He mentioned the case of an intelligent man in public life, who confessed that one of our little Sabbath tracts had produced a greater effect upon his mind, than the most powerful and eloquent lectures he had heard on the subject, though he had heard many.

Elder W. B. Gillett submitted the following—

Resolved, That we heartily approve of the efforts that are being made by Protestant Christians to give the Word of God, correctly translated, without note or comment to all the inhabitants of the earth; and that the American and Foreign Bible Society meets our approval, and claims an interest in our prayers and contributions.

Bro. GILLETT sustained the resolution in a spirited manner, remarking that in view of our own efforts which we propose to make in the foreign field, it was important to co-operate with the Bible Society, for it was actually preparing the way for us. In sending a man into the field, we need not wait for him to translate the Scriptures; they would be already translated to his hand. The tools would be prepared for us, and we would only have to go to work and use them.

The resolution was seconded by T. B. BROWN, who briefly adverted to the state of Roman Catholic countries. Where the Bible was witheld from the people, the consequence was that Christianity was perverted into a soul-cursing and body-destroying system. An insulting priesthood, to be sure, would boast of their orphan asylums, their institutions for the poor, and parade with much show of piety their list of charities; but in reality their miserable system of superstition first created the necessity for such [illegible] the extortions it practiced upon its disciples. But true Bible religion not only teaches us to exercise our charities, but also to do away the necessity for them. This the people would discover if permitted to read the Bible for themselves. Mr. B. also urged, that nothing else than the Bible was adapted to the growing and expanding intellect of man. Other themes than Bible themes might be exhausted, and the mind might become satiated with them. But the Bible is like its Author, infinite. Its themes will be the subject of meditation through all eternity.

Bro. Lucius Crandall presented the following resolution—

Resolved, That this Association regard with great pleasure the establishment of our religious press in the city of New York, and do highly approve of the official duties of the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder, and recommend the paper to the patronage of the Christian public.

He said it was not necessary for him to say any thing by way of recommending the paper; it was a sufficient recommendation of itself. He thought we could not honorably refuse to sustain it. We have gone into the very camp of the enemy, and if we do not maintain our present position, it will be considered as settled that we cannot live either in or out of the camp. There was, therefore, no alternative; the war must be prosecuted. Some might talk of postponing action till we had acquired greater strength, but it was impossible to gain strength by inaction. He exulted in the power of divine truth, and though Rome might build a steeple tall as the moon, yet by the simple truth of God we were able to exert an influence that would reach beyond its shadow. After many other spirited remarks, he concluded by urging the resolution.

The above resolutions were all unanimously adopted.

The Association will hold its next anniversary with the Marlborough Church, Salem Co., N. J., on the fifth day of the week before the 4th Sabbath in May, 1846. Bro. L. Crandall to preach the Introductory Discourse; Bro. A. B. Burdick his alternate.

MR. CRANDALL IN REPLY TO MR. MAGRUDER.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:

Mr. Magruder, in his letter published in the 34th No. of your paper, says, when speaking of himself in connection with those associated with him, "I do not admit the existence of the obligation, in this dispensation, to keep any day whatever as the Sabbath day." In close connection with this statement, he adds, "I believe heartily in the consecration of the Lord's day." Speaking of the duties of what he calls the Lord's day, towards the close of his letter, he says, "To do all this, the suspension of all secular business on Sunday is highly expedient, if not necessary." In my remarks upon Mr. M's letter, I said, "It is truly wonderful, that amid the multiplied shapes and shades in which opposition to the law of the Sabbath appears, it should invariably carry with it demonstrations of its own impracticability." Now what is here called impracticability, is the sentiment that there is no existing obligation in this dispensation to keep any day whatever as a Sabbath day, as contained in the first quotation cited from Mr. M.'s letter. And to show that the doctrine or sentiment is impracticable, even with Mr. M. himself, I bring his own words, in the second and third quotations above, from his letter.

Our positions, then, are simply as follows: Mr. Magruder says, "There is no Sabbath in this dispensation;" and I say, his sentiment is impracticable.

But what a mighty odds there is between these positions and those which Mr. M. presents in their place in the opening of his reply to me. See what he says—"Mr. Crandall supposes my position, that the ancient seventh-day or Sabbath is not now obligatory on Christians, is impracticable." Now, sir, this statement, as it now stands, is false. It stands as an exhibition of Mr. M.'s position or sentiment which I call "impracticable." But Mr. M.'s position which I call "impracticable" is not contained in this statement; and so I am made to appear to be accountable for saying what I never said. By thus substituting a denial of the obligation to keep the seventh day simply, instead of a denial of the obligation to keep any day whatever as a Sabbath-day, Mr. M. improves vastly upon his condition. First—He puts out of sight what is very offensive to a large portion of professing Christians, and difficult also to sustain, viz: the no-Sabbath-doctrine. Second—He makes himself very acceptable to the popular feeling, by narrowing down his position to simple opposition to those who keep the seventh day. Third—He is thus enabled to make his doctrine appear very practicable to the superficial and prejudiced Sunday-keeping reader, while he proceeds to an illegitimate effusion from his real original premise, in which he says, "The old day, the Sabbath—the last day of the week—fitly belongs to the old dispensation. The new day—the first day of the week—as appropriately becomes the new dispensation. God completed the work of creation, and instituted a monumental evidence of his power, by consecrating the last day. He, through his Son, now completes the work of redemption, and institutes a monumental evidence of his power by consecrating the first day." Now what talk this is for one to use who denies the existence of any Sabbath. Suppose this statement about the first day was as true as it is false, would it not make that day just as truly the Sabbath of the new dispensation as the seventh day was the Sabbath of the old? What becomes of Mr. M.'s dénial of the existence of the obligation, in this dispensation, "to keep any day whatever as the Sabbath-day," in view of this comparison, (which he improperly calls a contrast,) of the consecration of the first day of the week with that of the last? Again—Did God consecrate the last day of the week, and thereby obligate men to keep it as a Sabbath or rest-day; and has he now consecrated the first day, and at the same time imposed no obligation, even on Christians, to keep it "as a Sabbath-day in any sense of the word"? Can this be so, while it is highly expedient, if not necessary, to suspend all secular business on Sunday, in order to do the duties required on that day, as making up its proper observation?

I pass to notice another feature of Mr. M.'s reply to me. He says, "Your correspondent spreads a net for me, and gets entangled himself in its meshes;" and to make which appear, adds, "He says, in reply to my citation to Paul's authority in Col. 2: 16, that Paul's language in Gal. 4: 10, 11, forbids keeping Sunday, or any other day." In this way Mr. M. charges me with saying, that Paul forbids keeping Sunday or any other day. But I have said no such thing, as any one will see, if he will read the second paragraph of my article upon his letter. The truth in this case is, that Mr. M. urged in his letter that Paul, in Col. 2: 16, forbade the keeping of the seventh day. My response was this, "Now, if this view of the Apostle's doctrine be correct, does not Mr. M. set his authority at defiance by keeping, as he says, holy the Lord's day—[Sunday]? Will not this view of Paul's language forbid keeping Sunday or any other day? For the Apostle says to his brethren, Gal. 4: 10, 11—'Ye observe days, and months, and times, and years; I am afraid of you.' But this view of the subject is dubious." The sum of all this is, that Mr. M. adopts a principle of interpretation, according to which I proved to him that Paul may be made to appear to teach what neither he nor myself would believe Paul ever taught at all. And on account of the absurdity of the conclusion legitimately flowing from his principle of interpretation, I deny the soundness of his principle of interpretation, and also the truth of his conclusion; and yet Mr. M. charges me with affirming that this very absurdity is a truth.

My object in dwelling on these two points is only to show what is of the utmost importance here, viz. that so long as Mr. M. reads my articles as he seems to, and replies to them as he has in this case, our subject can derive no advantage from our controversy. Mr. M. assays to reply to me; but it is all a farce—an illusion. He makes, properly, no reply to me at all. Therefore, as touching his labor to make obedience to the fourth commandment take rank with that Judaizing which he says the Apostle to the Gentiles was combatting, or his declaration that God has consecrated the first day through his Son, I should be happy to speak in due time. But, unless Mr. M. will renounce his first position, viz. that there is no obligation now existing to keep any day whatever as a Sabbath-day, I shall regard his arguments for keeping the first day as sufficiently refuted by himself. For if his arguments prove any thing for observing the first day, they prove it should be observed as a Sabbath day.

"The Sabbath was made for man"—not for beasts, not for birds, not for angels. Such is Mr. M.'s interpretation of our Lord's words, if I can understand him. Or, again, the Jews being men, and having received the Sabbath, Mr. M. thinks the Saviour would inform his hearers that the Sabbath was made with some reference to the human family for that reason; although for the most part mankind had no interest in the institution. Now if Mr. M., as being in the presence of Christ, can honestly say, that he so understands his Master, then with all long-suffering and doctrine I will reprove him. But for the present I confide in his sense and candor, to correct so palpable a wresting of a plain and gracious declaration of the blessed Son of God.

LUCIUS CRANDALL.

SOUTHERN METHODIST CONVENTION.—After nearly two weeks of deliberation, this Convention came to the conclusion, and unanimously resolved, that they could not sanction the action of the late General Conference on the subject of slavery, by remaining under the jurisdiction of that body, without deep and lasting injury to the interests of the Church and country; and that, therefore, unless the northern majority will recede from their position, they must separate from the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the General Conference. This, we believe, is the third rupture of great ecclesiastical bodies occasioned by slavery. It is fast proving itself to be the "great disturber."

◆

SLAVERY IN NEW JERSEY.—An interesting case has been tried before the Supreme Court of New Jersey, involving the question of slavery under the new Constitution of that State. It seems that Alvan Stewart, Esq., sued out writs of habeas corpus in favor of certain persons held as apprentices and slaves, for the purpose of trying the constitutionality of the law by which they are held. The writs were granted, and on Tuesday, the 20th inst., the trial came on in full bench. The arguments in the case were closed on Friday last, but the decision of the Court is not expected until its next session. The number of persons so held as to affected by this decision, is stated at about 3000.

◆

A NEW BISHOP.—The Annual Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church of Pennsylvania was in session last week at Philadelphia. The principal business was the election of a Bishop to fill the place of H. U. Onderdonk, who resigned the post about one year ago. After several ballotings, the clergy succeeded in electing Rev. Dr. Bowman by a majority of five votes, the whole number being 74. But when it was referred to the laity either to approve or reject the election, they rejected it by a vote of 55 to 37. The clergy thereupon went again into an election, and chose Rev. Alonzo Potter, of Schenectada, N. Y., whose election was unanimously concurred in by the laity. Dr. Potter is now a Professor in Union College, and a son-in-law of the venerable Dr. Nott, President of that College. It is thought that he will accept the office, at a salary fixed by the present Convention of $3,500 per year, exclusive of traveling expenses.

ENLARGEMENT.—Although the Recorder for the present year has been as large as any paper ever issued for our denomination, some of its friends have wished to see it still larger; and we have therefore had the subject under consideration for a time past. It is well known, that in order to publish a denominational paper safely, "the coat must be cut according to the cloth," or, in other words, the outlay must be regulated somewhat by the income. In our own case, we can tell exactly what the outlay will be, and can calculate pretty nearly what the income will be. Having then so much money (in prospect) with which to print the paper for a year, the whole subject has resolved itself into two questions—1st. Shall we expend the money in printing a great blanket sheet, on poor paper, with several columns of advertisements?—Or, 2d. Shall we expend it in printing a medium sized sheet, on good paper, with no advertisements? We have referred these questions to several good advisers, and they unanimously say, Give us a sheet of the present size, on good paper, and filled with reading matter. This advice corresponds exactly with our own taste, and we have concluded to follow it. With the commencement of the new volume we shall make considerable improvements, by which means we hope to render the Recorder still more deserving of a liberal support.

General Intelligence.

LATE RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE.

Mission in Turkey.—From very recent intelligence from Beyroot, it appears that great religious interest is waking up among the Maronites, who have heretofore violently opposed Christian missions. The Missionaries in that region have just commenced open public Protestant worship, without molestation. In Constantinople the work is advancing, though amid much opposition. The Greek Patriarch persecutes, and as one consequence, the brethren, as in apostolic days, "are scattered every where, preaching the word."

The Mahommedans in Turkey are making no effort to sustain their system—are building no new mosques nor repairing old ones, and assign as a reason for this course, that according to the Koran, Mahommedanism is to pass away, and therefore it is of no use to do aught to maintain it. Important changes, it is known, are taking place in the Turkish Empire, and the Sultan is pressing on his ministers the duty of providing for the general education of the people. They have a hard task to accomplish—much like raising the dead to life. But in connection with the Christian Missionaries, every where so abundantly blessed, we may hope such efforts of the Government will be successful.

China.—The law heretofore existing in China, that no man once leaving the country should be permitted to return on penalty of death, has been rescinded since the opening of the country to Missionaries, and permission given to all to return if they wish, and the consequence is, that many are returning from India and other countries, some of them, it may be hoped, imbued with the spirit, as well as knowledge, of Christianity.

Missions in Southern India.—A recent writer from Madras to the American Board says, that in some of the chief seats of Heathenism of that region, where there has been the most determined opposition to Christianity, Missionaries are now, by invitation, distributing their books, and preaching to attentive congregations, sometimes numbering several hundreds.

Rev. Mr. Muzzy, of the Madura mission, holds similar language; and a correspondent of the N. Y. Observer speaks of great effects produced by native preachers, under the direction of Missionaries, in that region. He says the progress of the people towards Western civilization, in consequence of steamboat intercourse, is very manifest, and likely to increase.

It is rare now, he says, to see a Heathen temple repaired, but common to see one going to ruins; rare to see an Idolator become a Romanist, because the change is too slight to be thought worth making; but by no means rare to see both Heathen and Romanists embracing revealed truth.

African Missions.—The London Church Missionary Society has recently sent out a large company of missionaries to commence a settlement in the interior of Africa. Mr. Crawthur, one of the number, is a native African of the Yoruba tribe, torn from his country in boyhood, by a slave-dealer—re-captured—freed—converted—educated—ordained, and now commissioned to preach Christ to his benighted countrymen.

The African Slave Trade.—The Sierra Leone Watchman of the 18th of February gives the following items:

It is stated that the slave traders at Seabar and in the river Gallinas had been much emboldened by the prosecution of Capt. Denman, in England, for his summary destruction of sundry harracoons, and openly asserted their determination to seek redress in the English Courts if they were again molested in their operations.

Rev. William Raymond, the missionary who went from this country with the Africans of the Amistad, writes from his Mendi mission-house, Little Boon River, January 8th, and gives a picture of his trials. It seems that Mr. R. had been the bearer of a letter from the Governor of Sierra Leone to the King of the Mendi country, by which that personage was greatly angered, as well as by various hostile demonstrations of the British against the slave establishments at Seabar; all which he imputed to the agency of Mr. R. He said if the English wanted to destroy the slave trade, they must destroy one half of Sierra Leone, for half of Sierra Leone was engaged in it, &c.

After much talk of this kind, in which the king inveighed bitterly against the English and their attempts to destroy the trade, he told Mr. R. that he must go; and finally gave him a written notification that he must 'clear out' before the 7th of February.

This king bears the name of Henry Tucker, but it does not appear whether he is an African with an English name, or actually a white man. Mr. Raymond ascribes his conduct to the instigation of Luiz and other slave traders. His letter, which was addressed to the superintendent of the Wesleyan Mission at Sierra Leone, asks for advice as to the course he had better pursue; whether he should go away, or remain and trust to the aid he might receive from the men-of-war, &c.

The Watchman says that Commodore Jones had resolved to protect Mr. Raymond and suppress the traffic by all the means in his power; that he had burned the factory of Luiz at Seabar, and several other establishments at Gallinas.

Later intelligence informs, that the difficulty was carried to a higher authority than King Tucker, and that Mr. Raymond was exculpated from blame.

The New National Name.—The proposition of the New York Historical Society to change the name of our country to "Allegania," has elicited all sorts of jokes and comments from the press. Some are disposed to view it with favor and have adopted it in every case instead of "United States." Others are satisfied of its propriety, but doubt that it can ever be acceptable enough to the mass of our people, to effect the change. The Boston Courier suggests the name of All-gain-ia, as more expressive of our national character. The N. Y. Express proposes Yankeedoodledom as more explicit still; while others have suggested such barbarisms as Winnepisseogiana, Okefenokeania, and Apalachicoliana. The N. Y. Plebeian goes in for "Dollar-land." In view of the omnipotence of South Carolina chivalry in the affairs of the nation, Quattlebumdom has also been named.

The First Lion.—A correspondent of the Commercial Advertiser, under date of Rahway, N. J., May 5, 1845, gives the following account of him:—

The first lion that appeared in this country made his debut in the year 1798. He came to New York in a French brig belonging to the island of Gaudaloupe, which had made a voyage to Africa, for slaves, and, having landed them at Charleston, South Carolina, proceeded to New York to obtain an outward cargo of calicoes, beads, New England rum and tobacco, for the Congo market.

The lion was a small young whelp, not more than six months old, and was brought as a pet by the commander of the French slaver. While the brig was in New York, the lion became troublesome and mischievous, and the Frenchman, weary of him, sold him to a man who was a servant in a hotel situated where the old Tontine now stands. This man, whose name I think was Gold, paid ten dollars for the whelp, took him home and caged him till he was a year old, when he commenced exhibiting him. A lion, in that lionless age, was a downright wonder, and every body was anxious to say, "I have absolutely seen a sartin' live lion."

Mr. Gold, the owner of the animal, without the aid of the puffs of the press, soon became a lion himself, in consequence of the association; and the two lions were objects of universal curiosity. Mr. Gold was not unapprised of the fact, and made the most of it.

To obtain admittance to the lions, the curious had to pay one dollar, and that fee was deemed dog cheap by the admirers of the wonders of animated nature. Mr. Gold remained proprietor of the "only lion there was in the United States" till the year 1820, when he sold out for the sum of one thousand dollars, and with deep regret parted with the author of his fortune and his fame, his majesty the king of the beasts.

I met this Mr. Gold at sea, in the year 1832, and had these facts from his mouth. He was then an old man, possessed of a large fortune, all of which came through the lion; and he told me that before he sold the animal, he had produced him upward of thirty thousand dollars. He never exhibited him for less than one dollar "the sight."

Those were old and happy days; the men of that era about which Mr. Thomas Ritchie likes to talk, when Mr. Jefferson wore red plush breeches, and old John Adams and Timothy Pickering insisted that every man of taste and fashion should wear a cocked hat and perriwig. But,

> Old times have changed; old manners gone—
> A stranger fills the Stuarts' throne.

And now you can see a whole army of lions, tigers, leopards, zebras, elephants, rhinoceroses, and one third of the whole animal world, by paying the very small sum of twenty-five cents.

The Food of Man.—The Genesee Farmer gives this brief summary of the native countries of our most familiar plants:

The potatoe is a native of South America, and is still found wild in Chili, Peru and Monte Video. In its native state, the root is small and bitter. The first mention of it by European writers is in 1588. It is now spread over the world. Wheat and rye originated in Tartary and Siberia, where they are still indigenous. The only country where the oat is found wild is in Abyssinia, and thence may be considered a native. Maize or Indian corn, is a native of Mexico, and was unknown in Europe until after the discoveries of Columbus. The bread fruit tree is a native of South Sea islands, particularly Otaheite. Tea is found a native no where except in China and Japan, from which country the world is supplied. The cocoa nut is a native of most equinoctial countries, and is one of the most valuable trees, as food, clothing and shelter are afforded by it. Coffee is a native of Arabia Felix, but is now spread into both East and West Indias. The best coffee is brought from Mocha, in Arabia, whence about fourteen millions of pounds are annually exported. St Domingo furnishes from sixty to seventy millions of pounds yearly. All the varieties of the apple are derived from the crab apple, which is found native in most parts of the world.

The peach is derived from Persia, where it still grows in a native state, small, bitter, and with poisonous qualities. Tobacco is a native of Mexico and South America, and lately one species has been fouud in New Holland. Tobacco was first introduced into England from North Carolina, in 1586, by Walter Raleigh. Asparagus was brought from Asia; cabbage and lettuce from Holland; horse radish from China; rice from Ethiopia; beans from the East Indias; onions and garlics are natives of various places both in Asia and Africa. The sugar cane is a native of China, and the art of making sugar from it.

The Jews.—We find in one of our exchanges the following statistics in regard to the Jews. There are—

"In America—In the United States, 35,000; in other parts of America, 40,000. Total, 75.-000.

In Europe—Russia and Russian Poland, 1,700,000; Sweden, 1,250; Denmark, 6,000; Prussia, 194,588; Germany, 145,000; Holland and Belgium, 80,000; Great Britain and Ireland, 30,000; France, 80,000; Austria, 453,524; Switzerland, 2,000; Italy, 200,000; Turkey, 325,000; Gibraltar, 2,000; Portugal, 1,000; Ionian Islands, 8,000. Total, 3,228,362.

In Asia—Palestine, 120,000; remainder of Asia, 2,988,000. Total, 3,000,000.

In Africa—500,000. Grand total, 6,803,362.

Jews in New York, 12,000; Philadelphia, 2,500; Baltimore, 1,800; Charleston, 1,500; London, 20,000; Amsterdam, 25,000; Hamburg, 9,000; Berlin, 5,000; Cracow, 20,000; Warsaw, 30,000; Rome, 6,000; Leghorn, 10,000; Constantinople, 80,000; Smyrna, 90,000; Jerusalem, 6,000; Hebron, 800; Tiberias, 1,900; Saphet, 1,800.

Mines.—The deepest shaft in the world is one in the Tyrol, which is 460 fathoms, or 3764 feet deep; the next is Sampson mine, at Andreaberg, in the Hartz, which is 360 fathoms, or 2230 feet deep. The Valenciana mine, in Mexico, is 295 fathoms, or 1770 feet deep. In our own country, the greatest depth to which a shaft has been carried is 244 fathoms, or 1464 feet deep. A comparison between the height of any great work above the surface of the earth, with one of these undertakings, will best show their extent. St. Paul's cathedral is 360 feet high, and comparative observation between that measurement and the shafts of some of the mines will show the magnitude of the work. Though the mines in England are not so deep as some others, yet they are, perhaps, much more difficult to accomplish. The mines in South America and in Germany are begun far above the surface of the sea. The Valenciana mine is 6000 feet above the top of the mine in Cornwall; whilst the Jarrow pit, near South Shields, which is the deepest of our coal mines, is 165 fathoms under the sea level, and one of the mines in Cornwall extends more than 200 fathoms below the level.

Professors of Religion in the United States.—The American Almanac for 1845, fixes the whole number of professors of religion in the United States at 4,181,292. Of this number, about 3,000,000 belong to denominations usually termed evangelical. The whole number as given in the Almanac is estimated to be about one half of our adult population over twenty-one.

Lightning Express.—A gentleman who was proceeding from London to Bristol by the Great Western railway, on Saturday last, discovered, just before the train reached Slough, that he had lost his purse, cantaining £900. On arriving at Slough he had the electric telegraph put in action, and in five minutes afterwards he received the happy intelligence that the purse had been found at the Paddington booking office, by a policeman who had searched for it on the news of its loss being received.

Irishmen in England.—The Dublin Nation says that Mr. Smythe, the M. P. for Canterbury, the original Coningsby, is an Irishman, and that at this very hour, Irishmen are at the head of every class and profession in England, fairly open to intellect. "Her great general (Wellington,) her great painter (Maclise,) her great poet (Moore,) her great sculptors (McDowell and Moore,) the greatest orator in the House of Commons (Shiel,) her great actor (Macready,) her great dramatist (Sheridan Knowles,) nay, even her great caricaturist (H. B,) and her great comedian (Farren) are one and all Irishmen." Maclise and Knowles were born in the city of Cork.

SUMMARY.

We see it stated, that ten Newfoundland dogs have been imported into Paris, for the purpose of watching the banks of the Seine, and experienced trainers are every day employed in teaching these magnificient animals to draw from the water stuffed figures of men, women and children. The rapidity with which they cross and recross the river, and come and go at the voice of the trainers, is truly marvelous.

"While I am asleep, I have neither fear nor hope, neither trouble nor glory; and blessings on him who invented sleep, the mantle that covers all human thoughts; the food that appeases hunger; the drink, that quenches thirst; the fire, that warms cold; the cold, that moderates heat; and, lastly, the general coin, that purchases all things; the balance and weight, that makes the shepherd equal to the king, and the simple to the wise." [Sancho Panza.

A party of 150 emigrants from London, arrived at Keokuk via New Orleans. Several of them have from one hundred to five hundred pounds sterling. They intend making a settlement, as agriculturists, in some one of our new countries, and will purchase at once, if an eligible location presents itself, some two or three thousand acres of government land; after which, if successful, more will annually follow.

A treaty has been negotiated between the United States and the Grand Duchy of Hesse, abolishing every kind of droit d'aubaine and tax on emigration. This will allow all aliens resident in either country, to inherit real estate and dispose of the same, paying only such duties as the inhabitants of the country where the property lies would pay in like cases.

Mr. Pitchlynn, the distinguished chief of the 25,000 civilized Choctaws beyond the Mississippi, will probably visit Washington next winter, for the purpose of applying to Congress in behalf of his nation, for the admission of the Choctaw country as a territory of the United States, with a delegate to Congress. The tribe is very anxious to be thus received, and there is no good reason for refusing this tardy justice to the red race.

The Charleston Mercury, referring to the anticipated division of the Baptist church on the subject of slavery, says:—"Mr. Clay thinks it endangers the Union. So do we. But are the southern people to submit to virtual outlawry—to an ignominious position, because their self-vindication will weaken the Union?"

Already the tide to the West has commenced. The papers in Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin and Iowa, speak of the heavy emigration which, so unusually early, is coming in There is every indication that the current will set heavier this season in that direction than it has since the extraordinary times of '35 and '36.

Mr. Cornelius Mathews, formerly one of the editors of the Arcturus, has recently inherited a large fortune.

The celebrated writer, Frederick Adolphus Krummacher, author of the Parables, died on the first of last month, at Bremen.

The Printing establishment of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, at Lodiana, North India, was almost totally destroyed by fire on the 28th of Jan. last.

The Grenada Chronicle, of the 22d of March states that six refugee slaves had been picked up at sea by a vessel arrived there. They stated that seven of them had left Martinique with only one day's provision, for St. Lucia. They were however prevented from making that island by a strong current. They had been eight days at sea when they were picked up. On the preceding day, one of the poor fellows, in utter despair, had jumped overboard, preferring death to the risk of being enslaved.

An officer of the U. S. brig Truxton, now on the coast of Africa, writes that a good healthy negro costs there but 20 dollars; and is purchased for rum, powder, tobacco, cloth, &c. The price for the same negro in Cuba is four hundred dollars.

Rev. Theodore S. Wright, Pastor of the colored Presbyterian Congregation in Frankfort street, who has been absent since December on account of ill health, arrived at Boston from Nassau in the schooner Hudson on Wednesday. The Boston Chronicle states that his health is much improved.

Skillful Surgical Operation. Mrs. Thomas Woodland, Sen. of Plainfield, blind for several years past, from cataract, was restored to sight last week, by a surgical operation, skillfully performed by Dr. Stillman, assisted by his student Mr. Utter. The Plainfield Union adds—"this delicate and interesting operation was attended with the most complete success, not being followed by the least inflamation, or other ill effect."

The Western Seventh-day Baptist Association, as we learn from the Minutes of last year, is to hold its Tenth Anniversary with the 2d Church in Adams, Allegany Co., N. Y., commencing on the 25th day of June. S. S. Griswold is to preach the Introductory Discourse; N. V. Hull is his substitute.

☞ Will Bro. James R. Irish see that an account of the meeting is forwarded to us soon?

Church Organized.—On first day, the 18th inst., a Seventh-day Baptist Church was organized in Ulysses, Potter Co., Pa., consisting of 16 members. Brothers Norman Palmer and Noah Halleck were ordained Deacons. The above are all converts from the observance of the first day, and it was the result chiefly of the distribution of a few copies of our Tracts and Vindicators. Correspondents need not fear that their favors are overlooked, because they are delayed for a while. We cannot find leisure every day to revise and correct articles for the compositor. In the line of poetry especially, it often takes us considerable time to get into a mood for making alterations.

Large Newspapers.—The Rev. E. R. Tyler, formerly editor of the Congregational Observer, in a letter to the editor of the Religious Herald, makes the following remarks, which are the results of his own experience, and are worthy of consideration:—

"I rejoice," he says, "that you have had the good sense not to enlarge it (the Herald) to a mammoth size. This has been the curse of most of our religious papers. Some it has broken down The Congregational Observer was so enlarged as to embrace nearly double the matter of the old Connecticut Observer, without any advance of price, and the result was—bankruptcy.

MARRIED,

In Clarence, Erie Co., N. Y., on the 18th inst., by Eld. N. V. Hull, Mr. William G. Lee, and Miss Fanny J. Hill, all of Clarence.

DIED,

In Alfred, N. Y., in November last, Charles Benjamin, aged 50 years. Also in November last, in Alfred, Amos Burdick, in the 78th year of his age.

In Alfred, February last, Edward Green, in the 84th year of his age. He took an active part in the revolutionary war, for which he enjoyed a pension. He was a member of the 2d Church in Alfred, and was highly esteemed as an upright and useful citizen.

In Newsted, Erie Co., N. Y., of consumption, William, son of Joel and Catharine Jones, in the 18th year of his age, The subject of this obituary was a worthy member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Clarence. In his sickness he was patient, and his death was peaceful. "Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord."

In Independence, on the 17th inst., after three hours illness, George, son of Allen Wood, aged about 6 years.

In Genesee, Allegany Co. N. Y., on the 4th inst., of bilious fever, Asa A. Langworthy, son of Dea. John Langworthy, in the 38th year of his age.

Bro. Langworthy was one of those who in early life left the land of his nativity to endure the fatigues and privations incident to the early settlers of the forests and uncultivated portions of our country. Soon after his settlement, he gave evidence of a change of heart, and united with the 1st Seventh-day Baptist Church in Genesee, and until the day of his death adorned his profession, evincing his love to God by a strict adherence to all his requirements. Few possess such intrinsic worth, or such an elevation in morality and religion, as he in the estimation of all who knew him. By this dispensation of God's Providence, one of the brightest lights of the church has been extinguished; that star which shone with peculiar effulgence and lighted up her religious atmosphere, has darted like a meteor from the cluster. But let us not murmer that Albert has left us; for we can feel the blessed assurance that our loss is his eternal gain. In this affliction, the impenitent have lost a dear friend—one whose soul was interested for their welfare, and whose ardent desire for their salvation was manifested by sweet counsels and mild admonitions. His companion is also bereft of an affectionate husband, the solace of her life, and hope of her declining years—one who made her home pleasant and desirable, and who when life's sea was ruffled, sought by the most kind attention to still the rising anguish of her troubled soul. But he has gone, leaving parents, kindred, and friends, to mourn the loss of one so universally beloved, and so unexpectedly called, in the prime of life, to fill a higher and better station—to dwell with saints in light. On the day of his interment a large and weeping assemblage met at the church, and with breaking hearts followed his remains to the tomb. Nought but a hope of meeting in a better world, and a reliance upon God, could have buoyed up the sinking desponding souls.

Genesee, May, 6th, 1845. J. L. Scott.

In Wirt, Allegany Co. N. Y., April 4th, of consumption, Lydia Rogers, consort of Clark Rogers, and daughter of Maxson Stillman, aged 34 years.

The subject of this notice experienced religion in early life, and united with the first Seventh-day Baptist Church in Alfred, where she remained a worthy member, until she removed to Genesee and united with the first church there, of which she was an ornament until called to join the church triumphant; where, judging from her life and the Christian patience and love manifested in her death, we fully believe she sits clothed in unfading and untarnished glory. Her sickness was of a lingering nature, yet she appeared reconciled to the will of her Divine Master, and in her death her language was, "Come, Lord Jesus, Come." She has left a husband, wounded and broken-hearted, to mourn her departure, and a groupe of children to sigh and grieve for one of the most tender-hearted mothers. The Church has lost one more of its lights. By this dispensation, we are reminded that the day of our redemption draweth nigh.

NOTICE.

The Ministerial Conference of the Western Association will hold its Annual Meeting with the Second Church in Alfred, N. Y., on Tuesday, the 24th day of June, 1845, commencing at 10 o'clock, A. M. All those having Essays to prepare are requested to have them in readiness for the occasion. Introductory sermon by Eld. A. A. F. Randolph. S. S. Griswold, Sec.

Independence, May 20, 1845.

WESTERN ASSOCIATION.

The Seventh-day Baptist Western Association will convene with the Second Church in Alfred, N. Y., on Wednesday, the 25th of June, 1845. Eld. Griswold to preach the Introductory Discourse; N. V. Hull his alternate. James H. Cochran, Cor. Sec.

Alfred, May 20, 1845.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION.

The Central Association will hold its Tenth Anniversary with the Seventh-day Baptist Church at Adams, Jefferson county, N. Y., commencing on the 11th of June, being the fourth day of the week before the second Sabbath in the month. Introductory discourse by Rev. Eli S. Bailey; substitute, Rev. S. B. Crandall.

It is hoped there will be a full attendance from all the churches of the Association, as there is business of vital importance to be transacted, especially our missionary business, and the publication of a Tract on Baptism. I hope, also, that our brethren will come prepared to discuss and dispose of the practice of laying on of hands on newly baptized believers, as there is now a division among us on that subject. G. M. Langworthy, Rec. Sec.

Adams, April 20, 1845.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

This Institution has a pleasant and quiet location thirteen miles south-east of Angelica, and six mile south of Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y., under the care W. C. Kenyon, as Principal, and Miss Caroline B. Maxson, as Preceptress, aided by able and experienced assistants.

Teachers' Classes will be exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining every facility of a Normal School, without its usual disadvantages. Within the past year, more than one hundred and fifty students of the institution have been employed as teachers in this and the adjacent counties—a number much larger than from any other institution in the State.

Students are prepared for entering any class in College. Ample advantages are also secured to those pursuing Modern Languages and the Fine Arts. The institution is liberally endowed and supplied with a choice and valuable library, and apparatus sufficiently extensive to illustrate every department of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. It has also well selected cabinets of Geological, Mineralogical and Conchological specimens.

The plan of instruction aims at the development of the moral, intellectual and physical powers of students, so as to render them thorough, accurate, and practical scholars.

Lectures on Chemistry, accompanied by a full course of experiments, will commence with the second week of the fall term, and continue daily to its close. During the fall and winter terms, daily lectures will be given on School Teaching. Lectures on Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Physiology, illustrated by experiments, will be given each term of the year.

Tuition, per term of fifteen weeks, from $3,50 to $5. Board per week, in private families, $1. The entire expense of the academic year, including tuition, board, washing, light, and fuel, need not exceed $60. No extra charges incurred.

SAMUEL RUSSEL,
President of the Board of Trustees.

Miscellany.

From the Boston Recorder.

THE CHRISTIAN EDITOR,

CONTRASTED WITH ONE OF INFIDEL SENTIMENTS.

Thou hast an influence—God gave it thee,
And on it wrote, "For all Eternity:"
Thy jewels shall be bright, thy stars shall blaze,
When on earth's crowns and skies no eye shall gaze
It is thy work, truth's watchfires to supply
With fuel that shall flame toward the sky,
That storm-driven souls their proper course may know,
Nor strike those rocks where breaks the surge of woe

* * * * *

Amid those solemn scenes, that grand review
Of human counsels, false, as well as true,
Two beings stand, in different garments clad,
One's eye is bright, the other's sunk and sad:
One placed true beacons on the rocky main,
And souls in safety did the haven gain;
The other held false lights along the shore,
And lured by these, souls sank to rise no more.
One wrote the truth, and sent it far and nigh,
The other sold for gain, a fatal lie.
Each had its object, and succeeded well,
One wrote for Heaven, the other wrote for Hell.
And now, before the burning throne they stand,
One with a harp of gold in his right hand,
While spirits bright with smiles his course approve,
And talk with him of Jesus' dying love.
The other holds a dark and fearful scroll,
The changeless doom of his undying soul;
While on his head vast crowds their curses pour,
For things he wrote in ages long before.
He fed men's passions, and he pleased their taste,
But left their souls a frightful moral waste:
He lulled their conscience while they lived in sin,
Nor strove to quench those raging fires within.
Ah! who could envy now, the wreaths he gained,
Since they with blood of souls were deeply stained!
His sky is thickly set with stars, 'tis true,
But wand'ring stars, most mournful to the view,
Not so with him, whose eye is beaming bright,
He looked through darkness to a world of light;
He knew that earth and time would pass away,
And deeds he weighed, on this great final day;
That public sentiment rife here would show
What was true wisdom on the earth below;
That fame, when honored by the thrones on high,
Should live in triumph, never more to die.
That fame he sought,—that deathless, high renown,
He gained it, and receives a star bright crown;
The praise of men, no being more shall hear,
But God's applaudit welcome meets his ear,
"Well done, my good and faithful servant, 'come,
Dwell near my throne, my palace is your home;
For countless hosts your loyalty behold,
And see your deeds graved on your crown of gold.'"

D. H. B.

MINISTERIAL GRAVITY.

The following very appropriate remarks on the importance of gravity in a minister of the gospel, are taken from the Millennial Harbinger:

Gravity, from ancient times, has been opposed to levity, vivacity and mirthfulness; and very naturally associates with sobriety and sincerity, as kindred virtues of the same family. It is an element of authority so essential that we are apt to indicate a person of great authority by representing him as one of great weight of character. Gravity is but another name for authority. In ministerial character it is, on this account, an attribute of vital importance. It gives to the message of truth a passport to the conscience and to the heart, without which they could not be admitted.

We naturally associate gravity and sobriety as inseparable adjuncts: or, rather, we philosophically regard them as twin sisters, the legitimate offspring of sincerity and truth. It is owing to this intimate connection that we find them so often associated in the minds, not only of apostles and prophets, but in all persons of much reflection upon the subject of Christian character.

Indeed, there are not wanting persons who could not be persuaded that any preacher is honest who is not grave. Attempts at wit, at humor, at pleasantry, or any indications of levity, or of effort to obtain a smile, or even the reputation of saying a smart thing, while seeking to save men from everlasting ruin, is so perfectly incongruous and unsuitable, that it must always secure the reprobation of all men of sound discrimination. Indeed, it may be on this account that terms essentially indicative of honesty are here employed. Semnos translated grave, and Semnotees translated gravity, in those passages that treat of ministerial qualifications, are, on other occasions, translated honest and honesty. Hence, I conclude that a light, witty, humorous preacher, is a dishonest man. Any one who courts a smile when he would woo a soul, or that provokes any fleshly association when he announces the terms of eternal life and eternal death, is essentially a dishonest man—unfaithful to God and his fellow man. Cowper's portraiture of a Christian minister so well known, admirably touches this point.

Certain attributes of character are intimately associated with each other. Wherever we discover the one, on examination we may soon discover the other. Hence in all minds are associated, sobriety and sincerity. The philosopher, the poet and the Christian, alike regard them as confederates. Do we discover that a man is grave? He is certainly sober and sincere. Or is he sincere? Then he is sober and grave. This is pre-eminently so in matters of salvation. They are solemn, most solemn and grave affairs. Life and death are the most solemn and grave realities in the universe. And if there be a time and a place for everything suitable and convenient, surely the pulpit and the Lord's day, as well as the subjects of eternal death, imperiously require the delightful solemnity of religious fear, and the dignified gravity of infinite and eternal themes.

We have known preachers who wittingly say light and foolish things for the sake of securing the attention of their hearers! Miserable excuse! Wretched apology! Then the eternal joys of heaven, the almighty terror of the Lord, need puns, jests, and witty sayings, to gain them acceptance! Was ever folly more consummate, or more suicidal than this? To dispossess demons by a smile! Surely this is a new enchantment—a sorcery unknown to the ancients. To prepare the heart for the grace of God by attempts at wit and anecdote! Amongst all the proofs the apostle ever gave of his divine mission, or of the accompaniment of the divine Spirit, that of ability to produce a laugh, to tell an amusing tale, or to sport with fancy, never found a place.

A Rowland Hill, a David Jones, and a John Leland, effectually tried that scheme of bribing Satan with a jest, a witticism, or some such doceur, to let the people go and serve the Lord. The Lord plagued the wicked Pharaoh; but these amuse a still more ruthless tyrant, in the delusive hope of producing a relaxation of his vigilance or his hate, that they may cheat him of his prey. Converts won by such artifice, or hearts allured by such flimsy rhetoric, are unfit for the kingdom of heaven.

Not one of the undignified, fitful eccentric preachers was there, so far as we have learned their history, who did not finally repent, and some of them very bitterly indeed, of their follies in this particular. The son of one of them, of no mean fame either, informed me that his father, during his last illness, said that if the Lord would ever permit him again to preach the gospel, he would never give way to the temptation of saying any of those facetious, light and irreverent things that he had heard him utter. Would to God that all who have so far mistaken human nature, the Lord and his gospel, might profit from such examples, and in their teaching exhibit incorruptness, gravity and sincerity.

The Four Pistareens.

When John was about thirteen years old he left his paternal roof in the north of New Jersey, and went to Philadelphia to learn a trade. He entered as an apprentice with his brother, a coachmaker in the northern part of the city. On a certain occasion he was sent to a drug store for a half a gallon of oil. He had frequently been sent on a similar errand, and had been accustomed to pay 25 cents for the oil. But it happened that oil had fallen, and the price was now only 20 cents, of which however he was not informed. He had taken with him a one dollar note, and having obtained the article, he presented the note, and received in change—not as he expected, three quarters of a dollar, but four pistareens, of the value of 20 cents. John, who was ignorant of their value, supposed they were quarters of a dollar, and that the druggist had given him four instead of three.

He had been taught when a child to be honest.

He knew that he ought to do to others as he would have others do to him; and that it was dishonest to take advantage of another's mistake to take what was not his own, as to cheat in any other way. His first impulse, therefore, was to return one of the pieces to the man; but before he had time to carry out his feelings into practice, Satan and the evil in his own heart tempted him: the thought occurred that he would give three of them to his brother as the right change, and keep the fourth for himself. He closed his hand upon the money, took up his jug and left the store.

The jug in which he carried the oil had no handle, and he had to carry it by a string tied round its neck. This so cut his fingers, that after changing it from one hand to the other several times, he was compelled to stop at the distance of a square and rest, which he did at the first and the second corner, doubting each time whether to go on or turn back with the money.

The next corner brought John a third time to a stand. Rest relieved the smartings of his hands, but the cuttings of his conscience were not so easily prevented. He meditated some minutes. Conscience became urgent in its demands. He wished he had obeyed his first honest impulse.—He felt very unhappy, but he must not delay. He had already been a good while about his errand. He took his jug; was undecided whether to go forward or return. He stood one moment and determined——to go back.

It was a hard task to trudge back three long squares with a heavy jug without a handle; and more than once he had almost determined to give up his earnest resolution. But he persevered, reached the store and set down his load. "You have given me too much change," said he, presenting the four pistareens to Mr. W———; "you have given me four quarter dollars instead of three."

"You have your right change," said Mr. W———, "the oil is 20 cents, and those four pieces are not quarter dollars, they are 20 cent pieces." "Here is a quarter," continued the benevolent store-keeper, taking one from his drawer, "which I will give you. You can notice the difference between them as you go home; and let me advise you always to deal as honestly as you have to-day."

Who can imagine the feelings of the boy when he saw the true state of the matter; and knew in an instant that had he persevered in his sinful project he must, from the very nature of the circumstances, have been discovered! "Had I carried out my first intentions," said he, when he related his anecdote, "I should have handed my brother three of the pistareens. He would of course have asked for the balance, and I should have been driven to add falsehood to my crime, by saying that was all he gave me. In all probability I should have been detected, and sent back to my father in disgrace. It would have stamped my character with dishonesty, from which I might have never recovered." As it was he picked up his jug and with light heart and rapid step proceeded up the street. He was so rejoiced at the happy result, and so thankful for his preservation, that he set out on a run, and did not feel the string cut his fingers. During thirty-five years that he lived after this event, he never forgot the lesson it taught him; he became a most excellent man and a true Christian, and throughout his life, in private business and in public office, ever acted under the firm conviction that "honesty is the best policy."

From the Church of England Magazine.

CHRIST DIED FOR THE UNGODLY.

ROMANS, V. 6.

Why, perishing sinners, your hearts will ye harden,
And reject the commandments of God in your pride?
O seek ye from heaven forgiveness and pardon;
For it is for your sins that the Saviour has died.

And will ye live on, still no Saviour revering,
And still refuse Christ as your king and your guide?
O why are you thus in your sins persevering,
When it was for those sins that Christ suffered and
died?

How sweet to the Christian, in moments of sadness,
To know that there is one in whom he can confide!
How oft will this thought fill his spirit with gladness—
That his sins are forgiven, since Jesus hath died!

And when, the death-bed of the Christian surrounding
His friends and his kinsmen watch life's ebbing tide
They rejoice that the Saviour, in mercy abounding,
Has come down from above, and for sinners has
died.

A Benevolent Girl.

A gentleman went to visit a woman who was sick. As he was going into the room, he saw a little girl kneeling by the side of the poor woman's bed. The little girl rose from her knees as soon as she saw the gentleman, and went out of the room.

"Who is that child?" the gentleman asked.

"O sir," said the sick woman, "that is a little angel, who often comes to read her Bible to me, to my great comfort; and she has just now given me sixpence."

The gentleman was so pleased with the little girl's conduct, that he wished to know how she had learned to love the word of God, and to be so kind to poor people. Finding she was one of the scholars of a neighboring Sunday school, he went to the school and asked for the child. She felt rather afraid when she was called to the gentleman; but he was very kind to her, and asked her if she was the little girl that had been to read the Bible to the sick woman.

She said she was.

The gentleman said, "My dear, what made you think of doing so?"

She answered, "Because, sir, I find it said in the Bible, that 'pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this—to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction.'"

"Well," said he, "and did you give her any money?"

"Yes, sir,"

"And where did you get it?"

"Sir, it was given me as a reward."

The gentleman was affected by the goodness of God, in making this little girl so obedient to his holy word, and prayed that the latter part of the text which she had quoted might also be fulfilled in her; that God would keep her unspotted from the world."

The Rum-seller's Dream.—'Well, wife, this is too horrible! I cannot continue this business any longer.'

'Why, dear, what's the matter now?'

'Oh, such a dream! such a rattling of dead men's bones! such an army of starving mortals! so many murderers! such cries and shrieks! such horrid gnashing of teeth, and glaring of eyes! and such a blazing fire! and such devils! I cannot endure it! my hair stands on end, and I am so filled with horror I can scarcely speak! Oh, if ever I sell rum again!'

'My dear, you are frightened.'

'Yes, indeed am I. Another such a night will I not pass for worlds.'

'My dear, perhaps—'

'Oh, don't talk to me. I am determined to have nothing more to do with rum, any how. Don't you think, Tom Wilson came to me with his throat cut from ear to ear—and such a horrid gash! and it was so hard for him to speak, and so much blood, and said he, 'See here, Joe, the result of your rum selling.' My blood chilled at the sight—and just then the house seemed to be turned bottom up, the earth opened, and a little imp took me by the hand, saying 'follow me.' As I went, grim devils held out their cups of liquid fire, saying, 'drink this.' I dared not refuse; every draught set me in a rage; serpents hissed on each side, and from above reached down their heads and whispered 'rumseller!' On and on the imp led me through a narrow pass. All at once he paused, and said, 'Are you dry?' Yes, I replied. Then he struck a trap-door with his foot, and down, down we went, and legions of fiery serpents rushed after us, whispering, 'Rumseller! Rumseller!'

At length we stopped again, and the imp asked me as before, 'are you dry?' Yes, I replied. He then touched a spring—a door flew open—what a sight! There were thousands, aye millions, of old, worn-out rum-drinkers, crying, most piteously, 'rum, rum, give me some rum!' When they saw me they stopped a moment to see who I was; then the imp cried out, so as to make all shake again, 'Rumseller!' and hurling me in shut the door. For a moment they fixed their ferocious eyes upon me, and then uttered, in a united yell, 'Damn him!' which filled me with such horror that I awoke! There, wife, dream or no dream, I will never sell another drop of the infernal stuff. I will no longer be accessary to the miseries that come upon man in consequence of the traffic in intoxicating drinks. I will not. [Religious Rec.

One thing at a time.—Many boys and girls will read this without once thinking that it is meant for them. Let me ask a question or two. 1. Do you never try to study and play at the same time? 2. Do you never try to study and play at the same time? 2. Do you never try to carry two articles at once, when one is as much as you can carry safely? 2. Do you never have more than one book or one piece of work on hand at a time? Watch yourself, and you will soon detect the fault. And

When it is detected
Let it be corrected.

Hunting Fugitives.

The editor of the Cincinnati Herald tells the following amusing story:—

A citizen of Cherry Fork informs us, that lately seven slaves, of all sorts and sizes, made an exodus from Kentucky, and that a formidable band of knights, some on foot, some on horseback, soon followed on their track, as anxious to overtake them as the ancient Egyptians were to catch the Israelites. The gallant cavaliers made a bold descent upon the residence of General McIntyre, of Cherry Fork, but the General disputed the entrance to his castle, and by the help of friends, made good his defence. The neighborhood was then ransacked for a magistrate, to see whether the law could not do, what brute force failed to do—open Gen. McIntyre's door. The very man was at last found, and he issued a search warrant for certain garments which had been stolen from Kentucky, and which were supposed might be in the General's house. A very pretty device! Divers armed cavaliers, ready to eat fire if need be, came all the way from Kentucky, to hunt after old clothes! The General, like a very dutiful citizen, suffered his house to be searched; but the things wanted, were not, and had not been seen. Meantime, while these men were amusing themselves in looking after old clothes, the seven two-legged chattles, it is said, had placed themselves at a non-comatible distance. And there the matter rested.

What the magistrate got for his search-warrant, or what the band of knights-errant received for their search after old clothes, the deponent saith not.

ANOTHER.

Arrest of a Fugitive Slave.—A great ferment was excited in Crosswicks, N. J. last week, by an attempt made by the Sheriff of Burlington, Joseph Kirkbridge, and Constable Alexander Pearson, to arrest a colored man named Lewis, said to be a fugitive slave. They found him at the house of William Idell, where he was at work, claimed him as their prisoner, and called upon Garret Bennett and Charles Applegate, who were at work near by, to bring a rope and help secure him. While these men were hesitating whether to obey the Sheriff or to follow their own feelings, Lewis, who was firmly grasped by each arm, with an almost superhuman effort, dashed the officers from him to some distance, and jumped at a bound over a high gate, and then over a high pale fence, without touching either. He then ran across a field partly through the creek, but recollecting that if his clothes were wet they would impede his flight he returned and crossed the creek by a neighboring bridge. He ran to the house of a friend near by, in great alarm, crying out, 'they have had me! they are after me!'

Finding his pursuers were near, he fled to another house, and there concealed himself. The same night he was landed in New York, and is presumed to be now safe from all pursuit.

We are informed that the colored man was much esteemed in Crosswicks, and that the attempt to arrest him has produced a great excitement against the officers. It is presumed, however, that those officers considered that they were performing their duty under the law; though it is the opinion of many, that in consequence of a recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, no State law, in regard to the arresting of fugitive slaves has any force, and that no State officer is bound to arrest such persons.

Not a Cent.—In the town of S. the good ladies started the project of making their minister a present of a new suit. Among those zealous in the work was the mother of a sailor absent at sea. Before a sufficient sum was raised, he returned with his wages in his pocket, when his mother boarded him again and again for a donation. Each time he met her impunity with a shake of the head and an emphatic not a cent. She remonstrated, and asked the reason. "Why mother," said he, "I have now been home six weeks, and he has not prayed for a sailor once, and he shant have a cent."

A Just Reproof—A minister of a certain denomination, who was not very noted for his fiery zeal, visited one of his flock, who had been for a long time sick. And upon enquiring after his health, the brother told his minister that he was mending; but said he, I can't sleep, I am quite restless day and night, I can get no sleep, I had a thought of sending for you to make an appointment at my house and come and preach to me, for I recollect that when I used to go to church to hear you preach I could sleep very soundly under your preaching.

Benevolence in Great Britain.—From a table published in the Christian Almanac for the present year, we learn that the people of Great Britain contributed to various benevolent societies, during the year 1844, the very large sum of nine hundred and twenty thousand six hundred and five pounds sterling. This fact shows that, with all the corruption that exists in that kingdom, there must be a large amount of Christian principle which could induce their citizens, after paying such heavy tithes as the government exacts for the support of religion, voluntarily to contribute so large an additional sum to advance the general cause.

The Yazoo Democrat tells the following:—"Hallo, mister, did you see a dog come by here that looked like he was a year, or a year and a-half, or two years old," said a Yankee to a countryman at the road side.

"Yes," said the countryman, thinking himself quizzed, "he has passed about an hour, or an hour and a-half or two hours ago, and is now a mile, or a mile and a-half, or two miles ahead, and he had a tale about an inch, or an inch and a-half, or two inches long."

"That'll do," said the Yankee, "you're into me a feet, or a feet and a-half, or two feet."

Evening Hymn.

BY WILLIAM BLAKE.

I know, when I lie down to sleep,
The Lord is near my bed;
That angels watch, by his command,
Around my infant head.

I know, when I kneel down to pray,
That still the Lord is there,
He hears my words, he sees my thoughts,
And listens to my prayer.

I know, when I go forth to play,
The Lord is by my side;
Through every hour, at every step,
He is my guard and guide.

I know his eye sees every thing
In earth and sea and air;
That he in darkness, as in light,
Can see me everywhere.

Then let me guard each thought, each word,
Lest he should chance to find,
Evil within a heart that should
Be gentle, meek, and kind.

THY WANDERING BOY.

TO A PARENT.

By W. B. Tappan.

Has he thy tireless love forgot?
Thy early, anxious care;
Are thy gray hairs remembered not?
To prayer, then, sire! to prayer:
For if thy boy has turned aside,
And chosen Folly's way,
And for thy tears but scoffs repaid,
What canst thou do but pray?

Is he a wanderer from thy dome
On the world's tossing sea,
Where, dreaming not of heaven or home,
Thy son is lost to thee?
Still, as sad rumor to thine ear
Tells heavily how frail thy stay,
To Him who vials every tear,
Go, stricken man, and pray.

Perhaps upon the bed of pain,
Away he lies a victim now,
And he seeks a father's hand in vain,
Whose touch might cool his burning brow:
While thinking of the holy joy
Thou knew'st e'er sin knew to betray,
For him, that lovely, ruined boy,
Do thou in earnest pray.

By the bright spring of childhood's love,
That in his countenance once shone;
The eyes that meekness, like a dove,
Sat on the brow—Contentment's throne:
The beauty that unto thy heart
Appeals with power of boyhood's day,
Go, aged father, weep apart,
And, trembling, hoping, pray.

And if, for thee, there linger yet
The dregs of this world's bitter cup,
The God thou serv'st will not forget
To give thee grace to drink it up:
Yet no! not thus will prayer be lost,
Thou yet shalt bless that cast-away,
And see for him, the Folly-tost,
The penitent, 'twas good to pray.

ANTI-SLAVERY REPORTER.

The American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society has decided to enlarge its operations, and prosecute them with vigor. To this end, the Executive Committee have secured the services of the Rev. A. A. Phelps, late of Boston, as Secretary of the Society and Editor of the Reporter. The Reporter will be issued in a form and style suitable for binding and preservation, as well as general distribution. Besides the discussion and defense of the great principles of the Anti-Slavery cause, the Committee design it to be a register of the more important movements and events, affecting the cause, both in this country and abroad. In the promotion of the cause in this country, it will give attention to its moral, ecclesiastical, benevolent, social and political relations and aspects. The Committee intend it to be especially suitable for distribution among those not yet converted to Anti-Slavery principles, both in the free and slave States; and such, in all respects, as the organ of a National Committee should be. No pains will be spared by the Editor or Committee, to realize the design.

The paper will be issued monthly on the following terms, viz. 1 copy, to one address, 50 cents; 5 copies do. $2, 8 copies do. $3; 14 copies do. $5 24 copies do. $7; 50 copies do. $12; and in the same proportion for intermediate and larger numbers—all payments to be in advance; and all communications to be addressed to A. A. Phelps, 118 Nassau street, New York.

Individuals wishing the Reporter should order it, as above, at once; and the Committee earnestly request the friends of freedom, in different parts of the country, to make immediate arrangements to take it in parcels. Subscriptions for a parcel of five, ten, or more, can be secured at once as well as at some future time—in most cases better. The Committee hope for a prompt and generous response.

PROSPECTUS
OF THE
LITERARY EMPORIUM.
A COMPENDIUM OF
Religious, Literary, and Philosophical Knowledge.

"MULTUM IN PARVO."

We shall be modest in our pretensions, while we give as true a description of our intended course as we can, in plain English. In the first place, light literature will find no place in its pages, i. e. love tales, literary trash, &c. In the second place, sectarianism will not be admitted into the Emporium; that is to say, it will favor no particular denomination of Christians; but we do not mean by this that it will not advocate the religion of the Bible. It is intended that it shall do this, and in the strongest terms. It will urge the necessity not only of a change of heart, but of a virtuous and holy life, in order to be truly happy in this world, and to be prepared for that which is to come. It is intended that its religious matter shall be of such a nature as will be calculated to cultivate, to inspire and please a good and correct taste—that which will inform, expand, and elevate the mind, and also excite in the soul love to God, holiness, virtue, and humanity. In regard to its literary character, it is designed to be of such a nature as to water the thirsty soul that is studiously endeavoring to acquire a knowledge of man in his past and present condition; also, some information in relation to the different sciences and arts, and the variety of the works of nature, with such miscellaneous reading as will invigorate the faculties of the mind, give scope to the imagination, while it shall address itself to the good sense of all who desire to be truly elevated by reading.

Each Number contains 32 pages of handsome paper and type; it also contains splendid plates; is published monthly, at $1 a year, if paid in advance. One third allowed to persons who procure subscribers for the work. Good agents wanted to circulate the Emporium. All letters, orders, &c., should be addressed to

LEAVES FROM A TRAVELER'S NOTE-BOOK—NO. 17.

LONDON TO OXFORD.

It was a bright cold morning in October that we mounted the stage-coach "Diligence," at Ludgate Hill, for a sixty-miles ride to Oxford. For half an hour we were passing through thronged streets of calling here and there at the different receiving stations. At length we were assured that "all's right;" and our horses set off in their accustomed direction, prancing gaily as if conscious of the importance of their mission.

An English stage-coach has its peculiarities. It is so arranged that only four persons can be accommodated inside, while sixteen can ride outside. By this means the few, who are anxious to keep up their dignity, and are willing to pay for it, may be set apart from the many, who prefer to consult economy or their own comfort. A place is provided on the top of the coach for depositing the luggage, and another place in the rear, under lock and key, for depositing such parcels as may be committed to the care of the coachman. The latter provision is a great convenience, as it enables one to send valuable articles in this way without the least danger. The regularity with which journeys by stage are performed is truly surprising, and could only be secured by the most judicious arrangements. On the way-bill is marked the exact moment at which the coach should reach each place of consequence on the route; and every coachman is provided with a time-piece, by consulting which he is able to direct his speed so as neither to over-step his time nor over-fatigue his horses. Fresh horses are stationed once in about eight miles. On approaching a station, the horn is blown to give notice, and the relay stands ready, so that the delay of changing need not exceed two minutes. The roads are perfectly smooth, and in cases where there is any considerable ascent an extra horse and rider stand ready to lend their assistance. It is not uncommon for the horses to pass from station to station without breaking that peculiar gait to which they are trained. In our own case, the distance of fifty-eight miles was performed in exactly six hours.

The ride from London to Oxford brings before one many things worth seeing. The splendid mansions and rich lawns of the wealthy; the old thatched-roof houses, and small but tasty gardens of the poor; the various and widely-different styles of architecture and agriculture—all together are sufficient to interest the stranger. To this may be added the beautiful scenery of some parts of the route. That around Henley-upon-Thames especially has been long and justly noted. It was in one of the inns of this town that Shenston wrote his poem, "On an Inn." Near by is Fawley Court—a place which suffered much in the civil wars from a troop of horse in the service of Charles I., who tore the books of the library to pieces and destroyed many valuable manuscripts and papers. Several other towns of more or less historical interest lie near the route. Among them is Wallingford, in the castle of which Edward Stennett formerly resided and preached. It is situated on the river Thames, and now contains a population of about 3000.

Oxford is a place of great antiquity—so great that its origin is involved in obscurity. In the reign of Alfred, who once resided at Oxford with his sons, the place was noted for a monastery found in the year 727. Since then it has been the frequent residence of kings, and the scene of several sanguinary conflicts. Henry II. resided at Oxford during the greater part of his reign, and here his son Richard Cœur de Lion was born. Here it was that John Wicliffe delivered his lectures which occasionad so great an excitement. It was here also that Latimer, Ridley, and Cranmer, were burnt, in the reign of Mary. A monument in front of Baliol College marks the spot of their martyrdom. During the civil wars Oxford twice changed masters, and finally became the head quarters of the King. But since the revolution no event of much importance has occurred in the history of the town.

But Oxford is interesting now mainly as the seat of one of the most celebrated Universities of Europe. Indeed there is little else of the town than a collection of college buildings, with such residences and shops as naturally spring up in the vicinity of colleges. The origin of the University, like that of the town, is involved in obscurity. Very early there appear to have been schools here for the instruction of youth. The first charter of privileges to the University, however, was given by Henry III., and it was not until 1603 that the privilege of sending representatives to Parliament was obtained. The University consists of twenty Colleges and five Halls, and has on its books the names of between five and six thousand students. University College is said to have been founded by Alfred, but there is some uncertainty about this. The college, as such, was erected by funds bequeathed by William of Durham, who died in 1249. Baliol College was founded in 1263, and Merton College in 1264. Lincoln College, of which John Wesley was a fellow, was founded in 1479; and Wadham College, where Francis Bampfield had his conflict with the Devil, was founded in 1613. The other colleges were founded at different dates from the beginning of the thirteenth to the eighteenth century. The Bodleian Library contains, perhaps, the most valuable collection of books and manuscripts in Europe. It was founded by Sir Thomas Bodley at the close of the sixteenth century on the remains of one established by Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester.

There are many curiosities in and about Oxford which will attract the attention of a stranger. Among them are the Ashmolean Museum, built for the reception of Ashmole's collections in natural history; the Radcliffe Library, one of the most imposing architectural ornaments of Oxford, from the top of which may be obtained a complete view of this city of colleges; the city bridewell, where is preserved the door of the prison in which Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, were confined; the Radcliffe Infirmary, the Clarendon Printing-House, etc., etc.

For the Recorder.

JEROBOAM AND HIS IMITATORS.

"And Jeroboam ordained a feast in the eighth month, on the fifteenth day of the month, like unto the feast that is in Judah, . . . in the month which he had devised in his own heart."

When we trace the origin of the keeping of the first day of the week as a Sabbath, laying aside tradition and the force of education, and examining impartially the subject in the light of Scripture, we are constrained to acknowledge there is a striking similarity to the case of Jeroboam. The object of Jeroboam was to serve his personal aggrandizement, which he feared might be endangered by the people's going to Jerusalem to worship. Christian emperors, in order to establish their authority, ordained the first day of the week to be kept as the Sabbath. Both were the devices of their own hearts. Jeroboam made two calves of gold, and placed one in Dan and the other in Bethel, that the people might have a visible object to worship, crying, Behold thy Gods, O Israel! Popes have encouraged the invocation of saints, and imagery in the churches, that their followers may have visible objects before their eyes, and they teach their followers that such is the way of salvation. The majority of the house of Israel was led away by Jeroboam's advice, although they had the law, and were often and sharply reproved by their prophets. The majority of professing Christians are more or less led away from the simplicity of the Gospel, although they have the sacred oracles, by papal mummery. If one of old, in view of the degeneracy of God's people, was constrained to cry out, "Be astonished, O heavens, and wonder, O earth; I have nourished and brought up children, and they have rebelled against me;" how much more shall we who live in this age of Bibles be astonished at the inconsistences of those who profess to take the Scriptures as their only rule of faith and practice, and preach the law, and the whole law, yet live in open violation of the fourth commandment, and teach others to do the same.

I have often heard it repeated in the sacred desk, that not one jot or tittle of the law shall fail till heaven and earth shall pass away. Indeed, I have heard it asserted that the moral law of the ten commandments was the rule by which God himself was governed, and would be the standard that would govern all intelligent beings in the kingdom of heaven throughout eternity. Now does it not become the imperious duty of every one to be up and doing? Let us not be discouraged; truth is strong and must prevail.

C.

MOUNT SINAI.

President Durbin, after he had visited this renowned and holy mountain, and had felt his mind filled with the vast associations of the spot, broke forth in the following beautiful train of thought when contemplating the scene anew, with his pen in hand to record the sentiment:

"I have stood upon the Alps in the middle of June, and looked around upon their snowy empire—I have stood upon the Appenines, and looked abroad upon the plains of beautiful, eventful Italy—I have stood upon the Albanian mount, and beheld the scene of Æneid from the Circean promontory, over the Campagno, to the eternal city, and the mountains of Tivoli—I have sat upon the pyramids of Egypt, and cast my eyes over the sacred city of Heliopolis, the land of Goshen, the fields of Jewish bondage, and the ancient Memphis, where Moses and Aaron on the part of God and his people, contended with Pharaoh and his servants, the death of whose "first-born of man and beast in one night" filled the land with wailing; but I have never set my foot on any spot, from whence was visible so much stern, gloomy grandeur, heightened by the silence and solitude that reigns around, but infinitely heightened by the awful and sacred associations of the first great revelation in form from God to man. I feel oppressed with the spirit that breathes around and seems to inhabit this holy place. I shall never sit down on the summit of Sinai again and look upon the silent and empty plains at its feet; but I shall go down a better man, and aim so to live as to escape the thunders at the last day, which once reverberated through these mountains, but have long since given way to the Gospel of Peace. I can scarcely tear myself away from the hallowed summit, and I wish I too could linger forty years in converse with the Lord."

EASTERN SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST ASSOCIATION.

REPORT ON THE STATE OF RELIGION. D

The Report of the Committee on the State of Religion is somewhat lengthy; but it contains thoughts of so much value, and so appropriate to the present time, that we cannot refrain from publishing extracts from it. The Committee report as follows:—

That after a careful examination of the letters from the several churches, and a free conversation with the messengers delegated to attend the anniversary, they are brought to the painful conviction, that the state of religion is unusually low among us; the additions have been but few, and the work of the Lord has not made the progress around us which we fondly hoped for at the commencement of the associational year.

As a denomination, we had agreed to observe the 1st first day of the week in 1845, as a day of fasting and prayer for the blessing of God upon our efforts to make known the claims of his holy Sabbath among our fellow men, and to revive the work of grace among our own churches and congregations. We know that many, if not all, of our churches, did so seek the Lord; yet it is remarkable that not one of the letters sent to this meeting makes any mention of that exercise, nor of their continued waiting on God and looking for an answer to those prayers. We fear that this fact indicates a lack of that living faith in God and his promises, which would lead us as a people to wrestle with God and say, "I will not let thee go except thou bless me." Our Saviour has taught us that there is a kind that goeth not out but by prayer and fasting. Such, it appears to us, is the inveterate prejudice, in the minds of our fellow men of this age against Sabbath-keeping; and we think that in all our attempts to promote it in the world around us and in our families, we have peculiar need thus to seek the interposition of the omnipotent arm and spirit of Jehovah. The same blessed Teacher has assured us, that holy and united importunity in our approaches to the mercy seat of the Lord, is peculiarly acceptable in his sight, and ultimately avails much before him who loves to grant his children the desires of their hearts. In making our report on the state of religion among us, we could not satisfy ourselves without expressing our conviction, that as a people we have not WAITED enough on the Lord; our desire and our expectation have not been enough unto him. O that every one of us may hereafter examine ourselves, and inquire—Have we asked in faith? Have we asked aright?

We would not have any suppose, however, that we regard the cause of Christ as retrograding among us. No—blessed be the name of the Lord, he has not withdrawn his loving kindness from us. Our churches uniformly speak of union, peace, and brotherly kindness, and of edification under the means of grace, as enjoyed among them, with a growing steadfastness in attachment to that form of sound words which embraces the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus. It will be seen, also, by our statistics, that some additions have been made to our numbers, both by baptisms among ourselves, and by others forsaking the traditions of men to keep the law of the Lord. While, therefore, we regard the general apathy among us as calling for profound humility and great searchings of heart, that we may turn afresh unto the Lord, we feel also that great gratitude is due unto the Lord that he hath not in anger for our lukewarmness wholly removed his loving kindness from us, but hath granted us the continuance of all our privileges, and hath made some of our churches to rejoice in additions to their number of such as have taken hold of God's holy Sabbath to keep it, to love the Lord our God and to serve him.

* * * * *

From the First Church in Hopkinton we have but little information beyond what is contained in their statistics. We learn, however, that the ministry is continued among them as in past years, and the members evince an immoveable stability in the faith for which they are distinguished.

The Second Church in Hopkinton lament their want of advancement in divine things, but speak of enjoying union and peace among the brotherhood of faith. The ministry and ordinances continue with them as in past years.

The Third Hopkinton Church is one of a number of years' standing, but became a member of this body at the present session. It occupies the site of a growing factory village. They are hoping for enlargement from the population coming in, and are preparing for corresponding efforts. They have recently called Bro. A. B. Burdick to the pastoral charge of the church, whose labors they and we hope may be attended with great success among them.

Marlborough, N. J., lament that they have made no more progress during the past year than their statistics show. Yet they enjoy union and brotherly love; and feel much interested in the promotion of God's cause in our connection. They occupy an important place, in the prospect of a growing population around them, and no other religious interest to interfere.

Newport, R. I., the oldest church of the denomination in America, aided by the Missionary Association, has continued to have the ministry among them the past year, which has not been in vain, it having been sanctified to their encouragement and comfort, while a few have by the same instrumentality been added to their numbers. Invincible prejudice keeps the multitude from examining the claims of God's holy Sabbath, and a fatal want of principle deters some, who are convinced of the truthfulness of those claims, from obeying the Lord in that important institution. "Almost thou persuadest me," say they, but they have not found it convenient yet. Though few in numbers, the church hold on their way, and labor to convict their neighbors of this neglected truth.

Piscataway, N. J.—This Church presents but little variation in its course and condition during the past year. Enjoying the labors of a worthy minister, and a body of intelligent and active members, it contributes its share towards the great objects our denomination have in view. Death has removed two beloved brethren of the church during the past year; and having no additions by conversions or baptisms, they feel conscious of cause for heart-searchings before the Lord.

The Church in Plainfield, N. J., though favored with the ministry during most of the year, have to lament that there have been none baptized—none turned unto the way of the Lord among them. They however feel that their privileges are great, and their hopes are strong that they shall yet see the work of the Lord prosper, to the enlargement of his people who honor him.

The Church at Pawcatuck, R. I., is a benevolent body, and has a prospect of increase before them, although their efforts have met with but little success during the past year. The congregation has been steadily increasing, and two have embraced the Bible Sabbath during the past year and been baptized.

Waterford, Ct., has enjoyed a pleasant season of revival during the past winter, the issue of which was an addition of seven by baptism, and one who turned from the traditions of the fathers to keep the commandments of God. The ministry has likewise been greatly blessed to the strengthening of the faith of God's people, and their joy of soul in the great things of his word.

Westerly, R. I.—In the letter from this church the brethren speak of trials and of mercies, of sorrows and of joys, of fears and of faith triumphing in expectation of grace yet to be revealed. They rejoice that God has manifested his love to them at different periods since the last anniversary by the divine influences of his Holy Spirit attending their worshiping assemblies.

Our Associational Messenger having during the year visited the churches in Berlin and Petersburg, Rensselear County, N. Y., and Shiloh, Cumberland Co., N. J., was very kindly received by all. He preached with them on Sabbath days and other occasions, visited from house to house, and found them generally well established in the faith that distinguishes us from other Christian denominations. There were in Petersburgh a few instances of delusion respecting the immediate appearing of Jesus Christ in his second advent to earth; but even these held fast their attachment to God's holy Sabbath. But both in Petersburg and Berlin the anti-rent difficulties so filled every mind that little place was left for attention to the great interests of religion. * * * * We are happy to say, that Brother William B. Maxson has recently been called to labor with the church in Berlin, whose labors we hope will prove a great blessing to the cause in that region.

The church in Shiloh, N. J. is an able and benevolent body of Christians, who are doing considerable for the Missionary and Tract Societies, and exerting a salutary influence in their own neighborhood.

In view of the whole, we hope the cause of religion is progressing among us; but we feel also that in view of the state of religion in the world, we as a people are not awake to the magnitude of the work set before us, nor to the responsibilities that necessarily devolve upon us to seek the restoration of God's holy law to the observance of the world and the Church. We want more of the living faith of God's ancient servants, and the self-denying zeal with which they sought the promotion of his glory among men.

LUTHER'S COMPLAINT OF ABSENCE OF MIND IN PRAYER.

I know not how strong others may be in spirit, but I confess, that I cannot be as holy as some profess to be, for whenever I do not bear in mind the Word of God, I feel no Christ, no spirit and joy. But if I meditate on any portion of holy writ, it shines and burns in my heart, so that I obtain good courage and another mind. The cause is this: we all discover, that our minds and thoughts are so unsteady, that, though we desire to pray earnestly, or meditate on God, without his Word our thoughts scatter in a thousand forms, ere we are aware of it. Let any one try how long he can rest on one idea, he has proposed himself, or take one hour and vow, that he will tell me all his thoughts. I am sure, he will be ashamed before himself and afraid to say what ideas have passed through his head, lest he should be taken for a mad dog and be chained. This is my case, though engaged in serious thoughts. But I must explain myself by an example. St. Bernhardt once complained to a friend, that he found it very difficult to pray aright, and could not even pronounce the Lord's prayer once without a host of strange thoughts. His friend was astonished, and gave it as his opinion, that he could fix his thoughts on his prayer, without any difficulty. Bernhadrt offered him the wager of a fine horse, on condition he should commence forthwith. The friend commenced; "Our Father," &c., but before he had finished, the first petition, it occurred to him that if he should gain the horse, whether he would also receive saddle and bridle. In short, he was so entangled in his own thoughts, that he had to quit, and give up the prize. This I state, in order to show how necessaay it is, to keep guard over our hearts, that they may not become distracted, but may cleave to the letter as a guide. On the other side, beware also against the danger of falling into formality, but let the heart commence, then lips, words and external position will naturally follow.

FOREIGN MISSIONS AND REVIVALS.

A most philosophical remark was made at the close of the meeting in behalf of the American Board, held during the Anniversary week, by the venerable Dr. Beecher, of which we would perpetuate the remembrance. The good Doctor rose, as it was thought, to pronounce the benediction; but he took the occasion to utter a last remark—the last, he feared, that he should ever make on a like occasion. He was not insensible to the testimonials of regard which had been rendered to him during the week; but they only made him feel his utter nothingness, and his infinite obligations of gratitude. His soul had indeed been re-animated by the zeal and eloquence of his younger brethren; and though Heaven with its many crowns, was full in his eye, as the object of humble hope in Him who alone was worthy, still, in view of all those crowns, he would readily accept a furlough of ten years more, were such the Sovereign will. He would cheerfully gird on his armor for another campaign. This, however, could not be anticipated. And though he felt no indications of being speedily called home, yet he could not but be affected with the probability that he might never again stand in this place, or greet these brethren in the flesh. Under this impression, he would gladly say a word to be remembered. The question had often been started—what could be the occasion of the mournful suspension, for some years, of Divine influence? There was but one answer satisfactory to him: The church had faltered in the work of Foreign Missions. For want of full trust in God, she had, in troublous times, dared to withhold the silver and the gold which were clearly his, and had ungratefully left the missions, planted by his providence and watered by his heavenly grace, and demanding continued care and sacrifice—had left some of them, at least, to fearful reproach and threatening ruin! The Saviour has thus been deeply wounded—the Holy Spirit grieved. And now, at parting, he would affectionately urge, as the thought to be remembered—TAKE CARE OF FOREIGN MISSIONS, AND GOD WILL TAKE CARE OF YOU AND YOURS. Never again falter. Take care of Foreign Missions, and God will revive his work in your midst, and give his Spirit, so that nations may be born in a day.

THE JEWS AND PALESTINE.

The Rev. Ridley H. Herschell, on Wednesday evening of last week, delivered a lecture on this subject in New York. Mr. H. has resided for the last two years in Palestine, Syria, and Asia Minor, on which account his information is both interesting and authentic. The following report of the lecture is given by a daily paper:—

"He commenced by saying it was a grateful token to see so many of the Gentile race present to express sympathy and interest in the cause of Israel. A description of the present state of the city of Damascus was given, from which it appears that the glowing descriptions which are often heard of it are not very correct, the city being unprepossessing in outward appearance, and a mass of humble dwellings of the most wretched and uncleanly appearance. The last massacre in Damascus was alluded to, and a lucid history of the unfortunate event given. Mr. Herschell here mentioned that the Jews were a grateful, affectionate, and kind-hearted people, and that these qualities have been shown in their appreciation of the efforts of those who at that time aided them with efficient succor. The state of education in Damascus was represented to be in a most neglected condition, seldom more than one member of a large family being able to read. Very few of the Jews here had any idea of the history or death of the Saviour, or any of the acts named in the New Testament. The city of Tiberius was alluded to as one of the four Holy Cities of the Jews, and now in a most melancholy condition. On the sites of Capernium and Bethsaida no vestiges remain—the word of the prophecy has been fulfilled.

"The approach to Jerusalem is represented to be desolate in the extreme—no road can be traced—"the highways are desolate"—and this desolation seems to be purposely kept up, as if to fulfill the truth of the prophecy. A description of Mount Zion was given, of which it is said it "shall be ploughed as a field"—such is now literally the case, and a poor crop of barley is annually gathered from its sides. A gloom seems to hang over Jerusalem as if sadness and mourning were its constant attendants. On Mount Moriah there is now a Turkish Mosque, and if the prophet Micah had been a painter he could not have given a more exact picture of its existing state than is in the inspired volume. Mr. H. expressed his belief that the time was approaching when the aspect of these things shall be changed—where the Turkish Mosque now stands will be the House of the Lord. The Church of the Holy Sepulchre was mentioned as the scene of the grossest idolatry that can be imagined. At certain seasons thousands of pilgrims come to see the ceremony of bringing Holy Fire from Heaven, which is pretended to be done by the priests, with the most impious and ridiculous associations. Many of the so-called Christians there are only so in the mere name. The Jewish population of Jerusalem Mr. Herschell estimates at between 3000 and 4000; there they are generally computed at about twice that number. Their condition is generally very wretched, and starvation is more common in Jerusalem than in any other part of the world. The endurance and self-sacrifice of the Jews is however the same, and no suffering can alienate them from the promised land of their fathers and their religion. Their faith and sincerity is alike unshaken and abiding. Mr. Herschell expressed his opinion that the Restoration of Israel is approaching to the long-desired consummation—that events seem to shadow the prospect, and that it will occur in the manner most to be desired by the pious Christian and Philanthropist."

The Sabbath Recorder.

NEW YORK, JUNE 5, 1845.

THE FESTIVAL OF SUNDAY A HUMAN ORDINANCE.

"The festival of Sunday, like all other festivals, was always only a human ordinance, and it was far from the intentions of the Apostles to establish a divine command in this respect; far from them, and from the early apostolic church, to transfer the laws of the Sabbath to Sunday."

Thus writes Dr. Augustus Neander, of Germany, who has been called by an able reviewer of his Church History, "the great ecclesiastical historian of the age." His declaration is a bold and startling one, which ought, if true, to produce important practical results. Nothing is more common than to hear the terms Sabbath, Sunday, and Lord's Day, applied indiscriminately to the day of rest which is here declared to be a mere "human ordinance." Nor is this all; but when the name Sabbath has been given to the day of rest—the first day of the week—it is not uncommon to hear all those texts of Scripture wherein mention is made of the Sabbath, quoted in support of its claims. This course has led many persons to oppose the sabbatic institution altogether, and to regard the advocates of the "Lord's day" as conveying impressions in respect to it which they do not themselves really believe. If, say they, we are bound to observe a Sabbath because God commands it, then we are bound to observe it as he commands it, when he says, "The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God; in it thou shalt not do any work." But if, on the other hand, the Lord's day is entirely a different institution from the Sabbath, by what right is it called the Sabbath, and enforced by the law of the Sabbath? Such inquiries make it important to examine into this matter, and decide if possible whether Dr. Neander's assertion is true or false.

It is universally agreed, we believe, that wherever the Scriptures speak of a Sabbath they mean the seventh day of the week. It is also admitted, that until the death of Christ this day was strictly observed by his disciples. We are assured by an Evangelist, that immediately after his death they "rested the Sabbath day according to the commandment;" and it is apparent from the Acts of the Apostles, that for years afterwards it was their custom to reason in the synagogue every Sabbath, and persuade both the Jews and the Greeks! But here we are told that a regard was likewise paid to the first day of the week. In reply to which we ask, What of that? Was the first day regarded as the Sabbath, or as a substitute for the Sabbath? Every thing which is said to have been done on that day might have been done with perfect propriety on any day of the week; and not a single transaction is mentioned as having occurred on the first day which is exclusively appropriate to the Sabbath. In such circumstances—without any abrogation of the seventh day, or any command to observe the first day—it is impossible for us to see why the one institution should be regarded as having taken the place of the other.

If we pass now from the Scriptures to the History of the Church, we shall find our view equally confirmed, that the Sabbath has not given place to another institution. The first intimation to be found of a regard for Sunday, in any writing of acknowledged integrity, is that by Justin Martyr, A. D. 140. He is cited as saying, that the Christians in city and country assembled on the day called Sunday, and after certain religious devotions all returned home to their labors. This fact alone, that after their worship they returned to their avocations, shows conclusively that the day was not then regarded as a Sabbath. The custom of engaging in labor after the religious services of the Lord's day were over, was common at a much later period. Dr. Francis White, Lord Bishop of Ely, in his "Defence of the Orthodoxal Doctrine of the Church of England against Sabbatarian Novelties," tells us that "the Catholic Church for more than six hundred years after Christ, permitted labor and gave license to many Christian people to work on the Lord's day at such hours as they were not commanded to be present at the service of the Church."

But how fared it with the Sabbath during this time? Theophilus Brabourne, a writer in 1632, says that "the Sabbath was in use in the primitive churches after Christ for three or four hundred years, being so long as the church retained her best purity." In proof of this assertion, we may refer to Ignatius, who says, "Let us not keep the Sabbath in a Jewish manner, in sloth and idleness. . . . But let us keep it after a spiritual manner, not in bodily ease, but in the study of the law, and in the contemplation of the works of God. . . . And after we have kept the Sabbath, let every one that loveth Christ keep the Lord's day festival." From this it is apparent that he would have the Sabbath kept first as such, after which the Lord's day, not as a Sabbath, but as a festival.

And here it ought to be noted, that Lord's day, or Sunday, was not the only holy day of the church during the first three centuries. Origen names Good-Friday, the feast of Easter, and Pentecost. Indeed, anciently not only the day of Pentecost, but all the fifty days from Easter forward, were accounted holy, and solemnized with no less observation than the Sundays were. The day of the Ascension, also, or Holy Thursday, soon after the period of which we are speaking, was more highly esteemed than all the rest.

Such was the estimation in which the "festival of Sunday" was held during the first three centuries. It stood on a level with other holy days which are now disregarded by the body of the Church in this country. The term Sabbath, during this period, was applied exclusively to the seventh day of the week, or Saturday. Indeed, wherever, for a thousand years and upwards, we meet with that term, it must be understood of no day but the seventh day or Saturday. Up to the present time, on the Records of England, particularly on the Journals of the House of Lords, the highest court of England, all things entered as done upon the seventh day are entered as done Die Sabbati, upon the Sabbath day.

Thus the matter stood until the time of Constantine, in the early part of the fourth century. The Sabbath was generally observed, while the Lord's day was regarded as a festival of no greater importance and authority than Good-Friday or Holy-Thursday. No text of Scripture, or edict of Emperor, or authoritative decree of Council, could be produced in its favor. But from this time forward may be found emperors and councils combining to give importance to the Lord's day and to oppose the Sabbath. The Emperor Constantine was the first prince that publicly professed the Christian religion, and the first that passed any law about the keeping of Lord's day or Sunday. This he did A. D. 321. Eusebius, in his life of Constantine, says, "He appointed as a suitable time for prayers the Dominical day," "therefore he determined that those obeying Roman power should abstain from every work upon the days named after the Saviour, that they should venerate also the day before the Sabbath, in memory, as seems to me, of the events occurring in those days to our common Saviour." "An edict also by the will and pleasure of the Emperor was transmitted to the Prefects of the Provinces, that they thenceforth should venerate the Dominical Day, that they should honor the days consecrated to the Martyrs, and should celebrate the solemnities of the festivals in the Churches." Sozomen, speaking of this honoring of Sunday and Friday, says, "He honored the one as being the day of our Redeemer's resurrection, the other as the day of our Saviour's passion." Such were some of Constantine's laws in favor of Sunday. They did not place it in the stead of the Sabbath, but consecrated it with other days to commemorate interesting incidents in the life of Christ. Dr. Chambers says, "Before him, and even in his time, they observed the Jewish Sabbath as well as Sunday."

But these laws, though sustained by royal authority and example, did not lead to entire neglect of the Sabbath. This was not secured until a much later period. As late as the sixth century we find councils forbidding labor on Sunday, and forbidding to keep the Sabbath, as though this Sunday labor and Sabbath resting were common.

The reasons for Constantine's opposition to the Sabbath are apparent to any one acquainted with the history of the matter. Prejudice against the Jews, and a disposition to remove as far as possible from them, had great influence over him. This prejudice shows itself in many ways. Speaking respecting the observation of Easter according to their custom, he says, "Let us have nothing in common with that most odious brood of the Jews," . . "withdrawing ourselves from that deceitful nation," . . . "having nothing in common with murderers of fathers, and such as have put their Lord and Master to death," . . "which also hath no fellowship with the damnable perjury of the despiteful Jews." Here is seen the feeling which prompted his opposition to the Sabbath, and his favor of the Sunday festival. So strong was it, that even Athanasius, Bishop of Alexandria in Egypt, in the fourth century, while he felt bound to keep the Sabbath, yet apologizes for himself thus: "We assemble on Saturday, not that we are affected with Judaism, but to worship Jesus the Lord of the Sabbath."

Many quotations might be made from civil and ecclesiastical histories, showing that although much was said in favor of observing Sunday from the time of Constantine to the Reformation, yet that it never was regarded as the Sabbath, nor called by that sacred name. The result of the civil and ecclesiastical laws in favor of Sunday and against the Sabbath was, that the institution fell into general neglect. Those who professed to regard the day, often devoted its hours to labor and amusement. Here and there were found individuals who observed the Sabbath, the seventh day of the week, strictly, though exposed to many privations and frequent persecutions. As witnesses for the truth always have been, so were they, few and misrepresented. The mass of men regarded the Sabbath as abolished—Sunday as no Sabbath, but merely a church holy-day, to which, of course, they paid no conscientious regard. In this case, as in most similar cases, the attempt to alter and improve upon divine law only served to defeat the object which was sought.

With the commencement of the Reformation, a new spirit of inquiry was awakened in regard to the duties of practical godliness. Among the subjects for discussion we find the Sabbath early introduced, and thoroughly examined. There was one class of Reformers, who, dwelling alone on the sufficiency of faith and the freeness of the Gospel, trembled at the thought of imposing rules upon men, and expressed a sort of holy horror of the term Law. These declared that the law of the Sabbath was abolished; that Sunday was no Sabbath, only a festival of the Church, which had been appointed, and might be altered at its pleasure. A second class there was, who contended that an institution given in Paradise, and enforced by one of the precepts of the Decalogue, could not have been abolished; yet, finding themselves in the dilemma of observing another day than that originally appointed, they maintained that the day had been changed so early as to justify us in allowing it. A third class contended that an institution so early given and so often enforced, could not have been abolished or changed without explicit authority; that this explicit authority had never been given; and that, therefore, the seventh day of the week, and that only, was to be observed. The number who acknowledged the morality and perpetuity of the Sabbath, and manifested a sacred regard for either the first day or the seventh day, was small in comparison with the whole. They were sufficient, however, to prove that wherever the subject of the Sabbath has been considered, there have always been found those who, by precept and example, have witnessed for the Sabbath of the fourth commandment.

Probably the first book published in England advocating the morality of the Sabbath, and the change of the day, was that by Dr. Bound, in 1595. This was soon followed by several others both in favor of and against his view. The "orthodoxal doctrine of the Church of England," as explained by its bishops and historians, then was, that the Sabbath had been abolished, and that the Lord's day so-called was altogether another institution, which could not be enforced by the fourth commandment, since that distinctly says, "the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God." Among the men who held this view we might mention Dr. Francis White, Lord Bishop of Ely, Dr. Peter Heylyn, Edward Brerewood, Gilbert Ironsides, and others. Against these men were arrayed the leading Puritans, who maintained the morality of the Sabbath, and the necessity of restraining men by the sanctions of the fourth commandment. The true Sabbatarians stood opposed to both these parties, maintaining not only the morality of the Sabbath, but the obligation to observe the seventh day of the week. A work supporting this view, of great force and candor, from the pen of Theophilus Brabourne, appeared in 1628. He took the position that the fourth commandment was simply and entirely moral; that the seventh day, of every week ought to be an everlasting holy day in the Christian Church; and that the Sunday is an ordinary working day, which it is superstition and will-worship to make the Sabbath of the fourth commandment. This view was adopted by considerable numbers in England, and has been represented from that day to this by men of learning and piety. Among them were Thomas and Francis Bampfield; Edward, Joseph, Dr. Joseph, and Samuel Stennett; John Maulden, and Robert Coruthwaite—men whose memory ought to be cherished by every admirer of a truth-loving and self-denying spirit.

The result of this discussion is familiar to most friends of the Sabbath. The consequence of the no-Sabbath principles adopted by the German Reformers, is seen in the almost universal neglect of the day of rest which prevails all over the Continent of Europe. In England, it is true, the case is somewhat better, because the leaven of Puritanism and Sabbatarianism has more or less affected the whole body of professing Christians in that country. But who can estimate the influence of the Puritans in favor of the Sabbath, if they had been free from the charge of inconsistency in observing a different day from that which the fourth commandment required? Except for that inconsistency, their influence would have been irresistible, and the claims of the Sabbath would have been universally acknowledged. As it is, they must expect, what they have long seen, that Episcopalians will continue to refer to the change of the Sabbath as proving the necessity of aid from tradition; that Catholics will continue to urge the power of the church to command feasts and holy days from "this very act of changing the Sabbath into Sunday;" and that those who see the inconclusiveness of the reasoning for the change, will continue to charge such as teach it with "befooling and misleading the people." The only safe course in this case is to acknowledge, what the best historians assert, that "the festival of Sunday is only a human ordinance;" and then, forsaking that human ordinance, to return to the observance of the Sabbath of the Lord.

HOSTILITY TO THE SABBATH.

In a late number of the Philadelphia Christian Observer, we find an editorial reviewing an article which appeared some time ago in the United States Catholic Magazine. It seems that the Catholic editor had been favored with a copy of the Address to the People of the United States from the Baltimore Convention. On reading it, he found many positions taken which seemed to him erroneous; he therefore took the liberty of expressing his dissent from them, and of giving his reasons therefor. This drew out the editor of the Christian Observer, who comments somewhat severely upon the article, and charges Catholics with a most wicked and successful hostility to the Sabbath.

Again—In a late number of the New York Evangelist we find an article under the heading, "Anti-Sabbath Efforts," in which the writer professes to bewail the publication of Archbishop Whately's Essay on the Sabbath. In that Essay, Dr. Whately takes the ground that either the Sabbath law has been abolished, or else the seventh day ought to be kept. For his own part, he prefers the former alternative, and therefore maintains the abolition of the law. The whole Essay has lately been published in pamphlet form for sale and gratuitous distribution. This the correspondent of the Evangelist regards as an attack of human depravity upon the truth, because it has become too formidable to be passed by in contempt. He frankly says, "There is no denial of the fact, that the pamphlet is well adapted to make an impression upon the multitude, and even upon thinking minds, unfavorable to the cause of the Sabbath. The argument is specious, and it has the influence of a great name to recommend it. The well-known evangelical character of Archbishop Whately, his eminence as a profound thinker, a forcible writer, and a sound logician, will give weight to his suggestions." . . . "There are thousands among certain denominations professedly Christian, who do not believe in the obligation to keep the Sabbath day holy, and there are many others who oppose all denominations."

—Now we confess ourselves unable to sympathize with the Observer in its denunciations of the Catholics, or with the Evangelist in its lamentations over the publication of Whately. The hostility of the Catholics and the movements of the Anti-Sabbatarians will serve to call attention to the necessity of following the divine commandment in order to have any thing deserving the name of a Sabbath reform. They will show, likewise, what has all along been denied, that the people are not unanimously in favor of compelling men to refrain from labor on the first day of the week. By this means they will prepare the way for a candid examination of the claims of the Sabbath of the Lord—that day upon which alone he has pronounced his blessing.

"AMERICAN AND FOREIGN SABBATH UNION."

Last week was the Anniversary season in Boston. Among other Societies, we notice that the American and Foreign Sabbath Union had a meeting. The Secretary, Dr. Edwards, reported, that in carrying out the designs of the Society, he had traveled more than 8000 miles; fifteen Sabbath Conventions have been held; the 'Permanent Sabbath Documents' have been stereotyped in Boston, New York, and Philadelphia, and it has also been translated into German, and arrangements made to put 60,000 copies into families, etc. Dr. Beecher of Cincinnati, Ohio, preached a sermon on the Society's behalf, from the text, "Wherewithal shall a young man cleanse his ways." After alluding to some of the prominent perils to which young men are exposed, he spoke of the importance of the Sabbath to them. It is a birthright blessing; it affords young men an opportunity of safe relaxation and needful physical repose; if abused, it is the most corrupting day of the seven; rightly used, it is a security for the integrity of young men in all periods of temptation; it is necessary to the existence of an intelligent republic. The sermon closed with a variety of incidents illustrative of the blessings of the Sabbath, and an earnest exhortation to young men to honor it themselves, and lend their influence to promote its better observance in the community.

MAXSON vs. ANNAS.

It appears that this suit, which has been for some time pending in the Supreme Court of the State of New York, has been decided against the plaintiff.

It will be remembered, that some two years since Mr. John Maxson was summoned to answer, on the Sabbath, to a suit brought against him by Mr. Annas. Of course Mr. M. did not appear; judgment was rendered, and an execution levied, on the Sabbath, by which he suffered heavy and unjust damage. Thinking that the law which had just been passed for the protection of Sabbath-keepers was really a security, he appeared as plaintiff in a suit for damages. The Judge decided without trial that the law only exempted Sabbath-keepers from being summoned on the day of their Sabbath, but did not exempt them from answering on that day to a summons served on a previous day. This makes the law but a farce, and exposes us to the malice of evil-minded men even worse than before; and that there are those bad enough to take advantage of this defenceless condition, we have had abundant evidence. At the instigation of many friends of the Sabbath, Mr. Maxson carried his cause to the Supreme Court, where the decision of the Circuit Judge is confirmed. It now remains to know what the intention of the Legislature was in the passage of the law. Their intention will govern the decision of the Court of Errors; and that it was their purpose to give Sabbath-keepers the same protection enjoyed by others in the observance of their day of rest, the minutes of the Legislature fully show. We hope, therefore, that the case will not be permitted to rest where it is. If the law is not what we petitioned for, we ought to know it; means ought not to be withheld to carry this case up; and as the friends generously volunteered to sustain the responsibility of an appeal to the Supreme Court, they should not allow the case to be abandoned until we know the worth of the law. PRESBYTERIAN GENERAL ASSEMBLY, OLD SCHOOL.

The meeting of the Assembly for the present year took place at Cincinnati, Ohio, commencing on the 15th day of May. Three questions of somewhat general interest were under discussion. The first was, whether baptism in the Church of Rome is valid, which was answered in the negative by the voice of nearly nine-tenths of the Assembly. The second question related to slavery; upon which a long report was made, and resolutions passed to the effect, that the Assembly was organized upon the conceded principle that the existence of domestic slavery was no bar to Christian communion, and that the petitions asking the Assembly to make the holding of slaves a matter of discipline do virtually require this judicatory to dissolve itself and abandon the organization under which it has so long prospered. The third question was about the propriety of a man's marrying the sister of his deceased wife. The Confession of Faith says, "The man may not marry any of his wife's kindred nearer in blood than he may of his own; nor the woman of her husband's nearer in blood than of her own." A minister some years ago saw fit to marry the sister of his deceased wife, and was condemned therefore. This first brought up the subject. It is now proposed to strike out that part of the Confession of Faith. After much discussion the whole subject was indefinitely postponed.

Our Sabbath-Keeping Churches in London.—We are pained to learn, by a letter from Rev. Mr. Black, that the Mill Yard Church has met with a heavy loss in the death of a beloved and much-valued Sister, Charlotte Slater. Miss Slater was a daughter of the Rev. Wm. Slater, former Pastor of the Mill Yard Church, of which she had been for several years an active and useful member. May it please the Head of the Church to grant a spirit of resignation, and to raise up those who shall fill the place now left vacant.

From the same letter we learn, that William Harris Murch, D. D., late Principal of Stepney College, now exercises the ministry of the word and ordinances in the church of our late brother Shenston.

Encouraging.—We find in the April number of the Biblical Repository an article some ten pages long, in review of our series of Sabbath Tracts, the Sabbath Vindicator, and the Address to the Baptists. The article is written with little candor and a bad spirit. It shows plainly, however, that our publications are read, and that they are exerting precisely the influence they were designed to exert. Among other things, the writer frankly acknowledges, that "the preachers of this sect seem at this very time, to be making more systematic and vigorous efforts for the dissemination of their peculiar notions, than have perhaps ever been made in any age or country." The article is too good to be passed without notice, and we shall therefore publish it entire, or make copious extracts from it, soon.

Desecration of Sunday.—On Sunday, May 25, upwards of 1500 persons assembled at the Camden race course, N. J., to witness the training of the horses preparatory to the race which took place on the following Wednesday. There was plenty of rum-drinking and gambling, as well as some small accidents. One horse ran away, and in his course overturned several light vehicles, which were broken to a greater or less extent. Several men narrowly escaped injury.

MORAL AND CEREMONIAL LAW.

Although much has been said, and well said, upon this subject, yet there appears to me to be one form of argument which has not been introduced, and which has much weight in favor of the commonly-received notion.

All laws, in a perfect government, are adapted to the circumstances and capacities of the people placed under them. Such unquestionably was the case in God's government over men before the fall. Man was at first a holy, intellectual, and moral being; but in the fall he became corrupt. In this condition, the first law was not adapted to him. He sustained a character which he did not originally sustain, and consequently another law became necessary. Paul says, "The law was added because of transgression." The first code of laws was given to man at his creation. The second was given "four hundred and thirty years after the promise was made." The first was a rule by which he was to perform the high duty of loving God and man, and retain his original holiness. The second was given to man as "a schoolmaster to bring him to Christ." The first was given by God in the garden of Eden; the second by Moses in the wilderness. The first was obligatory on all mankind; the second on the Jewish nation only. Thus it appears that these laws were given to different classes of men, at different times, in different places, for different purposes, by different persons, and for a different duration. There is, therefore, an actual difference. The terms used to express this difference may be scholastic; but that does not destroy the fact of there being a DIFFERENCE.

One who Differs.

TROUBLES OF THE SABBATARIANS.

Providence has manifestly frowned on every special effort that has been made by the popular churches for the last twenty years, to perpetuate and strengthen Sabbath legality. The Sunday Mail petitions in 1828-9 were quashed by Johnson's report. The Sabbath Union died of imbecility in 1831, after its third anniversary. The movement in favor of the Sabbath in the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, in 1837, ended in an indefinite postponement of the subject, for fear of exposure of Sabbath breaking on the part of its own members. But notwithstanding all these disasters, the clergy have lately made another attempt to carry their point. They have had a great Sabbath Convention at Baltimore, and the whole machinery of clerical influence has been set in motion within the last year to get up public opinion in favor of the idol. Learning from past failures that they cannot drive the politicians, the Sabbatarians have turned to flattering them. And they appear to have had some success in this line. The Post Office department is probably administered at the present time with more respect for the Sabbath than it has been at any previous period. 'Devout and honorable women' have clubbed together and made Henry Clay and Daniel Webster life-members of Sabbath Associations, and these compliments have drawn forth from those pious souls some 'good words and fair speeches' about the Sabbath. This 'going down to Egypt for help' promises well, and great hopes are doubtless entertained of out-flanking the adverse Providence which has baffled past efforts. But in the mean time a new enemy has arisen, that threatens to give the advocates of the Lord's day more trouble than any heretofore encountered. The Seventh-day Baptists are just now bestirring themselves with great vigor. This time, the Lord 'sets fire to fight fire.' The first-day men complain bitterly of this untimely interference.

The First Anniversary of the Rhode Island Sabbath Union was held in Providence on Wednesday afternoon. Addresses were made by Gov. Jackson, Dr. Wayland, and others. Dr. Wayland was chosen President for the year ensuing.

General Intelligence.

THIRTEEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steamship Great Western arrived at New York on Sunday last, bringing English news to the 17th ult.

The possibility of a war with the United States about the possession of Oregon, occupies the public mind to the exclusion of nearly every other topic, and the news from this country is looked for with absorbing interest. The general opinion in England seems to be, that Oregon is not worth fighting for, but that the arrogant, overbearing, bullying style in which it is claimed by this country cannot be brooked. Hence the English Government is determined to press the matter to some decision immediately.

It is thought beyond a doubt that the bill to increase the grant for Maynooth College will pass.

Large sales of cotton have been made, but no material change in prices. Business was good in the manufacturing district, and the country generally was prosperous. Iron had fallen off in price since the last news, and the market was dull.

A war between England and Brazil is looked for.

They continue to talk of the Queen's visit to Ireland.

The Irish Repeal Rent averages £350 to £400 weekly.

Green peas, imported from Lisbon, made their first appearance in the London market on the 6th ult.

Fifty thousand accidents requiring surgical aid occur annually in London.

The official return of the military force in Ireland shows that on the 1st of May there were, including the Royal Horse and Foot Artillery, 21,000 men; to which may be added 9,000 police and the recently embodied out pensioners that can be called into active service if required.

Thursday, the 1st of May, being the birth-day of Lord Wellington, the distinguished veteran soldier and statesman, the House of Lords, principally in compliment to his grace, adjourned over that day. He has now completed his 76th year, and is yet wonderfully healthy.

On Sunday, May 4th, four persons read their recantation from the Church of Rome, and received the sacrament according to the rites of the Church of England, in St. Andrew's Church, Dublin.

John Dent, Esq., of Ribston Hall, near Knaresborough, has offered a premium of £5 to any of the poor families residing in Hunsingore and Walsford, who may feel inclined to make a trip across the Atlantic. A like offer has also been made by the parish officers in those places, and many families have already availed themselves of the opportunity.

The Bristol Gazette states, it is in contemplation to attach to those trains which travel between distant places, a sort of railway restaurant, or refreshment carriage, from which hungry travelers can be supplied with hot or cold refreshments at pleasure.

One of the now nine-days' wonders amongst the citizens of London is the new iron suspension bridge which connects the Middlesex and Surrey sides of the British metropolis, and which is just opened. On Sunday 40,000 persons crossed over it, paying the toll of one penny each.

The parish of Clerkenwell has lately suffered severely from the wholesale desertion, by men belonging to that parish, of their wives and families, some of them leaving six children—thus casting a heavy and permanent burden upon the ratepayers. Twelve men have thus absconded; and to such an extent has the system been carried that the parish has determined to adopt rigorous measures to check the practice, if possible, and intend to offer handsome rewards for their apprehension.

France.—The exciting topic of the Jesuits has occupied the attention of the Chamber of Deputies. It originated with M. Thiers, who described the vicissitudes the order of Jesuits had experienced since its foundation; the motives of its condemnation in France in the 18th century, and those which had induced the Pope to pronounce the dissolution of a community that Frederick the Great alone, in all Europe, did not consider dangerous.

M. Thiers, in concluding, called on the Cabinet to execute the laws, and dissolve the Society.

Switzerland.—By the 2d ult., Lucerne had suffered all the prisoners made by the troops to depart, under the stipulations for ransom. A letter from Lucerne gives an account of a curious sentence, the Nidwald, upon a Lieut. Nermann, who had joined the Free Corps in the attack upon Lucerne. He is condemned to stand in public for four hours, with a rod in his hand, then to be flogged with it, and afterwards imprisoned for six months, during which he is to receive "religious instruction."

China.—The news from China extends to the 10th of February, but business was in a state of stagnation in consequence of the Chinese holidays.

Turkey.—The Ottoman Government, being determined to carry out its plans for the moral and physical melioration of the country, has organized ten itinerant commissioners, destined to set out and visit in detail various portions of Asiatic and European Turkey, for the purpose of reporting upon the improvements that can, without too heavy a charge on the national resources, be introduced to further public instruction, advance agriculture, commerce, trade, the means of communication, the establishment of hospitals and places of refuge for the poor, &c.

Three Days Later.—The steamship Cambria reached Boston on Sunday night last, with news to the 20th of May. Thomas Hood, the poet and jester, died on the 3d of May. The German papers give accounts of a mineral substance discovered by Prof. Liebig which when combined with guano, is a remarkable fertilizer. Father Mathews has been entirely relieved from debt. It is reported that John Ronge, the seceding Catholic priest, and founder of the German Catholic Church has been assassinated.

A new paper has just been started at Milwaukie with the motto—"Devoted to the removal of J. A. Nooman as Postmaster of Milwaukie, and to be continued until that object is effected."

News from Mexico.—The latest news represents Mexico as being anxious to prevent annexation by acknowledging the independence of Texas. But in case of failure here, and the annexation of Texas, it is thought war will be declared.

It would seem that the Mexican Government is desirous to prepare for war, and has asked Congress for a loan of $3,000,000.

On the 16th of April Congress passed a resolution allowing Santa Ana and Canalizo to expatriate themselves, within eight days, for ten years. If they refuse, the prosecutions against them are to be urged forward.

The earthquakes in the city of Mexico had ceased. From the Departments accounts continue to arrive of the devastation caused by those of the 7th and 10th ult.

Rumors of revolutions in various portions of the Mexican Empire are rife. One of these implicates California in an insurrectionary movement.

Later from Mexico.—Advices from Vera Cruz to the 14th have been received, via Pensacola, brought there by the U. S. brig Somers.

A bill authorizing the Government to negotiate with Texas for a recognotion of her independence passed one branch of the Mexican Congress by a vote of 41 to 13, and no doubt was entertained that it would pass the other also.

No Railroad Mails.—There is every prospect, at present, that we are to have no more Railroad Mails in this State, after the expiration of the present contracts. The rates of compensation under the new law being some 33 1-3 per cent. lower than they are at present receiving, the railroad companies have signified their intention of declining them. The provision of the laws of this State for the appointment of commissioners to regulate such questions can be of no benefit, as they cannot bind the department, and the companies would be pretty likely to be sustained in their demands by the commissioners. Rather a dilemma.

SUMMARY.

A horse-race came off near Camden, N. J., May 28, at which the staging near the Judges' seat, gave way, carrying with it 1200 or 1500 persons. Several were fatally injured. Despite this casualty the race took place.

We notice in the Chicago papers a price current of the different kinds of circulating medium in that region, from which we take the following specimens:—Illinois State Bank, 40 a 45 per cent. discount; Bank of Illinois, at Shawneetown, 50 a 55; Cook County Orders, 18 a 20; Canal Indebtedness, 70 a 75; Bank of Michigan, 85; Railroad Script, 60 a 75; St. Clair Bank, probably worthless; Michigan State Script, 10 a 15; Indiana Land or Canal Script, 60 a 65.

The Hagerstown Torch-Light gives an account of a battle that came off on Monday morning between twelve runaway slaves from Leesburg, Va., and the constables and citizens of Smithsburg, Md. The slaves were armed with pistols and tomahawks, and wounded several of their assailants. Four of the twelve were captured after a hard fight.

The Committee appointed to wait on Dr. Potter, returned to Philadelphia on Wednesday. He asked ten days to consider the matter before giving his final answer. The Committee feel confident that he will accept the office of Bishop.

Dr. Potter has twice been elected a bishop, once, we believe, of Massachusetts, and once of Rhode Island, but declined assuming the orders of either station. Dr. Potter has been looked to in New York, as the successor of his father-in-law, the venerable Dr. Nott, in the presidency of Union College, Schenectada, and we have reason to believe that his professorship in that institution has been regarded by him as preferable to the mitre.

Mr. Hector Perkins, of Baltimore, who was wounded in the battle of Chippawa, thirty years ago, had to have his leg amputated on the 25th ult. For nearly thirty-one years he has suffered occasional pain, and for several months past he has suffered most intensely, until, at last, he consented to lose his leg. He has been doing well since the amputation.

Two Bremen ships arrived on Wednesday, from Bremen, with nearly 400 passengers.

Some fancy goods that were sent from Boston on Friday morning last, were placed on the counter of a store in Chesnut street, Philadelphia, and sold before 10 o'clock the same evening.

Monday night, on board the Rochester, a gentleman had a gold watch stolen from the foot shelf of his berth. Another had his pantaloons pockets cut, and lost—a paper of tobacco!

The Presbyterian Convention decide that a man may not marry his deceased wife's sister, by a vote of 98 to 79.

The Board of Excise of Poughkeepsie have by a vote of three to two, decided against granting any license for the ensuing year.

The receipt of $120,093 has been acknowledged at Pittsburg, for the relief of the sufferers by the great fire.

A live seal was taken in a seine in the bay at Providence a few days since.

A shark of great size visited Baltimore harbor on Tuesday last.

Black Tongue is making frightful ravages in North Carolina.

Persico, the sculptor, sailed from this port for Europe a few days since. He has received, it is said, nearly $100,000 from our Government, for his Group of Columbus, &c.

Whenever a pickpocket gets out of practice, he needs some little exertion to get his hand in.

The Providence Journal says that orders have been received at Newport to mount the guns at Fort Adams, and the men were busily engaged in the work last Sunday.

The authorities in Portland, Maine, are trying to suppress Millerism in that city.

A State Medical Convention, numbering nearly one hundred delegates, is in session at Cincinnati. Among the topics for discussion has been the superiority of vegetable over mixed diet.

The whipping post, in Delaware, is the punishment still for criminal offences. A relic of barbarism indeed, the extinction of which would be a feather in the caps of the anti-Capital Punishment advocates, if they would direct their efforts that way.

The spirit of opposition still rages between the different lines of steamboats upon the Hudson river, and passengers can be accommodated in first-class steamers, at any price from 50 cents down to a levy.

A letter from Mazatlin, published in a late Vera Cruz paper, says: "The insurrection in California against General Michel Torena has succeeded—the holy cause of liberty is triumphant, and we are independent."

There is an apple tree in full growth on a farm at Spring Valley, Hackensack, Bergen county, which measures 12 feet 9 inches in circumference, and which produced one hundred bushels of fruit in one year.

Hon. Elbridge Gerry's widow, now resident in New Haven, has become the legatee or inheritor of a handsome fortune by the death of a brother in England. The amount is said to be 50,000 dollars.

The Washington Constitution says the entire stock of the Philadelphia and New York Magnetic Telegraph Company has been subscribed, the first instalment paid up, and the Company organized.

On the 22d and 23d ult. seventy-six ships, barks, and brigs entered the port of Quebec; nearly, if not all of which were from ports in England, Scotland and Ireland.

The Lowell Journal says that Mr. Aldridge, Superintendant of the Lowell Lock Company, has lately made a padlock, which, although offorts have been made for the last fortnight by a number of persons, yet they have not been able to discover the keyhole.

News from Central America gives an account of the siege of the Capital of Nicaragua by Gen. Malespin, who, it is said, burnt about a thousand of the aged women, children and friends of Leon. The people of Salvador, of whom Malespin is governor, rebelled against him during his absence. Malespin, at the last dates, was marching against the revolters. The Government of Guatemala had prohibited the admission of the Jesuit Fathers.

On Tuesday afternoon the Unitarian Laity of Boston gave an entertainment to their clergy. About a thousand persons were present. Hon. John Quincy Adams presided. Drs. Dewey, Gannett, Pearce, Messrs. Adams, Eliot, of St. Louis, Huntington, of Illinois, &c., made speeches on the occasion.

The publisher of the Cincinnati Commercial, Mr. Brown. was attacked, on entering his office, on Saturday last, by a man who swore he would assassinate him. Mr. B.'s head was cut open and his arms and shoulders bruised. The Editor, Mr. Curtis, was also attacked in his office during the same day.

Jamiaca (W. I.) papers report, on the authority of travelers by the Panama route from South America, that a fearful avalanche of snow from the great central Cordillera of the Andes, last Summer (our Winter,) had been destructive on both the Atlantic and Pacific sides of the mountains. Ten or twelve hundred lives were lost.

Miss Mary O. Burt, of Franconia, attempted to commit suicide in Manchester, N. H., on Saturday last. The young lady, it seems, had received a letter of dismissal from her lover, that drove her crazy, and she deliberately cut her throat. Upon examination it was found that the wound was but slight.

Mrs. Eliza Letitia Yeates, of Lancaster, Pa., has recovered from the administrators of John Yeates, Esq., her deceased husband, a verdict of $20,000 damages and 6 cents cost, for the non-performance of the marriage contract, entered into between wife and husband, by which the latter contracted to settle upon the former the sum of $20,000 in case she survived him, in consideration of which she was to relinquish her dower.

Messrs. Loring, Sterling & Co. had, at the time of the fire in Pittsburg, 3000 kegs of nails in their cellar, which were melted into two solid masses of iron, from 9 to 30 inches thick, weighing from 16 to 30 tons, which were found hopeless to break or to remove, and the workmen dug graves for them in the cellar, beneath the floor of which they are to be buried, by taking the earth from under them, as they proved too ponderous to be put in motion.

In Mexico there are seven millions of Indians and Creoles, ignorant and slothful, and a hundred thousand persons of Spanish descent, wealthy, and of the military profession. In 1843, her exports to the United States were $2,782,406 in specie. Her imports were $1,471,937.

From six to eight hundred wagons are annualmanufactured in Belchertown, Mass. The first wagon with two shafts made in this country, was built in that town—they were previously made with a neap and yoke like an old fashioned sleigh. The manufacturer of the wood part of the work, Mr. Mason Abbey, is now living. He is about 90 years old.

A fearful accident happened at the residence of Mo. Kelsey, Acre's Hollow, on the 21st ult. The Schoharie Republican gives the particulars. The neighbors of Mr. K. had assembled to assist in raising a barn. On attempting to raise the third bent, the whole fell with a dreadful crash, injuring fifteen persons.

The German papers state that emigration to the United States, to a very great extent, is taking place among the better portion of the German agricultral laborers, farmers and artizans. Antwerp has been literally crowded with these emigrants recently, who were anxious to procure berths on board vessels bound to New York.

The Island of St. Thomas, W. I., was visited by a succession of earthquakes during the month of April, which created no small alarm among the inhabitants. The shocks were cotemporaneous with those that devastated Mexico.

In making some excavations near the mouth of Mad river, Ohio, trees were dug up which must have been buried there five hundred years or more. They have been covered over with sand by a change in the channel of the river.

Another great fire occurred at Pittsburg on Tuesday night in a stable on an alley running from Coal lane to Fountain street, just in the rear of Seventh street; and before the flames could be subdued between thirty and forty houses were destroyed. All the houses from the alley on Prospect street, up to Washington, on both sides of the street, were entirely consumed. The houses were occupied by a large number of poor families. The Age estimates the number of persons burnt out at 700. There appears to be but little doubt that the fire was communicated designedly.

The executive committee of the New York State Temperance Society, in view of the recent passage of the license law, an event not confidently anticipated, and therefore not sufficiently provided for at the late annual meeting of the society, deem it proper to recommend a convention of the friends of the cause, to meet on Wednesday, the 25th day of June next, at 10 o'clock, A. M., at the city of Albany.

A gentleman from Providence, R. I., informed us a few days since, that the custom-house officer there, recently appointed by President Polk, declared to him that no one should continue in office under him for one hour who used intoxicating drinks. It was generally understood that such was President Polk's wish.

A letter from Capt. Squires, of the Swallow, mentions the recovery of several articles of baggage from the cabin of this ill-fated boat. Among others, three valises, one marked A. P. Raymer, Troy; another with wearing apparel marked J. S. Patten, and the third containing a small sum of money, also thirteen overcoats, three umbrellas, and a ladies' satchel with clothes, and a letter addressed to Ebenezer Clark, 18 Mercer-street. No more bodies have been found.

The rates of postage, under the new law, being fixed to conform to American coin, the operation of the law will probably drive out of use fourpences and nine-pences—"a consummation devoutly to be wished."

The Boston Mail speaks of some tobacco, which if a man smoke or chew, he "will forget he owes a dollar in the world." We are afraid that some of our subscribers chaw that kind of tobacco.

Passengers are now carried from Buffalo to Chicago for $2. This ruinous competition cannot be long kept up.

A hint for shearing time is, that fleeces of wool be not tied, after rolling, with other than woollen cords. If tow, cotton, or hemp be employed, portions of this mix with the wool, and injure the future web, as such will not take color with the wool. This may seem a trifle; but we see that dealers make it an objection, and prices have been lowered by it—a loss the grower of the wool may easily avoid, if he will.

The Bayou Sara (La.) Chronicle, Feliciana Whig, and Baton Rouge Gazette, state that the woods are swarming with locusts, and that it is feared great damage will be done to the crops by these mischievous insects.

The judiciary committee have reported to the legislature of Connecticut a bill to prevent betting on elections. The fine provided in such case they recommend to be not more than $100, nor less than $20.

In 1748 the number of Episcopal Churches in New England was 36. They now number 223.

The Catholic College at Worcester, Mass., has fifty Students, and a select Library of two thousand volumes. It was established two years ago.

Bank notes in Ohio are called by the euphonious names of 'sick-monkey,' 'red-dog,' 'blue-pup,' &c.

A certain Justice of the Peace would never hear but one of the parties in a case before him; "Because," as he said, "it always puzzled him when he heard both!"

Hemp is now rotted by the aid of steam in Kentucky. Five minutes application of steam makes the stem ready for the brake. The fibre is thought to be better and more beautiful than when water-rotted.

The upper and lower decks of the Swallow have been examined, but no more bodies found. The ladies' saloon is carried away, and the boat so much injuried that nothing about her can be put to any use except her machinery.

There are few instances in our country of such rapid growth as that of Milwaukie, the principal business town of Wisconsin. The settlement commenced but ten years ago, and the present season will probably carry the population up to ten thousand.

MARRIED,

In New York, on Tuesday, May 27, by Rev. Wm. B. Maxson, George B. Utter and Catharine C. Stillman.

In Westerly, R. I., on Wednesday, May 28, by Rev. Alexander Campbell, Franklin W. Stillman and Lucy Elizabeth Wells.

DIED,

At his residence in Westerly, R. I., on the 26th of May, after a long and distressing illness, Adam Stillman, in the 53d year of his age.

On Saturday, 24th ult., at the residence of his brother, Dr. Wm. M. Fahnestock, in Bordentown, N. J., Harris C. Fahnestock, merchant of Philadelphia, in the 48th year of his age.

In Persia, Cattaraugus Co., N. Y., on the 21st of April, of dropsy in the head, Elizabeth Maxson, wife of Joel C. Maxson, in the 29th year of her age. She has left a disconsolate husband and three children to mourn their loss S. B. C.

In Brookfield, N. Y., on the 29th of May, of consumption, Dea. Joshua Maxson, in the 83d year of his age. Bro. Maxson in early life, like Joshua of old, chose the service of God, and connected himself with the church, which has lost in his death a faithful brother and a worthy deacon. The large family connection feel also that they have lost an affectionate father and friend. S. B. C.

NOTICE.

The Ministerial Conference of the Western Association will hold its Annual Meeting with the Second Church in Alfred, N. Y., on Tuesday, the 24th day of June, 1845, commencing at 10 o'clock, A. M. All those having Essays to prepare are requested to have them in readiness for the occasion. Introductory sermon by Eld. A. A. F. Randolph. S. S. Griswold, Sec.

Independence, May 20, 1845.

WESTERN ASSOCIATION.

The Seventh-day Baptist Western Association will convene with the Second Church in Alfred, N. Y., on Wednesday, the 25th of June, 1845. Eld. Griswold to preach the Introductory Discourse; N. V. Hull his alternate. James H. Cochran, Cor. Sec.

Alfred, May 20, 1845.

CENTRAL ASSOCIATION.

The Central Association will hold its Tenth Anniversary with the Seventh-day Baptist Church at Adams, Jefferson county, N. Y., commencing on the 11th of June, being the fourth day of the week before the second Sabbath in the month. Introductory discourse by Rev. Eli S. Bailey; substitute, Rev. S. B. Crandall.

It is hoped there will be a full attendance from all the churches of the Association, as there is business of vital importance to be transacted, especially our missionary business, and the publication of a Tract on Baptism. I hope, also, that our brethren will come prepared to discuss and dispose of the practice of laying on of hands on newly baptized believers, as there is now a division among us on that subject. G. M. Langworthy, Rec. Sec.

Adams, April 20, 1845.

Miscellany.

"WHEN THE HOPES OF THE HEART."

When the hopes of the heart thou so dearly hast cherished,
Till, even in its wreck, it has carried thine own,
'Neath the wrongs and the frowns of its people have perished,
Denied all their promise,—their prospects all gone—
wilt weep, not exult, o'er the desolate ruin,
Thou wilt cherish that feeling, once sacred and pure,
Which still, in despite of all fortune's misdoing,
Must hallow the sorrow it never may cure.

Thou wilt not forget, though to this they would bring [illegible],
That the exile they hate has reposed in thy arms,
And the venom'd reproach which they utter will sting thee,
And rob all the bloom of thy sunniest charms;
They will teach—thou wilt feel—that the love which so won him,
'Till, all things forgotten, he ceased to be free,
Was the sound of that spell which so sadly undone him,
And made him a traitor to all things but thee.

And when the sweet hours shall return of our meeting,
The long summer night in our moon-hallowed grove,
When thy heart, pressed to mine, with like rapture was beating,
And we had not a thought, not a feeling, but love;
Oh! then thou wilt sigh for the bliss that's departed,
More dear through the grief that has followed it still—
Oh! then thou wilt weep for the lone, broken-hearted,
That, blessed by thy love, even hate cannot kill.

ON THE LOVE OF GOD.

Beware how you neglect that species and degree of intercourse with your Heavenly Father, to maintain which, his mercy permits, and his word invites, and his grace, if you will make use of it, enables you! Beware, lest by thinking of Him but seldom, but seldom addressing him in prayer, and seldom hearing his voice in his holy Scriptures, and his public ordinances, you estrange yourself by degrees, entirely from his love, and allow the pursuits and pleasures of the world to establish an empire in your hearts, left empty of holier affections. It is by daily prayer and daily thanksgiving, by patient study of God's word, and by patient meditation on our own condition, and on all which God has done, and will do for us, that a genuine and rational love for him is kindled in our hearts; and that we become unfeignedly attached to the Friend, of whose kindness we have had so much experience. It is to be expected, that in the earlier stages of our approach to God, we should experience but little of that ardor of devotion, those pleasures of earnest piety, which are in this world the reward of love, as well as its most convincing evidence.—Our prayer at first will often be constrained, our thanksgivings cold and formal; our thoughts will wander from our closets to the world, and we shall have too frequent occasion to acknowledge with shame and sorrow the imperfection of those offerings, which we as yet can make to our Benefactor. A religious feeling, like every other mental habit, is slowly and gradually acquired. A strong and lasting affection, is not ordinarily the growth of a day; but to have begun at all, is, in religion, no trifling progress; and a steady perseverance in prayer and praise, will not only by degrees enlist the strength of habit on the side of holiness, but will call down, moreover, and preserve to us, the spiritual support and influence, without which all human effort must be in vain, but which no one will seek in vain, who seeks for it in sincerity and by the appointed means. [Bishop Heber.

QUESTIONS FOR SELF-EXAMINATION.

1. Have I tried to discharge my duty to God my Creator?
2. Have I prayed for divine grace, to teach me to love the Lord my God with all my heart, and soul, and mind, and might?
3. Have I tried to make the word of God the rule of every thought, word, and action of my life?
4. Do I love my neighbor as myself?
5. Have I obeyed the command of the Lord my God, to honor my father and mother; and to love them whom I am most bound to love; and obey them with a willing and cheerful mind?
6. Have I listened with attention and reverence to the good instructions that have been given me this day?
7. Have I been respectful to all my superiors?
8. Have I been kind and loving to my brothers and sisters, teachable, attentive and thankful to my teachers?
9. Have I been unkind to any person?
10. Have I been very careful to speak the truth, simply, at all times?
11. Have I been guilty of evil speaking?
12. Have I tried to do all the good that was in my power?
13. Did I engage in my morning devotions with seriousness and attention?
14. Did I read the Scriptures as the word of God, by which I am to rule every thought, word, and action of my life?
15. Did I examine myself the last evening with attention?
16. Did I lie down and awake with God?
17. Have I a firm faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and do I expect salvation alone through his merits?
18. Do I pray daily for the help of the Holy Spirit, to enable me not only to learn from the Holy Scriptures what is my duty, but to practise it?
19. Have I spoken the truth from my heart? The Lord is the God of truth, and he abhors liars.
20. Have I been guilty of deceiving; or of that sad habit, in relating facts, of going beyond the truth, by making false statements, and by that means often deceiving or injuring another?

"Search me, O God, and know my heart; try me, and know my thoughts:

"And see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting."—Psalm cxxxix. 23–4.

A SLAVE AUCTION.

A correspondent of the Freeman's Advocate and Journal, traveling in Louisiana, and who is no abolitionist, gives the following account of an auction held at Raymond, near Vicksburg:

It is the practice here for the sheriff to sell property on which executions have been levied, in front of the Court-House, on the first day of the session of the court, and the citizens of the county in great numbers generally assemble on that day. Among the property to be sold on this occasion, were some twenty or thirty men, women and children, taken in satisfaction of execution by the sheriff, and I saw the effects of slavery in a new form. A young woman was first placed upon the bench, in the midst of a crowd, well dressed, modest, and neat in her appearance, and recommended as a good house servant, and sold for $500; and another, in good condition which ought to have prevented her exposure, was presented to the public gaze, and sold for about the same sum. A man, about forty years of age, described as an excellent blacksmith, well skilled in his trade, was then sold; and immediately after him, his wife and three children were placed upon the stand, and a scene of most painful interest ensued.—Finding the gentleman who had been his purchaser, he urged him with a most anxious solicitude to buy his family; and as the bids for his wife and children were received successively from different persons by the sheriff, and the chances of a separation seemed to preponderate, his countenance indicated a heart swelling with painful emotions; and as if he could not endure the probable fate which awaited him, he again spoke to his new master, recounting the valuable qualities of his wife. The bids already made by others were regarded excessive, and his purchaser refused to raise upon the sum offered, the fatal words, 'Three times, and gone,' announced his separation from the objects of his affection, by their becoming the property of another. As they came down from the stand, he advanced to his wife with a downcast look, and remarked, 'Well, Sally, we are separated;' an annunciation which at once drew tears from her eyes. Seeing their feelings, the purchaser of the man—a gentleman of high character, and whose bid was made without a knowledge that he had a family—immediately announced to the sheriff his wish to relinquish his purchase, assigning as a reason his unwillingness to be the means of separating the man from his family, and presuming that the owner of the woman and children would, on a second sale, become his purchaser. He was again put upon the stand, but there were those present in whose hearts there was no symthy for severed affections, to the sacrifice of the chance of a favorable purchase of a valuable blacksmith, and the re-sale only inflicted new pangs in the bosoms of his family, by the revival and disappointment of new hopes. He was again struck off as the purchase of another.

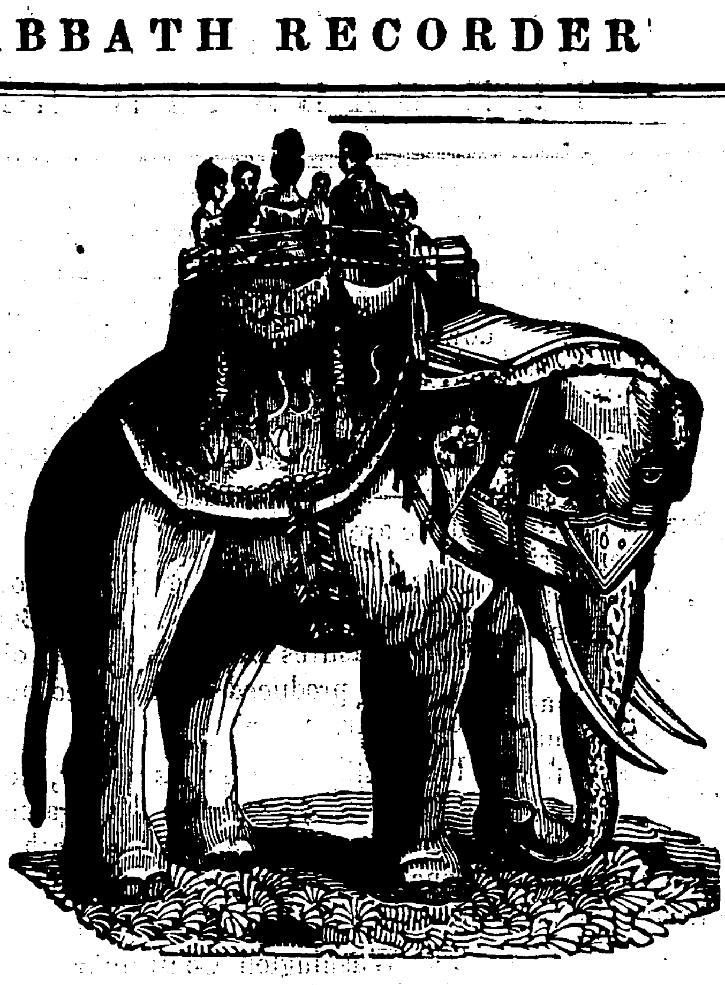
A woman, with two children, one an infant in her arms, were then sold; and then two other children of the same mother, a little boy and a little girl, were sold separately, amid the affecting cries of the mother at the thought of parting with her children. A little girl, about thirteen years old, and nearly as white as any one present, was then placed upon the platform, and struck off to the highest bidder at $350. The sale continued till these human beings were all sold to satisfy the demands of execution creditors. Let it not be supposed that these consequences of existing laws find approbation among the virtuous and respectable part of this community; for it is not so. In speaking of this scene with the freedom an independent citizen, I found my own feelings painful, not to say indignant, and to be in unison with those of every respectable gentleman with whom I conversed; and I doubt not, from what I saw and heard, that any well informed gentleman, in the spirit of an American Freeman and a Christian, could have addressed the assembled multitude in the condemnation of the cause of such results, with the concurrence of nine-tenths of all present. Although the law sanctions it, public sentiment condemns the separation of families, and it is only men of loose principles or profligate characters that will be the occasion of doing it. The truth is, the idea of one man being the property of another, and subject to all the incidents of property, is so revolting to human nature in a state even of partial refinement, that it is only when goaded by extravagant provocations that its justifiaction will be attempted. The division of society into castes, and the subjecting of one to the obligation of perpetual service to the other, is one thing; but the recognition in one of the right of property in the other is quite another thing.

Slavery, as a domestic relation, making one race the servants of the other on such terms as that the personal right and obligations of both parties are recognized by law, might by many be defended; but the recognition of property in human flesh, bones, and sinews, to the exclusion of every personal right, is too revolting to humanity to admit even of an apology, in a community where civilization, not to say Christianity, has shed its rays.

FRAGMENT.

We are all mariners on this sea of Life—
And they who climb above us up the shrouds,
Have only, in their overtopping place,
Gained a more dangerous station, and foothold
More insecure. The wind that passes over,
And harmeth not the humble crowd below,
Whistles amid the shrouds, and shaketh down
These overweening climbers of the ocean
Into the great gigantic vast of Death.

"Men's books with heaps of chaff are stored;
God's Book doth golden grains afford;
Then leave the chaff, and spend thy pains
In gathering up the golden grains."



The Elephant.

The Elephant is the largest and strongest of all beasts. They are natives of Africa and Asia. They are the most numerous in Africa; but those of Asia are larger, and are consequently valued higher. In Africa, they seldom, if ever, are found more than ten feet in height, but in Asia it is common to find them fifteen feet high.

They are taken by being decoyed into a strong enclosure made of upright posts, so constructed as to afford less and less room as the Elephant passes on, until he can neither turn round or move, when he is bound and secured by the hunters.

The Elephant used to be much employed in war by the Eastern nations. When led into the field of battle, there was a square tower upon their backs which contained from five to seven men, who were armed with darts. See the picture above. On the neck of the animal was seated the conductor, who drove him forward into the thickest of the battle, and encouraged him by his voice in the work of death. Wherever it went nothing could withstand its fury, and whole ranks would be leveled to the ground.

This animal is very kind and affectionate when well treated—it is very grateful for all favors; but it is sure to revenge an injury. We will relate two cases:—

We are told that the conductor of one of these animals promised to reward him with an additional amount of food, if he would exert himself in removing some heavy cannon. The creature was animated by the promise, and put forth all his strength, and when the task was performed the fulfilment of the promise was looked for, but the reward was not given. After waiting a reasonable time, the elephant killed the man who had made him the false promise.

An elephant which was often driven through the market at Adsmeez, always received from a woman, who kept a stall, a handful of her greens. This elephant one day broke loose in a fit of anger, and ran furiously through the market, dashing every thing to pieces in his course. When he came to the old woman's stall—from whence she had fled in such terror as to forget her child—on seeing the little boy the outraged animal became cool, and carefully took the little fellow up and carried him to a place of security, and then went dashing on as furiously as before.

PRO-SLAVERY THEOLOGY.

What sad and ludicrous work our teachers of theology make, when they undertake to torture the Word of God into the defence of popular and legal villainy. We have a very stupid specimen of this sort in the Congressional Journal of last week, over the signature of Senex. The author's old age seems remarkably verdant. He is discussing the orthodoxy of sympathy with Mr. Torrey, and the way he proves that our imprisoned brother deserves his hard fate is highly astonishing. He argues, with all the solemnity of an owl, that Mr. Torrey must be wrong in violating the law, otherwise God would have interposed by a special miracle, for his release, as he did in the case of the prophet Daniel. Hear him

"If God had not interposed his special agency in sending his angel to shut the mouths of the lions, and if Daniel had been destroyed by them, there would have been no evidence that God justified his conduct, or viewed the law unjust.

"Nothing of this kind is found in the case of Mr. Torrey. When God sends his angel to take him out of prison, or in any way interposes by a special providence, to effect his liberation, then we will believe the cases are analagous, and God justifies his conduct, and not till then!"

This is decidedly unique! Did the writer ever hear of John Rogers, of Smithfield, immortalized by wood-cut and brief history in the New England primer? He was doubtless a poor, mis-guided fool, for he suffered death for disobedience to law; and as God "did not intefere by special miracle" to snatch him from the flames, we have no evidence that he approved his course! His legal roasting, doubtless ascended as a sweet savor to heaven! The martyrs of all ages, who trampled upon human laws, when they interfered with their duty to God, are samples of the same folly. God did not save them by miracles, therefore they were victims to their own stupidity, and have met the eternal doom of all those who lose the divine favor! Such is the theology of Senex in the Journal. It is but just to the editor of that paper, however, to mention, that "as this is an important moral question," he expresses no opinion about it. It is not expected of him that he shall express an opinion upon questions of morality—for what has morality to do with religion, of that sort which apologizes for robbing men, women and children, and enacting prostitution and heathenism by law? [Granite Freeman.

Domestic Happiness.—Ah! what is so refreshing, so soothing, so satisfying, as the placid joys of home! See the traveller—does duty call him for a season to leave his beloved circle? The image of his earthly happiness continues vivid in his remembrance, it quickens him to diligence, it makes him hail the hour which sees his purpose accomplished, and his face turned towards home; it communes with him as he journies, and he hears the promise which causes him to hope—"Thou shalt know also that thy tabernacle shall be in peace, and thou shalt visit thy tabernacle and not sin." Oh! the joyful reunion of a divided family—the pleasure of renewed interview and conversation after days of absence! Behold the man of science—he drops the laborious and painful research—closes his volume—smooths his wrinkled brow—leaves his study, and unbending himself, stoops to the capacities, yields to the wishes and mingles with the diversions of the children. Take the man of trade—what reconciles him to the toil of business—what enables him to endure the fastidiousness and impertinence of customers—what rewards him for so many hours of tedious confinement? By and by the season of intercourse will behold the desire of his eyes and the children of his love, for whom he resigns his ease; and in their welfare and smiles he will find his recompense. Yonder comes the laborer—he has borne the burden and heat of the day—the descending sun has released him of his toil, and he is hastening home to enjoy repose. Half-way down the lane, by the side of which stands his cottage, his children run to meet him. One he carries and one he leads. The companion of his humble life is ready to furnish him with his plain repast. See his toil worn countenance assume an air of cheerfulness! His hardships are forgotten—fatigue vanishes—he eats and is satisfied. The evening fair, he walks with uncovered head around his garden—enters again, and retires to rest; "the rest of a laboring man is sweet whether he eat little or much." Inhabitant of this lowly dwelling! who can be indifferent to thy comfort? Peace be to this house.—Rev. W. Jay.

SERIOUS QUESTIONS.

There is a God. He preserves, and he can destroy you. Do you daily think of him?

You have a soul. Do you care for it? You care for your body, but do you properly care for your soul?

You are a sinner. Do you know how a sinner can be saved?

There is a Saviour. Are you anxious that he may save you?

There is an awful hell. Are you seeking to escape it?

There is a glorious heaven. Are you in the way to it?

You must soon die. Are you prepared for the solemn change?

You must appear at the judgment seat of Christ. What will then be your lot?

There is an eternal state after death. Is yours likely to be an eternity of bliss, or an eternity of woe?

You must be pardoned through the blood of Christ, and sanctified by the Spirit of God, or you cannot be saved. Are you daily seeking these blessings?

"Without holiness no man shall see the Lord." Are you living a holy life?

There is a book able to inform you on these subjects, and to make you wise unto salvation. Do you search the Scriptures?

Think of these questions, dear children, every day, and especially when you lie down at night; and may God give you grace to answer them truly.

A Paragraph For Children.

A little boy eight or nine years old, was walking along Grand street the other day, on an errand for his parents. Near at hand, under the shadow of an awning, was an apple stand, kept by a poor woman, and covered with delicious pears, blackberries and apples. The little boy thought he had never seen such beautiful yellow apples—and he wondered how they came to be ripe so early in the season. Just at that moment, while the woman was busied with a customer, one of the largest and plumpest of the apples rolled from its pinnacle off on the walk and down into the clean, clear Croton water in the gutter, and on, on, on, nearly two rods from the stand. The apple woman did not see it—apparently no one saw it but the little boy. Now he was very fond of apples and he had no money, and it was plain that he could easily take the prize and who would know anything about it? For two full minutes the child stood on the curb-stone, and many jarring impulses agitated his bosom. He could take it—but would it not be bitter to the taste hours after he had eaten it? No one would see him—but would the cheating of a poor apple-woman not be wretched business? He stooped down decidedly—picked up the fruit and carried it back to its owner. Now this paragraph may be seen by many children. We love them all—and we ask them to stop one little minute and turn over in their own minds what were the boy's thoughts as he walked onward along Grand street—and what would have been his thoughts the rest of the afternoon if he had put the apple in his pocket. [N. Y. Sun.

The Child's Way to Heaven.

"O! I am weary of earth," said the child,
As it gazed with a tearful eye
On the snow-white dove that it held in its hand,
"For whatever I love will die."

So the child came out of its little bower,
It came and looked abroad,
And it said, "I am going this very hour—
I am going to heaven and God."

There was shining light where the sun had set,
And red and purple too;
And it seemed as if earth and heaven met
All around the distant blue.

And the child looked out on the far, far west,
And it saw a golden door,
Where the evening sun had gone to its rest
But a little while before.

There was one bright streak on the cloud's dark face,
As if it had been riven;
Said the child, "I will go to that very place,
For it must be the gate of heaven."

So away it went to follow the sun,
But the heavens would not stay,
For always the faster it tried to run
They seemed to go farther away.

Then the evening shades fell heavily,
With night-dews cold and damp,
And each little star on the dark blue sky
Lit up its silvery lamp.

A light wind wafted the fleecy clouds,
And it seemed to the child that they
Were hurrying on to the west, while the stars
Were going the other way.

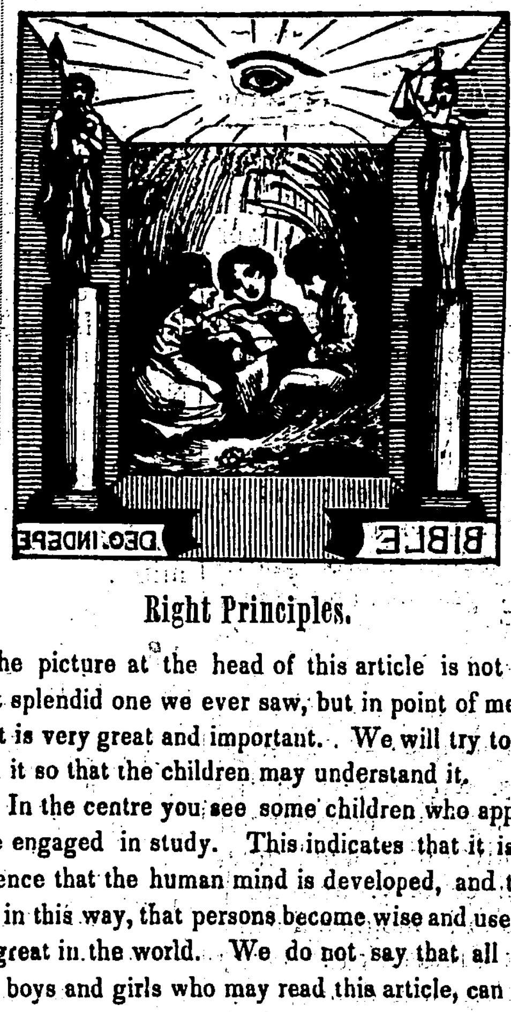
And the child called out when it saw them stray,
By the evening breezes driven,
"Little stars, you are wandering out of the way,
That is not the way to Heaven."

Then on it went through the rough waste lands
Where the tangled briers meet,
Till the prickles scratched its dimpled hands,
And wounded its little feet.

It could not see before it well,
And its limbs grew stiff and cold,
And at last it cried, for it could not tell
Its way on the open world.

So the child knelt down on the damp green sod,
While it said its evening prayer,
And it fell asleep as it thought of God,
Who was listening to it there.

A long, long sleep—for they found it there,
When the sun went down next day;
And it looked like an angel, pale and fair,
But its cheek was cold as clay.



Right Principles.

The picture at the head of this article is not the most splendid one we ever saw, but in point of meaning it is very great and important. We will try to explain it so that the children may understand it.

1. In the centre you see some children who appear to be engaged in study. This indicates that it is by diligence that the human mind is developed, and that it is, in this way, that persons become wise and useful, and great in the world. We do not say that all the little boys and girls who may read this article, can become equally learned and wise with the same amount of study, but we do say, what we are sure is true, not one of them will become learned and wise without study. How pleasant it is to see those children thus engaged in learning something that will make them better, and prepare them to be useful to themselves and others.

2. At the right hand of the picture, you see an upright post, called a pillar. At the bottom of this pillar is the Bible as its foundation, and upon the top stands a figure holding upon its head a pair of scales or balances, which is a representation of justice. As the pillar upon which Justice stands with her balances, rests upon the Bible, it denotes that the Bible is the standard of moral right, and that all principles and all human actions, when weighed in the balance of justice, will be pronounced right or wrong as they agree or disagree with the Bible.

3. At the left hand is another pillar, resting upon the Declaration of American Independence, upon the top of which stands the Genius of Liberty. This pillar supporting the Genius of Liberty resting upon the Declaration of American Independence, denotes that that document contains the great fundamental principles of human rights. It says that "all men are created equal, and are endowed by their Creator with the inalienable right of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

4. At the top of the picture is the all-seeing eye, representing the eye of God, which sees every thing, and from which nothing can be hid. This all-seeing eye placed at the head of the picture, may denote two things. First, it may signify that God is above all, and that the Bible supporting the pillar of Justice, and the Declaration supporting the pillar of Liberty, are only the embodiment of principles which are derived from God. It may be designed to show, secondly, that God always sees us and marks all our acts and notes all our deviations from the precepts of the Bible, and all our infractions upon the liberty and rights of men.

5. The young students being placed between these two pillars, and under the all-seeing eye, indicates that the human mind can flourish only upon the principles of the Bible, and in the possession of liberty, which is essential to improvement, and under a sense of accountability to God, knowing that his eye is ever upon us.—Juvenile Wesleyan.

EASTERN AFRICA.

By a resolution passed at the last Anniversary Meeting of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association, the Board of Directors were instructed to make a special effort to ascertain what opportunities offer to establish a mission in Eastern Africa, or Ethiopia. In pursuance of that resolution, the following information has been collected and arranged by the Corresponding Secretary of the Society, and by order of the Board is now submitted to the denomination.

On the eastern side of the great African continent—from the staits of Babel Mandel, in the fourteenth degree of north latitude, to Sofala, in the twentieth degree of south latitude—lies a vast extent of country, of which but little has been known to enlightened nations since the times of Solomon and the prophets of Israel. It then contained an empire which vied with the most powerful kingdoms of the earth, and carried on a lucrative commerce which supplied the Tyrian fairs "with chief spices, and with all precious stones and gold." Ez. 27: 22. The subversion of the Egyptian and Babylonian monarchies, with the smaller dependent kingdoms, left this empire almost entire, but cut it off from nearly all intercourse with the Grecian and Roman empires; so that neither the people nor the rulers partook of their advancement in arts and literature. From these causes it became a "terra incognita," a land unknown to modern nations. A few enterprising travelers have succeeded in penetrating into parts of the country, and from their accounts, together with what has been gleaned from the natives of the interior who visit the marts opened for British wares near the straits of Babel Mandel, with the ancient Jewish records, we have to gather our scanty materials for a sketch of their history and present condition.

This vast territory comprehends a coast nearly 3000 miles in extent, and an interior stretching from 1700 to 2000 miles from the eastern towards the western coast—a varied region of mountains with salubrious climes; valleys and deserts, hot and pestilential; fertile plains and plateaus with the mildest atmosphere; and abounding with the richest vegetation and mineralogy, with large lakes, rivers and bays, every way adapted to all the useful purposes of human life.

This great country, it is believed, was early taken possession of by the descendants of Phut, Cush, and Joktan, probably from Arabia by the Red Sea. But as they never had a cultivated literature, their early progress in population and the social relations, the extension of possessions, and their cultivation of the arts, with all their revolutions in government, are buried in oblivion, except what may be gathered from a few incidental references to them by the historians of more enlightened nations, and a few uncertain traditions of their own.

It is believed that they early made rapid progress in population and empire. Job speaks of the progress of their companies; and one of their Queens, who evidently sought to vie in regal pretentions with the court of Solomon, with great riches and a splendid train, came, not as a vassal to do homage to a superior monarch, but attracted by the report of his glory, to behold and learn for herself and her kingdom how to attain a similar glory. Forty years after this event, in the days of Asa, king of Judah, 950 years before the Christian Era, Zerah the Ethiopian, after possessing himself of Lybia and Egypt, led an army of 1,000,000 men up to within eighteen miles of Jerusalem, and his conquests were interrupted only by the interference of Jehovah, who destroyed his hosts and gave the spoil of his camp to the Jews. 2 Chron. 14: 9—15. This empire maintained its greatness and splendor down to the Mahomedan conquest of Arabia. Pliny, a Roman writer of the second century of the Christian era, says, at one time, it contained forty-five subordinate principalities. In the Abyssinian chronicles styled the "Glory of the Kings," Ittopia is said to have divided with Romia the dominion of the world—all the globe north of Jerusalem belonging to Romia, and all south to Ittopia. It is known to have extended its dominions from Nubia along the coast of the Red Sea and the Indian Ocean, as far south as Sofala, that is, over nearly forty degrees of latitude, including provinces far into the interior westward, and including eastward the province of Yemen in Arabia. In the fourth century, in consequence of the reception of Christianity, a rival government was erected within the empire, which maintained itself until the middle of the tenth century, when it also became Christian and ultimately divided the empire with the ancient royal dynasty, which latter retained the loyal Christian provinces of the south; and formed what is now called the kingdom of Shoa, the capital of which is Ankoner in lat. 9° 34′. The usurping dynasty took the northern part and with it the titles of the empire, and formed what is now called the kingdom of Abyssinia, the capital of which was Axeum, now Gondar. In the sixteenth century Graan, a Mahomedan conquerer, with a nation of Moslem barbarians, passed the frontiers of this empire and dashed into atoms the structure of two thousand five hundred years; totally dismembered the great Ethiopic empire, and over ran many of its best provinces with Mahomedan invaders, who continue, with alternate peace and contention with the Christian part of the empire, unto the present time. Both the former divisions of the empire have since been recovering their original possessions and power. A. D. 1700 the emperor of Abyssinia led out an army of 500,000 men, and his domain has been computed at 1,000,000 square miles. Asfa Wooden, grandsire of Sáhela Salássié, the present reigning monarch of Shoa, becoming a very Nimrod for personal valor and conquest, greatly enlarged his possessions and shook off all allegiance to Gondar. So that, although the ancient Ethiopic empire is not entirely dissolved, the name at least of the ancient "King of Kings" residing at Gondar is deemed essential to render valid the titles to the government of all the dependent provinces of Abyssinia. To this the king of Shoa forms an exception. He is in fact an independent monarch, and it is in name only he can be spoken of as a vassal of the emperor of Gondar. The hereditary provinces at this day subject to the king of Shoa are comprised in a rectangular domain of one hundred and sixty by ninety miles; which is traversed by five systems of mountains, whereof the culminating point divides the basin of the Nile on the north from the Haivesh on the south. The Christian population of Shoa and Efat is estimated at a million of souls. But besides these there are numerous conquered provinces, dependent on the king of Shoa, and tributary to the royal treasury. Four hundred governors are appointed by the king of Shoa, who rule over 1,500,000 Mahomedans and pagans, besides the remnants of a once numerous Christian population.

An inspection of our maps of Africa will show an extensive hiatus marked only as unexplored regions, yet the Egyptians, three thousand years ago, are said to have been informed of a vast river taking its rise on the southern side of those mountains furnishing the sources of the Nile, which flows to the north, while the former river flows southerly into the Indian ocean. The early Arabian geographers are said to have specificially mentioned large rivers descending from the same high mountain lands towards the Indian ocean. The Portuguese also spoke of this stream two centuries ago. And recently, from the high lands of Abyssinia, the British embassy, who visited Shoa in 1842, believed that they had obtained a clue to the origin and course of the hitherto hidden river. From the reports of various persons from the interior countries with whom they met in the kingdom of Shoa, the Gochob is described as rising in the the great central ridge of mountains which is known to divide the waters that flow west and south into the Atlantic and those that flow east and south to the Indian Ocean; receiving in its course a number of important tributaries, and finally disemboguing either immediately under the equator or within four degrees south of it.

Between Abyssinia and the northern shore of this river, several large interior kingdoms are known to exist. Euerea is a powerful kingdom occupying an extensive plateau of fertile land, among the most elevated in Africa, where but little sickness of any sort prevails, and the inhabitants enjoy abundance of the luxuries of a tropical region. The inhabitants are a mixture of Christians, Mahomedans, and Pagans; yet here the weekly seventh-day Sabbath is strictly observed.

Zingero is another large kingdom whose high mountains, [illegible] from the high lands of Euerea. Its southern boundaries are the river Gochob. In days of yore fourteen kingdoms are said to have been tributary to the sovereign of Zingero. Although no portion of the inhabitants profess the Christianity of Abyssinia, and none of its feasts are observed, the rite of circumcision is universal, and the Sabbath is respected, together with the Abyssinian festivals of Kidána Mehérat, and St. Michael. In other respects, the most revolting superstition and cruelty are prevalent.

Caffa is a mountainous peninsula, formed by the junction of the Omo with the Gochob. It is an independent monarchy of mixed Pagans and Christians, over whom presides Queen Bálee, a young woman of extraordinary energy and ability, very hospitable to the rovers who visit her with blue calico, beads and trinkets, in return for which she gives cloth and other productions of the country.

Beyond Zingero, and considerably lower down the river, is the kingdom of Koocha, which is described as being hot, and subject to annual rains of two months' duration. It extends on both sides of the river, with a numerous population inhabiting many large towns, with conical houses, made of mud and bamboo.

On both sides of the River Gochob, there exist in various quarters isolated communities professing the Christianity of Ethiopia, who for a long period of years have successfully held their position among the mountain fastnesses in the very heart of the now Pagan and Mahomedan countries.

One of the most remarkable of these seats is in the lake Zooai. Five rivers empty themselves into this lake. It is described as a double sheet of water, in the midst of which are five islands, covered with lofty trees, and containing three thousand Christian houses constructed of stone and lime. The people are said to have many sacred edifices, but no regular priests, i. e. ordained ministers; but they abound with monks and monasteries. At the period of the Mahomedan invasion, the church manuscripts and other sacred things of Southern Abyssinia, were carried and deposited here for safe keeping, where many of them still remain.

In Geerágué the population is almost exclusively Christian. Twelve isolated churches, previously unheard of, were discovered a few years since, on the conquest of Yeya by Sahela Salássie. This country occupies about one and a half degree of longitude by one degree of latitude, and swarms with a population at this moment in a state similar to that period of the Israelitish history of which the Scripture says—"There was no king in Israel, and every man did that which was right in his own eyes." In the absence of a supreme head, each village or community elects its own temporary governor, who is perpetually being removed by the cabals and caprice of the people. While the Mahomedan Galla make frequent predatory inroads from without, anarchy reigns within: so that Geerágué is the very hot bed of slavery in Eastern Africa, north of the equator. Annually pouring out many thousands of her sons and daughters in every direction, this wretched Christian province, a prey to lawless violence, and every monstrous and detestable crime, cries aloud for the extension of philanthropic measures to raise her from her overwhelming miseries.

Between Garro and Metchu, where the forest commences in the south of Shoa, is a small tract, peopled by Christians, who reside entirely in caves among the mountains, as a measure of security against the heathen by whom they are encompassed on every side.

Cambat is a small mountainous province lying due east of Zingero. With the exception of a few Mahomedan rovers, this independent state is inhabited solely by Christians, who have fifteen churches and numerous monasteries, but like the people of Zooai, are without priests. The capital, Karempza, is constructed on the summit of a lofty hill of the same name. Degóyey, the king, who is extremely advanced in years, is represented as a just and upright ruler, very hospitable to strangers, and a good warrior.

Wolámo is another Christian province, under an independent sovereign, lying below Cambal to the south-eastward of Zingero, and constantly at war with these States. The country is extremely mountainous, and the inhabitants who after being captured and sold for twenty pieces of salt, and frequently carried by the slave-dealers to Shoa, are of a fair complexion, and speak a distinct language. Wofáua is the capital, and the province is watered by a considerable river called the Ooma.

Eight days journey below Zingero is the country of Mager, represented as having a powerful monarch named Dogaie.

Korchassie, which is famous for a great river called Wábi, is peopled by Christians. The same may be said of Sidama. Both are surrounded on all sides by heathen.

Susa, of all the isolated remnants of the ancient Ethiopic empire to the south of Abyssinia and Shoa, appears to be the most considerable and the most powerful. This kingdom is situated beyond Caffa, and extends to the head of the Gitché, which rises in Chara Nara, and is one of the principal sources of the Gochob. The rains are violent during three months of the year, and the climate is excessively cold, the elevation being much greater than that of Shoa, while beyond it the mountains which "seem to touch the skies" are covered with snow. Susa is a kingdom of much greater extent than Shoa, but in manners and customs nearly similar. They profess submission to the Patriarch of Abyssinia, their priests having obtained their ordination from him. The language spoken is distinct from the Galla, from the Amharic, and from the ancient Geezor Ethiopic, and possesses a written character. The government is not despotic. No subject can be put to death, unless condemned by the judges. Property is free; and there is no restriction upon dress, save upon the article of gold, to wear which is the exclusive privilege of royalty. [illegible] a stone house two stories high. He gives public audiences daily, where the decisions of the judges are confirmed or annulled from a raised throne of solid gold, concealed by velvet draperies. All occupation is interdicted on the Sabbath, as well as on the festivals of Gabriel, Michael, and George's, which are the only saints' days observed in Susa.

Among the manifold superstitions of the people of Suza, a new knife, before being used for cutting meat, must be blown upon by the priest. Witchcraft has a firm hold on every mind. Every house possesses its slaves; and polygamy is universally indulged, at the discretion of the man, or according to his worldly substance. Theft is punished by sewing up the culprit in a green hide, when he is suspended by the heels in the market place, with the stolen property about his neck until the contraction of the drying skin at length puts a period to his sufferings.

Raw flesh, eaten with pepper, butter, and wheaten bread, forms the principal diet. Edible fruits are abundant. Citrons, nutmegs, ginger, coffee, and tea, grow wild over the whole country. The grape is indigenous, and extensively cultivated.

All classes of the inhabitants are warriors, well mounted, and frequently engaged in the chase, large packs of dogs being kept for the purpose of hunting the rhinoceros, buffalo, elephant, lion, leopard, giraffe, zebra, and ostrich, with many other animals new to natural history. Unhappily, Beddoo, the king, frequently employs these to extend his dominions, by murderous wars made upon surrounding tribes.

All these countries are believed to be accessible from Juba, more commonly called the Gooind, which is said to rise in Abyssinia, and to be navigable in boats for a three months' voyage from its mouth, and is supposed by the British Embassy to be the same as the Gochob, spoken of by the natives of the interior countries. Its embouchre is in the territories of the friendly Sheiks of Brava, seven in number, the hereditary representatives of seven Arab brothers, who were first induced to settle on that part of the coast by the lucrative trade in grain, gold, ambergris, ivory, rhinoceros' horns, and hippopotamus' teeth. They were formerly under the protection of Portugal, but even the remembrance of that state of things has nearly passed away from the present generation. From Mombas, in Zanguebar, which is the most northerly possession of Sygud Iman of Muscat, the coast as far as the equator is in the occupation of the Sohilis, a quiet and intelligent race, of Moorish origin; and thence to Zeylu, which is now in the hands of Sheik Ali Shermárki, the entire population is Somaule. The climate, even so far south as Mombas is notoriously good, and the government affords a not less striking contrast to that of the western coast, where in corresponding latitudes the pestilential regions of tropical miasma are subject to bloody despotisms, such as is submitted to by none but the direst savages.

The eastern coast of Africa, from Sobola in lat. 20 south, to cape Guardafui lat. 11 north, is free to the commerce and intercourse of all nations.

No portion of the African continent has, however, excited less interest in modern times, than the eastern coast. Since the Portuguese papal missions of the sixteenth century, no religious enterprise has been attempted in those parts. And in late years it has been but little frequented by any, save the enterprising American, whose star-spangled banner is seen waving to the breeze in ports where others would not deign to traffic, and who, being thus the pioneer to new countries, reaps the lucrative harvest which they are almost sure to afford. English ships from India have occasionally visited the southern ports for cargoes of ambergris and ivory, but the trade being yet in its infancy, affords but little routine; and in the absence of any rival, the Iman of Muscat is, with his daily increasing territories, fast establishing a lucrative monopoly from Mombas to Zanzibar.

It will be very surprising if this state of things should be suffered to remain, when it is known that no quarter of the globe abounds to a greater extent in vegetable and mineral productions, than the eastern side of tropical Africa. Gold, gold-dust, ivory, civet, ostrich feathers, peltries, spices, wax, precious gems, coffee, and a species of tea, and cotton unrivaled by any in the world, are among the superabundant productions of that vast region. In most of the interior countries lying opposite to this coast, to the south of Shoa, the people unite with an inordinate desire for trinkets and finery, a degree of wealth which would favor an extensive sale of the manufactures of more cultivated nations. That their wants are neither few nor trifling, may be satisfactorily ascertained from the fact that the sum of £96,000, or about $456,000, the product of the slave trade from the ports of Berbeun, Zeyla, Tajura, and Mossonah, is only one item of the total amount annually invested in foreign goods and manufactures.

It is believed that Sofala was the Ophir whence Solomon's ships brought the gold, silver, ivory, apes, and peacocks, every three years; and that this coast furnished the merchants of Sheba with the best spices, and with all precious stones, and gold, which they sold in the Tyrian fairs. Ezek. 27: 22. And there are many reasons to believe that this ancient commercial route will hereafter be as frequently visited as in its best days.

In nearly all these countries, from northern Abyssinia to the extremities of the ancient Ethiopian empire, some knowledge of Christianity was imparted in the early ages of the Christian era; and in most of them, remnants of those ancient provincial communities, retain their attachment to the forms and rites communicated to them by the ancient Abyssinian church. But every where the wretched slave trade prevails, withering all the charities of life, and perverting all the social relations of man, where it extends its baleful influence. Ignorance and despotism rest as a mighty incubus upon all the energies of the people, which break out only in periodical bursts of murderous wars and internal feuds. No part of the earth more needs the quickening influence of evangelical doctrines, and the soul-inspiring influence of spiritual teaching and example. Probably no portion of the earth would afford a speedier or more extensive recompense to the missionary, than some of those interior countries bordering upon the river Gochab, were they once favored with a regular course of Christian instruction. All these countries are supposed to have received whatever they have of Christianity from Abyssinia, through the medium of the great Ethiopic empire, and this chiefly at periods long subsequent to apostolic times, when the great apostacy of the eastern and western world had corrupted the primitive faith, and added a number of superstitious observances to the pure and simple institutions of the great Head of the Church. The Abyssinians have a tradition that their empire became Christian in the days of their celebrated Queen Candace, who, they say, was converted by the illustrious Eunuch, her treasurer, after his baptism by the Apostle Philip. (Acts 8.) From the time of Solomon, the worship of Jehovah was celebrated in the empire under priests originally sent from Judea, and according to the requirements of the Mosaic books; and many Israelites had settled and multiplied in the land, which sufficiently accounts for the Jewish character of many of the customs and sentiments of the people, as, for example, the practice of circumcision and the distinction of meats, clean and unclean. If the Ethiopians received Christianity in the reign of Candace, it is probable there was no legal solemnization of it as an hierarchy, for this seems by general consent of those who have written on the matter, to be referred to the fourth century, when Fruementius, a Tyrian by birth, had signalized himself among them as a teacher and a learned man, was sent by the emperor to the Patriarch of Alexandria, who loaded him with honors, and consecrated him first Bishop of Ethiopia. The primate of Abyssinia has ever since been received from Alexandria.

One hundred and ten volumes comprise all the literature at this day extant in Abyssinia; four manuscripts only are written in the language at present spoken and understood; and with the exception of the holy Scriptures, the whole is said to be little more than a tissue of absurd church controversy, and lying monkish legends. Even this lore is shut up as a dead letter, so that few excepting the priests and desteras can decipher them, and many of these learned men are more indebted to the memory of their early youth, than to the well-thumbed page in their hands. Not one in a hundred of the population can read.

The national character is a singular compound of vanity, meekness, and ferocity—of devotion, superstition, and ignorance. The Abyssinians possess no just idea of the more salutary doctrines of Christianity. Their belief in Christianity is strange, childish, and inconsistent. Long and severe fastings constitute the essence of their degenerate religion; the idolatrous worship of saints has overspread the land; charms and amulets are every where in high repute; sorcerers and necromancers have a powerful hold on the minds of the ignorant multitude; the blacksmith and the worker in iron are held to be endowed with supernatural powers; sickness and misfortune are usually ascribed to the evil influence of his eye; and yet the presence of any Christian emblem, or portion of Holy Writ, is supposed to be sufficient to neutralize his labors. No metal can be welded within sight of the cross; and should any scraps of the Bible be worn on the person of the bystanders, the desired figure can never be imparted to the metal. It is evident that a people holding these vain and foolish doctrines, can have but very vague and indefinite ideas of the great Bible doctrine of salvation. As might be expected, their morals are said to be extremely bad. Born amid falsehood and deceit, cradled amid bloodshed, and nursed in the arms of idleness and debauchery, their character is truly painted in the confession of one of their own degenerate sons:—"Whensoever we behold the pleasing ware, we desire to steal it; and we are never in the company of a man we dislike that we do not wish to kill him on the spot." Poligamy and all its attendant vices every where prevails: and the slave trade, with all its attendant crimes, is carried on by large caravans from the interior to the coast, through the large States, who carry on the most murderous wars with the weaker, often for the sake of obtaining prisoners, who may be exchanged for the trinkets and wares of other countries.

Some missionary efforts have been made for twenty years past, on behalf of Abyssinia proper, and more recently in Shoa. In 1818 the English Episcopal Church Missionary Society obtained a manuscript copy of the first eight books of the Old Testament, in the Ethiopic language, and presented it to the British and Foreign Bible Society, to be printed under the superintendence of Professor Lee, a learned oriental scholar. In 1823, in the University of Cambridge, the British and Foreign Bible Society printed the Amharic Gospels from a version made by M. Asselim, French Consul at Cairo, from the Ethiopic of the fourth century, in the royal dialect spoken at Gondar.

For a number of years Mr. Gobalt was stationed at Gondar, as missionary from the English Episcopal Church Missionary Society; and for some time past Dr. Krapf at Aukuber in Shoa. "But the missionary labor is a hard up hill task. Disliked as a stranger of envied accomplishments, despised as an alien to the land, and hated by the jealous priesthood, the words of truth fall unheeded from lips the most eloquent, and the best directed endeavors prove of small avail." Perfectly satisfied with his own creed, the Abyssinian finds it easier to kiss the holy book than to peruse it, and to trust to the fast and the priestly absolution, than to mould his conduct according to the Gospel. The bigotry of ages is confirmed by pride and the excessive ignorance of all classes. We are not informed, however, that any effort has ever been made by enlightened Christians for the improvement of the more southern and interior States, where, we should judge, if their condition is not more inviting, their superstitions are fewer, and their bigotry less tenacious, than in Abyssinia and Shoa, where all the pride of ancestry, and ancient pre-eminence, is brought to the aid of ignorant prejudices.

To us it is all-desirable that a mission to one or more of the states bordering upon the great river Gochob should be attempted as soon as possible. We are informed that American tradeships are already accustomed to visit that part of the coast lying between Sofala and cape Guardafoi. These, it is probable, would afford opportunities for such an attempt to be made. The Iman of Muscat having friendly commercial relations with the government of the United States, would be highly favorable to his being friendly to a mission from this country, if such a mission needed his countenance.

There are three things universally common to the religion of those Christian states, which would be more favorable to a mission from Seventh-day Baptists than to any other denomination. 1st. They profess reverence for the holy Scriptures in whatever they know of them. 2d. They are immersionists, practicing trine immersion. 3d. The Sabbath of Jehovah, the seventh-day Sabbath, is every where strictly observed.

Who then is willing to go? Who is ready to send pious, devoted, qualified teachers, to these ignorant fellow-creatures?

Although we submit the foregoing information to the serious attention of the denomination, as opening a door for a mission from our denomination, in a field unoccupied by any other evangelical society, we would by no means inculcate the idea that a mission from our churches would not be likely to succeed in any other heathen country. On the contrary, we believe that we have only to send godly, well-qualified men, thoroughly imbued with the spirit of Christ, and in any part of the heathen world, let them teach all the commandments of God and the faith of Jesus, and their testimony will be as likely to be believed, and their labors crowned with as much success, as those of any other Christian denomination. Indeed we seriously wish we had missions among the teeming millions of the great Anglo-Indian empire, and among the three hundred millions of Chinese, where neither the Sabbath nor Sunday is observed; and that the converts to Christianity under the labors of Sabbath-keeping missionaries would uniformly receive and observe God's holy day, is certain from the laws of the human mind, and the power of truth upon an unprejudiced heart. Indeed, experience shows that missions among the heathen are commonly more successful than among a people whose minds are perverted and prepossessed by a corrupt form of Christianity. But we have strong impressions that on the coast and throughout the vast interior of that great continent, there is an almost illimitable population, with whose views of the claims of divine institutions, our own would conflict less than those of any other religious denomination. And this region remaining unoccupied by all other societies, would seem to point it out as a sphere designed by divine providence for us to occupy.

The Sabbath Recorder.

NEW YORK, JUNE 12, 1845.

WHAT GOOD WILL IT DO?

There are not a few religionists who are remarkably zealous in promoting any popular movement which gives promise of immediate and showy successes, but who are exceedingly cautious how they identify themselves with any movement which does not promise such successes. They seem to suppose, that the questions of right and duty are altogether subservient to expediency, and that nothing can possibly be demanded of them for which they are not likely soon to receive an equivalent. Speak to them of the claims of the inebriate or the enslaved, and of the duty of making efforts on their behalf, and they at once raise the question, What good will it do? Or, speak to them of the duty of restoring to notice some forsaken and long-neglected divine institution, and they with equal readiness turn from the duty itself to the probable consequences of discharging it. We have met with many persons who treat the subject of the Sabbath in precisely this way. They acknowledge that the seventh day of the week only is the Sabbath, that it ought to be universally observed, and that they would be glad to see it so observed; yet the moment you press upon them the duty of observing it themselves, and laboring to promote its observance among others, they will reply by asking the question, "What good will it do? The first day is generally observed; great efforts are making to secure its better observance; these efforts would be hindered by introducing the claims of the seventh day; and, therefore, What good will it do?" This is a very easy way, surely, to escape from an unwelcome duty. What a pity that it did not occur to Elijah of old, when he was charged with being "he that troubleth Israel;" or to Jeremiah, when he was shut up in the court of the prison for prophesying evil against Israel; or to Paul, when the disciples dissuaded him from going up to Jerusalem. Who can tell the consequences, if they had judged it a sufficient reason for neglecting duty, because they could not see exactly what the result would be? Even it were granted, for the sake of giving to the objection the greatest weight, that we could not see distinctly what good would result from our Sabbath efforts, that would be no proof that they were useless, and no reason why we should neglect to put them forth. But we deny that there is any such uncertainty about their usefulness, and maintain that good has already been done and may yet be expected from them. Let us look into this matter somewhat.

Our Sabbath efforts have been designed, in the first place, to promote right views in regard to the divine law. It is well known, that no inconsiderable portion of professing Christians have denied, both in theory and practice, the claims of the divine law upon them. Not a few have taken this position in view of the inconsistency of allowing its claims, and yet disregarding an important part of the fourth commandment. This practical antinomianism has led, in many places and at different times, to a total neglect of the sabbatic institution. Now the efforts to enforce the claims of the seventh day have shown, that in order to have a Sabbath, we must have the Sabbath of the fourth commandment, sustained and enforced by divine authority. They have turned the eye of the public—particularly that part of the public who are interested in a Sabbath reform—to the necessity of taking a position which will ensure for them the blessing of God and the sanctions of his law. In this way our efforts have contributed very greatly to promote right views in regard to the divine law.

Again, our efforts have contributed greatly to promote a free and full discussion of the Sabbath question. It is only a few years ago, that the subject was rarely under consideration, and when brought up was treated as quite unimportant. The case is very different now. The subject is every where spoken of as all-important; the necessity of a radical reform is acknowledged; the weight of argument in favor of the seventh day is felt; and those who advocate its claims are looked upon with respect and listened to with attention. Now what, we ask, has wrought this change? We will not say that the new interest in the subject is attributable wholly to the efforts of Sabbatarians. But we will say, without hesitation, that their efforts have done more than any other one thing to secure freedom and liberality in the discussions of the question, and to improve the feeling which prevails in regard to those who observe the seventh day.

Still again, our efforts to disseminate the truth have been owned and blessed of God to the conversion of some from their error in respect to the Sabbath. It is now common to hear of individuals here and there who have embraced the Sabbath of the fourth commandment, and commenced keeping it in the midst of opposition. In some cases, little worshiping circles have been formed of those who have come out through the instrumentality of our efforts. We do not think, by any means, that our usefulness is to be measured simply by the number of these conversions. But they are pledges which God gives of his favor to the truth. As such they should be welcomed, and regarded with a feeling of encouragement. They show that the seed sown is now and then received into good ground, and thus assure us, that it shall finally bring forth fruit, some thirty, some sixty, some an hundred fold. In the light of such facts and encouragements, we cannot think despondingly of the question, What good will it do?

Floral Procession.—They have in Philadelphia a most admirable plan for interesting children in Sunday Schools, and providing funds for the support of such schools. It is by means of Floral Processions, which the children are encouraged to attend, not only with smiling faces and light hearts, but with their arms full of boquets, wreaths, and floral decorations. After marching about for a while, the flowers are deposited at a convenient place, and exposed for sale. A procession of this kind came off on the 29th of May, at which several thousand Sunday School scholars were present, and an address was delivered by a minister appointed for the purpose. About $1000 will be realized from the procession, which is to be appropriated to the purchase of Sunday School books and libraries for the destitute schools and families at the west. This happy arrangement is doubly blessed; it blesses those who engage in it as well as those for whose benefit it was originally designed.

CHANGE OF A CHRISTIAN'S ABODE.

We are pained at the perfectly worldly spirit which governs most Christians in a change of their location. Neither the spiritual prosperity of themselves, nor of their families, seems to constitute an item in the account. The whole business is one of dollars and cents. If they can increase their property, if they can raise more wheat to the acre, or send a larger stock of cattle to market, or expand their mercantile or mechanical operations, by a removal, the policy is considered as settled, and forthwith speedy arrangements are made for a transfer of all their effects to a new home. In the mean time those advantages which are of an intellectual, moral, and religious nature, are scarcely ever thought of; or, if they are, made such secondary considerations that the predominance of a worldly spirit is palpable to every body's observation.

We have met with the farmer who fancied that the land of promise was somewhere else than where he was abiding, and was therefore so intent on a removal to it, that he could neither find a heart for conversation upon the things of religion, nor even time for prayer in his own family. We have fancied ourselves holding some such conversation with him as the following:—

"What, brother, will be your religious privileges in the place to which you are going? Is there a church in the neighborhood to which you could attach yourself, and where your family could enjoy such privileges that their souls would not suffer?"

"Why, I believe so. I have understood there is a church a few miles off."

"Then you are not certain of it; you have only heard so. But be it so that there is one, what kind of a church is it?"

"I don't know certainly; I presume it is an orthodox church—perhaps Methodist, or Presbyterian, or Baptist?"

"But is it a Sabbath-keeping church? Do they meet for worship on the day God called his own, or do they honor another day, and teach a theology which seeks to keep in [illegible] the great and popular festival which the Man of Sin has engrafted upon the religious world?"

"Why, I suppose they meet on the first day of the week."

"Well, it seems then that the day which God has blessed and sanctified, and said, 'in it thou shalt not do any work,' is made by them a working day, and not only so, but the busiest day of all the seven; that, if you would enjoy religious privileges with them, you must break off your labor when you believe it your privilege to work, which—if we might judge from your present anxiety to increase your substance—you would be loth to do, and so your family are in danger of having no place of worship at all. And even if you should attend, your children must constantly hear the Sunday proclaimed as the Sabbath of the Lord, in flat contradiction to the Bible. They consequently will grow up to forsake the Lord's institution, and either honor one of man's device, or observe no day at all. Your own soul also becomes barren, and godliness after a while becomes little else than a mere name."

"Why, you don't suppose that those first-day people are not Christians, do you?"

"That is nothing to the purpose. They may be sincere, and think that they are doing God service. But you have been instructed into the way of the Lord more perfectly. And if every one is to be judged according to the light he has, you could not expect to fare as well as they will in the great day, although in this world your outward conduct should be the very same. You stand on entirely different footing."

"But perhaps I can do them some good; perhaps I can show them their error."

"If that were your motive in going, perhaps you could. But your governing motive seems to be of an entirely different character; your worldly gain is what you are looking after; and a man who is governed by such a spirit is but ill calculated to be a reformer. The greater probability is, that he would leave the way of the Lord himself. If you can sell your present religious privileges for mere dollars and cents, it is very probable you will be ready to sell the Sabbath also, when a sufficient price is paid for it."

"Brother, I think you are severe."

"Be it so: but the good Book teaches us that those who are unfaithful in little are unfaithful in much; and applying this priciple to your case, I see no reason to think that the same desire of gain which now leads you to make a sacrifice of religious privileges will not in the end lead to still worse consequences."

"But I must provide for my family, or I shall be worse than an infidel."

"Very true. But are you really driven to this course in order to meet the wants of your family? Is there no alternative? Is your family starving, or likely to starve?"

"Why, I can't say that they are."

"Very well; then trust in the Lord and do good; so shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed. And let it be added, that even in a worldly point of view, a removal may not be of such great service after all. Your children are made rich, not by the acres they possess, and the gold and silver bestowed upon them, but by the development of their energies. Take the hard, barren, and rocky soil of New England, for example, where one would think that neither man nor beast could get a living. Yet men placed on such a soil are stimulated to the most vigorous exercise of intellect, and to constant industry; and the consequence is such a development of energy of character as makes them in reality richer than it is in the power of gold to make them; while in those countries where the fertility of the soil brings every thing to the hands of the people without much labor, the energies stagnate, the mind dwindles, the body is sickly, and a catalogue of evils ensue which dollars and cents can never banish." *

DISABILITIES OF JEWS IN THE UNITED STATES.

It may be unknown to some of our readers, that in parts of our own country, notwithstanding our boasts about liberty of conscience and universal equality, the Jews are subject to more or less civil disabilities on account of their religious opinions. In the enlightened and liberal State of Massachusetts, for instance, and we believe in New Hampshire also, Jews are ineligible to certain offices, for no other reason than because they are Jews. In North Carolina they are not allowed to hold any civil office whatever. We are not aware that the question of removing these disabilities has ever been agitated in Massachusetts, on which account there may be less culpability in the case. But in North Carolina, the subject has been under consideration; and at the last revisal of the Constitution, a clause giving to the Jews equal privileges with other citizens, was positively rejected, and that notwithstanding the Catholics were wholly relieved from the disabilities under which they had formerly labored. These facts furnish a mournful commentary upon our profession of equal privileges to all, and ought not to be allowed to exist another day.

Jews of Morocco.—We learn from the "Voice of Jacob," that Sir Moses Montefiore, on behalf of the committee to relieve the Mogadore Jews, addressed a memorial to the Emperor of Morocco, asking the same privileges for the Barbary Jews as are conferred on their brethren in the Turkish dominions. The memorial was prepared in an elegant and sumptuous style, and was replied to most graciously by the Emperor. He assured Sir Moses Monefiore that the Jews in his dominions enjoyed equal rights, privileges, and protection, as the Mahomedans. He also expressed much grief at the calamities which had befallen [illegible] character of this reply, and the known humanity of the Emperor, render it probable that he only needs the power to enforce his wishes throughout his dominions, in order to put an end to the evils of which the Jews complain, and render his rule an easy and pleasant one.

Jews of Jerusalem.—A private letter from Mr. Warder Cresson, U. S. Consul at Jerusalem, represents the Israelites in the seat of their ancient glory as being in a state of melancholy destitution, wanting in many cases the simple necessaries of life, to say nothing of its conveniencies and luxuries. Mr. C. suggests the opinion, also, that in some of the conversions which are represented to have taken place under the patronage of the Protestant Episcopal Mission, the converts have not been wholly uninfluenced by their own wants. That is a sad state of things, truly, which leads men to make religious professions for the sake of obtaining the bread which satisfieth not. We sincerely hope the picture of poverty and suffering is overdrawn.

Conference of Ministers.—A Conference of Baptist Ministers was held in Boston during the Anniversary week, to take into consideration the present state of religion in the Baptist Churches. It seems to have been generally felt, that things were in a bad state, and needed reforming. But upon the questions what had produced this bad state of things, and what could be done to improve it, there was more difference of opinion. It was maintained by some, that there has been too little doctrinal and experimental preaching; that the necessity of the Holy Spirit's influences, of the atonement, and of the thorough application of the divine law, has been too much overlooked; that the mind has not been sufficiently stored with truth, but too much occupied with the outward and mechanical duties of religion. Others thought there was an uncalled-for disposition to disparage themselves; that the present condition of the church was not altogether peculiar; that a process of refining and disciplining was now going on; and that the present was a state of trial rather than of declension. All agreed that there was just occasion for humility, and for increased earnestness in prayer to God for a revival of his work.

Another Death on the Missionary Field.—Mrs. Abbott, the beloved helper and friend of Rev. E. L. Abbott, died at her residence in Sandoway, Arracan, on the 27th of January last. She had but recently returned from a tour in the jungles, whither she went to attend her husband in case he should be ill, as she feared. On the 24th she was attacked with a fever and an affection of the heart, of which she died on the 27th. These oft-repeated losses on the missionary field are calculated to try the faith of Christians, and certainly demand of them increased zeal, and prayer that the Lord would send forth laborers into his harvest.

FOREIGN MISSIONS.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:

By a resolution of the Board of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association, I am instructed to communicate to our churches from time to time any important information that may have come to hand upon the subject of a Foreign Mission. Permit me to say, that the object meets with almost unqualified approbation. In about ten days, without any extraordinary effort, I have obtained more than three hundred dollars in subscriptions of the most reliable character. And from what I can learn of the feeling of our brethren generally, I entertain not a doubt that funds sufficient for a foreign mission will be immediately furnished, on the adoption of a field of labor, and suitable men to occupy it. Indeed, there appears to be such a coincidence in circumstances, sentiments, and feelings, on this subject, in remote parts of our denomination, that I feel a very great assurance that it is a movement directed by the Providence and Spirit of God. If so, both the men and the means will be provided.

A short time ago, I wrote to our brother, Rev. William Henry Black, Pastor of the Mill Yard Church, London; and on my return from the Anniversary of the Eastern Association, I was happy to find an answer from him, from which I doubt not a few extracts will be gratifying to our brethren on this side of the Atlantic. After acknowledging the receipt of the letter, &c., he says:

"The importance of the project of your Association has long appeared to my own mind; so that I have been as willing, if it were possible, to visit the descendants of the ancient Ethiopic Christians, as to see the flourishing churches of Sabbath-keepers in the new world. Who knows but a Sabbath-keeping Protestant missionary might be a Luther to that benighted people? I am confident that none but such a Protestant could effectually revive religion in that remarkable nation, and that a mission from our churches could hardly fail of success, with the blessing of the God of the Sabbath upon its pious endeavors." * * *

Speaking of the qualifications of a missionary to Ethiopia, Mr. Black says: "One important qualification is, he must be a man of peace, and not a man of worldly politics. The Anglican mission to Ethiopia is said to have failed partly through worldly policy on the part of the missionaries. At present there is no Protestant missionary in all that vast region. It is closed against English Episcopalians, but it is open to us, and is all our own to occupy."

"There exist in London the means of acquiring the Ethiopic or Amharic language, in a Dictionary and Grammar of the modern language printed in English, and in Ludolph's Grammar and Lexicon of the ancient language in Latin. The Bible Society is possessed of printed copies of the Ethiopian and Amharic Gospels, published at its own [illegible] tures in manuscript, so that sufficient means of philological preparation can be had for an intelligent and pious student to make himself equal to the task of a Christian mission to Ethiopia. There is an excellent map of Nubia and Ethiopia, just published in Johnson's National Atlas, No. 36—an expensive work, of which we have a copy in the Baptist Mission House."

"My own opinion is, that if an unexceptionable man be found in your churches, one whose zeal and prudence are well balanced, and who would not scorn the labor of preparation for a service in which he must expect to spend all his energies and life itself, there are not wanting friends, even among the first-day Baptists, to encourage and support him in the arduous undertaking. For my part, I should rejoice to welcome such an one for a time to this city and this church, and introduce him to all the facilities of study that our libraries afford.

Br. Black thinks that after a messenger shall have spent two or three months in London to acquire what knowledge may there be afforded him, he should proceed to Aden by the Indian overland route, and remain there for a short time to mature his knowledge of the language, and learn what would be the most eligible point of the country to commence the mission. And it is his opinion, and the opinion of a number of leading Baptist brethren to whom he has mentioned the project, that the merchant caravans would afford a safe and practicable route either to Gondar, which is about 450 miles westward, or to some other part of Ethiopia, as may be judged best. He however promises more information shortly; and adds, "We shall not forget your welfare in our prayers. May God graciously raise up one of his servants to serve him in Ethiopia, and open a way there for his success!"

Will not all the pastors of our churches bring this subject before our people, and labor to enlist their prayers and subscriptions for its success?

Are there not brethren whose hearts burn with missionary zeal, and who say, Send me? We shall be glad to communicate with any brother upon this subject.

Samuel Davison, Cor. Sec., Plainfield, N. J.

The Right Spirit.—A brother who has already done the Recorder much service, requests us to cease sending the paper to a man who likes it but feels unable to pay for it. He adds, however, "I shall make this the occasion of sending you several new subscribers for the next volume." That is the right spirit, and its general prevalence would render the publication of a religious paper comparatively easy and pleasant. Who will go and do likewise?

☞ One week from to-day completes the first volume of the Sabbath Recorder. Is it needful to say to our friends, that this is just the time when money due for the first volume, and advance payments for the second, will be most acceptable?

ENGLISH BENEVOLENCE.

In London, the month of May is devoted to a series of Anniversary Meetings of various Societies, embracing nearly every imaginable object of Christian benevolence. Some of these meetings for the present year were held before the sailing of the last steamer, and appear to have been unusually interesting.

The Baptist Missionary Society held its 53d anniversary on the 1st of May, at which addresses were delivered by several ministers and returned missionaries. The receipts of the Society for the year have amounted to about $100,000. In India the Society has 38 missionaries, and 71 native assistants; 1404 church members; 54,760 volumes printed during the year. In America, 16 missionaries, and 35 native teachers, with 3027 church members; to which may be added 34,000 members in Jamaica.

The British and Foreign Bible Society held its 41st anniversary on the 7th of May. The number of Auxiliary Societies in Great Britain connected with the parent society is 2,991. The receipts and expenditures of the Society for the present year have somewhat exceeded those of last year, being above $400,000. The total number of copies of the Scriptures issued at home and abroad has been 915,811. A nonpareil duodecimo Bible is now issued for about nineteen cents, and a New Testament for less than eight cents, both strongly bound.

The Wesleyan Missionary Society met on the 5th of May. The Annual Report showed that the receipts had exceeded $500,000. The Society has in its service, and under its pay, 4,143 persons, who are employed as preachers, missionaries, assistant missionaries, catechists, interpreters, day-school teachers, etc. Several liberal donations to the Society were made at the anniversary meeting; one of £1,000 from Mr. Thomas Farmer, and another of £2,000 from Mr. Isaac Crowther.

The London Missionary Society's 50th anniversary was held on the 14th of May. The receipts of the Society have been £65,563, while its expenditures have been £82,876, being an excess of £17,249 over the receipts. This excess was occasioned by the purchase of the missionary ship and some other extraordinary contingencies. The number of missionary stations is 439; of churches, 131; European missionaries, 165; native assistants, 438; printing presses, 15.

RELIGIOUS ITEMS.

Religion in France.—The efforts which are making for the diffusion of pure Christianity in France are not in vain. Dr. Baird says: Ten years ago, there were but one hundred evangelical ministers in connection with churches under the patronage of government; now, there are two hundred, besides nearly a hundred others who are laboring successfully to plant new congregations. More than two hundred colporteurs are distributing the Bible and other religious books, in almost every part of France. Protestant ministers, as the result of this colporteur movement, are called for in places where no Protestant church has ever been planted. The great difficulty at present is, to meet these calls. Ten, twenty, and even fifty villages in some departments of France, are prepared to welcome a devoted ministry. Never, since the Reformation, has the way been so prepared in that country, for the wide and triumphant dissemination of the Gospel.

Education in India.—The number of scholars in the educational institutions of the East India Company, is 8,281. Of these 6,035 are Hindoos; 1,683, Mohammedans; 248, Christians; 197 are neither Hindoos, Mohammedans, nor Christians. Five-eighths of the whole number learn English; 426, Sanscrit; 572, Arabic; 801, Persian. The medical school sends out, it is said, accomplished practitioners.

The American Education Society's receipts the last year, amounted to about $34,000, of which $20,000 have been used to pay off so much of their debt. They have still a debt of something more than $7,000. About $15,000 of their receipts have been from legaices of former years.

The American Bible Society have issued from their depository the past year, 430,000 Bibles and Testaments. This is 100,000 more than in any former year. They have printed the Bible in six huge folios, in raised letters, for the blind. The stereotype plates for this edition cost $10,000. The books are sold at cost, which is $20 for the six vols.

The American Peace Society have issued the past year more than 90,000 copies of their various periodicals. They employ a corresponding secretary, a general agent, and an agent at their depository, and two lecturing agents. Expenditures, $4,819 50.

A letter from Stockholm, dated 12th of April, says that the Swedish Diet has responded to the appeal of the King, and in a manner which secures freedom to the four or five hundred slaves belonging to the Swedish Island of St. Bartholomew. The estates acceded to the proposition of the King by voting 10,000 piastres yearly, for five years, to be expended in redeeming the slaves of that Island, and compensating the loss of their masters.

General Intelligence.

Great Fire in Quebec.—The Montreal Times of May 29, gives an account of a great fire in Quebec which burnt upwards of twelve hundred houses, leaving their former inmates not only houseless but pennyless.

Private letters, says the Times, give dreadful accounts of the sufferings of the unfortunate persons who have been deprived of their habitations. One of our correspondents remarks:—"Never have I seen any thing to equal the misery of the poor creatures; the flames have left them no homes, and the hospitality which is shown by those who have escaped is scarcely sufficient to provide shelter for the crowds who claim relief. Wet, cold, and hungry groups are to be seen standing upon the wharf and in the street almost lost in despair, but yet instinctively clinging to the poor remnants of their houses."

From a Quebec paper we select the following:

One assertion we may safely make, that the amount of property lost is not too far magnified, and the sacrifice of human life is underrated. The total loss has been computed with the utmost nicety possible, and found to be between one million and one million and a half pounds!—or, in dollars, from $4,000,000 to $6,000,000! The loss of life cannot be estimated. We hear of many private interments of the remains found by supposed relatives, and it is asserted that about forty victims of the conflagration have so far been inhumed, and that many, very many, will never be discovered.

African News.—By the Madonna, papers have been received from Liberia to the 9th of April. The following is a summary of the news:—

The American Colonies were enjoying the blessings of peace, happiness and prosperity. Upper Caldwell Meeting-House congregation, and the Day and Sunday Schools attached, are reported to be most exemplary. Rev. Mr. Russel writes encouragingly from the interior mission at Mount Andrews. He has been among the tribes, teaching the Gospel, and every where met a cheerful and friendly reception. He named many children after distinguished people in the Colony or in the United States. Fourteen boys were given to him by their parents—he adopted them as part of his family. Cape Palmas was quiet, the war between the native tribes having terminated. The Episcopal Mission among the conquering tribe had not sustained any injury, nor were the Colonists at all incommoded by the savage conflicts of the natives. The Methodist Mission is some distance from the scene of contention.

The aggressive movements of England have created much uneasiness among the colonists. Our Colonies are threatened by the British Government; their revenue laws have been disregarded, part of the Territory has been seized, and offered for sale; and the colonists have been denied all political or national rights except such as England pleases to grant. They appeal to the United States, and to the whole civilized world, to judge between them and the aggressor.

Apprehensions were entertained that another and more formidable attack would be made on the Grahway tribe by the Half Cavallas.

The Half Ounce Letter.—A writer in the Doyleston Olive Branch has been at great pains to ascertain how much can be transmitted for five cents. An avoirdupois half ounce is 218¾ grains. Wafers one grain. Sealing wax, usual quantity, five grains. A sheet of foolscap weighs 172 grains. Letter paper, 135. Small envelopes, 45 grains—large 52. You can send 300 miles a letter for five cents, containing, viz: the sheet of letter paper enclosing seven bank notes sealed with wax; or the letter and three bank notes in an envelop. Half a sheet of letter paper with half eagle enclosed under wax. A sheet with a dime and a half enclosed and secured by wafers. One sheet of letter paper with a quarter eagle enclosed, secured by wax. A sheet of foolscap in an envelop sealed with wafer. One and a half sheets of letter paper sealed with wax or wafer. These calculations are based upon the ordinary letter paper in use. By using very thin French paper, a greater number of sheets go to the half ounce, of course. [Express.

A Living Toad in a Child's Stomach.—On the 20th of May last, a little girl, four years and nine months old, an only child of John Bronson, of Russell, in this County, vomited a living Toad. It measures from the mouth to the end of the body 2½ inches. It lived about 12 hours, and is now preserved in spirits that it may be seen at any time, at the house of Mr. Bronson. The child for some months past has complained of distress in the stomach, and her parents have noticed a pale and sickly appearance; but her appetite being good, and the child usually cheerful, they were disposed to believe the occasional periods of indisposition were induced by worms.

The gentleman who gave us the above information, lives within a few rods, saw the toad while living, has carefully taken its dimensions, and knows it to be true.

Mormon Petition.—In the Connecticut Legislature on Saturday, says the Hartford Courant, a message was received from His Excellency the Governor, accompanied by a communication from Brigham Young and others, "a Committee of the Latter Day Saints" at Nauvoo—otherwise called Mormons, asking for an Asylum in Connecticut, or for aid in obtaining one elsewhere. They claim to be "law-preserving citizens," and say Illinois has treated them as bad as Missouri. The former "pounced upon their patriarch and their prophet, repealed their chartered rights," &c. They say that many citizens of Connecticut are among them—and request the Governor to convene a special session of the Legislature to grant them an asylum, and to aid in establishing a Colony of "Latter Day Saints in Oregon." The message was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

European Journals.—It is estimated that, at Rome, there is one journal to every 51,000 persons; at Madrid, one to 50,000; Venice, one to 11,000; London, one to 10,600; Berlin, one to 1,070; Paris, one to 3,700; Stockholm, one to 2,600; Leipsic, one to 11,000. Taking, instead of cities, kingdoms, the estimate is—in Spain, one journal to 864,000 individuals; in Russia, one to 674,000; in Austria, one to 376,000; in Switzerland, one to 66,000; in France, one to 52,000; in England, one to 46,000; in Holland, one to 40,500; in Prussia, one to 43,000. Comparing the number of subscribers with the population, the former is to the latter, in France, as one to 437; in England, as one to 184; in Holland, as one to 100.

The Blind.—It appears from the Annual Report of the Institution for the Blind that there are at present 111 pupils in the Institution; 42 females and 56 males are engaged in regular studies, and 12 occupied during the day with music or manufacture. Music is an important branch of education. They have six pianos; and during the past year, through the liberality of friends, a valuable organ has been provided. Many of the pupils have already become accomplished on this instrument, and are well fitted to perform in churches. Fifty-six pupils are now receiving musical instruction; the choir in the Institution consists of twelve girls and eight boys, and the band is composed of fourteen boys. Their performances excite great admiration. Basket-making is another occupation of the pupils in addition to the weaving of mats and carpets. Among the great variety of paper boxes manufactured, they have made during the year, 2,567 band-boxes, 3,785 shoe-boxes, 1,798 cap-boxes, 19,175 artificial flower-boxes, and 3,319 fancy boxes, and over 1,000 market baskets. Over $9,000 were received from the State last year, to aid the Institution.

A Hard Story.—It is said that a scientific gentleman, residing at Ipswich, England, Mr. Frederic Ransome, Engineer, has lately discovered a method by which the hardest stone can be brought into a consistance resembling common putty, so that it can be cut and moulded into any shape for ornamental purposes, without altering its general character and appearance; for it becomes as hard, and in some instances even harder, than when subjected to the process. Another reported peculiarity of the process is, that any color, or variety of colors, can be imparted to its solid substance, so that an endless variety of shades can be produced, and, as it is capable of being polished, it effectually resists the action of the weather. And, above all, it can be used as a cement, and can be brushed over the surface of wood, so as to render it fire-proof. The stone-cutter's occupation is likely to be gone.

Poverty among the Cherokees.—The great scarcity of provisions, and the destitute condition of many of the people, have made it necessary to supply their wants as far as possible out of the public funds. For this purpose depots have been established in several of the districts, where corn is issued to those most needy, but to what extent we have not ascertained. Could those to whose guidance and mercy are committed the temporal being and destiny of the Cherokees, descend for a moment from their places of ease and affluence—come into our midst, and witness the destitution and want that have been brought on many whose only crime was that they clung too fondly to the land possessed by them, the gift of God, surely the dispensation of justice would no longer be withheld. The Western Transcript, a Moral and Religious Anti-Slavery journal, published at Cincinnati, and which had reached its thirty-first number, has been discontinued for want of patronage. Its Editor, Rev. W. H. Brisbane, is a man highly respected wherever he is known, and his paper has been remarkable for its uniform courtesy towards opponents, as well as for the moderation of its tone. Mr. B. was formerly a clergyman in South Carolina, and was greatly beloved by the Baptist denomination to which he was and still is warmly attached. Having become convinced of the sinfulness of Slavery, he emancipated his thirty bondmen, and subsequently removed to Cincinnati. He afterwards, at the risk of his life, returned to South Carolina for the purpose of assisting his former slaves in removing to a free State, which object he accomplished. Having thus proved the sincerity of his faith by his works, he is entitled to the respect of all who revere freedom and free institutions. [Tribune.

The subscription to the Capital Stock of the New York and Erie Railroad Company is going on in good earnest.

During a severe thunder storm in the town of Riga on the 4th inst. a man named Stevens, who was ploughing for Ichabod Sprague, was killed by lightning. The fluid entered the top of his head and came out at his chin, making a hole like a bullet. It ran down his body, passed through his foot, and tore the sole off his boot. One of the horses was killed.

Father Sewall, the well-known Missionary in Maine, is ninety years of age, of large stature and bulk, and has a staff of proportionate size. He is hale and vigorous, and still itinerates among the new settlements of Maine, and there is hardly a log-house in which he has not prayed, and preached, and slept.

The projected Railroad from Ogdensburgh to Lake Champlain, through Clinton, Franklin and St. Lawrence Counties, is attracting much attention at the North, and the Bostonians appear disposed to take hold of the matter with energy. The length of the Road is about 130 miles, and it could be built for about $1,500,000 to $2,000,000.

The Manchester Mill, No. 1, now in progress of erection, will require, it is said, more than 1,000,000 pounds of wool annually.

Six members of a Baptist Church at Union Village, in Washington county, have been excommunicated for belonging to the order of Odd Fellows. The Pope of Rome has also denounced the same order, and prohibited its being tolerated at all by his clergy or Church.

We find the following queer apology in the Liberia Herald of January 25:—"Rice is uncommonly scarce. Our readers we know will excuse the want of editorial under these circumstances, for who can write when he is hungry?"

A letter dated at Cambridge, June 3d, says: "A brilliant Comet was seen from the Observatory at a quarter past two o'clock this morning. Observations on it were continued until daylight. It is a most beautiful object. The micrometric measurement seemed to indicate that it would soon pass within our circle of perpetual apparition, but this of course is a matter of uncertainty.

The Ancient and Honorable Artillery Company of Boston recently celebrated their 27th Anniversary. A sermon was preached by Rev. Dr. Vinton of the Episcopal Church, and the Governor went through with the usual ceremony of taking his seat on the Common and giving the officers of the Company their commissions.

The Commercial tells of two gentlemen who left Boston on Saturday, came to New York on the Long Island road, and returned home the same evening by the 5 o'clock line via Worcester. In old times, according to the Commercial—excellent authority in such lore—"a journey from Boston to New York was never undertaken rashly or performed hastily. Friends were consulted—papers arranged—provision made for families during the absence of the head, and wills were sometimes made."

A dead blue-bird was found, last week, clinging with its feet to one of the wires of Morse's Electro-Magnetic Telegraph, a few miles from Washington city. The body of the bird was examined, and no shot wound, or wound of any kind, was discovered sufficient to produce death, which has led to the belief that the poor thing was killed while perched upon the wire, some time during the operation of the Telegraph by a shock of the electricity.

It has been decided by Judge Nelson, that if the proprietor of a new invention sells even one of his articles, before he has taken out his patent, he thereby loses his exclusive claim; the sale is held to be an abandonment of the invention to the public. This is a new decision—the opposite doctrine having been heretofore held at the Patent Office.

The Reading Railroad carried last week 18,000 tons of coal, and during the month upwards of 60,000 tons. This month it is calculated to carry 80,000 tons, and by September 100,000 per month, if not disappointed by the miners.

The travelers go the greater part of the way on foot, through a dreary, barren country, crossing mountains that are 10,000 feet high, and destitute of vegetation and water. They are liable to be attacked by the Indians, and suffer all kinds of annoyance and privation.

The whole cost of the Croton Aqueduct, including accumulated interest during the construction of the work, ($1,577,459) was $12,606,000. The water rent at present is estimated at $150,000. The whole distance from the Croton Dam to the Battery in New York city, is 44 1-2 miles. It supplies 60,000,000 imperial gallons every 24 hours. There are 6000 "free hydrants" in various parts of the city.

The Sheriff of Schoharie has received arms from the State arsenal, and has proceeded to enlist men under the new law "to enforce and preserve order." One or two arrests have been made by the under sheriff without resistance; and the force in commission on Monday morning to aid the sheriff amounted to 80 men, all that are required at present.

The Freemasons of Cincinnati had a long and imposing procession on the 4th inst., to lay the Corner Stone of the splendid and spacious new Hall and buildings which they are erecting in that city.

Mr. John R. Peters, Jr., who went out to China with the embassy of Mr. Cushing, arrived in this country yesterday in the Bazaar. He has brought with him, we are told, the largest collection of Chinese Curiosities ever brought to this country. Mr. Peters says that "the Emperor of the Celestial Empire," is about sending a letter to Mr. Polk, "the President of the Democratic Empire." At the time he left, the scroll, six feet long and three broad, written in two languages, was completed. We are curious to learn what the great relative of the Sun will have to say to Mr. Polk.

The Philadelphia Firemen had a great riot at a fire on Sunday last.

The difficulty between the Long Island Railroad Company and the inhabitants of the Island, about burning up their forests, has been amicably settled.

Mr. Alexander Hamilton, of Madison Co., N. Y., and Miss Chloe C. Hodges, of Herkimer Co., N. Y., were recently married on board the Steamer Great Western, on Lake Huron. It seems that they both started from their homes at the East in expectation of living a life of single blessedness at the West. But becoming acquainted with each other on the Erie Canal, they fell in love, and were tied together as before stated.

Twenty-five thousand passengers went and came between the Battery and Staten Island on Sunday.

The Small Pox excitement is all gone. The City never was healthier at this season than it is at present.

The Temperance Bill in the Connecticut Legislature, by which the people of any town in the State that shall refuse to license taverns after the first of July will have power to break up all tippling-shops within its limits, passed the lower house on Friday by a vote of 101 to 43.

To the Editor of the Sabbath Recorder:

The Crops.—I have just returned from a tour through the counties of Saratoga, Washington, Warren, and Essex. Although the season is a little backward, yet the grass and grain crops look well. It is thought that the fruit was not materially injured by the late frosts, and people every where are confidently expecting an abundant harvest. Yours, H. H. B.

DIED,

In Sharon, Potter Co., Pa., on the 25th ult., in the 24th year of his age, Perry Hall, son of Benjamin and Wealthy Hall. He embraced religion five years ago, and united with the first Seventh-day Baptist Church in Genesee, and has ever adorned his profession in that way which Christians would not blush to imitate. Thus while his friends are deprived of a beloved son and brother, and the church of a bright and shining light, he undoubtedly is enjoying a blessed reward.

In Preston, N. Y., May 30th, of consumption, Jane Rogers, consort of Nicholas Rogers, in the 31st year of her age. Sister Rogers experienced religion in Waterford, Conn., when she was about 16 years old, and became a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church of that place, where she remained a living witness and an ornament of the church of God until about ten years ago, when she moved to this place and became a member of the Seventh-day Baptist Church, of which she remained a faithful member until the time of her death. She seemed to be apprized, some time previous to her death, that her stay on earth would be short, and lived in apparent daily preparation for the event. After her first confinement of her last illness, she said she had thought that she was ready and willing to meet death; but when brought near to the reality, she found a great struggle in giving up her family and dear friends. By God's assisting grace, however, she became more than willing. Her faith in God seemed to be perfect; she believed him to be a present helping God. At one time she said her mind was somewhat dark, and requested me to pray with her. In the time of prayer her countenance was seen to change, and when asked what affected the change, she replied, Oh I am so happy. At another time, she requested her friends to sing the verse commencing, "Oh thou in whose presence." During the singing, I heard an unknown voice, and turning to see whose it might be I ascertained that it was hers quite above the rest. She had great confidence in prayer, believing that God heard and answered in full all her requests. Great was her love to God, and peaceful her death. She said she had never forgotten her closet devotions. She was a kind companion, an anxious mother, and a faithful sister. I think no one could visit her in her illness without being profited. I was constrained to say in my heart, Oh that men would learn to die. In her death brother Rogers has sustained a great loss, and the church has been bereft of a devoted member. Funeral services were attended on the Sabbath following her death, when a sermon was preached from Heb. 11: 14—"They that say such things declare plainly that they seek a country." V. H.

☞ The death of a child of brother Wood was noticed in the Recorder some time ago. It occurred under melancholy circumstances. In company with other children, this boy had gathered what was supposed to be spikenard, but what was really a very poisonous root. Soon after eating a piece of it, he was taken sick, became spasmodic, and died in about three hours, notwithstanding the best medical aid was procured. Mrs. Wood also became affected, and was only restored by powerful antidotes. By this means a beloved family has been bereft of a darling child. S. S. G.

ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

This Institution has a pleasant and quiet location thirteen miles south-east of Angelica, and six mile south of Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y., under the care of W. C. Kenyon, as Principal, and Miss Caroline B. Maxson, as Preceptress, aided by able and experienced assistants.

Teachers' Classes will be exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining every facility of a Normal School, without its usual disadvantages. Within the past year, more than one hundred and fifty students of the institution have been employed as teachers in this and the adjacent counties—a number much larger than from any other institution in the State.

Students are prepared for entering any class in College. Ample advantages are also secured to those pursuing Modern Languages and the Fine Arts. The institution is liberally endowed and supplied with a choice and valuable library, and apparatus sufficiently extensive to illustrate every department of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. It has also well selected cabinets of Geological, Mineralogical and Conchological specimens.

The plan of instruction aims at the development of the moral, intellectual and physical powers of students, so as to render them thorough, accurate, and practical scholars.

Lectures on Chemistry, accompanied by a full course of experiments, will commence with the second week of the fall term, and continue daily to its close. During the fall and winter terms, daily lectures will be given on School Teaching. Lectures on Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Physiology, illustrated by experiments, will be given each term of the year.

Tuition, per term of fifteen weeks, from $3,50 to $5. Board per week, in private families, $1. The entire expense of the academic year, including tuition, board, washing, light, and fuel, need not exceed $60. No extra charges incurred. SAMUEL RUSSEL,
President of the Board of Trustees.

THE LIGHT OF PEACE.

I.

There's a light that is seen in our loneliest hours,
It awakens the soul from the sleep of despair,
And it comes to the heart like the dew to the flow'rs,
Imparting the freshness it meets not with there.
'Tis felt in our moments of bitterest anguish,
When grief, like a storm cloud, sits dark on the breast,—
And, cheered with its warmth, does the soul cease to languish,
For it promises rapture and wins it to rest.

II.

It sheds not its ray for the Tyrant, awaking
That calm in his soul which he knew not before—
It charms not the warrior from blandishments breaking
To bathe to the hilt his proud falchion in gore.
But it comes when the first glow of joy has departed,
It soothes the high pulse, and it softens the pain—
And it brings back that calm to the lone, broken-hearted,
The mourner had hoped not to cherish again.

III.

It comes like the moon shining through the dark hours,
And it tinges life's sky with its ruddiest glow,
And it gives to the forests, and flings o'er the flowers,
Those soft rainbow tints that embellish them so.
It shines—and the desolate heart long forsaken,
Won away by its glow, with its sorrows may cope—
It comes, and with magical power, to awaken
Every flow'r of our youth, every dream of our hope.

From the True Wesleyan.

The only way of Salvation.

It is written, "Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things written in the book of the law to do them." It is also said on the same authority, "All have sinned and come short of the glory of God." On what principle, then, can sinners be saved? Let us look briefly at the different grounds that may be assumed by sinners as the foundation of their hope.

I. Is the penalty of God's law limited in point of duration, so as to do its work, effect its own cure, and expire as fire goes out when the fuel is all consumed, or as animal life becomes extinct when its functions are exhausted by exercise and worn out by age? We think not.

The penalty of God's law is death.—Death was the penal sanction of the first precept given to man. Gen. iii: 17. "In the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." Ezek. xviii: 20. "The soul that sinneth it shall die." Rom. vi: 23. "The wages of sin is death." Rom. viii: 6. "To be carnally minded is death." James i: 15. "Sin when finished bringeth forth death." Now, death, whether natural or moral, must be in its own nature endless. What is death? It is the negation of life, the absence of that life to which it stands opposed. If death is made to consist in moral depravity, it is the negation of that holiness, that conformity to the divine will and likeness, which constitutes moral or spiritual life. If death is made to consist in the dissolution of the body, it is the negation of those vital energies which constitute animal life. When a person dies morally or naturally, it is the principle or power of the opposite life that is overcome; life becomes extinct and death reigns. Now when a person is dead, on this principle, self-resuscitation is utterly impossible, life has become extinct and nothing but death reigns and pervades the whole system; hence death left to the tendency of its own nature must hold on to its subjects with an eternal grasp, unless it be said that death can produce life, or that inertia can produce animation; for as there is nothing but death now pervading the once animated sphere of the fallen, the energies of life can move there no more forever, unless they can spring from death, or out of nothing rise.

It is certain then, so far as moral or spiritual death is concerned, of which this argument is predicated, that persons once dead must remain dead forever, unless God, who said "thou shalt die," speak to the dead and say, thou shalt live, and thereby revoke the sentence of his righteous law.

II. Does the law provide for the remission of it—its own penalty.

This question is answered by St. Paul, Gal. iii: 21, 22. "If there had been a law given which could have given life, verily, righteousness should have been by the law, but the scripture hath concluded all under sin, that the promise, by faith of Jesus Christ, might be given to them that believe."

In this text, the Apostle asserts, in effect, that no law has been given which can give life; hence, the law, which inflicts death, can contain no provisions for the removal of death and the restoration of the dead to life; for in such case the law would give life, which is the point the apostle denies. A law without any penal sanction would be of no force, and might be violated with impunity; and a law, making provision for delivering offenders from its penalty, would be the same, in effect, as a law without any penal sanction; since, in such case, no penalty would take effect; therefore, the idea of a law making provision for delivering offenders from its own penal sanctions, is a solecism.

III. Is pardon, then, to be expected by the prerogative of God? We proceed, to the answer of this question, on the ground that God is immutable, just, wise, and good, which will not be denied by any, who believe in the God of the Bible. These perfections of the divine nature are so many objections to the theory which asserts the pardon of transgressors, by the mere prerogative of God without an atonement.

1. If God be immutable, what he does or sanctions at one time, he must do or sanction at all times, under circumstances involving the same moral principles. God having sanctioned the death of the sinner, by attaching death to his law as a penalty, to counteract it by interposing a pardon would be to act differently at different times, under circumstances which involve the same moral principles, which would clearly imply mutability or change; unless something be urged as the ground of the pardon which renders the case of the offender a different one from what the law contemplates, as is the case, on the supposition that Christ has made an atonement. Taking this view, it must appear that for God to pardon merely by prerogative, not only implies his mutability, but also involves the divine administration in principles which contradict and oppose each other. It makes God say in his law, the soul that sinneth it shall die, and at the same time say, by an act of pardon, the sinner shall not die; both of which cannot be true.

2. Divine justice, on the above principles, must be violated, either in the penalty of death, or else, in the pardon which averts the penalty. The law claims the death of the transgressor; hence, if the law be just, justice claims the death of the offender; and justice as well as law says, the soul that sinneth it shall die. On the other hand, if justice does not claim the death of the offender, the law claims more than justice and must be unjust, and, consequently, God must be unjust; for he could not be just in giving an unjust law. Now as justice claims the death of the sinner, his deliverance by a pardon, founded on mere prerogative, would be a violation of justice; for justice cannot claim the death of a sinner and sanction his life at the same time, all in view of the same moral principles. The conclusion is that if God pardons sinners by mere prerogative, he must have been unjust in sanctioning his law with the penalty of death, or else in the pardon which sets aside a just penalty.

3. If God is all-wise, he must have seen it proper and for the good of the moral system that transgressors should die, or he would never have sanctioned his law with the penalty of death, for God could not be wise in giving to his law a penalty, the execution of which would be improper and opposed to the best interests of his government. Now, if perfect wisdom saw that it would be proper and for the best interests of the moral system that offenders should die, the same perfect wisdom cannot see that it is proper and for the best interests of the moral system that the same offenders should live: It is either proper and for the best interests of the divine government that sinners should die, or it is not; if it is proper and for the best, God would be unwise to pardon them; but if it be not proper and for the best, that sinners should die, God must have been unwise when he gave his law the sanction of death. The conclusion is, that if God pardons offenders by mere prerogative, he must have acted unwisely when he sanctioned his law with the penalty of death, or he acts unwisely when he prevents the execution of such penalty by extending a pardon to the offender.

4. The same mode of reasoning may be employed in relation to the goodness of God, for it must appear obvious to all, that the same goodness which would pardon a sinner to save him from death, which is the penalty of the law, would have withheld such a sanction from the law; or to reverse the order, that goodness which would sanction the law with the penalty of death, would not prevent its execution, but suffer the offender to die. But we forbear to pursue this subject, supposing that enough has been said.

Should it be conjectured that the above reasoning stands opposed to our own views of pardon through the atoning merits of Jesus Christ, we answer, that a pardon upon consideration of an atonement, consisting in a substitute for the sinner's death, involves moral principles very different from a pardon by a prerogative. When the doctrine of pardon is urged on the ground of atonement, it supposes a consideration or reason which the law does not contemplate in the denunciation of its penalty against all offenders; and such new consideration justifies a different procedure in the divine administration. God may say that sinners shall die, in view of the relation which they sustain to the divine government, merely as his creatures in rebellion against his authority, and yet pardon the sinner redeemed by Christ, in whose behalf Christ has offered himself a redemption price, without implying any mutability in God, nor in the principles of his government, but in the sinner, or in the relation which he sustains to the divine administration. Again, God may see it just and wise to condemn to death, sinners unredeemed, or sinners rejecting offered grace through a redeemer, and at the same time see it consistent with justice and wisdom to save redeemed sinners through faith in Jesus Christ.

IV. Can man, then, make an atonement for his own sins? This is impossible, in view of the following facts:—

1. Man has nothing to present, as an atonement, or to render to divine justice as a redemption price, on which the law had not a previous claim. Were man capable of obeying the law, perfectly, from this time forward and forever, and should he do it, it would not atone for his past sins; for all this the law claims without any reference to his past disobedience, and would have claimed, if he had never disobeyed. We have already seen that the law claims man's entire obedience, through the whole period his existence; but if the sinner should, at any time, commence a course of obedience, and pursue it forward, in view of his past disobedience, he could obey God, only during a part of his existence, and hence, must forever come short of answering the claims of the divine law.

2. We maintain that man is a fallen and corrupt being by nature; he is, therefore, incapable of any such obedience without first being redeemed and renewed by grace.

V. There is but one ground of hope more, which has already been anticipated; it is the Gospel plan, pardon through the merits of Christ's death as a sacrifice and atonement for sin. That this is the only way, so far as the Gospel is concerned, is too plain to need proof. The Apostle says of him, Acts iv: 12, "Neither is there salvation in any other: for there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved." But we must leave the more full exhibition of this ground of hope for a future article.

ROME IN RUINS.

FROM THE SPANISH OF QUEVEDO.

Pilgrim! in vain thou seek'st in Rome for Rome!
Alas, the Queen of Nations is no more!
Dust are her towers, that proudly frowned of yore,
And her stern hills themselves have built their tomb.

Where once it reigned, the Palatine in gloom
Lies desolate; and medals, which of old,
Triumphant trophies, power and victory, told,
Mouldered by time, speak only of her doom.

Tiber alone remaining—he whose tide
Circled the royal city, now with tone
Solemn and sad, weeps o'er her hopeless fall.
O Rome! thy grandeur and thy beauty—all
Have passed away—and of thine ancient pride,
That which seemed fugitive survives alone!

FAITH AND GOOD WORKS.

Faith is the link that binds me to my Saviour; good works the link that binds me to my fellow-men. Faith is the light of the soul; love is the mirror in which it is reflected. The mind is the prison of faith; the heavenly rays fall on it, and we call the reflection by the names of 'joy, peace, long suffering, gentleness, goodness, meekness, and temperance.' Faith without works is a vine without grapes; faith without love is the faith of devils. Faith is a fruit tree, and neither oaks or elms, however full of leaf, are accounted such. Without faith it is impossible to please God; without good works, it is impossible to attest its reality before men. Faith is the channel by which all that is pure and angelic is received into the soul; love is the overflowing of that fountain, which gushes out in benevolence and good will to all. Faith sees with the eyes, feels with the heart, and works with the hands of love.

ISLAND OF PATMOS.

This is an Island of the Archipelago, now called Patino, situated on the coast of Natolia, between the isles of Samos and Nicaria. It is twenty miles in circumference; and being one of the most barren heaps of rocks in the Archipelago, it might have continued forever unnoticed, but for the book of Revelation which St. John composed here. A few valleys only are capable of cultivation. It abounds, however with patridges, rabbits, quails, turtles, pigeons and snipes. In the midst of the island is a mountain, terminated by the convent of St. John, which, with its irregular towers and massy appearance, might well be immagined a citadel. The inhabitants of this convent are in reality the sovereigns of the country; but their domains would be insufficient for their maintenance, were it not for the possession of some lands in the neighboring isles, and the certain tribute they derive from the superstition of the Greeks. These monks, called Caloyers, are spread over all Greece. Scarce any of them can read, and yet they understand how far the empire of superstition can extend over ignorant minds. They keep their credulous countrymen in the most absolute subjection. The hermitage of the Apocalypse is situate on the declivity of a mountain between the convent and the port of Scola. It leads to the church of the Apocalypse, which is built against a grotto in the rocks; if we may believe the inhabitants, was the asylum of St. John, during his exile at Patmos. Here, they say, he wrote the book of Revelation; and they pretended to show the very chinks in the rocks, through which the Holy Spirit breathed his inspiration. The fragments of the rocks they affirm to be a certain specific against evil spirits. The Greek monks vend this remedy as well as the absolutions. The women of Patmos are generally pretty, but they disfigure themselves by the excessive use of paint. Long. 26 24 E., lat. 37 24 N.

"A journalist," said the great Napoleon, "is a grumbler, a censurer, a giver of advice, regent of sovereigns, a tutor of nations. Four hostile newspapers are more to be feared than an hundred thousand bayonets."

From the Christian Reflector.

WEEP NOT.

Weep not, when sad distress is nigh,
When bliss and transient pleasures fly;
When earthly blessings droop and fade,
And all is wrapt in sorrow's shade.

Weep not, when death with cruel dart
Pierces some idol of the heart;
When hallowed friendship decks the bier,
When tender love would claim the tear.

Weep not, for as the morning cloud
Doth nature's radiant smile enshroud,
But scatters soon—these gloomy woes
Shall flee, and all be calm repose.

Weep not, for as the floweret fair
Is crushed with winter's blighting air;
Pressed rudely down, it droops its head,
And all its varied hues are fled—

With opening spring its bloom revives;
Again the beauteous floweret lives;
Thus, when life's wintry storms are o'er,
The friend revives, to die no more.

THE CHRISTIAN-BUTCHERING CHRISTIAN.

"Persons who have nice scruples about religion, have no business in the army."

Duke of Wellington.

We trust that few can be found in this enlightened age disposed to dissent from this sentiment of the Hero of Waterloo. What business a follower of the meek and lowly Jesus can have in the army, is a question which has troubled, for centuries, the darkened understanding of the heathen world. To them—poor pagans!—and to all the beings that look down with pity and wonder upon the terrestial scene, a field of battle, where Christians meet and mingle in savage butchery, has been the most unaccountable phenomenon in the moral world. In what state of sentiment the love-breathing religion of the gospel exists in the heart of a Christian, while, with his eyes glaring like a tiger, he is pushing his bayonet through the body of another Christian, or stamping him, breathing, into a jelly beneath his horse's hoofs, is a problem which no moral physiologist has ever solved. We know there are some insects, reptiles, and quadrupeds, which after a long winter of suspended animation, resume, or assume, under the breath of Spring, a new and vigorous existence. But during this long interregnum of death, they retain no characteristic of their several natures. Nothing but their cold and lifeless forms ascertains to you that they were once flies, snakes, or mice. Through all this period they assume no new qualities. They sleep and awake, live and die, immutable and unchanged in their natures. If the Christian warrior could take advantage of a state analagous to this condition, the vital principle of religion might, perhaps, be perpetuated in his heart through a long winter of suspended animation. But here is a difficult defect of parity in the two cases. While training for the profession of man-butcher, and engaged in its ferocious and half-cannibal duties, he is compelled to sweep his heart clean of any vestige of humanity, and take unto himself "seven other spirits," as unlike the spirit of Christ—the vine of which he purports to be a branch—as any that ever fell out of heaven and kindled the fires of the infernal pit with the burning intensity of their malice.

In the first place, the oath that he takes to violate every law of God, at the command of his commanding officer, is all that Satan ever asked of the rebel angels, with whom he assayed to dethrone the Almighty. And in complying with that oath, and the fiendish service it involves, history, in seeking the most expressive terms of eulogy of the conduct of Christian armies on the field of battle; has described them as fighting not only like tigers, lions and hyeanas, but like devils! This is a just discrimination. To say that Christians ever fought like tigers and lions, is a libel upon those carnivorous beasts. In the most insane ferocity of those calumniated animals, they generally fight for food; as well as vultures and other birds of prey. It would mitigate the bloody occupation of the Christian man-butcher, if he could proffer the same excuse, and say that he fought as a cannibal. His inhuman work would then be slightly relieved by the plea of necessity and his character as a beast. In such a character only can the Christian fight like a lion or tiger. But as an intellectual and moral being, if he fights at all, he must fight like a devil. If he could destroy his fellow-beings with fire and sword; if he could take up little infants on the point of his bayonet and roast them in the flames "at the word of command;" if on his furious steed he could ride down the new-widowed mother, as she fled throw the crimsoned snow with her babe on her breast; if he could chase old age and infancy into the house of God and fire it over their heads; if he could do all this—and to do it is the bond—with no worse appetites and passions in his heart than those which stimulate the most ferocious beasts of prey, he might still retain the dignity of fighting like a lion or tiger. If he could do it in cold blood, without an angry emotion stirring in his bosom, the world, with united voice, would denounce him as an irrational monster, below the lowest of the brute creation—a murdering automation, a human butchering machine, wound up and set a going by "a superior officer." But if he must do it as an intellectual and moral being, possessing a moral conscience, and in face of all the laws, attributes, and revelations of God; if he may not do it as a carnivorous beast, a cannibal, or a soulless, cast-iron machine, then must he fight like a devil, invested with the chiefest attributes of that character. He must do it with those malignant passions burning in his heart, which make a devil,—which, set on fire in a mass, make hell in any part of the universe.

E. B.

"Bearing Precious Seed."—I have heard, says one, in substance, of seeds which will sleep in the earth for ages, and I have read of the young of certain insects, which lie in a state of death for eighty years together, and yet when the hand that scattered the seed has been long mingled with the dust, and when the insect that has deposited its young had ended its flight for generations, the seed would come forth and form a forest of mighty trees, and the slumbering insect would awake to life, and become the mother of an endless multitude.

And so it may be with us. We are scattering the seeds of knowledge, virtue, piety, and immortality, but we may not see the seed at once spring forth. Our instructions may seem to be forgotten; the fruits of our liberality may seem to have perished; and our labors to have been in vain. But no; the seed is still undecayed, and the time will come, when it shall spring forth, and yield a glorious harvest. And he that soweth and he that reapeth shall yet rejoice together.

What have I done that I should be used so?—said a forlorn woman, whose appearance gave every assurance of poverty and suffering, while she covered her eye, no longer capable of shedding tears. The fountain was dried up.

"Used how!" I asked.

'He'—pointing to a rumseller living in Chesnut street—'he took my husband, a faithful man as ever wedded woman, got all his money, burned up his heart, ruined his body, palsied his tongue; and sent him home to inflict on me, with the curses which overhung his own guilty head, and on his family, shame, that neither toils nor tears can wipe away; and now that husband is in the grave, with no one to weep for him, no one to console his wife and children.

"My son caught the spirit and followed the example of his father; was enticed by the same rumseller; and drained all he could earn or supply, till he came back upon me not a son but a bloated carcass, quickened with the spirit of a fiend, and has ended his career not in death, but in a crime, at the thought of which I cannot hold up my head; widowed, childless, and old! Oh God, what have I done that I should be used so?"

Our heart melted over the picture of wo, as we exclaimed, "God will not allow the cry of the widow to go unheard, or her cause to go unavenged."

Alas! for the man whose business calls him to such a responsibility.

[Philadelphia paper.

A Thrilling Scene.—In Frankfort, on the banks of the Penobscot, in Maine, a gentleman lost his wife by death. Three days after her interment he had some business with a young physician of that town. Calling at his house, he was informed that the doctor had gone out, but would soon return. He concluded to wait, and to pass the time more agreeably, as he thought, went into the young physician's Studio, and there he found a student with a scalpel in hand in the act of dissecting a dead body. He started back at first view, as people generally do when suddenly coming into the presence of the dead. Recovering from his surprise, he stepped towards the corpse which the student was cutting, and horrors of horrors, found the dead body to be that of his wife; buried three days before. His feelings may be imagined, but cannot be described. The husband immediately took legal measures against both student and doctor. They were examined and bound over to answer for the crime of carrying away and dissecting dead bodies.

Out and In.—A Frenchman who was traveling in a canal boat was about passing under a bridge. The Captain shouted "Look out!" to the passengers at the top of his voice. The Frenchman understood him literally, and poked his head up out of the cabin. He received a severe bump upon the forehead which knocked him sprawling upon the floor. He jumped up in a great rage, scratched his head and addressed the Captain in the most indignant style, "Sare! what yon say 'Look out' for! Why you not say 'Look in!'"

Evening Hymn.

BY WILLIAM BLAKE.

I know, when I lie down to sleep,
The Lord is near my bed;
That angels watch, by his command,
Around my infant head.

I know, when I kneel down to pray,
That still the Lord is there,
He hears my words, he sees my thoughts,
And listens to my prayer.

I know, when I go forth to play,
The Lord is by my side;
Through every hour, at every step,
He is my guard and guide.

I know his eye sees every thing
In earth and sea and air;
That he in darkness, as in light,
Can see me everywhere.

Then let me guard each thought, each word,
Lest he should chance to find,
Evil within a heart that should
Be gentle, meek, and kind.

FRIEND AFTER FRIEND DEPARTS.

BY MONTGOMERY.

Friend after friend departs;
Who hath not lost a friend?
There is no union here of hearts
That finds not here an end!
Were this frail world our final rest,
Living or dying none were blest.

Beyond the flight of time,—
Beyond the reign of death,—
There surely is some blessed clime
Where life is not a breath;
Nor life's affections transient fire,
Whose sparks fly upwards and expire.

There is a world above,
Where parting is unknown;
A long eternity of love,
Form'd for the good alone:
And faith beholds the dying here
Translated to that glorious sphere!

Thus star by star declines,
Till all are past away,
As morning high and higher shines
To pure and perfect day:
Nor sink those stars in empty night
But hide themselves in heaven's own light.

The Sabbath Recorder.

EDITED BY GEORGE B. UTTER. "THE SEVENTH DAY IS THE SABBATH OF THE LORD THY GOD." PUBLISHED AT NO. 9 SPRUCE STREET.

VOL. I. NEW-YORK, FIFTH DAY, JUNE 19, 1845. NO. 52.

For the Recorder.

THOUGHTS ON THE PERPETUITY OF THE SABBATH.

NUMBER NINETEEN.

The Fourth Commandment is so expressed as not to admit of any change in the Day without altering the nature of the Institution.

"It is the Sabbath, not the seventh day, which we are to remember," say our first-day brethren; "Sabbath means rest; it was the Sabbath which was hallowed and blessed, and not the seventh day; so that the holy rest is one thing, and the day on which we are to rest quite another thing."

Doubtless to those whose prepossessions are all in favor of the first day, this appears a plausible argument. But to me it appears as sophistical as any argument I ever met with. It first perverts the meaning of the word Sabbath; wrests it from its connection with the word day; casts out of the commandment the numerical adjective seventh; and so transposes the word Sabbath, that instead of its being a participial adverb qualifying day, it becomes a noun, signifying another thing altogether! What less is this than loving and making a lie?

The fourth commandment says, "THE SEVENTH DAY IS THE SABBATH of the Lord thy God." It also says, "The Lord blessed THE SABBATH DAY and hallowed IT." And it tells the reason, "For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day." It no where says that God blessed man's resting the seventh day, nor that he blessed the day because man rested thereon. But it says, he blessed and hallowed the seventh day, because HE, God, rested thereon. It is plainly then a commemorative day, and is to be kept as such. Hence the commandment says, "Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy;" and in Isaiah 56: 2, the Lord says, "Blessed is the man that doeth this, and the son of man that layeth hold on it; that keepeth the Sabbath from polluting it, and keepeth his hand from doing any evil." The reason then why God blessed the Sabbath day was, as stated in the commandment, that it was the day of HIS rest; the reason why he pronounced a blessing upon the observers of the Sabbath was, as stated in Isaiah 56: 2, because "they kept the Sabbath from polluting it, to serve him, to love the name of the Lord, to be his servants." God pleads for his holy day on principles very different from those on which many of our first-day brethren plead for it. These plead for it on the ground of its utility and expediency; He for his own honor, that its observance should be an expression of love to the Lord, and of service to him. To observe it on any other consideration than what is contained in the fourth commandment, is not obeying the Lord. To keep any other day than the seventh day, is not keeping the fourth commandment, because that commandment specifies the seventh day, and the seventh day only; and no other day can answer the end of the institution, nor agree with the reason given for its enactment. Now suppose we substitute the first for the seventh, and then see its absurdity: "Remember the first day, to keep it holy; six days shalt thou labor and do all thy work; but the first day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God. For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea and all that in them is, and rested the first day." Here we should have God working and sabbatizing at the same time, on the same day, and that day at the beginning rather than the close of his work. Besides this absurdity, it makes the fourth commandment tell a lie. The first day is not the Sabbath of the Lord. It is the Romanized Christian Sabbath. God has no where called it His Sabbath, as our first-day brethren know very well, for they say they keep it in honor of another and greater event than that of God's sabbatizing after the work of creation. But this they never learned of Jesus Christ, whom they thus profess to honor, while they cast dishonor upon God's holy institution; for Jesus Christ proves his power to forgive sins, i. e. to redeem men, by his having power to heal the sick. See Matt. 9: 5. The argument, then, from the supposition that redemption is a greater work than creation receives no countenance from the Scriptures. Both works required a God to plan and execute them, and no man can safely assert that to redeem is a greater work than to create that which needs redemption.

—But when every other argument fails, it is common for the advocates for the first day to say, "We do not know certainly that any body keeps the seventh day; or that any body knows when that day is!" I have repeatedly heard sceptics say, "I do not know but that the Bible has been altered, it has passed through so many hands." But I never knew a devout Chrisitan who had not an answer to such surmises always at hand. It is so with those who love the Sabbath of the Lord. If there were any difficulty in this matter, it would lie as much against the observance of the Sabbath by the Jews in our Saviour's time, as against us at this day; for no one ever pretends that the knowledge of the first day of the week has been lost since his resurrection. But what a sad reflection this objection throws upon the great Jehovah! He has given a law, with awful threatenings, and glorious promises. Yet no one is able to tell whether it can be literally kept or not! God knows when it is, and has taken care to give the means of knowing to all who have a mind to do his will. He has raised it so high, that there is no other monument of antiquity so ancient and conspicuous as his holy Sabbath. When he created the sun and moon, he said they should be for times and for seasons. When he created the heavens and the earth, the sea and all that in them is, he numbered each day at the close of the light thereof; so that no man needs a clock or any other time-keeping machine, to know when Sabbath time begins or ends. A fair day or a cloudy one, at the equator or at the poles, it is all one; the great natural divisions of time are all marked, and cannot be altered. Jehovah has bound himself in a perpetual covenant that they shall continue to the end of time, saying, "While the earth remaineth seed time and harvest, cold and heat, summer and winter, day and night, shall not cease."

Not only does God know the times he hath appointed, but he has set up way-marks through all ages to perpetuate the knowledge of his appointments to all generations. 1. Methuselah was contemporary with Adam and Noah. 2. Shem with Noah and Abraham. 3. Isaac with Abraham and Joseph. 4. Amram with Joseph and Moses. Thus four illustrious individuals form the link of the first three thousand years of the world's history! At the giving of the manna, Moses, under God's direction, says, "To-morrow is the rest of the holy Sabbath unto the Lord." And God confirmed his words by withholding manna between the close of the sixth day and the close of the seventh. For forty years this weekly miracle was continued before three millions of living witnesses. Not for Israel's sake alone did the Lord do this; "but I wrought for my name's sake, that it should not be polluted before the heathen, among whom they were, in whose sight I made myself known unto them in bringing them, forth out of the land of Egypt." Thus Israel was set among the nations for a light of them that sat in darkness. And to this day they are a monument of God's truth to all nations, just as Moses predicted they should be. They are a monument raised up of God to witness for his holy law, the shadow of which reacheth to the ends of the earth, and none can pluck it up. While God is God it will be impossible for the knowledge of his holy Sabbath time to be lost to the end of the world.

But says Doddridge, and ten thousand others who have been deceived by the great Mystery of Iniquity, "We cannot all keep the seventh day, beginning and ending at the same instant of time, in all parts of the earth." Astonishing discovery, and overwhelming argument! But who ever required this at their hands? God's law does not. The seventh day does not occur at the same instant of time in all parts of the earth. We know, however, where time began, and where the law was given; and whether we travel eastward or westward, we shall find Jews and other nations have the Sabbath, the seventh day, reckoned from the longitude of Palestine. There is, therefore, no difficulty whatever in ascertaining when God's holy Sabbath time begins and ends. When I have been repeatedly asked how I could keep the seventh day if I had sailed round the world, I have answered, that I would set my reckoning right when I found it was wrong. Sailors, I believe, never lose a day's wages by sailing round the world westward, nor gain one by sailing round the world eastward. The reason, I suppose, is that they never reckon more than 180 degrees of longitude; consequently they can never vary more than twelve hours time from any given place. They may have one day including by clock time thirty-six hours, or only twelve; one that may include two sunrisings or two sunsettings; but never eight days to a week.

Suppose two ships bound for Canton should sail from Boston at noon, June 1st, keep their time (as all mariners do) by the meridians or noon of the place where they are either sailing or lying, and both perform the voyage in 150 days, or meridians. If the ship Adolphos takes the western course round Cape Horn, and the ship Belus the eastern course by the Cape Good Hope, the following curious circumstances will occur. When the A. is at Otaheite, and the B. at Cape Good Hope, they would each be 90 degrees from Boston and Canton, and 180 degrees from each other, and the time of each would vary six hours from Boston time, and twelve hours from each other. That is, suppose the eastings and westings happen on the same day that half their voyage is performed, it is noon at Boston August 24th, while on board the A. it is six o'clock in the morning, and on board the B. it is six o'clock in the evening, by their time. But if they have a good chronometer on board, they will see at once that it is noon by clock time and at Boston. Pursuing their voyages, the B. arrives at Canton at midnight November 3d, and the A. arrives at the same port at midnight November 4th by Boston or clock time. By the reckoning of each ship it is noon November 4th, but the B. arrived one meridian earlier than the A. What then is the real solar time? The course of time is with the sun westward; consequently, although it is midnight at Boston, and the Sabbath is over, it is Sabbath noon November 4th at Canton. The crew of the B. understood this, and adjusting their time to that meridian, they commenced keeping Sabbath in port, after sundown; and the crew of the A., following their reckoning, commenced keeping the Sabbath at sea at sundown too, and thus they close it together. The only difference is, that the A.'s days have been a little longer than at Boston, and the B.'s a little shorter, which she has to make up by adding twelve hours clock time to her reckoning. On their return, the same difference will occur again, but reversed from one ship to the other. If they go round the world, and each ship returns the way the other went, the difference will the same, for there being but 180 degrees of longitude east or west, they must commence a new reckoning when they pass from east to west or west to east; consequently they are never more than 12 hours from the true time of any given place. It is all deception, then, to talk of losing the Sabbath time. Sailors have no six-day nor eight-day weeks, although they may be twelve hours longer or shorter by clock time at any given place. I have never yet heard it pretended, that the Jews of Asia keep one seventh day on the 3d of a given month, and the Jews of America another on the 4th of the same month. If the inhabitants of Pitcairn's Island were found observing the seventh day for the first day, it must have originated in their want of distinguishing between solar and clock time, and regulating their reckoning to the natural course of time, from east to west, which was very likely to have been the case with men in their station of life. They were common sailors who had mutinied against the officers of the ship, and having either killed or set them all adrift, they were not likely to have much science in their future reckoning.

These facts present insurmountable obstacles to that system which advocates the seventh portion of time for a Sabbath. It can never be exactly rendered as it is too difficult to ascertain under all circumstances by the different classes of persons affected by it. But the law of God says, "the seventh day," which can always be ascertained, although the week should have a day in it as long as that was when the sun and the moon stood still for Joshua in the valley of Ajalon; or although there be one like that day when the sun went backward ten degrees on the sundial of Ahaz. It is all in one week, and the seventh day is the last day. God's ways are perfect; nothing can be added to them, nothing taken from them, without marring their beauty and design. S. D.

I WILL PRAISE THEE.

BY CAROLINE FRY.

For what shall I praise thee, my God, and my King?
For what blessings the tribute of gratitude bring?
Shall I praise thee for pleasure, for health, or for ease,
For the sunshine of youth, for the garden of peace?

Shall I praise thee for flowers that bloomed on my breast?
For joys in perspective, and pleasure possessed?
For the spirits that brightened my days of delight?
For the slumbers that sat on my pillow by night?

For this should I thank thee: but if only for this,
I should leave half untold the donation of bliss;
I thank thee for sickness, for sorrow, for care,
For the thorns I have gathered, the anguish I share,
For nights of anxiety, watchings and tears,
A present of pain, a perspective of fears;
I thank thee, I bless thee, my King and my God,
For the good and the evil thy hand hath bestowed—
The flowers were sweet, but their fragrance is flown,
They yielded no fruit, they are withered and gone!
The thorn, it was poignant, but precious to me,
'Twas the message of mercy, it led me to thee!

A DAY'S EXCURSION.

Were New York a walled city, supplied with gates through which egress was made difficult, the changing seasons might afford little variety to most of its inhabitants, save a change of temperature. City and country, however, are in close contiguity even upon this narrow island, populated as it is with more than three hundred thousand souls.

Wishing to enjoy the cool breeze, and breathe the fresh air away from the dust and noise of a city street, we this morning accepted an invitation to accompany a friend to the Lunatic Asylum—an institution at Bloomingdale, some six miles distant. A year or two had passed since our last excursion in this direction, during which time the suburbs of the city had become so changed, that scarce any thing looked familiar. New dwellings were every where erected, or going up—new streets leveled and paved, and new public or private edifices, designed to last for ages, were scattered here and there, giving variety and beauty to the extended landscape. A little farther on were hills and valleys, fields and trees, left unscathed by man's device. Flowers were blooming, meadows waving, and Nature's own handiwork looked as we were wont to see it in the halcyon days of childhood.—Thought threw off its shackles, and soared away like a bird let loose. What so delightful as to see God in his works, where sin has cast no blight—to recognize a Father's hand in the green sward, the flowing stream, and the thousand nameless forms of beauty that grace the early spring. Who that loves to commune with Nature, does not perceive superior charms in rural sights like these?

Our ride terminated too soon. Ere we were aware, the vehicle entered the beautiful enclosure surrounding a stately mansion where 129 fellow immortals, deprived of reason, were measuring out their weary days. We alighted, and after exchanging civilities with the matron, were favored with an interview with the Superintendent and resident physician, Doct. Earle, who kindly permitted us to pass through the establishment, and converse with the patients as far as practicable. This we regarded as a special favor, knowing that strangers were not usually thus privileged.

What we saw and heard was painfully interesting.—The establishment throughout appeared in the most perfect order, and nothing seemed wanting externally to promote the greatest comfort of the inmates. Their excellent physician is manifestly a man of refined sympathies and quick discernment. As he passed from room to room he met each with a dignified urbanity of manner, and the response given to his salutations evinced how fully he shared the confidence of his numerous patients. All were sane on some subjects, while they lived only in an ideal world respecting others. Some with whom we conversed, supposed themselves the victims of wrong inflicted by imagined foes, and complained bitterly of their confinement—others affirmed that they were there from choice—had the control of matters—were persons of special consequence, etc. One who through early life had read almost incessantly, especially works of fiction, had become so changed, that she could scarce be recognized as her former self. The winning manners, intelligent expression, beautiful countenance—in a word, all that can render youth lovely and attractive, were sadly changed—and the wreck of reason was exhibited in all her actions.

To one whose speaking countenance indicated strong emotions, and keen mental suffering, we said, soothingly, "You have a pleasant home here, and much to make you happy." "Ah," she replied, "but it's a sad place to those who have been brought here bereft of reason, when they come to themselves enough to know the cause." Her eyes filled with tears as she continued, "I have my reason now, but six weeks since I had not, and I did things so dreadful that I tremble to think of them." She became much agitated, and understanding by a half uttered suggestion from our attendant, that it would be unwise to elicit farther remark, we turned away, and when beyond her hearing, were informed that but six weeks since, in a fit of insanity she had murdered her father, purposing at the same time to kill her mother and then herself. The reason she assigned in her delirium for thus attempting the lives of her parents, was, that as she was going to take her own life, theirs might better be taken first, so that they would not feel bad! Dr. E— said her reason appeared to be nearly restored, but they thought best, as much as possible, to prevent her dwelling upon the past.

Another patient whose case excited our interest, was a very old lady of dignified appearance, who is a relative of Washington. Her resemblance to the honored Father of our country, was strongly marked. She had been here several years—was now sufficiently rational to converse somewhat intelligently, and placing her arm in ours, she accompanied us with feeble step through the spacious hall, seemingly much gratified with being kindly noticed. We looked upon her as a relic of other years—a reminiscence of the far dark past—and a glance at the great interests that had once absorbed the minds of her kindred, now known but in history, and seen but in their glorious issues, brought to mind the lines—

> "Earth's scenes are passing all—its hopes, fears, joys,
> Flit like a sun-beam o'er the shaded plain—
> Man in his best estate fades as the flower,
> His deeds with their results alone survive—
> But if his having lived makes others blest,
> Then has he lived for high and holy ends."

One of the Halls of the male department appeared more like a reading room than like a Lunatic Asylum—the men were chiefly occupied with books or the morning papers—and one old gentleman began to talk politics to us with great good nature. This Hall is furnished with a good library of some five hundred volumes—also with periodicals, newspapers, and reviews, all of which are regularly read by many of the patients. We were also informed that Divine worship is attended statedly on Sunday, and regarded as highly beneficial in its effects. The strictly humane system of discipline, and none other, is adopted in this Asylum, and the law of kindness is found to effect far more in the management of the insane, than stripes, dungeons, and strait-jackets. Recreation and amusement of various kinds are provided, and the neighborhood of the Asylum affords a diversity of cultivated scenery surpassingly beautiful. Though the sight of mind in ruins must ever awaken the deepest sympathy of those who have hearts to feel for human suffering, yet it is truly pleasant to contemplate the many advantages enjoyed here for the mitigation and relief of mental diseases, compared with the treatment adopted in former years.

This Asylum was erected at an expense of near two hundred thousand dollars, and first opened in June, 1821. It has since received two thousand eight hundred and seventy-five patients, of whom one thousand three hundred and fifty-four have been cured. The causes of insanity as given in the statistical table, of their published reports, are various—but among them intemperance and licentiousness have contributed their full quota. In our judgment, a proper physical education, and right moral training from infancy to manhood would have diminished the aggregate number some 90 per cent, and when the time shall come that fathers and mothers understand their high mission, and meet its sacred responsibilities, then will a generation bless the world with sound minds in sound bodies, and instances of insanity will be of rare occurrence. But that time is not now, and taking things as they are, there is abundant cause to be thankful to God and to man for the existence of well-conducted Asylums.

The "Leake and Watts' Orphan House," a new and admirably finished institution for orphans, erected by the munificent charity of those whose name it bears, is but a few rods from the Insane Asylum. Taking this in our way, we found its kind matron a friend of the sainted Prior, and while passing through its spacious apartments, our hearts were made glad in view of the prospective benefits it is destined to confer upon the homeless child of want. Fifty-nine boys, from three to twelve years of age, are the present inmates; but its doors are open for any number of a given age for whom application may be made.

In the Orphan Asylum, three miles nearer the city, founded near forty years since by the faith and prayer and indefatigable labors of the well-known Isabella Graham, and her honored associates, we found one hundred and fifty children, under the care of a competent and devoted superintendant, matron and teachers. The portrait of Mrs. G., with a face beaming with benevolence, hung in the common parlor, and while we looked at the happy countenances of the bereaved ones congregated there, it was pleasant to contemplate the character of their gifted benefactress, and the reward she is now reaping in the New Jerusalem.

> "Deeds of good men all remind us,
> We may make our lives sublime,
> And departing, leave behind us,
> Foot-prints in the sands of time."

[Adv. Moral Ref.

THE UNFORGIVING CHRISTIAN.

"She is a very excellent lady, but she will never forgive you if you once displease her." These were the words of a Christian brother to us, while speaking of an estimable and religious lady, whose virtues we were well acquainted with. In kindness and benevolence to the poor, few equalled her; in punctuality at church and conference meetings, her place was always filled save when prevented by illness; in fervidness of religious feeling and warmth of religious devotion, she was an example to all her sisters in the church. She was a woman of high mental cultivation; affable in her manners, and possessed of good native understanding. No one, unless most intimately acquainted with her, could have suspected her of an unforgiving temper. But as we thought of all her excellencies, the words of our friend, "She will never forgive you," rushed through our mind.

"Is it possible," thought we, "that she can be a Christian?" We recalled the words of Christ, "If ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your father forgive your trespasses." Perhaps, then, this lady has a long catalogue of sins, which her heavenly father has never forgiven. If so, of what avail will it be that all her friends think her a Christian. She may deceive herself, also; her good deeds and her deep sympathy with Christians and with the church, her inward glow of piety, may all lead her to a false estimate of herself as she appears in the sight of God. She is an unforgiving Christian! Can there be such a Christian?

We mused over this thought. An unforgiving Christian. Can we call such a being a Christian? We may apply the name, as we do to nations. The church may honor such with the title. But of what worth is the name, if our Father in heaven forgives us not our trespasses? The name and the reputation will do us little good, when we appear before our final Judge with trespasses unpardoned, and simply because we do not forgive those who trespassed against us.

How much religion we have among us; but, alas! how little piety. It is fashionable, to some extent, to belong to the church; and then, if our lives be not scandalous, we are good Christians. The most exalted Christian virtues, brotherly love, forgiveness of our enemies, charity and kindness to our erring brethren, these are too much overlooked. In the religious activity of the age, these quiet and unobtrusive but decisive evidences of true piety pass unobserved. If we join voluntary associations for benevolence and reform, advocate their claims with zeal, and support them generously with our money, we are never troubled with doubts of our piety. We have not time to examine our hearts; but as everybody acknowledges us to be Christians, we believe that we are such.

Forgiveness of our enemies? We might write a homily upon these words. How much it implies! Who are our enemies? All who are not our friends. All who would injure us. Do we forgive or forget the wrongs which they have done us? A fellow-Christian has done something to injure us. Some brethren believe us incapacitated for the office we hold, and try to effect our removal—perhaps wrongly. Do we forgive them? Do we pray for them? Or do we seek to undermine and destroy their influence? A neighbor has apparently slighted us—what are our feelings?

Christian! perhaps you have neglected forgiving those who would wrong you. Think of it! This may be the point on which your eternal salvation hinges. All that may be charged against him is an unforgiving temper. Because you would not forgive, God will not forgive you. Christian Watchman.

TO AN ABSENT BROTHER.

BY AN ORPHAN.

Would thou wert here, my brother! Would that fate
Had not presum'd to part what God had joined!
—Cast early on the bosom of the world,
To nourish on its friendlessness—to share
Alike the scorn, contempt, and chilling words,
It ever pours upon defenceless ones,
Our sympathies were mutual—our hopes
Identical—our interests one. Our hearts
Were linked by ties as strong as bind to life.
—Thy joy and grief were mine, and mine were thine.
The blessed Saviour better knew the ills,
And sore temptations, incident to man,
For having been a man and felt the same;
[illegible]
What only thou hast shar'd—thy brother's lot!
Yet we on earth may meet no more—no more
Hold converse sweet, and mutual love express.
But—peace, my heart—there's yet another world
Where kindred souls part not, nor sigh, nor mourn,
O'er blighted hopes, and friendship's sever'd ties;
For that bless'd world let's steer, and stand our watch,
'Till anchor'd both within the veil, we meet,
To love and praise around our Father's throne.

FOR WHAT IS A MOTHER RESPONSIBLE.

A mother is usually also a wife, and has the management of a family and a direct influence and control over those within her appropriate sphere. She, in subordination of course to her head, has the seat of authority, and wields the sceptre of government. From a position of entire dependence she has risen to power and rank; and though her throne may be in a cottage, and her dominion the little world of household affairs, yet is she not the less really responsible, than is that youthful queen who now sways a sceptre over the four quarters of the earth. But for what is she responsible?

She is responsible for the nursing and rearing of her progeny; for their physical constitution and growth; their exercise and proper sustenance in early life. A child left to grow up deformed, bloated, or meagre, is an object of maternal negligence.

She is responsible for a child's habits; including cleanliness, order, conversation, eating, sleeping, manners and general propriety of behavior. A child deficient or untaught in these particulars, will prove a living monument of parental disregard; because, generally speaking, a mother can, if she will, greatly control children in all these matters.

She is responsible for their deportment. She can make them fearful or cringing; she can make them modest or impertinent; ingenuous or deceitful; mean or manly; clownish or polite. The germ of all these things is in childhood, and a mother can repress or bring them forth.

She is responsible for the principles which her children entertain in early life. For her it is to say whether those who go forth from her fireside shall be imbued with sentiments of virtue, truth, honor, honesty, temperance, industry, benevolence, and morality;—or those of a contrary character, vice, fraud, drunkenness, idleness, extravagance, and covetousness. These last will be found to be of the most natural growth; but on her is devolved the daily, hourly task of weeding her little garden, of eradicating these odious productions, and planting the human heart with the lily, the rose, and the amaranth, that fadeless flower, emblem of truth.

She is to a considerable extent responsible for the temper and disposition of her children. Constitutionally they may be violent, irritable, or revengeful; but for the regulation or correction of these passions a mother is responsible.

She is responsible for the intellectual acquirements of her children; that is, she is bound to do what she can for this object. Schools, academies, and colleges open their portals throughout our land; and every mother is under heavy responsiblities to see that her sons and daughters have all the benefits which these afford, and which their circumstances will permit them to enjoy.

She is responsible for their religious education. The beginning of all wisdom is the fear of God; and this every mother must teach. Reverence for God, acquaintance with His word, respect for the duties and ordinances of religion, are within the ability of every parent to implant; and if children grow up ignorant or regardless of the Bible and the Saviour, what mother, when she considers the wickedness of the human heart, can expect them to rise up and call her blessed.—Mother's Jour.

ROBBING GOD.

'Only see mother, what nice sweetmeats I have got, and now I am going to eat them. How good they will taste.'

'I am sorry you spent your money in this manner, my daughter. It is wrong. Such articles are injurious to health; and in using them you are guilty of robbing God.'

'Mother, how can you say that? I did not take them without paying for them, and my money is my own, I am sure.'

'It is your own as it regards any one else. But as it regards God, it is not your own. It is his, and his alone.—Whatever we have is given to us of God to use for his glory. You know I hire Amelia to do house work and sew and take care of the children. I entrust to her care articles of clothing, provisions, furniture, and sometimes I leave her to take care of you and Georgianna. How should she regard all these, as mine or as her own?'

'As yours, mother; you pay her for her work, and she ought to use all these things for you and not for herself.'

'Very well. But suppose she should regard them as for her own personal benefit. What should you think of that?'

'I know very well that it would be robbing you, mother.'

'Yes, and whatever God gives us, it is to use for his glory, and if we waste or squander it, or use it for any thing which is not in accordance with his will, we are guilty of robbing him. If you waste, or unnecessarily expend your money, your time or your influence, you take what belongs to God, and are thus guilty of robbery.'

'Well, mother, I will try do right, for I am not willing to be guilty of the sin of robbing God."

'Very well; try to do right, but remember you cannot do anything in your own strength, but must look to God to work in you, my daughter; and remember that none can be accepted of God, none can enter heaven, can be fit to live or die, but those who make an entire surrender of all to him.' R. E.

EXERCISE FOR THE YOUNG.—Action is a law of our being. Seasonable well graduated exercise is highly promotive of health, and as regards the young, can never be dispensed with without engendering the most serious evils. The parent, therefore, who restricts, unduly, that rational exuberance of animal spirits which vents itself in action—wild, free, graceful action, and circumscribes the sports of his child to the juvenile and tawdry engrossments of the kitchen, nursery and parlor, violates an important and essential law of nature. Let them out into the glad sunshine, where the bland airs of nature will enamel their young cheeks with the carmine of rosy and vigorous health, and where the great influences of creation operating through the intellectual, will tend to energize and develope the physical powers.

NEW YORK, JUNE 19, 1845.

THE LEARNING OF THE MINISTRY.

We have often been pained with the views which we have heard expressed respecting the amount of learning necessary for a Christian minister, and the value of such learning to him. There are many who seem to think a minister so entirely under the influences of the Holy Spirit, that he needs not the aid of human instruction or close personal application. They forget, that a sound judgment and a warm heart, though they are the gifts of God, and most important qualifications for the ministry, may yet need cultivation and improvement to enable a minister to reason with clearness and persuade with energy. Of course, forgetting this, they discourage thorough preparation for the work, if they do not actually encourage indolence in it.

But though this prejudice against human learning is wholly groundless, there are some things to be said in excuse for it. Good people there are, undoubtedly, who think of divine and human learning as directly opposed to each other; and having read of the oppositions of science falsely so called to the Gospel, they are afraid of science truly so called. But such persons would find, upon a thorough examination of the subject, that true science and sound philosophy, instead of casting a shade over Christianity or weakening its foundations, really contribute not a little to illustrate and confirm it. Profane history, candidly considered, confirms the history of the sacred volume; and a careful observation of human nature, establishes the words of Scripture in regard to it. Allowing such to be the case, the prejudice of which we are speaking is wholly groundless, and ought in consistency to be rejected.

Again, we are told, that human learning encourages vanity and pride. If this were really true, it would be a good ground of objection to it. One would naturally suppose, however, that an acquaintance with the history of the world and the laws by which it is governed, would serve to humble rather than to exalt men. It is true, that there is a semblance of knowledge which sometimes puffs up, and against which the apostle warns Christians. But the nearer men approach to the summit of knowledge, the more clearly do they discern their own follies and mistakes, and their need of a humble and inquiring mind. It has been precisely thus with some of the most eminent personages mentioned in sacred and profane history; and we believe it will be so generally, with those who have the reality rather than the show of learning. When it is not so, there is reason to doubt the pretensions of the vain boaster. He has abused a rich gift of God, and has incurred an awful responsibility. For our own part, we should as soon think of refusing food because there are gluttons in the world, or of rejecting the grace of God because some have turned it into lasciviousness, as of opposing ministerial education because some who profess to be learned have been vainly puffed up.

There is a third objection, however, which has greater plausibility, and deserves a candid answer, viz. that many ministers who have had but little learning have been very useful, and therefore ordinary ministers may do without learning. This is true to a certain extent, and should make us careful about laying down precise rules to which all must conform. There are many men whose minds have become disciplined, and whose judgments have become matured, by observation rather than by study, and who are not, therefore, accounted learned men. There are others who have had few literary advantages, but great experience in divine things, which qualifies them to speak effectually and to edification. Both these classes may be very useful laborers in the vineyard of the Lord, and should be welcomed to its toils and rewards. But can we suppose, that these men have accomplished all which a thorough training would have enabled them to accomplish, or that it would be best for all other ministers to follow their example? Surely not. We believe it will generally be found, that such men are the first to deprecate their own want of learning, and to urge those who have it in their power, to avail themselves of the advantages of a thorough education. They have seen its usefulness in the fact that most of those who have exerted a lasting and valuable reformatory influence have been educated men; they have felt the need of education in their own case; and hence they urge others not to neglect it.

As to the question what sort of learning is necessary for a minister, there may be some difference of opinion. Of course the first thing needed is an experimental acquaintance with the principles of the doctrine of Christ. Repentance from dead works, and faith towards God, are indispensable. There is an old maxim, it is true, that grace makes a Christian, and gifts a minister. Yet a poor minister will he be, however great his gifts, who is destitute of the grace of God. He may be eloquent and discriminating, and capable of interesting and instructing his hearers. But to speak of the truths of the Gospel with pathos, energy, and effect, gifts must be combined with grace, and both must be directed by the love of God and of the souls of men. Nor is this all; the apostle tells us that a bishop must be apt to teach. He must not only possess knowledge and the organs of speech, but must have that easy and agreeable manner of presenting the truth which will carry it home to the hearts of his hearers. It is a part of the design of education to assist the scholar in acquiring that possession of his own powers, and that command of language, which will assist him to do this. He who should neglect to use every means within his reach for securing such an object, would be recreant to his trust. Then, to good elocution should be added an acquaintance with the evidences of natural and revealed religion, a comprehensive view of the great doctrines of Scripture, an acquaintance with the manners and customs of those times when the Scriptures were written, a clear idea of the constitution and history of the Christian church, and a methodical and coherent manner of presenting these subjects. If he be lacking in these things, his discourses will necessarily be made up, to a considerable extent, of declamation or rhapsody, mis-stated facts or inconclusive reasonings—in short, of solecisms and absurdities. These are among the indispensable qualifications. Others might be added to them, which would greatly assist in the discharge of his duties and the success of his labors. Among them might be named, perhaps as first, an acquaintance with the languages in which the Scriptures were written, and the literature of those languages—a qualification of inestimable importance in the interpretation and explanation of the sacred volume. Other fields of study would open before the industrious and resolute student, as his opportunities for pursuing them should be increased—all serving to render him, as he certainly should be, thoroughly furnished unto every good work.

We believe there has never been a time in the history of our own denomination, when there was a more urgent demand for thoroughly educated men in the ministry, or greater encouragement held out to such, than at present. The means of preparation are accessible to the resolute and pious; the field for exertion is wide open before them; and they may enter it with full confidence of reaping a glorious harvest. Who is willing, for the sake of the truth, to endure the toil of preparation, and the fatigue and anxiety of actual service?

CENTRAL SEVENTH-DAY BAPTIST ASSOCIATION.

From our Correspondent, Thos. B. Brown.

The Central Association of Seventh-day Baptist Churches was convened this day (June 11, 1845,) at Adams, Jefferson Co., N. Y. An excellent introductory discourse was delivered by Bro. Eli S. Bailey, from Matt. 5: 14—"Ye are the light of the world." The obligation of our denomination to carry out the duty implied in the text, by a bold and faithful exhibition of our peculiar sentiments, was urged with much earnestness; while that sectarian spirit which would contend for the Sabbath even to censoriousness in the letter, but refuse to keep it in spirit, was condemned. It is also in place to remark, that the speaker urged, that while there was a fourth commandment, there were also nine others of equal importance, to which we must yield an evangelical obedience as the disciples of Him who died for our sins. Doubtless a good effect was produced on the minds of the audience by the sermon.

After a short recess, the Association again met, when Bro. Ephraim Maxson was chosen Moderator, and James Bailey and Jason B. Wells, Secretaries.

The letters from the churches showed that they generally had not enjoyed much increase during the past year. Some of them had rather diminished in numbers. Others stand about as they were. One or two of them, however, had been highly favored. One new church was added, composed almost entirely of recent converts to the Sabbath, among whom was their minister.

Several Committees were appointed, and a number of points of minor importance disposed of, but nothing of special interest came up except the report of Bro. James Bailey of missionary services performed by him last winter. The report embodied an interesting account of controversial opportunities between the missionary and certain opponents of the Sabbath in Richland and its vicinity, the result of which was highly beneficial to the Sabbath cause.

After prayer by Bro. Varnum Hull, this first day's session of the Association was adjourned.

June 12.—The Association met, and after a sermon by Elder C. M. Lewis, and prayer by Bro. E. Burdick, the Report of the Committee on the State of Religion was read and adopted. The Committee appointed to prepare business for the Association made a report of sundry resolutions, from which we extract the following:—

Whereas, the law of 1839, for the protection of Seventh-day Baptists, has by the decision of the Supreme Court of this State, in the case of Maxson ads. Annas, been so construed as to leave us more exposed than before; therefore,

Resolved, That we recommend that the case be carried to the Court of Errors, and that the churches, and Seventh-day Baptists generally, be invited to contribute to meet the expense.

And farther, Resolved, That we instruct our Corresponding Secretary to prepare a petition to the next Legislature for an amendment to that law, so that we may enjoy equal protection with other citizens of this State, and that it be circulated among all classes for signatures.

Resolved, That Eli S. Bailey, James Bailey, and Joel Greene, be a Committee to act in concert with any committee that may be appointed by the Western Association, to prepare a detailed report that shall embody the arguments, scriptural, historical, and otherwise, for and against the Sabbath of the Bible, and whatever else may be important, to be presented to the Committee to whom the petition shall be referred in the next Legislature.

Upon these resolutions, an interesting and animated discussion arose, in which brethren Joel Greene, Eli S. Bailey, James Bailey, Varnum Hull, and others, participated. We wish we could give a report of the speeches made on this occasion, but it is out of our power to do so. Suffice it to say, however, that they evinced a noble determination to resist, in all ways compatible with the Christian profession, the spirit of intolerance and oppression which originated the unjustifiable case in law alluded to. The nature of this case has heretofore been made known to the readers of the Recorder; and the circumstances connected with it go to show, that even in this enlightened period of our country's history, the sacredness of conscience is not sufficiently regarded. It is indeed lamentable, that though our government has been in operation almost three score and ten years, yet still the great cardinal principle of free and full toleration, which our fathers laid in the foundation, and which honest and plain-hearted people always thought to be sufficiently guarded by the common law, must notwithstanding be disregarded and trampled under foot from time to time. The resolutions above referred to, were adopted by a hearty and unanimous vote. It was afterwards suggested, however, that the decision of Judge Gridley in the case referred to might have been caused by some informality in the proceedings, or by some real defect in the law, in which case a resort to the Court of Errors would only be attended with expense without availing any thing in the end. It was therefore resolved, that a committee be appointed to take able counsel on this point, and invested with discretionary power to act accordingly. Should it appear, that there was some legal informality in the proceedings, or that there is some real defect in the law, by reason of which it is insufficient for the protection of our rights, then the Committee vigorously to prosecute the alternative contemplated by the second and third of the foregoing resolutions.

Another important resolution adopted was the following:—

Resolved, That our Corresponding Secretary be instructed to ascertain, by correspondence or otherwise, what measures may be taken to stop the business, or close the canals, on the first day of the week, and prepare a petition for circulation against any and all such measures.

In the discussion of this resolution, it was shown, that the over-zealous advocates of Sunday reform did not scruple to resort to "pious fraud" in order to compass their ends. Petitions, with signatures measured off by the yard, had been sent to the Legislature; and it had been represented, that such petitions were from boat-captains, who thus asked the Legislature to compel them to do what their self-interest rendered them unwilling to do! To obtain their signatures, the petitions had been kept in the Collectors' offices, where, according to law, the captains must stop to do their business. In a very large proportion of the cases, however, the captain, instead of going in himself, sends one of his men, who is forthwith laid hold of, and persuaded to affix his name. So that instead of the petition coming from so many captains, as has been proclaimed, in reality not more than one-third of the names are of this rank! Moreover, instead of appealing to these men upon purely moral ground, they are told that they can make just as much money by working six days in the week, as when they work seven, and then they will have the Sunday to themselves! Thus self-interest after all, instead of divine truth, is the great lever at work in this popular reform. If ever there was a religious humbug palmed off upon the community, this Sunday movement is one.

The following resolution was also adopted:—

Resolved, That all the ministers of the Association be a committee to attend any Lord's Day, Sabbath, or Christian Reform Convention, that may be held in the bounds of this Association, where the subject of the Sabbath may, or can be, introduced.

During the rest of the day, the Association was principally occupied in arranging and settling its missionary operations for the ensuing year. The President of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association being present, urged the expediency of conducting their operations through the medium of that institution. He was, however, unsuccessful, and the Central Association will therefore manage its missionary operations as it has heretofore done, at least so far as efforts in our own country are concerned.

The usual religious exercise closed the second day's proceedings.

June 13.—A sermon was delivered this morning by Bro. E. Burdick, after which the following resolution was submitted:—

Resolved, That this Association has heard with great pleasure of the determination of the Executive Board of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association to extend its operations to foreign lands, and that the churches composing this body be requested to aid this important object by their contributions and prayers.

The resolution was spoken to at considerable length by Thomas B. Brown, after which it was adopted by a hearty and unanimous vote. God grant that it may be followed by that activity in the cause which it contemplates.

Bro. Joel Greene submitted the following resolutions, accompanied by interesting remarks, which were adopted:—

Resolved, That we approve the plan and organization of the American Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association, and pledge ourselves to co-operate with that body as far as our means will permit.

Resolved, That we appoint delegates to attend the next anniversary of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association; and that Clark Rogers, Joel Greene, and Ephraim Maxson, be said delegates.

From a comparison of these resolutions with yesterday's proceedings, it will be seen that although the President of the Missionary Association failed to secure all that was embraced in the object of his mission, yet it is hoped that some approximation was made towards it, and that at all events, so far as efforts in foreign lands are concerned, they will be ready to co-operate. The friends of the Missionary Association have reason, therefore to be encouraged.

An animated discussion arose upon a resolution having reference to the practice of laying on of hands upon newly-baptized members, in which brethren E. S. Bailey, V. Hull, D. F. Randolph, and G. M. Langworthy, took part. The resolution was offered merely for the purpose of eliciting discussion, and was finally laid on the table.

The two following resolutions were adopted unanimously:—

Resolved, That our Corresponding Secretary be instructed to ascertain whether any measures may be taken by first-day observers to secure the aid either of our State or National Legislatures, to cause a greater regard to be paid to the first day of the week than the seventh, either by stopping the mails on that day, or otherwise; and prepare a petition for general circulation against such measures.

Resolved, That the operations of the American Sabbath Tract Society are highly necessary to the prosperity of the Sabbath cause, and we most heartily commend that institution to the liberalities of our churches, and ask their devout prayers to God that his blessing may rest upon it.

The foregoing are the matters of general importance acted on by the Association. On the whole, the meeting was one of considerable interest. The next anniversary is to be held with the church in Scott. Bro. C. M. Lewis to preach the Introductory Sermon; Bro. James Bailey his alternate.

After the customary formalities, the Association adjourned.

The American and Foreign Bible Society.—A pamphlet of ninety-six pages lies before us, containing the Eighth Annual Report of this Society, together with an account of the last meeting at Providence, and the addresses which were delivered on that occasion. The Society appears to be in a flourishing condition. The receipts of the year have been $34,342, which is $11,000 more than was received last year, and $8,000 more than was received in any preceding year. The entire receipts of the Society since its formation amount to the sum of $235,211. Within the past year sixty auxiliary Societies have been recognized, making the whole number recognized since the formation of the parent Society three hundred. This institution has not yet received the charter which it asked of the Legislature, but we judge from the introductory remarks of the President, that the failure to obtain it does not occasion much anxiety or very great inconvenience. The report of the Society's labors during the past year speaks well for the enterprise and liberality of our Baptist friends.

American Protestant Society.—We have before us the Annual Report of this Society, which was organized some two years ago, "for the purpose of enlightening the minds both of Protestants and Romanists respecting the doctrines and duties revealed in the word of God, and to diffuse correct information concerning the distinctions between Protestantism and Romanism." The Society embraces members from all evangelical Christian denominations and all political parties in our country. Its missionaries are from the various denominations; and those who are converted through their instrumentality are left to select for themselves the church with which they will become connected. The course pursued towards Romanists is avowedly neither vindictive nor denunciatory, but kind and conciliatory. No other course could be of the least advantage, but this, if consistently pursued, can hardly fail to be useful. The expenses of the Society during the past year were $6,746, of which $1,505 was for publishing tracts and other works on Romanism. Although the Society has but just completed the second year of its operations, we notice as an omen of good, that it already numbers three hundred and twenty Life Members.

The Methodist Church South.—Notwithstanding the decisive action of the Louisville Convention in favor of a division of the Methodist Church on account of slavery, it seems that there exists at the South considerable hostility to the measure. The editor of the Christian Intelligencer, a Methodist paper published at Georgetown, Ky., expresses a hope that the Kentucky Conference will veto the action of a majority of her delegates in the organization of a separate ecclesiastical jurisdiction. He further says, that if the action is confirmed, and an attempt is made to transfer the membership of the Methodist Episcopal Church into the Church South, he knows some who will not go—who can neither be led by persuasion, nor coerced by threats and persecution, out of the Mother Church. The same paper contains a call for a Convention of the laity of the Methodist Episcopal Church to consider the propriety of the action of the ministers at the Louisville Convention in relation to the separation of the body into northern and southern divisions. These facts indicate clearly enough that a separation of the South form the North will not put an end to divisions, but will rather increase them.

Catholic Missions in China.—In the Freeman's Journal and Catholic Register of last week, we find a long article respecting the prospects of Catholic Missions in the vast regions of the Chinese Empire. The article states, that through the influence of French diplomacy the rigorous edict of 1805, forbidding the native Chinese to embrace Christianity, has been repealed. "A boundless field for the true soldiers of the cross," has thus been opened in China. It is thought that the principal obstacle to the success of the Catholic missionary will be the misrepresentations and intrigues of pretended laborers in the same cause, since every petty religious sect in England or America, claiming the title of Christian, will send out its handful of champions and publications, against which the Catholic missionary must be on his guard. Notwithstanding these obstacles, the encouragements to labor in that country are represented as great, and the sons of the Church are exhorted to follow in the footsteps of their predecessors who penetrated China in the thirteenth century, and endured persecutions for the sake of the one faith.

Correction.—In the list which we published of the officers of the Seventh-day Baptist Missionary Association, we omitted the name of A. D. TITSWORTH, Treasurer, Metuchen, N. J.

The Sale of a Distillery: A Pencilling of the Present Age. By Wm. Oland Bourne. New York, 1845.

Such is the title of a pamphlet, in which the bidders at an auction sale of a distillery are made to pourtray the evil consequences of Intemperance. It exhibits considerable ingenuity and poetic talent.

Lexicology.—A correspondent, who is somewhat fastidious in the science of words, requests us to give the definition of a term which he says is often improperly used. Here it is, therefore, as set forth by Webster:—

"MOIETY, [Fr. moitie,] The half; one of two equal parts."

Of course, as our correspondent suggests, to talk about a "small moiety," or "but a mere moiety," is an outrage upon language.

Newly-discovered People in Africa.—We find the following in a letter recently published in the National Intelligencer. The facts were communicated by persons just returned from Liberia and Sierra Leone:

"Near the mission established by the American Board at the Gaboon, a people have been discovered far superior to any upon the coast, whose language is represented as one of the most perfect and harmonious in the world: who have among them a tradition that some two centuries ago a stranger came to their country and instructed them in civilization and their duties: who are acquainted with the facts and truths of the holy Scriptures, and who are remarkably prepared for the reception of further knowledge. They are at the present removing from the interior towards the coast, and our missionaries cherish the hope that through their agency civilization and Christianity may be widely diffused."

Lay Missionaries.—It is an encouraging circumstance, that a growing importance is attached to the influence of laymen in connection with domestic and foreign missionary efforts. The Rev. Mr. Bronson, writing from Assam for help in the Missionary Schools, says:—

"We should be perfectly satisfied could be Board send us a lay brother, who, with his wife, possesses deep piety, good sense, a common education, and a knowledge of some trade, or of business in general, so that they could teach the scholars some useful employment, and have the general management of the scholars. He could do as much as any ordained missionary in conversing with the people and distributing the word of truth. Good, active lay brethren, such as I have described, would do as much good as ordained missionaries; and I presume that there are many in the churches who would readily offer their services for the work if they thought they were required."

THE PREACHERS FOR THE WEST.

At the late meeting of the Massachusetts Home Missionary Society, Rev. Dr. Beecher, of Cincinnati endeavored to explain what sort of ministers are needed at the West. They should be young men, or men of small families; men who can live on small means are wanted at the West. The churches there are poor and feeble; if they were not, they could get ministers without the help of this Society. Old men, or middle-aged men with large families, had better stay in New England. Common sense was indispensable in men who go West—men who understood human nature. Not such men as a revolutionary friend of his was, who, in describing to the Dr. his management in a certain battle, said, he ran up to the main body of the enemy and fired, and fired away; when, the first thing he knew, the wings were closing around him, and he was obliged to turn and run, with the bullets whizzing about his ears. Just so he has been doing all his life—firing away at the main body, and then turning and running.

Men of well disciplined and well filled minds are needed at the West. Men that can preach good sermons, without reading them. Men that would not be obliged to preach old sermons, but would run them over and bring them out fresh and new again. He was broken of preaching old sermons years ago, by a conversation with one of his people: "Doctor, do you think it right for men who are paid for preaching, to preach old sermons?" "Why not?" says the Dr., "Sermons that have done good once, why should they not again?" "I declare," said the man, "I never thought of that." And I declare, said the Dr., I never preached an old sermon after that. For, though my reasoning satisfied my good parishioner, it did not me.

We must have men who will preach sound, discriminating doctrinal discourses. Such preaching has made New England what it is—the glory of all lands; and such alone will make the West like New England.

DR. BEECHER ON PERSONAL HOLINESS.

During the Anniversary week in Boston, two meetings were held in the Mount Vernon Church, for the purpose of hearing from the venerable Dr. Beecher, of Cincinnati, an account of the religious experience enjoyed within the last year by some members of Lane Theological Seminary and others at the West, and also to unite in conference and prayer for the extension of the same blessing. The Morning Chronicle gives the following account of the meetings:—

Dr. Beecher's statements were extremely interesting and instructive. He represented that a good many persons had lately found by happy experience, the blessing of sanctification, by simple faith in Christ. Christians who feel the need of holiness, seek it too much in a legal way, and not by faith. He said the requisites to the obtaining of the blessing, were:

1. A firm belief that it is practicable:
2. A strong conviction that it is a duty to possess it, and a sin to be without it:
3. A fixed determination to seek it, and to seek it now:
4. A willingness to sacrifice every thing, no matter what, that obstructs its attainment:
5. A diligent use of all the means of grace, especially the word of God and prayer:

And then there should be a simple dependence on Christ for it. All seeking which is not by faith in Christ, is legal, and must be ineffectual. He said of himself that he had begun to enjoy it, though he had sought it so late in life. His whole soul was in his theme, and a large assembly of Christians, including many ministers, listened with the deepest interest.

General Intelligence.

Death of General Jackson.—Gen. Andrew Jackson closed his eventful life at the Hermitage on Sunday evening, 8th inst., at the advanced age of seventy-eight years. He retained his intellect unclouded to the last. A short time before his death, his friends and domestics were called around him, of whom he took an affectionate leave. He expired with the utmost calmness, expressing entire confidence in a happy immortality through the Redeemer. This event, though long expected, will excite deep emotions in many hearts.

Mexico.—Private letters received here from Mexico by the British frigate "Eurydice," state it as a matter almost of certainty, that before long the Mexican government will declare war against the United States.

We have seen some of these letters, and they all go to confirm the statements to that effect made in our paper of yesterday. So harsh to this country and to Texas is the tone of public sentiment in Mexico, that it is generally believed the government must either go to war, or suffer an overthrow by a new revolution. [N. O. Art of Floating.—Any human being who will have the presence of mind to clasp the hands behind the back and turn the face toward the zenith, may float at ease, and in perfect safety, in tolerably still water—ay, and sleep there, no matter how long. If not knowing how to swim, you would escape drowning, when you find yourself in deep water, you have only to consider yourself an empty pitcher; let your mouth and nose—not the top part of your heavy head—be the highest part of you, and you are safe; but thrust up one of your bony hands, and down you go—turning up the hand tips over the pitcher. Having had the happiness to prevent one or two drownings by this simple instruction, says an exchange, we publish it for the benefit of all who either love aqautic sports, or dread them.

The New Prison.—Over fifty convicts from the Sing Sing Prison arrived here on Monday evening in full uniform, in the Steamer Saranac. They remained over night in the Court-House, and were transported in wagons on Tuesday to the New Prison now building in this County. They were chained two together, and as they marched slowly up the Lake, they presented a most humiliating spectacle. [Plattsburgh Whig, June 7.

New York Statistics.—The following items are taken from the N. Y. State Register:—

The number of Colleges in the State is 12, Students, 985; of Academies and Grammar Schools, 501; Scholars, 34,563; of Primary and Common Schools, 10,871; Scholars, 501,156; Scholars at public charge, 26,266. There are 48,715 white persons over twenty years of age who cannot read and write.

Mill Tax on valuation, 592,008 57; Fees of Treasurers and Collectors, 30,881 40. Nett proceeds of Mill Tax, 561,127 17.

There are 391 periodicals published in this State.

There are 85 incorporated Banks, and 65 Banking Associations, making in all 150 Banks in the State, with a capital of $43,734,833. In the Counties of Alleghany, Clinton, Cortland, Franklin, Hamilton, Queens, Richmond, Rockland, Schoharie, Sullivan and Wyoming there are no banks. There are 14 Savings Banks in the State.

There are 639¾ miles of Railroads in operation in the State, which cost for construction $19,606,737 30, for repairs and running $799,752 81. The receipts have been $1,893,658 59.

Ohio Law.—In Clinton county, Ohio, the directors of a School District admitted 4 colored persons as pay scholars: objections were made by a man named Pyle, who had two children, one of whom he sent to a school in another district. He called a meeting of the people of the district; they decided in favor of letting colored children go, but not colored adults. He sued the directors for a violation of the law, and the jury awarded the damages at $22 50 against them. Such is the decision under the common school law of Ohio! So that colored children are in Ohio doomed to remain in ignorance, unless in Sunday Schools, or where philanthropic persons agree to educate them. This is one of the black spots in our code.

News Traveling in less than no time.—The strange fact is nevertheless demonstrated to be true, that news conveyed by Morse's Telegraph actually travels in less than no time. For instance, a member of Congress from Missouri commences a speech in the Capitol at 12 o'clock, and it is immediately communicated by Telegraph, and is announced in St. Louis at about 11 o'clock, just one hour before the speaker commenced. A correspondent of the U. S. Journal says, take any map and run your eye due West on the degrees, and you will get abundance of amusing illustrations of this event-anticipating affair. [Mirror.

A Bank Note on its Travels.—Some time ago the Editors of the N. O. Picayune conceived the idea of tracing and recording the progress of a bank note—promising to themselves and the public some amusement from its wanderings. They have had a note prepared accordingly, and put in circulation; and every person into whose hands it may come is requested to notify the Editors of the Picayune either by letter or through the nearest newspaper. The note is a five dollar bill of the Mechanics' and Traders' Bank, New Orleans, letter B, number 4001, dated January 2, 1843; its back is of a light red color, and on it is engraved, in large figures, the number 76.

Horrors of Earthquakes.—During the prevalence of the earthquakes in Mexico, recently, one town, called Valie de Rio Blanco, in Guanajuato, was entirely swallowed up, leaving only a large cavern where it stood. Upwards of 60 persons perished in this awful gulf. In Zacatecas, the oscillation of the earth produced the explosion of a powder mill, which did considerable damage, besides loss of life. On the 10th of April, the Capital was visited with two more shocks, which lasted each several seconds.

A Venerable Cap.—The mitre worn by Bishop Seabury, the first American Bishop, in the performance of some of his Episcopal functions, has, with the permission of his "distinguished descendant," Dr. Seabury, of New York, been obtained, and deposited in the library of Trinity College. It is a plain cap of black satin, the front of which has a cross and halo, embroidered in gold lace; while the reverse has, in similar work, a representation of the crown of thorns.

SUMMARY.

A laborer, named Andrew White, died suddenly on Tuesday, at Albany, while at work upon the clay banks. Verdict of the Coroner's Jury, that he came to his death in consequence of drinking cold water immoderately while in an extremely heated state.

This is the year of desolation created by fires. An entire square has just been destroyed in Lafayette, Ind.

The large and splendid collection of curiosities, with the cases, fixtures, &c., belonging to the Philadelphia Museum Company, are shortly to be sold by order of the sheriff, for payment of a debt exceeding $100,000.

The village of Ithaca has again been the scene of a destructive fire, the work of an incendiary. It took place early on Tuesday morning, and extended over nearly all the square bordered by Cayuga, Oswego, Geneva and Green streets.

There are about twenty-five days of full sale of strawberries in this market. At 4000 quarts per day this gives one hundred thousand quarts of strawberries sold in this market in one season. They average 8 cents per quart, which makes eight thousand dollars paid in a little more than three weeks for strawberries.

What would folks fifty years ago have said, asks the Pittsburg Age, had they received a London paper with an engraving of a fire in Pittsburgh, before the ruins had ceased smoking, yet such is the case now. We received a paper of the kind on the 4th, and lit a segar among the ruins on the same morning.

Any kind of brush, such as pine or spruce boughs, or other sorts of fine limbs that will lie somewhat compact, if laid upon rocks while being blowed to pieces by powder, will completely prevent fragments from flying, so that you may blast rocks in the vicinity of buildings, or even under buildings, with perfect safety.

We have been told by one of the passengers, that the steamship Hibernia, in her recent passage across the Atlantic, was three several times on fire! Now this a thing which could not have happened, we think, without the most culpable carelessness. [N. Y. Evangelist.

The trial of the individuals indicted for the murder of Joe Smith, the Mormon Prophet, and his brother Hyrum, last June, in the Carthage jail, terminated May 30, in a verdict of acquittal.

We learn that on Saturday, 7th inst., the sparks from a locomotive on the State Railroad set fire to a field of standing clover, in Lancaster county, which was entirely consumed, and the fire only arrested by cutting down a strip of wheat in the adjoining fields.

We see it stated that a spark from a locomotive on the Winchester and Potomac Railroad, on Monday, 2d inst., set fire to a field of green wheat, which by the most active exertions could not be subdued until about ten acres were consumed.

A letter from Milan, of the 21st ult., states that the Pope, a few days previously, had called together a congregation or meeting for secular purposes in Rome, at which it was determined not to allow railways within the papal States, either those having their origin there, or as connecting links with the adjoining countries.

The Northampton (Mass.) Gazette gives a sad account of the effects of a hail storm assuming the character of a tornado, destroying buildings, glass, crops, &c. to a large amount. In Williamsburgh it is estimated 3000 panes of glass were broken. In Amherst and Pelham several buildings were blown down, trees were taken up by the roots, and several persons narrowly escaped with life.

Extensive preparations are making by the Odd Fellows to celebrate the Anniversary of the revival of Odd Fellowship in Massachusetts, on the 19th inst. There are 75 Lodges, 7 Encampments, Grand Lodge and Grand Encampment, in this State, numbering about nineteen thousand. Delagations from all the Lodges and Encampments in the other states in New England will be present, swelling the number of which the procession will be composed to 20,000. This will, perhaps, be the only grand display by this brotherhood for many years. Their banners, emblems and insignia will all be brought out on this occasion.

The books for subscription to the stock of the Oswego and Syracuse railroad are to be opened by the commissioners on the 24th of July next, at the villages of Oswego, Fulton, Baldwinsville, Syracuse, and other places not yet made known. The Oswego papers say, that there is scarcely a doubt but that the stock will be taken up at once.

It is announced that in the archives of the kingdom of Sweden an autograph letter of Martin Luther has been discovered. It is addressed to the Archbishop of Mayence and Magdeburgh, under date Oct. 31, 1517. It declaims against the sale of indulgences by Tetzel, and the contents differ in many respects from the printed copy.

The University of North Carolina, at its annual commencement on the 5th inst., conferred the honorary degree of LL.D. upon the President of the United States; Rev. S. F. Hawks, of Mississippi; Hon. John Y. Mason, Attorney General of the United States, and Hon. Willie P. Mangum, late President of the U. S. Senate, all of whom are alumni of that institution.

The charter incorporating the Connecticut Grand Lodge of Odd Fellows passed the Senate by a vote of 14 to 7; and the House by a vote of 90 to 50. In each House objections were urged; but as appeared by the votes without avail.

The German papers relate a sad accident that occurred on the 7th ult. in the neighborhood of Vienna. A boat on the Danube filled with a hundred Sclavonians returning from a pilgrimage, was overturned in consequence of the rush of passengers to one side at the moment of debarkation, and more than a third of the party were drowned.

An Agricultural Congress, after the fashion of the scientific associations which meet yearly in England, and in various kingdoms of the continent, is to assemble in Paris, for the first time, on the 8th of next month, under the presidence of the Duc Decazes. The meeting is intended to be a yearly one. The present session will last for six weeks. And the grand referendaire will open to the Congress the grand conservatory of the Luxembourg.

The last Nauvoo Neighbor says: "Elder Pratt, our Missionary at Tooboui, one of the Society group, has forwarded several letters to this city, under date of Sept. 17, 1844. Although not the latest dates from that quarter, yet they contain much interesting matter, which will hereafter appear in its place. The Mission flourishes beyond our most sanguine expectations."

Rev. Dr. Sharp, of Boston, has safely arrived in England. He was on a visit to the scene of his childhood. He had kneeled on the graves of his parents—had preached in what was once his father's pulpit, where one of his early friends, now 70 years old, came to hear him, and walked home 12 miles after 8 o'clock in the evening.

Healy, the Artist, was at the Hermitage on the 3d inst., painting a portrait of Gen. Jackson for the King of the French.

We learn that the bill in relation to the Sale of Spirituous Liquors, which passed the Connecticut House last week, was rejected in the Senate on Monday, 14 to 5.

Governor Wright has offered a reward of $1000 for the apprehension and conviction of four men who, on the 23d of May last, made an attempt upon the life of deputy sheriff Sedgwick and constable Traver, in the town of Taghkanic.

Charles Hayward, Esq., of Boston, was severely injured on Saturday, by the gross carelessness of some persons engaged in tearing down an old building, a portion of which was thrown into the street, falling upon him in such a way as to endanger his life.

The German papers state that emigration to the United States, to a very great extent, is taking place among the better portion of the German agricultural laborers, farmers and artisans. Antwerp has been literally crowded with these emigrants recently, who were anxious to procure berths on board vessels bound to New York.

We learn that the new law in regard to newspapers is to be construed to mean 30 miles by the mail routes. By this construction the country papers are deprived of the advantage which it was believed they would receive from the law.

The papers state that Gov. Shannon was robbed by Mexican lazarees, both on his way out and return home, of every thing valuable in his possession. He had, however, a bundle of his Diplomatic Despatches about him which were left untouched!

A cheerful, handsome boy from the country yesterday got tired while walking through the hot streets, and taking off his thick, heavy shoes, set them carefully beside his clumped stick and laid himself down on an iron grating in William-street—his head on his cap and his face sunward—and slept peaceably and well, undisturbed by the noise and rush of the trampling crowd. Many a hard, stern face, corrugated with care, grew mild and expanded into a kindly smile at the sight of this brave boy sleeping securely with his wealth of new shoes unsuspectingly beside him, just as if all the world were honest. Poor boy! there is not a rogue in this great, wicked City, who would have dared to rob thee. [Tribune.

A meeting was recently held in the city of Charleston, S. C., to take into consideration the best means of promoting moral culture and religious improvement among the slaves at the South, at which the Hon. Daniel E. Huger, U. S. Senator from South Carolina, presided. Addresses were delivered on the occasion by the Rev. Charles Colcock Jones, of Georgia, and the Rev. Dr. Fuller, of Charleston.

A stranger in New York, last week, was swindled out of 30 or 40 dollars by a sharper, who appeared to value his acquaintance—and who borrowed the money to reward a man for picking up a pocket book in the street, as they were passing. Two dollars a year for a newspaper, would have given him a knowledge of such tricks, and saved him the imposition.

Twenty-one towns in Rhode Island, including nearly all the large towns, have voted not to grant licenses for the sale of ardent spirits. In this city the question of granting licenses has been indefinitely postponed in the Board of Aldermen. The whole number of licenses granted in the State a few years ago was over six hundred. The whole number this year is less than fifty out of the city of Providence, and probably less than one hundred if licenses are granted in the city. [Providence Journal.

It is said that there are at present in the Bellevue hospital four hundred and seventy-one, and in the city hospital two hundred and thirty-eight pauper immigrants, most of whom are more or less suffering from fever or other ailments, consequent upon the changes of climate, confinement on shipboard, and poor fare. The Irish Emigrant Society has aided nearly three thousand persons in obtaining situations, or information more valuable to them than any pecuniary aid.

Edward L. Carey, son of the late venerable Matthew Carey, expired at about 10 o'clock, June 16th, aged 40 years. Mr. Carey was a member of the firm of Carey & Hart, leading book publishers; and long esteemed one of the noblest patrons of the Arts and Sciences.

The District of Southwark was disgraced on Sunday last—the Sabbath, of course—by a brutal fight between the members of the Weccacoe and Franklin Engine Companies. Several persons were badly hurt.

The Friends' Yearly Meeting for New England is now in session at Newport. The meeting will probably be a stormy one, owing to a division which has taken place within the limits of the Providence Quarter on account of doctrinal differences.

It is stated that Mr. E. Deacon has purchased one-third of Graham's Magazine for $12,000, at the rate of $36,000 for the whole! Mr. G. has made a handsome fortune out of his work.

THE PENITENT CULPRIT.

Messrs. Editors:—As much has been said in our daily papers about the unfortunate man who was executed last week in New York, much of which was untrue, I thought a line from an eye-witness would be interesting to your readers.

About six weeks ago, I was requested, by one of the Aldermen of this city, to accompany him to the cell of Eager. I did so, and was introduced to him as his spiritual teacher. The prisoner had partially opened his mind to the Alderman, in which he stated that no clergyman had been to see him. A number of persons had entered his cell, some of whom promised to send a minister, but they had not done so.

I was struck with his appearance. He could scarcely look up—his feelings were intense—caused by a conviction of his guilt in the sight of God and man. He never attempted to justify his conduct; on the contrary, whenever it was alluded to, he expressed his abhorrence of the act, and the justice of his sentence. His parents were pious, but so poor that they were unable to educate their son. He could not read, consequently, his mind was extremely ignorant of Bible truth; still there was evinced by him a strong desire to be taught the way of salvation. When the Bible was read or explained to him, he would sit with his eyes fixed upon the book or person, anxiously desiring to retain in his mind whatever he heard. This he did to a degree which indicated a strong memory; for weeks after he had heard certain portions of the Scriptures read, he would mention them in a manner which showed that they were blessed to his soul. I saw him every other day at least, which enabled me to watch the working of his mind.

Toward the close of his life, his anxiety increased in reference to his eternal destiny. When asked if it was the manner of his death which troubled him, he replied with firmness, "No; that does not cause me one moment's uneasiness; it is that which comes after death."

During the last week of his life I visited him daily, and spent the whole of the last night with him. On the day preceding his death, he was visited by many of his old associates, some of whom witnessed against him. He freely forgave them. His wife also visited him on that day, for the second time since he was sentenced, and then she was intoxicated. This hurt his feelings much, as he wished to give her some wholesome advice.

Mr. Joseph Harris, missionary to seamen, sat up with me the last night in the poor man's cell. The whole of that night was spent in devotional exercises. After midnight he was requested to take some rest. This he refused to do. Said he, "I shall rest to-morrow night!"

We left him about six o'clock in the morning, and returned at nine, when he said, "After you left, I had a good season in prayer; now I feel better." About this time the alderman alluded to came into the cell, when an affecting scene took place. For some time neither of them could speak. At length Eager said, "I thank you, Mr. Ward, for bringing the minister to me; others promised, but you did it." We then sung a hymn, and had a season of prayer. He was asked if Christ was precious to him? He replied, "Yes; precious—very precious—very precious!" He intimated that he would like to have the hymn commencing "Jesus lover of my soul," sung on the platform of the gallows. The officers, however, persuaded him to have all the singing in the cell. He yielded. As we were singing, it echoed through the building, causing many to weep who were unaccustomed to shed tears. While the officers were preparing him for his execution, he remained calm, he did not murmur, but continued saying, "My trust is in the Lord; I am not afraid to die." This done, we had another season of prayer, in which he engaged heartily.

He had been accustomed to converse with Babe and Saunders, through the iron pipe which runs through the cells. He now called out, "Babe, I am ready—Farewell! look to Christ! Saunders, put your trust in the Lord—do have ministers come to see you." We then moved off in procession to the place of execution. At the last moment he said, "All is well, all is peace."

In view of the whole, we cherish the hope that through the merits of Christ, he is now where sin can never enter.

MARRIED,

In Watertown, N. Y., on the 1st instant, by Rev. J. A. Brayton, Doct. E. B. Wells, and Miss Sarah A. Wilkins, both of Watertown.

DIED,

In Brookfield, Madison Co., N. Y., on the 28th of April last, Ephraim C. Davis, in the 22d year of his age. He embraced religion in early life, and united with the Seventh-day Baptist Church in Brookfield, of which he has since been a worthy member. In him society has lost a valuable member; but his friends have the pleasing assurance that their loss is his gain, and that he has gone where youthful vigor never fades, and affection's ties are never severed. ALFRED ACADEMY AND TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

This Institution has a pleasant and quiet location thirteen miles south-east of Angelica, and six miles south of Almond, Allegany Co., N. Y., under the care of W. C. Kenyon, as Principal, and Miss Caroline B. Maxson, as Preceptress, aided by able and experienced assistants.

Teachers' Classes will be exercised in teaching, under the immediate supervision of their respective instructors, combining every facility of a Normal School, without its usual disadvantages. Within the past year, more than one hundred and fifty students of the institution have been employed as teachers in this and the adjacent counties—a number much larger than from any other institution in the State.

Students are prepared for entering any class in College. Ample advantages are also secured to those pursuing Modern Languages and the Fine Arts. The institution is liberally endowed and supplied with a choice and valuable library, and apparatus sufficiently extensive to illustrate every department of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry. It has also well selected cabinets of Geological, Mineralogical and Conchological specimens.

The plan of instruction aims at the development of the moral, intellectual and physical powers of students, so as to render them thorough, accurate, and practical scholars.

Lectures on Chemistry, accompanied by a full course of experiments, will commence with the second week of the fall term, and continue daily to its close. During the fall and winter terms, daily lectures will be given on School Teaching. Lectures on Natural Philosophy, Astronomy, and Physiology, illustrated by experiments, will be given each term of the year.

Tuition, per term of fifteen weeks, from $3,50 to $5. Board per week, in private families, $1. The entire expense of the academic year, including tuition, board, washing, light, and fuel, need not exceed $60. No extra charges incurred.

SAMUEL RUSSEL,
President of the Board of Trustees.

THE MESSIAH.

When first born nations looked through distant time,
And future years before them swiftly pass'd,
Nations with pomp and kingly pride came forth,
To rule the world, then sunk into the tomb—
And other nations rose, and slept in death.
Far down in time, like ocean's wandering waves,
New kings commenced their reign, new poets sung—
New prophets lived, and birds and beasts were slain,
To testify the death of Him "to come."
Like one who on the shore of ocean stands,
When the blue waves lie still, and pendant stars
At twilight gild the main, till the pale moon,
With broader beams, comes forth upon the deep,
And last of all the sun lights up the day—
So ancient seers look'd out on time's broad sea.
First in the shadowy distance, scarcely seen,
While age on age, like wave on wave, flowed on,
They just discerned, through mists of centuries,
The "promised seed," the appointed Shiloh crowned.
Tracing the opening vista, they beheld
An era of increasing light and joy;
Beyond, far down, an age of darkness lay—
An age of terror and the reign of death.
Few prophets lived, few poets sung, few fires
Were burning on the altar of the Lord,
And they but dimly, till like oilless lamps,
Their beams expired, and left the world in night.
Intently through the years of fearful gloom,
They traced long shadows, reaching down, half down
The day of time; at length, like morning clouds
Before the sun, they vanished in the light
Of Bethlehem's star, which shed his affluent beams
O'er the world's gloom, gilding the hoary locks
Of coming years, with hues like those which crown
Angelic forms in the bright realms of bliss.
At length the day long promis'd and desir'd,
Arrived, fulfilling ancient prophecies.
Earth slept, unconscious of its destiny,
Not knowing the Messiah was at hand.
Calm was the air, serene the cloudless heaven,
When rose in brilliancy the star whose beams
The wise men guided to the infant King.
Mute was the shepherd throng, and prostrate, while
They wondered and adored. Silent their flocks—
And silent all, except the vocal spheres,
Where angels, with loud, bursting melodies,
In strains of rapture sung "Good will to man,
On earth be peace and universal joy;
For unto him is born a Saviour, who
Is Christ the Lord—whose reign shall never end—
Whose name shall be Immanual—God with us!"
They, listening, not in vain, but full of faith,
With joyful haste, to Bethlehem repair,
Approach the manger, and the lowly couch,
Where, with rich gifts, they bow themselves before
The infant Majesty of heaven and earth.

THE FUGITIVE.

What is a fugitive? inquires some little bright-eyed reader. A fugitive is one who flees or runs away. But who is he, where did he come from, and where is he going? We will tell you something about him.

His name is Rocco, and he does not know that he ever had any other name.—He was a slave in Virginia, and knew but little about the blessings of freedom; yet he saw that others were free, and felt a desire to be free himself. He had never suffered so much in slavery as some others—having what is called a kind master, yet he feared being sold to some cruel trader, and driven south, as one of his brothers and two of his sisters had been.

From the moment they were sold and taken away, an awful apprehension took possession of his mind concerning his own fate—and how to escape such an evil was the subject of his day thoughts and his night dreams. He knew that there was a land in the North where there were no slaves; but how far it was, and how to find it, he did not know; nor had he any certain knowledge whether he should find friends or enemies when he should get there.

While he was in this state of mind, an unfavorable turn in his master's business was likely to settle his fate, and bring the very evil he had so much and so long feared. Though he appeared to be ignorant and unobserving, he watched every thing, and treasured up every word he overheard; and as he was mostly employed about the house, he had a good opportunity to understand the state of things. In this way he became satisfied that some of the slaves had got to be sold, and his fears told him that he would be one. He now began to think in earnest about running away—but where to go, or how to get clear, were matters over which the mist of darkness hung.

In the neighborhood lived a man who held no slaves, and though Rocco had never dared to converse with him, or about him, he had an impression that he disapproved of slaveholding. Whenever he met with this man, he fixed on him a look that awakened strange feelings; it did not make him tremble, as when his master or some other slaveholder looked sternly at him, yet it seemed to him as though the man saw and felt all that was in his heart, and made him wish the man would speak to him.—Now in his troubled state of mind about being sold, the thought occurred to him, that from this man he might obtain the information he so much desired concerning the land of his dreams, where there are no slaves.—With this view he managed twice to throw himself in the way of this man, and both times his courage failed and he dared not speak; but his strange conduct was marked by the old gentleman with whom he desired so much to speak. The third time when Rocco managed to cross his path at the hour of night-fall, the old gentleman anticipated his wish by speaking the first word. Pointing to the North, he inquired, "Seest thou that star?" The stars were just beginning to twinkle through the dusk of evening, and Rocco, after training his eyes for a moment, replied, "I see it." The old man added—"When thou wouldst seek after freedom, take that star for thy guide," and in a moment he passed on and vanished, while Rocco stood gazing at the star that had been pointed out to him.

We cannot describe all that passed in his mind; it is enough to say, that on that very night he ran away. About midnight he packed up what few articles he could get hold of, and started off at the top of his speed. He went first to the very spot of ground where the star had been pointed out to him, so as to be sure he got the right star—and taking its direction, he bounded over fences, through fields and woodlands, turning not to the right hand or the left, only when his course was likely to carry him too near some house, and then he would go round, lest he should alarm the dogs. In this way he pursued his course until day began to dawn, when he sought a thick wood, and concealed himself during the day. He got so far before morning, that he was beyond the reach of the stir which his absence produced, and he has never heard from home since.

But greater dangers awaited him, as you will soon see. He soon learned to distinguish his guiding star from all others, so that he could favor himself more in the selection of his ground, without danger of getting out of his general course. He traveled by night and hid himself by day, and suffered much from hunger. After he had been on his way for a number of days, he ventured out upon the public road one evening a little too early, and was met by two men on horseback, one of whom was armed with a pistol. They came upon him so suddenly that he had no chance to escape. They tied him, and took him back about a mile, where they put up for the night at a public house. They bound Rocco, and then agreed to take turns in watching him, one sleeping while the other watched.—About midnight the one on guard fell asleep. He went to sleep with his pistol in his hand, his hand lying upon the table.—His hand opened, and the pistol lay at ease. Rocco now thought it was his time to operate. He succeeded in untying himself.—Then he carefully took up the pistol. Next he put out the lamp, which burned dimly upon the table. Now came the last trial, which was upon the door, which he found so secured that he could not open it. He then attempted to raise the window, in which he made some noise, and the sleeping watch-man awoke and sprang upon his feet. Rocco presented the pistol, but it missed fire. By this time both men were up and rushing upon him. There was no hope but in a dreadful leap, and as quick as thought he plunged head-foremost through the window, and fell dreadfully cut and mangled upon the ground. He sprang upon his feet and ran some ten or fifteen rods, and paused long enough to look round, when he saw them come out at the door with a light, and run round the corner of the house to look for him under the window through which he had leaped. He then ran off as fast as he could, and leaving the road to elude pursuit, he traveled as fast as he could, bloody and wounded, until the approach of morning, when he concealed himself in a swamp.

No sooner did he cease traveling and become cool, than his limbs became stiff and swollen from the cuts and bruises he had received in jumping through the window. He was faint from not having eaten any thing the day before, and his limbs were so painful, producing a general fever, that he thought he must die. What to do, he did not know; to stay there was to die, and to go out and give himself up, was about as bad as death. He would rather have died than to have been taken back into slavery; but there was some faint hope that he might fall into the hands of friends, and this led him to make the trial. It was with difficulty he could walk; he rather crawled than walked at dusk of evening, and sought the nearest home of man. He knew not what part of the country he was in, nor whose hands he should fall into. What then must have been his feelings as he first heard the sound of an axe; the next moment he saw an open field as he crawled out of the woods—and then a house, at the door of which the axe was still sounding. As he approached still nearer, he saw through the gathering shadows an oldish-looking man, with a hat upon his head with a very large brim, and dressed in other respects very much like the man who first told him to take the star for his guide. A new ray of hope kindled in his heart, and he ventured up, intending to ask the privilege of staying all night. As he approached so near as to be heard, the chopper looked up, and his axe dropped from his hands. He paused before the venerable man, and before he could still his fluttering heart, and get his lips in a position to make his intended request, it was anticipated, as follows—"Thou lookest very ill; walk into the house; this is a public road, and it might not be for thine interests to be seen here."

The rest of the story is soon told; he staid there until his wounds were healed, and then he was given a full night's drive with a good horse, after which he went on foot, towards Canada, where he arrived in safety. [Juvenile Wesleyan.

The Toll-Man's Family.

A TRUE STORY.

In the town of Dessau, in Germany, there was a long, wide bridge over the Elbe. The ends of the bridge were much lower than the middle. The toll-man's house was placed upon the highest part of it, in the centre. In the spring of the year, when the ice was breaking up, there arose a great storm, and the river, with the broken pieces of ice, came roaring down so violently, that the ends of the bridge were soon carried away, and nothing was left but the middle arch of the bridge, with the toll-man's house upon it, which looked as if it were upon a little island, in the middle of the river. The force of the river was so great that it was impossible that this arch should stand long, and the poor toll-man feared that his house would soon be carried away by the waves, and his wife and children all drowned. There was a great many people on the banks, pitying the poor man's fate, and he and his wife and his children screamed to them for help; but the storm was heavy, and the ice made it dangerous, and they were all too cowardly to go out in a boat to try to save the poor family from drowning. Among them was a rich count, who held up a large purse of gold, and offered it to any one who would go and save the toll-man and his wife and children; but no one would risk his life for the money. At last a poor man came along in his waggon, and as soon as he saw the danger the poor people were in he set off in a little boat, and never minded the storm. He got safely to the toll-house; but he had to go three times before he brought away the whole family. Just as he was landing the last load the arch gave way, and the house was carried down the river. The poor father, and mother, and their children, were too happy to speak, when they found they were safe.

The count then offered the poor man who saved them the purse of gold. "No," he said, "my life was worth more than the money, and I do not wish to be paid for doing right." The count urged him to take it; he still refused it for himself, but said to the count, "I wish you would give it to the poor toll-man, who has lost all his clothes and furniture, and who has so many little children to feed."

FOR THE CHILDREN.

MY SUNDAY SCHOOL.

My Sunday-school! my Sunday-school!
  I love the hallowed spot;
Amid my trifles and my play,
  Thou shalt not be forgot:
Though idle, wicked children spurn
  Its counsel and its care;
Yet still my willing feet shall turn
  To seek instruction there.

My Sunday-school! my Sunday-school!
  How pleasant is the place
Where, in God's holy book, I learn
  The love of Christ to trace;
The words that fell from Jesus tongue,
  His cure of blind and dumb,
And how the Saviour loved the young,
  And bade the children come.

My Sunday-school! my Sunday-school!
  Oh may I so improve,
That my amendment may repay
  My teacher's care and love;
May all the blessings taught me there
  Be graven on my heart,
That I, O Lord, thy name may fear,
  Nor from thy ways depart.

Jane, and Fanny the Colored Girl.

'What is the matter? Jane,' said Mrs. Martin to her little daughter, as she entered one afternoon from school, her usually cheerful and good-natured face wearing a gloomy and sad appearance.

Jane hung down her head and burst into tears.

Her mother again earnestly inquired the cause of her unhappiness.

'Oh! mother, I have done very wrong to-day, and I am so unhappy.'

'But what have you done, my dear child?'

'Why, mother, you know poor little colored Fanny, that lives in the small brown house under the hill; she came to school to-day for the first time, and a number of the girls were offended because she came to school and was placed in the same class with them, and during the recess at noon they began to tease her, and call names. They called her Black Fan, and ridiculed her because she had on an old faded frock, and had nothing but brown bread for [illegible] was a washwoman, and that they would not play with her, and a great many other things they said to her.'

'But I hope, my child, you did not join in their wicked persecution of Fanny.'

'No, mother, I did not tease her, or call her names at all, I felt glad that the Lord had given me a white skin, and kind parents, and every thing to make me happy. I felt very sorry for poor Fanny, and ought to have told the girls that they did very wrong, and that I was Fanny's friend; but I was afraid to, because I knew they would laugh at me too. And when Fanny cried, and looked so frightened, I did not appear to pity her, and I know she thinks that I dislike her too. And I have felt so unhappy ever since, and I hurried from school to ask you what I should do to be happy again.'

'Why, go and acknowledge your fault to Fanny and your companions; tell them that you were afraid to do right, ask the Lord to forgive you, ask Him to help you do right in future—then may you be happy again. And then, my child, if you follow the example of our blessed Saviour, to love all, to be kind to all, to do good to all, then you may be happy with Him through eternity, with all those that love Him, and that love one another.' M. W.

The Choice.

A mother took her two little sons into their bed-room one morning, to pray with them. 'Well, my dear boys,' said she, 'what shall we pray for to-day? You know God's holy book says, if we ask aright we shall receive. Now we must ask to-day for what we want most of everything; what is it, Arty?' 'A pony, a real, live pony, I want.' 'O no!' said Tom, 'I want a gold watch; pray for a gold watch, mother.' 'O, I want something better than either of those,' said mama. 'Better than a pony! better than a watch!" exclaimed the boys. 'Yes, better than either; so choose again; besides, you know asking aright means to ask for something that will benefit us, as well as asking with right feelings in the name of Jesus; now choose again, what shall I pray for before we kneel.' The pony and the watch looked very tempting for a moment, but immediately they both exclaimed, 'that we may be good; pray that we may be good, mama.' 'Yes,' said the mother, 'that is a much better choice.' So they knelt down, and she prayed that the little boys might be good that day, and love the Saviour, and be kept from evil.

Little reader, what do you think of the choice? was it a good one?

When the day was over, the mother said, 'Well, little sons, how did you get along?' 'O,' said Arty, 'I am glad we prayed to be good in the morning; for when I got to the school-yard, a boy began to kick me because I would not go somewhere with him; and I wanted to kick back again; and my new shoes are real thick, and I could a hurt him plaguily; but,' said he, in a whisper, 'I remembered what we prayed for, and I didn't kick him, nor strike him; wasn't God good to help me?' and his little face beamed with joy at his conquest over himself, through what he felt was help from God.

'Well, Tom, what say you for your day?' 'O, I shan't pray any more—it's no use—God won't make me good—I am all discouraged—[illegible]' But the vexation displayed in his countenance plainly showed that he was not well pleased with this decision. So his mother told him God would not make him good against his will. 'Ah, my son,' said she, 'God helps those that help themselves: remember this, and try again.' 'Well,' said Tom, 'I want to be a good boy, and I shall try again; and if God will only help me I shall succeed; and I will tell you all about it, mother.'

Now, little reader, I suppose you would like to know whether Tom succeeded?—Well, perhaps when I write for you again, I will tell you. A MOTHER.

A MOTHER'S LOVE.—Time, nor change, distance, disease, wrong, unkindness, cannot exhaust it. It lives a fountain of undying waters, where the outcast, the wanderer may return, and the same hand that wiped away the tears of childhood will be put forth to cool the fevered brow and the parched lips of the world's rejected victim.

Honesty the best Policy.

We asked a gentleman the other day, how he became connected with the rich family of S——'s. He has had charge of their business from youth; always been befriended by them, and through their means, acquired a very handsome little property. "I will tell you, if you wish," said the gentleman referred to.

"When I was quite a small lad, Mr. S. used to send me upon errands for him, and was accustomed to give me all the cents that I brought back, as change, when sent to purchase anything. It seemed to me that I always had cents, and a great many of them to bring back. This made me feel ashamed, as I was afraid that Mr. S. would think that I took pains to get cents in change, so that I might be sure of my pay.

One day being sent upon an errand, I had quite a number of coppers to return. I felt so bad about it that I went into a neighboring store and had them changed into silver. As it happened, Mr. S. saw me, and when I returned he questioned me closely.

"Why, my boy," said he, "did you go into that store yonder?"

I blushed, choked, and could hardly speak at first; but summoning resolution, "Sir," said I, "as I always seemed to bring back cents as change, I was afraid you would think I had the money changed on purpose, so I went into that store to obtain silver for the cents I had."

"Go right back again, you little rogue," said the gentleman poorly concealing his admiration of the act, in the stern language he used, "go right back and get your coppers, and don't you dare to do such a thing again."

Soon after this the gentleman, who was a lawyer, insisted upon this honest lad's living with him, attending upon his office, and studying with him in the interim of his duties. He has ever since been connected with the family, and to this day reaping the benefit of this high minded and honest transaction, when but a boy.

Now, little readers, the question is, whether you would have been so scrupulous? Would you not rather have been pleased to have returned as many pennies, in order that you might have had a greater reward? Perhaps you might have been tempted to change the silver into cents; but how much nobler the conduct of this lad, and how much better for him in the end. God loves and will bless the honest boy and man! Be assured, dear little firiends, (and remember it as long as you live,) Honesty is the best Policy. [S. S. Messenger.

Ferocity of a Bear.

"Benjamin Foster, son of Maj. Asael Foster, of Bridgeton, being on his way through a thicket of woods, was suddenly alarmed by the growling of a bear. He soon discovered an old she bear and two cubs. The old one immediately made toward him, growling and very fierce. He immediately took to the first tree he could find, which was about nine inches in diameter, and about twenty feet to the first limb; this he ascended with all possible speed, and having reached the limb he called to the nearest neighbor, who lived about a quarter of a mile distant, for help. The bear, on hearing his cries, retreated from the tree and hallooed also, which she repeated as often as he called for help.

The bear then returned to the tree and climbed up nearly to the first limbs, but losing her hold, she fell to the ground; this enraged her, and she again ascended the tree with still greater velocity, and overtook him at the height of about thirty feet, when she seized him by one foot, but the shoe coming off she fell to the ground; recovering, she ascended the tree a third time, he constantly calling for help and found none. He had ascended the tree as far as was safe for him to venture, the bear constantly tearing his feet with her teeth, until they became a most shocking spectacle.

The bear at length fastened her jaws so powerfully to one of his heels as to cause the limbs by which he held to break, and he fell to the ground, the bear falling at the same time on the other side of the tree; and notwithstanding his feet were in this mangled condition, he escaped to the nearest house and arrived safe. The distance from the ground by measurement, from whence the young man fell, was forty-eight feet. It is supposed that his repeated and eager cries for help tended to increase the rage and fury of the bear, which had her whelps with her."

THE ARCHER AND THE ARROW.—Injustice, or wrongfully laying the blame on others—An archer complained of his arrow because it did not hit the mark. "If you had directed me right," said the arrow, "I should not have failed."

We too often blame others, when the fault is in ourselves.

Some children, when they do wrong things, instead of owning that they were in fault, and being sorry for it, will make the most silly excuses, and blame a brother, a sister, or playmate, or servant, rather than lay the fault where it properly belongs, to their own naughtiness. [Cobbin's Fables.

EPITAPH

IN THE PARISH CHURCH OF CHELMFORD.

Bold infidel, lie down and die!
Beneath this stone an infant's ashes lie—
  Say, is he lost or saved?
If death's by sin, he died—because he's here;
If heaven's by works, in heaven he can't appear!
  Reason, ah! how depraved!
Revere the Bible's sacred page, the knot's untied—
He died, for Adam sinn'd—he lives, for Jesus died.

A Brave Boy.

At a meeting of the Royal Humane Society, Lord John Russell in the chair, one of those who were esteemed worthy of the Society's medals was a young lad, named Joseph Lague, who was received with loud cheers. We give his 'case' from the report of the Society: "On the 13th of June, 1842, a boy named Richard Ledgett, when bathing in the Regent's Canal, Camden-town, suddenly got out of his depth, and sank.—The screams of his companions brought Joseph Lague, a little fellow only 11 years of age, to the spot. Without a moment's hesitation, he threw off his jacket, and at once dived into the water. In half a minute he appeared with the boy at the surface; but the latter being nearly double his size, he was unable to support him, and he again disappeared. Lague again went down after him, and again brought him up; but his strength failing him, he was compelled to let him go. After recovering himself about a minute, he dived a third time, and after a desperate effort brought the body of Ledgett up with his head under his arm, and contrived to reach the wood work at that part of the canal against which he sustained himself, until both were taken out of the water. Lague was much exhausted, and Ledgett was quite lifeless; but by the proper and timely treatment of Dr. Escott, both were recovered.

"Thou shalt not Steal."

As I was walking down the street one day, I saw a man running away as fast as he could, and a great many people running after him, calling out, "Stop thief, stop thief!" I think if this man had been taught the commandment at the head of this article, he might not have been running away as a thief. God says, "Thou shalt not steal." Do you know, my children, what it is to steal? I will tell you. It is to take anything that is not your own. Did you ever hear of a man breaking into a house and stealing money? He was a thief. Did you ever hear of a little child stealing a lump of sugar? That child was a thief. Yes, that child was as much a thief as the man that broke into the house and stole the money. They were both thieves. Stealing a little thing makes a person a thief as much as stealing a large thing. Then remember that stealing little things is as bad as stealing large things. Shall I tell you how to avoid stealing? Before a person steals a thing he sees that thing, and then he wishes for it. I once knew a little boy who went to his mother's cupboard, and saw a pot of jam. When he saw it he wished for it, and then he took it. What should that little boy have done? Why, as soon as he saw the pot of jam he should have run away, and then he would not have wished for it. Do you remember Eve in the garden, taking the fruit God had told her she was not to touch? Well, Eve should not have gone near the tree. When she was standing under the tree, the devil came and told her she might eat the fruit, then Eve wished for it, and then took it. Now take care not to wish for things that you must not have, lest you should be tempted to steal them. I have heard of people who have begun by stealing little things, going on till they have been put into prison. If you steal little things, you do not know where you may stop. A person that is ever known to steal any thing is never trusted. People are afraid to let him come into their houses, lest he should steal something. Pray remember that taking what is not your own is stealing, whether the thing be a great thing or a little one. Children are to obey their parents, but not when they tell them to do what is wrong. Some parents send out their children to steal. But children should not obey their parents when they tell them to do wicked things. They should say, "No, God has said, 'Thou shalt not steal;' therefore we must obey God before you!" They should say this respectfully, not pertly. If you steal very little things men may not think it worth while to take you up and send you to prison, but God will put you in a prison when you die. What prison? The prison of hell. Yes, God says in the Bible that no thief shall go to heaven. Men may not always see you. If you are sly, you may steal behind their back. But where is the eye of God, ah! where is his eye? Do you know? Upon you, yes, upon you! He sees you. Think of that. If you are ever going to steal, think that God sees the wicked hand put forth, he sees it take the wished-for thing, and while you are thieving, God is preparing punishment for you. Do you know any children that steal? If you do, talk to them, and tell them how wicked it is, and try to persuade them to leave off such wicked habits. But do you steal yourselves? If you do, pray to God to forgive you for all your thefts, and pray that you may never steal any more. You would not like to be put with thieves in hell. Then leave off stealing. Remember the little verse, "Thou shalt not steal," and pray, "Lord incline my heart to keep this law." [Youth's Penny Gazette.
